

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

Muz 13.11 *

THIS BOOK IS FOR USE
WITHIN THE LIBRARY ONLY

HARVARD COLLEGE
LIBRARY

MUSIC LIBRARY

Muz 13.11 *

THIS BOOK IS FOR USE
WITHIN THE LIBRARY ONLY

HARVARD
COLLEGE
LIBRARY

MUSIC LIBRARY

THE MUSICAL WORLD,

A JOURNAL OF

Music, Literature, the Drama, Fine Arts, Foreign Intelligence,

AND COMPLETE

RECORD OF THE THEATRES AND THE CONCERT ROOM.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT NOON;

TO BE HAD IN WEEKLY NUMBERS, MONTHLY PARTS, AND ANNUAL VOLUMES.

VOLUME XXII.

London :

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY W.S. JOHNSON, "NASSAU STEAM PRESS," 60, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, CHANCING CROSS.

MDCCKLXVII.

N
Mus 13.1/ *

Harvard College Library
Mar. 15, 1921
Neumburg Fellowship fund

INDEX TO VOL. XXII.

LEADING ARTICLES.

Handel and Scariatti, page 1.—Music in America, 3.—Robert Bruce, 13.—Handel and Scariatti, (second notice) 14.—The Rival Italian Operas, 16.—Society of British Musicians, 29.—The Rival Italian Operas, 30.—Her Majesty's Theatre, 45.—The Rival Italian Operas, 61.—The Royal Italian Opera, 77.—A Chat with Rumour, 97.—Her Majesty's Theatre, 113.—Matilda of Hungary, 129.—Her Majesty's Theatre, 132.—Her Majesty's Theatre, 149.—A Second Chat with Rumour, 151.—The Beethoven Quartet Society, 165.—The Philharmonic Concerts, 181.—Jenny Lind, 197.—Philharmonic Concerts, 213.—Her Majesty's Theatre, 229.—Royal Italian Opera, 245.—Harmonia, 261.—Felix Godefrid, 277.—Mendelssohn's Elijah, 278.—Mendelssohn's Elijah, No. 2, 293.—A French Critic in London, 309.—Mendelssohn's Elijah, No. 3, 311.—Carlotta Grisi, 325.—Madame Balfé, 325.—Signor and Madame Ronconi, 325.—Jenny Lind and her Influence, 341.—Mendelssohn's Elijah, 342.—Philharmonic Concerts, 357.—Carlotta Grisi, 458.—Jenny Lind and her Influence, 373.—Herz and Sivori in America, 389.—A Friendly Chat with Punch, 389.—Jenny Lind Testimonial, 405.—Sequentialism, 405.—Mendelssohn's Elijah, 421.—Our Concert, 437.—Rachel, 437.—The Musical World Concert, 453.—The Beethoven Quartet Society, 469.—The Lumley Testimonial and Jenny Lind, 485.—The Sacred Harmonic Society, 486.—Rachel, 501.—The Swedish Nightingale, 517.—The Operatic Season, 533.—Royal Italian Opera, 533.—Her Majesty's Theatre, 549.—Her Majesty's Theatre, 565.—A Trip, to Paris, 581.—The Gloucester Festival, 597.—Alboni, 597.—A Trip to Paris, 613.—The Gloucester Festival, 630.—Letters from Paris, 645.—Letters from Paris, 661.—Letters from Paris, 667.—Letters from Paris, 684.—Letters from Paris, 699.—Letters from Paris, 715.—Letters from Paris, 731.—Letters from Paris 751.—Drury Lane, 753.—Letters from Paris, 767.—Letters from Paris, 783.—The Two Italian Operas, 799.—Grand Opera, Drury Lane, 815.

ARTICLES ORIGINAL, EXTRACTED, AND TRANSLATED.

Jullien's Album for 1847, page 22.—Mrs. Butler's Return to the Stage, 31.—Perlet and Lemaitre, 32.—Christchurch Concerts, 32.—Felix Godefrid, 32.—Mémorial de Chastelain, 47.—Madame Bishop in the Provinces, 48.—Music at Manchester, 49.—The Rival Italian Operas, 50.—Gregorianizers v. Harmonizers, 52.—The new Theatre in Leicester-square, 64.—Madame Bishop in the Provinces, 64.—Mémorial de Palestrina, 64.—Sivori in America, 79.—Madame Bishop in the Provinces, 80.—Anecdotes of Fanny Elssler, 81.—The Rival Operas, 82.—Amateur Musical Society, 86.—Mémorial de Palestrina, 99.—Something about Nothing, 100.—Musical Critics and Criticisms, 101.—M. Steveniers 101.—Music in Dublin, 102.—Amateur Musical Society, 103.—Provincial Information, 117.—Madame Bishop in the Provinces, 117.—Madame Bishop in the Provinces, 133.—Mémorial de Gretry, 134.—Jullien at Manchester, 135.—The two B's and the new Musical Paper, 152.—Madame Bishop in the Provinces, 153.—Jenny Lind and the German Students, 153.—Lola Montez, 167.—Madame Bishop in the Provinces, 167.—Music at Manchester, 171.—Jenny Lind, 183.—Lola Montez, 184.—Music at Cambridge, 185.—The tenor of the Curse, 187.—Lola Montez, 197.—Madame Bishop in the Provinces, 198.—Chappell v. Purday, 215.—Madame Bishop in the Provinces, 216.—Nicholas Zingarelli, 217.—The new Philharmonic Champion, 223.—Music in Manchester, 280.—Lola Montez and the Times, 232.—Her Majesty's Theatre, 233.—Dr. Baker, 246.—Anticipatory Criticisms on the debut of Signora Vietti at her Majesty's Theatre in two Morning Papers, 247.—Mr. Ella's Musical Union, 248.—Jullien in Dublin, 250.—Music at Manchester, 251.—Dr. Mendelssohn's Oratorio, Elijah, 256.—Tamburini, 262.—Music at Manchester, 262.—Music at Coventry, 269.—Madame Bishop in Dublin, 278.—Mendelssohn and the Philharmonic, 279.—Letters upon Musical Art, 283.—Jenny Lind and Mr. Bunn, 284.—Music at Manchester, 287.—Mr. Bunn and Drury Lane, 288.—Glasgow Musical Festival, 288.—Madame Bishop in Dublin, 297.—Linda di Chamouni in Dublin, 315.—Jenny Lind and Mr. Bunn, 326.—Mémorial de Mademoiselle Alboni, 326.—Vieuxtemps' new Concerto, 327.—Boucher and Beethoven, 327.—Startling Information, 329.—Queen's Bench, 330.—An Analysis of the Human Voice, 330.—Music at Bermuda, 343.—Mademoiselle Denain, 345.—Music in Dublin, 347.—Grisi's Norma, 374.—Music in Dublin, 377.—Music in Liverpool, 375.—An Analysis of the Human Voice, 379.—Music in Manchester, 391.—Dublin Madrigal Society, 393.—An Analysis of the Human Voice, 393.—Music in America, 394.—Mr. George Buckland, 405.—Madame Anna Bishop, 406.—Spinosa, his Merit, and his Defect, 406.—An Analysis of the Human Voice, 410.—M. Panofka, 422.—Tit Bits from the Bristol Journal, 423.—Verdi in America, 423.—Lucile Grahn, 423.—Prize Glee, 424.—An Analysis of the Human Voice, 427.—John Whitaker, 428.—Organ Performance, 428.—Hullah's New Music Hall, 429.—Flowers and Women, 433.—Piscatory Music, 438.—Leigh Hunt, 445.—Music at Manchester, 455.—Yankee Criticisms again, 455.—Jenny Lind not at Worcester, 458.—Jenny Lind at Liverpool and Birmingham, 458.—An Analysis of the Human Voice, 459.—Mr. Wilson and Mr. Dempster, 459.—Liszt at Constantinople, 463.—The Musical World Concert, 471.—Prospects for Drury Lane, 473.—Musical Revolution in Switzerland, 474.—Flowers and Women, 477.—Drury Lane and its new Management, 487.—The Sale of Shakspeare's House, 487.—An Analysis of the Human Voice, 490.—Jenny Lind again, 490.—Drury Lane Theatre, 494.—The Surrey Zoological Gardens, 495.—Music in New York, 495.—Carlotta Grisi, 496.—Rachel and Jenny Lind, 502.—The Queen and the Poet, 503.—Shakspeare's House, 503.—Flowers and Women, 503.—The Close of the Haymarket Season, 505.—Drury Lane and its Prospects, 506.—The Drama at Liverpool and Manchester, 506.—A Country Paper Puff, 512.—Shakspeare's House, 518.—Ronconi, 519.—Rachel at Manchester, 520.—Death of Mr. Egerton, 523.—An Analysis of the Human Voice, 523.—Shakspeare's House, 524.—Giorgio Ronconi, 542.—Rachel at Manchester, 544.—Music at Margate, 544.—Drury Lane and its Prospects, 555.—Mademoiselle Rachel at Liverpool, 556.—Florentino and Escudier, 557.—Jenny Lind at Brighton, 557.—Jenny Lind at Birmingham, 557.—Ancient Concerts, 560.—Music at Margate, 567.—Music and Floriculture, 568.—An Analysis of the Human Voice, 569.—Jenny Lind, 570.—The Gloucester Festival, 573.—Judges' Chambers, 574.—Her Majesty's Theatre, 585.—Jenny Lind, 586.—Giorgio Ronconi, 587.—Music at Margate, 589.—An Analysis of the Human Voice, 590.—Pauline Garcia, 598.—Fanny Elssler and the Pope, 598.—Jules Perrot, 598.—Jenny Lind, 601.—An Analysis of the Human Voice, 603.—The Gloucester Musical Festival, 614.—Jenny Lind, 618.—Leigh Hunt, 620.—Her Majesty's Theatre, 632.—An Analysis of the Human Voice, 633.—The Handel Society, 634.—Madame Bishop in America, 635.—Music at Margate, 638.—Drury Lane and its Prospects, 647.—Jenny Lind, 649.—An Analysis of the Human Voice, 650.—An Episode in the Life of Sebastian Bach, 655.—Music, 663.—Donizetti, 665.—Rubini, 666.—Reception of Mademoiselle Alboni, by the Parisian Press, 669.—Liszt and his Audience, 673.—Biographical notice of Salvi, 676.—Alboni and the Parisian Press, 685.—The Husband of a Prima Donna, 689.—The Maestro and the Manager, 691.—Bunn v. Jenny Lind, 693.—The Italians and the Feuilletonistes, 701.—Music at Manchester, 707.—Music in Dublin, 708.—An Analysis of the Human Voice, 708.—Music in America, 710.—Death of Dr. Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, 718.—Operatic Sketches, Grisi, 723.—A Religious Festival at Bologna, 726.—Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, 732.—Rules for Composition, 736.—Worcester Musical Festival, 737.—Sketch of the French Composer, Gretry, 738.—Operatic Stars' Lablache, 740.—Copyright Law, 741.—Copyright Question, Leader v. Purday, 742.—An Analysis of the Human Voice, 766.—Operatic Stars, Persiani, 758.—Papers concerning the late Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, 769.—Carlotta Grisi, 771.—Music at Manchester, 772.—An Analysis of the Human Voice, 776.—Birmingham Festival Choral Society, 777.—Guildford Choral Society, 778.—Alboni at the Opera Italien, 787.—Operatic Stars, Tamburini, 790.—Miss Birch and the Académie Royale, 791.—Pauline Viardot Garcia, 801.—Alboni at the Opera Italien, 802.—Society of British Musicians, 804.—Music in Dublin, 808.—Bunn v. Lind, 818.—Analysis of the Human Voice, 820.

MISCELLANEOUS ARTICLES.

Pages 10, 11, 24, 25, 26, 40, 41, 42, 43, 56, 57, 58, 71, 72, 73, 74, 92, 93, 109, 110, 124, 125, 142, 143, 144, 160, 161, 177, 178, 193, 194, 203, 209, 210, 223, 224, 225, 241, 242, 257, 258, 273, 274, 289, 290, 305, 306, 321, 322, 336, 351, 352, 383, 384, 401, 416, 433, 419, 464, 465, 497, 512, 513, 529, 530, 545, 561, 562, 576, 577, 578, 592, 593, 608, 609, 623, 624, 625, 610, 641, 642, 657, 658, 672, 673, 674, 678, 679, 695, 696, 711, 712, 737, 728, 747, 762, 763, 764, 779, 780, 795, 812, 833, 824.

CONCERTS.

Beaumont Institution, pages 4, 120, 176, 206.—Exeter Hall, 51, 98, 121, 176, 266, 368.—Sacred Harmonic Society, 81, 157, 192, 223, 295, 739.—Beethoven Quartet Society, 82, 205, 262, 295.—Mr. Dando's Quartet Concerts, 82, 103, 138, 175, 209.—Madame Duicken's, 83, 104, 138, 193, 237, 448.—Mr. P. Ezekiel's, 83.—Mr. Alcroft's 103, 222.—The Greenwich and Blackheath Musical Society, 103, 253.—Mrs. Alexander Newton and Mr. G. Case's, 103.—Mr. H. Phillips', 104, 156, 223.—Mr. George Marshall's, 119.—Mr. Lindsay Sloper's, 120, 156, 208.—Choral Harmonists, 120, 207, 266, 299.—Mr. Stendale Bennett's 137, 176, 209, 424.—Amateur Musical Society, 138, 176, 208.—Sussex Hall, 139, 192.—Sacred Concerts, Crosby Hall, 139, 176, 208. Horn Tavern, 156.—Mr. Genge's, 157.—Society of British Musicians, 157, 777.—Mr. Mangold's, 158.—Ancient Concerts, 175, 265, 334.—Mr. H. Russell's, 176.—Mr. E. Coulon's, 176.—Mr. Kearns' Concert, 193.—Classical Instrumental Music, 193.—Mr. Boleyn Reeve's Concert, 206.—Messrs. Distins', 206.—St. James Theatre, 206.—Mr. N. F. Sporie's Concert, 207.—Royal Academy of Music, 207, 298, 413.—Miss Dinah Farmer's, 208.—Musical Union, 208, 253, 298, 836.—Mademoiselle Rosalie Thémars Soirée, 208.—Miss Steele's Sacred Concert, 223.—Classical Concerts, Greenwich, 237.—Mr. Frederick Chatterton's Concert, 237, 852.—Concert at Swindon, 248.—Philharmonic Concerts, 253, 312, 409.—Mr. Wilson's, 254.—Mr. A. Sedgwick's, 254.—Female American Sereaders' 266.—Messrs. Gollmick and Charles Oberthur's, 298, 396.—Mr. F. Kingsbury's, 299.—M. Alexander Boucher's, 321.—Hungarian Instrumental Vocalist's, 321.—Madame Puzzi's Concert, 334.—Herr Kube's Concert, 335.—Royal Society of Female Musicians', 335.—Mr. J. Cohan's, 335.—Herr and Fraulein Helene Stopel's, 335.—Miss Wheatley's, 336.—Miss P. A. Robinson's, 336.—Herr Willmer's, 336.—Julius Sculhoff's, 359.—Signor Brizzi's, 360.—Miss M. B. Hawes, 367.—Mr. John Parry's, 368.—Mr. Charles E. Horn's, 368.—Madame Juliette Forestier's, 368.—Miss Macirone's, 384.—Cheltenham Choral Society, 394.—Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Seguin's 395.—Hanover Square Rooms, 395.—Royal Italian Opera, 396.—Madame Mortier de Fontaine's, 413.—Madame Claire Hennelle's, 413.—M. Benedict's, 414.—Mademoiselle Molena di Menda's, 415.—Madame D'Eichthal's, 432.—Don Ciebra's, 432.—M. and Madame Shepanoski's, 432.—Madame and Herr Goffie's, 433.—Mademoiselle Vera and Signor Emiliani's, 433.—Miss Dolby and Mr. Lindsay Sloper's, 447.—Mr. Stephen Chamber's, 448.—Mr. Stocking's, 448.—Madame Balfé's, 481.—Mr. Donald King's, 481.—Signor Massone's, 481.—St. Mary's Hospital, 498.—Mr. Robert Green's, 513.—Mr. Bodda's Soirée, 607.—Mr. W. M. Rooke's, 778. Private Concerts, 811.—Princess's Concert Rooms, 811.

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

DUBLIN—Pages 71, 123, 142, 160, 256, 710.—NORTHAMPTON, 726.—FARNHAM, 240.—CROYDON, 655.—CANTERBURY, 38, 39, 91.—EDINBURGH, 189, 190, 204.—GLASGOW, 142.—CLIFTON, 726.—LIVERPOOL, 65, 70, 71, 90, 141, 256, 401, 415, 512, 528, 529, 592, 622, 668, 678, 710, 726, 779, 794, 811, 822.—MANCHESTER, 23, 39, 91, 123, 240, 268, 621, 654, 668, 669, 822.—BURY ST. EDMUNDS, 761.—BRIGHTON, 89, 811.—BATH, 39, 256, 269, 678, 726, 761, 779.—DEVIZES, 39, 811.—CHELTENHAM, 23, 91, 123, 240, 639, 677, 710, 726.—WOLVERHAMPTON, 23.—LEEDS, 678, 761.—LYMINGTON, 91.—STRATFORD-ON-AVON, 828.—BIRMINGHAM, 91.—MAIDSTONE, 91, 222, 429, 709, 828.—LINCOLN, 91, 222.—DUMFRIES, 623.—HALIFAX, 56, 677.—NEWPORT, 496.—NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, 39, 726, 727.—RYDE, 23, 607.—SALISBURY, 23, 222.—TUNBRIDGE, 23.—SHREWSBURY, 71, 91, 415, 623, 823.—FOLKESTONE, 91.—WOODFORD, 91, 189.—AYR, 709.—PORTSMOUTH, 123.—PLYMOUTH, 706, 823.—DORCHESTER, 123.—LEICESTER, 128, 241, 256, 545.—PRESTON, 41.—HEREFORD, 668.—Worcester, 188, 528, 640, 822.—NOTTINGHAM, 189.—WELLINGTON, 709.—BRISTOL, 204, 256, 400, 592, 607, 640.—OXFORD, 779.—DOVER, 229.—NEWBURGH, 292.—SHEFFIELD, 240.—EXETER, 240.—BELFAST, 266, 677.—GUILDFORD, 298, 668.—GLOUCESTER, 401.—LIMERICK, 416.—DEDHAM, 497.—PAISLEY, 794.—HODDSDON, 811.—LANCASTER, 811.—RICHMOND, 822.—WALWORTH, 823.—MARGATE, 823.—WATFORD, 823.

NOVELS AND ROMANCES.

"The Affinities" (continued), Pages 6, 18, 33, 53, 66, 84, 104, 118, 135, 154, 168, 185, 200, 215, 231, 249, 263, 280, 296, 313, 328, 343, 360, 375, 391, 407, 425, 439, 456, 471, 488, 504, 520, 539, 553, 568, 583, 599, 616, 632, 648, 664, 672, 688, 702, 721, 735, 754, 770, 786, 801, 818.

FINE ARTS.

Page 778.

REVIEWS OF BOOKS.

Christmas Carols, with the old tunes, 21.—Nursery Rhymes, with the old tunes, 21.—The Silver Swan, 22.—Christopher Tadpole, 36.—Domby and Son, 37.—January Eve, 37.—Fine Arts Journal, 88.—The Lady's Newspaper, 88.—The Stage as it is, 559.—Notes upon Dancing, 576.

REVIEWS OF MUSIC.

Pages 22, 70, 108, 123, 188, 221, 269, 270, 305, 316, 363, 364, 379, 401, 412, 413, 428, 429, 462, 495, 511, 525, 559, 575, 576, 592, 607, 608, 619, 620, 634, 655, 667, 674, 693, 705, 706, 727, 746, 747, 757, 758, 776.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

Pages 22, 37, 56, 69, 89, 108, 124, 141, 188, 221, 233, 284, 269, 288, 289, 315, 332, 333, 415, 458, 496, 511, 527, 558, 559, 574, 590, 605, 606, 620, 621, 638, 689, 651, 682, 687, 668, 677, 693, 694, 706, 746, 794, 810, 822.

POETRY.

"Sonnets," by N. D. Pages 10, 21, 34, 54, 67, 86, 108, 119, 136, 158, 171, 187, 203, 217, 232, 250, 265, 283, 297, 315, 330, 346, 363, 377, 393, 408, 426, 441, 458, 473, 490, 505, 522, 542, 554, 569, 585, 601, 633, 649, 660, 673, 691, 703, 722, 738, 771, 787, 802, 820.
"My home in the City," by F. W. N. Bayley, 36.
"Music, thy bewitching charm," by W. L., 720.
"Poems upon Little Edith," by Coventry Patmore, 38.
"Music's Charms," by W. L., 694.
"Adelaida," translated by Dion Bourcicault, 69.
"Lament for Mendelssohn," 759.
"Ballad from Geibel," by C. Rosenberg, 90.
"Lines to R. W.," by Hermann Lang, 884.
"Ane Modern Version of 'Jenny's Bawbee,'" by Andrew Park, 561.
"The War of the Normas," (from the Man in the Moon) 496.
"Reverie," by Camilla Toulmin, 576.
"Thoughts on Music," by Shirley Brooks, 606.
"Music," by Anna Maria Piper, 693.
"Closing of Covent Garden," (from the Man in the Moon), 689.
"Epigram on the late Trial of Pestal, 772.
"Lines on the death of Mendelssohn," 808.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARIS, 40; 187, 573, 605, 623, 655, 805, 806.—MILAN, 40, 92, 108, 233, 459, 591, 603, 605, 638, 694.—VIENNA, 39, 108, 158, 725.—NAPLES, 108.—VENICE, 56, 623, 694.—BERLIN, 56, 70, 573, 623.—DRESDEN, 70, 674.—ST. PETERSBURGH, 188, 220.—FRANKFORT, 174.—ROME, 604.—BONN, 573.—HAMBURG, 557.—CASSEL, 92.—HANOVER, 724, 756.—BRUSSELS, 605.—BERGAMO, 605.—MADRID, 756.—BOULOGNE-SUR-MER, 92, 528, 556.—STRASSBOURG, 572.—BRESCIA, 605.—BADEN BADEN, 604.—MADRAS, 591.—NEW YORK, 572, 706.—PHILADELPHIA, 89, 123.—HAVANNAH, 726.—FLORENCE, 820.—PADUA, 821.—THE HAGUE, 821.—LEIPZIG, 807.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

PANTOMIMES AND CHRISTMAS PIECES—Page 8.
HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE, 172, 191, 198, 219, 254, 270, 267, 268, 318, 331, 347, 365, 390, 398, 410, 430, 441, 460, 479, 491, 508, 526, 540.
ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, 217, 234, 271, 286, 300, 316, 331, 348, 366, 382, 396, 411, 431, 442, 460, 477, 492, 508, 526, 542, 555.
SHAKSPEARE'S NIGHT, 793.
DRURY LANE, 8, 21, 67, 86, 121, 189, 158, 190, 204, 238, 284, 299, 665, 675, 704, 722, 792, 821.
HAYMARKET, 9, 21, 34, 54, 68, 86, 106, 139, 174, 204, 238, 251, 267, 299, 333, 364, 394, 408, 446, 468, 493, 509, 619, 652, 669, 674, 708, 722, 744.
PRINCESS'S, 9, 21, 35, 55, 68, 104, 139, 159, 205, 229, 267, 284, 300, 383, 384, 377, 394, 409, 463, 622, 653, 670, 722, 789, 773.
SADLER'S WELLS, 522, 573, 637, 672, 723, 761, 775, 809.
ADELPHI, 9, 21, 55, 139, 159, 174, 239, 350, 408, 676, 760, 821.
LYCEUM, 8, 68, 240, 809.
OLYMPIC, 55.
SURREY, 68, 267, 522, 637, 653, 676, 706, 761, 798, 821.
FRENCH PLAYS, 19, 34, 53, 68, 87, 106, 122, 140, 159, 190, 203, 238, 252, 267, 286, 300, 318, 333, 350, 378, 394, 409, 427, 446, 468, 478, 494, 510, 793, 809.
ASTLEY'S, 523, 723.
MARTLEBORNE, 574, 672, 761, 774.

The Musical World.

(PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT NOON.)

A RECORD OF THE THEATRES, MUSIC, LITERATURE, FINE ARTS,
FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE, &c.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s. Stamped; 12s. Unstamped; to be forwarded by Money Order or Postage Stamps to the Publisher, W. S. Johnson, "Nassau Steam Press," 60, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross.

Each Subscriber is entitled to an Admission to an Annual Concert, and a Piece of Music, (regular Music size) Monthly.

No. 1.—VOL. XXII.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, 1847.

PRICE THREEPENCE
STAMPED, FOURPENCE

HANDEL AND SCARLATTI.

HANDEL'S "Suites de Pièces," in two books, edited by MOSCHELES; SCARLATTI'S "Pièces pour le Clavecin," edited by J. B. CRAMER.—CRAMER, BEALE, & Co., 201, Regent Street.

HANDEL'S Suites de Pièces were composed before the symphonic form, suggested by Gossec, Vanhall, Ditters, &c., and perfected by Haydn, was known. A suite de pièces consists of four or five movements of various characters, but in the same key. Each movement is complete in itself, though the composer's intention is to have the whole played as one piece. A suite de pièces is consequently a set of pieces to be performed at one time, as a single composition. Handel and John Sebastian Bach produced the finest specimens of this form of composition, and indeed the only ones now known that have any musical interest or value. Handel also composed sets of fugues for the harpsichord. Scarlatti's "Pièces" consist of single movements, nearly in the same form as some of the shorter pieces of Handel. Occasionally a fugue stands in the place of a piece. The Fantasia, invented by Bach, a kind of feat in modulation without regular form, was for some time confined to that composer and his son, Phillip Emanuel. Mozart, however, subsequently produced specimens which far excelled those of the inventor, and Beethoven, still later, united the attraction of orchestral accompaniment to the same kind of composition. The fantasias of Mendelssohn and Bennett are misnamed, since they differ in nothing from the regular sonata. The fantasias of the school of modern-romanticists, are, in comparison with such music, little better than nonsense. Hummel alone, among the recent composers for the pianoforte, has given specimens of the real fantasia, invented by Bach, and perfected by Mozart—perfected by Mozart, we say, because he found the art of combining melody, exquisitely developed, with the exigencies of this kind of writing, without departing from its original form—and thus doubled its attraction.

In Handel's first book, which is by far the most elaborate, there are eight sets of pieces. In five of them there are fugues, which, with deference to those who place Bach above Handel in this species of composition, we insist are the finest existing models. But we shall speak of them in their places. The first Suite consists of a prelude, an allemande, a courante, and a gigue, four pieces, varying in character, and all in the key of A major. The Prelude, as the modern acceptance of the word implies, is a number of discursive chords and passages, without form, in the key of the piece which is to follow. The only difference between the present one and a prelude likely to come from the fingers or the head of a modern pianist is to be found in the nature of its progressions, which though rare are very fine. (En passant, we may say that the preludes in the Clavier bien temperé, and other works of Bach, are usually elaborate compositions in which a particular figure of melody is carried through a variety of keys by a regular series of modulations and progressions. Mendelssohn's preludes are much longer, but are generally formed on this model, of which Handel has given very few specimens.) The Allemande (a piece in the German style we presume) is a melody in two parts, the one ending with a half close, the other with a full close in the key. Each part is repeated. The object of this kind of movement appears to be the development of a melody by the assistance of rich and various harmonies, and cunning interruptions and protractions of the cadence, so as to obtain a beautiful and satisfactory climax. The first Suite of Handel presents one of the most exquisite specimens of this lengthened melody, the art of producing which now seems to hang by the single thread of Mendelssohn's existence. It is in three parts, each of which is a melody almost complete in itself. The Allemande is always in common time; the style graceful or passionate, but never capricious or trivial. The Courante has much the same characteristics as the Allemande, with the exception that it is invariably in three-time, 3-4 or 3-8. The present, is a most finished and beautiful specimen. The Gigue is a quick lively movement in 12-8, 9-8, or 6-8 time. This movement is generally characterised by a quantity of free imitations, the subject not seldom being answered immediately in canon. It is written, with few deviations, in two parts throughout, and requires great neatness and agility of finger to execute properly. The present gigue in 12-8 time, is a short, but excellent specimen of this kind of movement, and being one of the least elaborate will be more easily compassed by the amateur pianist.

Suite II, comprises an adagio, an allegro, another adagio, and a fugue, all in F, except the second adagio, which is a fragment beginning and ending on the dominant of D minor. As this is the only instance we can find where one of the suites is interrupted by a movement in a different key from the rest, we cannot but consider it an accidental interpolation from the suite immediately following, which is in the key of D minor. The adagio in Suite II, is a fragment which chiefly serves to display the performer's agility in trills and ornaments, for which it is a mere frame-work. This was the characteristic of adagio-playing in Handel's time. It was for Haydn to discover the slow-movement as it now stands, with developed melody and symmetrical form to back it. By some freak of fancy, Handel has made this fragment end in A minor, although it begins in F, and the allegro, which follows—an exquisite specimen of writing in two parts, the right hand florid and the left hand simple—is also in F. The fugue with which this suite concludes is most masterly. The inner-counterpoint to the third answer is made use of as a second subject, with wonderful skill. This fugue not only displays the profoundest learning and ingenuity, but is beautiful from beginning to end, the subjects being melodious, and the harmony natural and pure. It is here that we find Handel superior to Bach. In the fugues of the latter, with few exceptions, there are points which a refined ear cannot tolerate; but in those of Handel, the progressions are so natural, the parts flow so easily, and yet in fine counterpoint, that no such disagreeable effects can ever be found in them. Our theory is that the laws of harmony cannot possibly be violated with impunity, and as Handel rarely or never violates them, we consider him a more legitimate musician than Bach, who constantly does. And yet we yield to none in our veneration for that great man's genius, which we hold to have been one of the phenomena of the era in which he flourished.

The third suite is in D minor. It begins with a brilliant prelude of scale passages and arpeggios, which is followed by a fugue. This perhaps, is not so exquisitely finished as the fugue in the preceding suite, but its character is more passionate. The subject is mysterious, and one of the counterpoints is most charmingly treated as an episode, in two parts, near the end; this point is of itself worth a whole modern opera. The point which will least please musicians in this fugue is a long digression into F, beginning with a somewhat trite sequence, and ending with a sequence on the dominant pedal, which is borrowed from the fugue in F in the preceding suite. An allemande and a courante, which come after the fugue, are both lovely. An air with variations concludes the suite. The air is in the florid style of the adagio in the last suite, but the variations formed upon its outline are ingenious and beautiful. There are five of them; the first three are the most beautiful; the second has a florid base, and the third a florid inner part, on the top of which rides the melody. (Cramer and Steibelt have each borrowed this variation for the basis of one of their studies. Cramer wrote his in E major, thinking to avert recognisance of the theft. Steibelt, more bold, assumed the same key, and almost the same notes, as Handel. Steibelt's is the best study of the two after all, which will go far to excuse his appropriation of Handel's property.) After the five variations, a very fine movement, presto, in 3-8 time, developed to considerable length, concludes the third suite.

The fourth suite, in E minor, begins with the brilliant and magnificent fugue in that key, which is known to all pianists who love good music. This is perhaps the finest composition in the entire Suites de pieces, but the difficulties attending its execution are enormous. You may play Liszt and Thalberg wholesale without being able to play this fugue. An allemande and a courante follow; they are plaintive and beautiful, and will remind the performer of similar movements in the Seven Characteristic Pieces which Mendelssohn composed in his early youth, when red-hot from the study of his Bach and Handel. The influence of these great writers on the style of the greatest composer now living cannot indeed be overlooked, or too often considered. A Sarabande comes next. This is a slow dance tune in 3-4 measure, in the style of a minuet, but played more leisurely. Handel makes these dances the frame-work for the finest harmonic progressions. The fourth suite concludes with a gigue, in 12-8—a pretty subject treated for the most part in free canon. The only fault of this gigue is its brevity, the whole being compassed in a single page.

The fifth suite, in E major, comprises a prelude in the style of Bach—an allemande, the longest and most beautiful of all—a courante of almost equal merit—and the charming air with variations popularly known as the "Harmonious Blacksmith." This suite is sure to be the most in favor, not only with amateurs, but the majority of professors. Be it so—though there is no fugue, the allemande and courante will be all powerful in their influence, and taste must be perfected by the study of such refined specimens of art.

The sixth suite comprises a fine prelude à la Bach, a stately largo in 3-4 time with some grand points of harmony, a sublime fugue with two subjects, and a gigue, the best composition of its kind in the book—the whole being in F sharp minor.

The seventh suite, in G minor, sets out with an overture, which consists of an adagio in the florid style, followed by a short presto, repeated twice, with the intervention of a fragment of the adagio after the first time; the allegro is a kind of free fugato (a short movement with imitations in the fugued style), and a striking character is given to it by its unbroken rhythm and sustained dotted accent. A beautiful andante, in the style of the allemande, gives way to another allegro, a sort of courante in double time (3-8 instead of 3-4), a movement somewhat in the manner of Scarlatti, but more profoundly treated than anything that master has left us. But for the antique cut of the cadences this short movement might have passed under the name of Mendelssohn. At all events the influence which the harpsichord music of Handel has had in developing and coloring the style of that great musician is strikingly exemplified in this allegro, which is incontestably the germ of more than one of those intermezzo movements wherein Mendelssohn is so fertile, and which, by the way, are very often in the key of G minor, that of the present suite. The allegro is followed by another sarabande and a very fine one, which in its turn is replaced by a gigue, short and sweet. The whole concludes with a passacaille—a series of variations on a short harmonic progression. The progression chosen by Handel in the present instance is as follows:—common chord of G minor, 6-3 on E flat, common chord of F major, ditto of B flat major, ditto of E flat major, 6-3 on C, seventh on D with major third, and common chord of G minor. On this simple progression he has founded no less than fifteen variations. These are brilliant and effective, but not otherwise remarkable.

The eighth suite, and last of the first book, is in F minor. It opens with a fine prelude, which, after going through a variety of beautiful progressions, stops upon the dominant harmony and gives way to a fugue on one subject, answered in the fourth below, and written in three or four parts ad libitum. This, though the least elaborate of the five fugues contained in the suite, is by no means the least striking. The subject is simple and majestic, and the treatment masterly. A magnificent effect is produced in several places, by the introduction of the subject in full harmony. The last time this occurs, the subject is given in the bass, in full chords, and a sublime point is effected by a sudden progression to the relative major of the key, which must be heard to be understood. This point alone induced us to play the fugue over a dozen times, for the sake of coming to it in its proper place and receiving exactly the same sensation of surprise at every repetition. An allemande, a courante, (both beautiful) and a gigue almost as good as the one in F sharp minor, conclude this suite and the first book. The subject of the gigue is answered in canon on the octave, and a capital contrast is produced by reversing the subject in the second part, taking the dominant harmony in place of the tonic, and vice versa.

We must defer noticing the second book of Suites de Pieces, and the Pieces of Scarlatti till our next, having exceeded our limits already. Meanwhile let us most urgently recommend all our readers, who are pianists, and who wish to make acquaintance (not being already acquainted) with one of the greatest works that have ever enriched the repertoire of the harpsichord—or, as it is now improved and developed, the pianoforte—to purchase without delay the first book of Handel, of which we have drawn up this crude and hasty sketch. It bears strong marks of having been a labor of love, and abounds in evidences of that astonishing genius which elsewhere manifested has long been ranked among the wonders of the world. The present edition is beautifully engraved and printed, and when in the second impression the few errors that have escaped the experienced eye of Mr. Moscheles, the editor, shall have been rectified, it will be perfect. A little more of such music as this, and a little less of the modern fantasia-school, would benefit extremely the musical taste of the country.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

THE papers that have lately reached us confirm the prophesy of our New York correspondent, that the arrival of Henri Herz would be the cause of a world of disagreeables between that celebrated pianist and "The Lion." From The American and Commercial Daily Advertiser, a paper printed at Baltimore, we extract a series of letters which will give a better notion of the state of affairs than any comment we could make on them. It appears that Leopold de Meyer and Henri Herz were to give each a concert in the same room within a day or two of one another—that De Meyer, after giving his concert, neglected to have his piano-fortes removed, which caused so much inconvenience to Herz as to lead to very angry proceedings on his part. But let the correspondence speak for itself. The first letter is from Leopold de Meyer, and is an appeal to the public against the conduct of his rival.

"TO THE PUBLIC.

"The undersigned is particularly indisposed to appear before the public of Baltimore, from whom he has received the kindest indulgence, upon a subject rather of a private than of a public nature. Yet, he feels it due to himself to make a simple statement of facts, in the event of any occurrence in the future of a similar character, and suggested by similar feelings. The citizens of Baltimore are aware, that the undersigned gave a concert in this city, at Calvert Hall, on Wednesday evening, and as usual left his pianos in the building, which he was informed yesterday morning were so disposed of as to leave no possible inconvenience to Mons. Herz, who was announced to give a concert, in the same place last evening. It was, therefore, much to the surprise of the undersigned that he received a note from the servant of Mr. Herz last evening, shortly before 6 o'clock, when the rain was pouring down in torrents, of which the following is a translated copy:—

'The two pianos of Meyer, have to be taken away immediately, or they will be thrown into the yard of the Hall.'

B. ULLMANN.

"Upon the receipt of this abrupt and offensive note, Mr. Meyer, unwilling either to cause any annoyance to Mr. Herz, or to subject himself to inconvenience by the wanton destruction with which his instruments were threatened, requested his friend, Mr. G. Reitheimer, to call immediately upon Mr. Herz, at Calvert Hall, and attend to the business. He there met Mr. Herz, and suggested, in consequence of the state of the weather, that the piano should remain, alluding at the same time to the impertinent note of Ullmann. Mr. Herz observed that he should not interfere in the matter, and that whatever had been done by his servant, was by his approval. Mr. Reitheimer at once proceeded to remove the pianos, though at considerable risk, and with some injury to one of them. This conduct is the more inexplicable in view of another fact of recent occurrence in New York, and which, but for the transaction of yesterday, the undersigned should never have brought before the public. During the absence of Mr. Meyer at Philadelphia, Mr. Herz announced a concert in New York, with eight pianos; at that time Mr. Meyer had one of his superb Erard pianos, in that city, in charge of Messrs. Scharfenberg and Lui*, Broadway, which, with a most strange and vague idea of the proprieties of life, Mr. Herz actually possessed himself of, and procured to be removed to the Tabernacle for his purpose, upon representations to those gentlemen, that Mr. Meyer would not object, and that he would be responsible to Mr. M. for what he did. Information being telegraphed to Mr. Meyer, at Philadelphia, he of course took measures to prohibit such an invasion of his rights. It is but charitable to imagine a cause for the very remarkable conduct of Mr. Herz, and the undersigned is led to suppose, that the effect of the weather last evening, being so very unfavorable to the gentleman's projected concert, it also by sympathy, touched his nervous system, and he was thus led to act so very rudely. It is proper to say to the public, that the pianos of Mr. Meyer, will be restored to their position in the Hall, on this (Friday) morning, preparatory to the concert of the evening.

LEOPOLD DE MEYER."

Herr Reitheimer is the chargé d'affaires of the "Lion Pianist," and has got him both out of and into several scrapes since his visit to the Yankees. He is a very useful appendage, nevertheless, to De Meyer's train, although he speaks English with little fluency and writes it with less. The next letter is a counter-statement, on the part of Herz, signed Bernard Ullmann, A.M.—for be it known that Herz also is attended by a chargé d'affaires.

"TO THE PUBLIC.

"In an address to the public in this morning's Sun, M. Leopold De Meyer has sought to provoke M. Henri Herz into a newspaper controversy, and has endeavoured to give point to his address by calling the undersigned M. Herz' servant, and by using other impertinences of language which it would not be becoming now to notice. At the risk of giving M. De Meyer a consequence which he does not merit, by noticing his communication, the undersigned contents himself with saying that his publication, in every essential particular, is entirely false, as the following brief narrative of facts, fortified by affidavit, will show. The platform at Calvert Hall is too small to hold, at the same time, the pianos of M. Herz and M. De Meyer. M. De Meyer had given his concert on Wednesday, and should have removed his pianos, early next morning as Mr. Herz's concert was immediately to follow. This he did not do; and the undersigned stated to Mr. Burke, (an assistant of M. De Meyer,) at nine o'clock on Thursday morning, that he would require the removal of the large piano only, and that the smaller one might remain. This was said in the presence of witnesses, and was intended solely to consult the convenience of M. De Meyer. No trouble, whatever, was taken to remove either of the pianos; and as night was fast approaching, the undersigned was informed by the person in charge of the Hall, that M. De Meyer refused to remove them, and the note which has been published became necessary. With reference to the second charge, falsely made, in relation to the piano of M. De Meyer in New York, the facts are these:—M. De Meyer, called upon Mr. Herz, and in the presence of several witnesses, offered him the use of one of his pianos, which Mr. Herz said he would accept if it became necessary, and on the evening of his concert, he had it removed to the Tabernacle. M. De Meyer's agent, apparently ignorant of this arrangement between Mr. Herz and M. De Meyer, came and ordered it away just previous to the concert, and without any notice of his intention so to do, to which Mr. Herz made no objection.—Upon a subsequent occasion, when Messrs. De Meyer and Herz again met, M. De Meyer, as the undersigned understood, apologised for the act of his agent, and said it had originated in mistake. Nothing more was heard of the transaction until it now appears in print, in M. De Meyer's communication. These are the plain facts, and the public can judge of them. M. De Meyer's difficulties, heretofore with Thalberg, with Sivori, and with every other artist who appears, as he supposes, to stand in his way; his unblushing method of reaching the public through the press, as disclosed in the late trial between Burchard and himself, for the price of the puff, and now this attempt to embroil Mr. Herz in controversy with him, will sufficiently convince the public, that he relies upon other means for giving himself consequence than professional science. The undersigned forbears to trouble the public with a narrative of the attempts which M. De Meyer has made to induce him, whom he now impertinently designates as the servant of Mr. Herz, to become subservient to his, M. De Meyer's ends, by puffing him into notice, and perhaps some parts of his present insolence may be attributed to the indignation with which the undersigned refused to receive from him a gold snuff box, as the price of a desired puff. BERNARD ULLMANN, A.M., Doctor of Philosophy, and Elève of the Imperial Polytechnic Institution of Vienna, Aus. State of Maryland, City of Baltimore, sc:—On this 20th day of November, 1846, B. Ullmann made oath before me, a Justice of the Peace for the said city, that the matters above set forth are true as stated.

Sworn before

G. D. SPURRIER."

But we do not stop here. Leopold de Meyer is not the man to be easily put down. Read his address to Henri Herz—a document which, for diplomatic cunning, might vie with the masterpieces of Talleyrand.

"TO HENRI HERZ.

"A publication in the Patriot of yesterday evening, under the name of an individual, who, instead of your savant, should, it seems, have been styled your savant, demands a passing notice. In regard to that statement, should you have authorised it, I now declare it to be untrue that I ever gave my consent that you should use one of my grand pianos at your concert with eight instruments, which took place in New York; nor did I ever apologise for, or in any way excuse the conduct of my friend, Mr. Reithimer, or deem it desirable so to do. On the contrary, his proceedings were prompt and proper, as a suitable rebuke to the impertinence of the act by which my piano had been appropriated, and I warmly approved what he had done. Indeed, upon learning that he had expressed his sentiments with regard to the impertinence of that act, when he recovered the instrument from the Tabernacle at the time of the rehearsal, I immediately sanctioned his conduct. In expressing his own feelings, he had given utterance to mine. In reference to the statement of your savant, that Mr. Burke received any communication relative to the pianos at 9 o'clock in the morning, it was either an inexcusable mistake, or a wilful misrepresentation. And I must also use the same language with regard to the assertion, that I refused to remove the pianos from the Hall, from the simple fact, that the first intimation I had of your desire that they should be removed, was the offensive and disreputable note received from your savant. And now, sir, a parting word. Concealed as you choose to be, under the shelter of your savant that you may avoid the necessity of an excuse "to the public" for your discourtesy, unworthy of a true artist, and permitting him to thrust forward private and irrelevant matters, I take occasion to invite the attention of the public to the correspondence of Signor Rapetti in the New York press of the 9th and 10th inst., for a full exhibition of those traits of your character which are calculated, unhappily, at once to excite pity and contempt. The unwise, and not to say most unjust insinuation of your savant against the character of the American press, as a mercenary instrumentality, I leave to be adjusted between him and a profession which I deemed beyond reproach, and whose members are so well able to defend her. In leaving this subject I do so with the assurance that this is the last communication I shall deem it my duty to make with you through the medium of the public press.

LEOPOLD DE MEYER, Pianiste to H. M., Emperor of Austria, &c. &c.

* * * TO THE PUBLIC.—I have been induced to appear in this manner once more before my numerous friends and the public of Baltimore, less from a sense of any necessity to refute the misrepresentations of the article under notice, than from a momentary indignation at the receipt of a menacing note from the distinguished savant of Mr. Herz, who, with a degree of impudence and presumption, I scarcely know which most to admire, desires me to refrain from any notice of this publication, under peril of being assailed by him in the press of New York, Philadelphia and Havana. This very simple-minded individual has yet to learn that he has entirely mistaken the character of the undersigned.

L. DE MEYER."

Is it not sad to contemplate such unworthy squabbling among artists, who, in their own walk, are equally incomparable! Surely in the United States there is room for more than one great pianist—and surely Herz and De Meyer are unlike enough in the peculiarities of their genius to make it well worth the while of the Yankee amateurs to hear them both, and pay for the hearing. Fie upon the European artists who thus forget themselves! But let us hasten to extract from another journal, The Philadelphia Public Ledger, a correspondence more creditable to Leopold de Meyer, and by consequence, more interesting to his friends and admirers on this side of the Atlantic. It records the fact of a testimonial having been presented to the celebrated Austrian pianist, by the Philharmonic Society of Philadelphia.

BEAUTIFUL TESTIMONIAL.—M. Leopold de Meyer was on Saturday evening honoured by the Philharmonic Society of Philadelphia with the presentation of a beautiful silver cup, of exquisite workmanship, about eighteen inches high. The cup is embellished with a design representing a lion playing upon a piano, musical emblems, and an appropriate inscription. A number of speeches were delivered on the occasion, and the following impromptu was made by J. P. Moss, Esq.

"Rame raised her trumpet, and she loudly blew—

"The great De Meyer's come! to him what praise is due!"
Euterpe answered, 'Why do you inquire?'

The cup will be exhibited at Mr. Scherr's, Pianoforte Manufactory, Chesnut Street, above Ninth, until Wednesday. The following is the correspondence which took place on the occasion.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 11th, 1846.

"My dear Sir—I am directed by the Managers of the Philharmonic Society to tender to you their grateful acknowledgments for the high honor you have conferred on the Society by your gratuitous and invaluable services at our concert last evening, and also to request your acceptance of the accompanying cup as a small testimonial of their high appreciation of you as an artist, and their regard and friendship for you as a man. Accept it, my dear sir, and have the goodness to place it in your cabinet among similar "tokens of feeling," and to regard our amateur association as one among the many thousands of your delighted and gratified audiences on this side of the Atlantic. We hailed your visit to this country in the anticipation of the impetus you would give to the cause of music, and the delight we would experience in listening to the strains of the first master of his time. We have now the additional pleasure of gratitude, for the good feeling which has recognized in our humble effort a principle worthy the encouragement of your great talents. Rest assured, that if, when in other lands, this little souvenir should bring back to you any recollections of last evening, that your kindness is still warmly cherished by the Philharmonic Society of Philadelphia, and that your appearance before it will always be remembered as a proud event in its annals. I feel myself highly honored in being made the medium of communicating the thanks of our association, and beg leave at the same time to present my individual wishes for your continual prosperity and happiness. Respectfully, yours,

Signed,

A. G. WATERMAN,
President of the Philharmonic Society."

LEOPOLD DE MEYER.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 15, 1846.

"Dear Sir,—It affords me the greatest possible pleasure to tender to you, as the medium of the high compliment bestowed on me this evening by the members of the Philharmonic Society, my warmest thanks, and to express the feelings of gratitude I entertain for the kind assistance they have manifested towards me. I acknowledge with pride and pleasure the receipt of the beautiful token of friendship which the society, through you, has been pleased to offer me, and rest assured that when the broad Atlantic shall separate me from the shores of America, and indeed wherever I may be through life, I shall turn to the souvenir with delightful eyes, and always remember with the best wishes my kind friends in Philadelphia. Modesty forbids replying to that portion of your highly complimentary letter, where you are pleased to award such flattering praise to my humble merits; and now let me tender you my sincere regard, not only as one whose real and persevering efforts to advance the cause of music are so well known and appreciated, but also as a highly esteemed citizen, (Qy—Who? De Meyer, or the secretary?) and believe me, my dear sir, I feel grateful for your kind wishes for my prosperity, and the knowledge of promising your personal friendship to me will always be a souvenir of unfeigned pleasure.

I remain, dear sir, with much respect, yours truly,

LEOPOLD DE MEYER."

"To A. G. WATERMAN, Esq., President Philharmonic Society."

(The above letter, we presume, from the style of its phraseology, to have proceeded, from the pen of De Meyer, chargé d'affaires.)

How much more pleased should we be to have only such events as the above to record, instead of being the unwilling chroniclers of disputes and acts of petty envy, which, on the part of men of genius and talent, are as surprising as they are disgraceful. We must confess, ex passant, that our intimate knowledge of the two men, leads us insensibly to exonerate Henri Herz from any blame whatever. He is the last man to put up with an offence, but he is equally, in our opinion, the last man to offer one. It is singular, at any rate, that Herz and Sivori should both have cause of complaint against De Meyer, and none whatever against each other. On the contrary, they are the best friends in the world.

CONCERT AT THE BEAUMONT INSTITUTION.

THE amateurs and connoisseurs of music at the East end are determined not to be outdone by the concert-givers of the more lordly section of the metropolis in providing all that is excellent and recherché for their visitors. The entertainments on Tuesday evening, at the Beaumont Institution, Beaumont Square, Mile-end Road, proved that the march of music was abroad, and that the love of art was pervading every class of society. The projectors of the concert must have been aware of the taste and judgment previously exhibited by the audiences of the Institution, or they would not have provided so very superior a feast of music as they did on Tuesday—superior, whether we consider the compositions to be interpreted, or the interpreters. The fact alone of Madame Bishop's services being obtained, speaks loudly in favour of the enterprising spirit of the establishment. Madame Bishop was engaged at a large sum, but the crowded state of the room proved that the managers of the concert did not reckon without their host procuring the assistance of England's greatest singer and greatest artist. We were both pleased and surprised at witnessing the excellent judgment displayed by the auditors of the Institution, in the marks of approbation they bestowed on the artists. Madame Bishop was listened to with the most breathless suspense until the close of each of her morceaux, when the whole audience broke out into the most tumultuous applause, which lasted several minutes. Before making any further remarks, we shall append the programme, which ran as follows:—

PART I.

Fantasia, Organ, Mr. Chitty, (organist of St. James's, Ratcliff)	Chitty.
Tertetto, Guai se ti sfugge, (Lucrezia Borgia) Madame F. Lablache, Mr. Manvers, and Signor F. Lablache.	Donisetti.
Buffo Song, Largo al factotum, Signor F. Lablache, (Il Barbiere di Siviglia)	Rossini.
Scena, Oh, 'tis a glorious sight, Mr. Manvers, (Oberon)	Weber.
Recitative, Al tempo move, } Madame Anno Bishop,	Donisetti.
Cavatina, Ah, quando } (Ugo di Parigi)	Macfarren.
Song, Why do we love? Made. F. Lablache, (Don Quixotte)	Case.
Fantasia, Concertina, Auld lang syne, Mr. G. Case,
Duet, Les Muletiers, Madame F. Lablache and Signor F. Lablache,	Masini.
Recitative, The bosom of yon waters, } Madame Bishop,
Ballad, On the banks of Guadalquivir, } (Loretta)	Lavenu.
(Composed expressly for her)
Scene, Mr. John Parry. Arranged by	John Parry.

PART II.

Duet, Senza tanti complementi, Madame F. Lablache and Signor F. Lablache,	Donisetti.
Song, Philip the Falconer, Mr. Manvers,	Loder.
Cavatina, O come rapida, Madame Bishop, (Crociato in Egitto)	Meyerbeer.
Song, Miei rampolli, Signor F. Lablache (La Cenerentola)	Rossini,
Song, I cannot suffer if I would, Mr. Manvers (Night Dancers)	Loder.
Solo, Vio in air Varie, Mr. G. Case,	Case.
Rondo Finale, Ah, heart be hushed and calm, Madame Anna Bishop (Loretta)	Lavenu.
Scotch Song, Come row me o'er, Madame F. Lablache.
Domestic Scene, Matrimony! (By Desire) Mr. John Parry,	John Parry.

Mr. Chitty's fantasia was nothing more, nor less, than a selection of subjects, and airs, taken at random, and used without the least art. Among these airs, and subjects, we recognised the chorus of priests from Spohr's Jessonda, an aria from Der Freyschutz, "Lucy Neal," an air de ballet from La Donna del Lago, "Love Not," and "God save the Queen." The tertetto from Lucrezia Borgia did not go well. The famous song from the Barbiere, was excellently given by Frederick Lablache, albeit his singing was considerably marred by the inefficiency of the conductor, who played the accompaniments in all sorts of ways, but the right way. We must allow that the pianoforte accompaniments to "Largo al factotum," are by no means easy to be mastered on the instrument. Mr. Manvers was not equal to the trying scena from Oberon. The recitative and Cavatina from Ugo di Parigi are admirably adapted to Madame Bishop's powers and voice. They involve the greatest brilliancies of fioriture, the most expressive melodical phrases, and demand from the interpreter the most chaste and delicate conception, conjoined with the most artistic finish. The last movement especially displayed to perfection Madame Bishop's art and skill. We never heard composition more exquisitely rendered. The chromatic passages, the shakes fortissimo and piano, the descending shakes, the cadenzas so novel and so striking, the elaborate and rapid fioriture executed with the ease of the most perfect instrument, all proved Madame Bishop beyond a doubt, one of the greatest singers of modern times. The applause consequent on this prodigious vocal display was uproarious, and an encore was tumultuously called for, but was not persisted in, the audience considerably making allowance for the great exertion of the singer. Macfarren's exquisite song was very nicely given by Mad. F. Lablache, and received an encore. Masini's duet is very pretty, and was capitally sung by Sig. and Mad. Lablache, obtaining a unanimous and loud encore. Made. Bishop received a tremendous call to repeat the ballad from Loretta, to which she responded, singing it, on both occasions, with her usual exquisite grace and finish. John Parry gave a new comic song called "The White Cat," in which the antique legend is set forth in a garb of modern humour. He sang it in his usual style, with immense effect, and was encored, when he gave Albert Smith's song of "Young England." In the second part, the duet from Don Pasquale was repeated with much applause; and Mr. Manvers gave Loder's popular song with expression and taste. Madame Bishop sang Meyerbeer's charming Cavatina from the Crociato in Egitto, with greater effect than any of her preceding efforts, and was applauded by the whole house for several minutes. We are inclined to think "Come Rapida" is the best performance of Madame Bishop we ever heard; and, certainly, as a display of consummate art and vocalization we never heard it surpassed. No doubt, the Italian language in which she interpreted Meyerbeer's Cavatina tended, in no small degree, to produce the perfectibility of her performance. So great was the impression wrought upon us, that we would strongly counsel Madame Bishop to sing "O Come Rapida" on every possible occasion in public. Her singing delighted to excess the amateur part of the audience, and enchaind the admiration of all appreciators of true art. Frederick Lablache reminded us potently of the Lablache in the fine dramatic aria buffa of Rossini. He sang it splendidly. This gentleman has made much improvement in his art within the last few years. Signor F. Lablache is now a superior general artist, and an admirable buffo singer. Loder's very charming song lost all its captivations, by being taken much too slowly; Mr. Manvers thereby neither doing the composition nor himself justice. We have much pleasure in bestowing our award of merit on Mr. G. Case's violin performance. This young gentleman is one of the best of our native violin soloists. Madame Bishop, as a matter of course, was enthusiastically encored in the Rondo finale from Loretta. It is unnecessary to speak here of a performance so universally known, and which has already won the tribute of admiration and surprise from thousands at Drury Lane. We cannot conclude our notice of the great artist's performance on this occasion without bestowing a word of praise on the grace and charming naiveté she displays in a concert room. Madame Bishop is the artist everywhere, and she well knows that half the attraction of a vocal performance lies in the manner of its execution. Many of our best chamber singers might take a useful hint from Madame Bishop's deportment in a concert room. The concert terminated with a song by John Parry, which we did not wait to hear. Altogether we were highly pleased with the entertainments at the Beaumont Institution, and shall be most happy, by any efforts of our own, to advance the interests of the musical section of this most praiseworthy establishment. Mr. Maurice Davies conducted.

THE AFFINITIES.

from the German of Goethe.

(Continued from page 670, vol. 21.)

PART I.—CHAPTER XI.

EDWARD accompanied the Count to his chamber, and was easily induced by his conversation to remain with him for some time. The Count discoursed on former days, and remarked with animation on the beauty of Charlotte, which, as a connoisseur of the fair sex, he unfolded with considerable ardour. "A handsome foot," said he, is a great gift of nature, and a charm which resists the ravages of time. I observed her to-day as she walked. One feels an inclination to kiss her foot, and to repeat that barbaric but deeply-felt mode of shewing honour which exists among the Sarmatians, who think there is nothing better than to drink to the health of a beloved and respected person out of his shoe.

The print of the foot was not the only object of praise with these two intimate friends. From Charlotte's person they rambled to old stories and adventures, and came at last to the obstacles which had formerly prevented the union of the two lovers, to the trouble they had taken, and the stratagems they had observed, only to be able to say that they loved one another.

"Do you remember," continued the Count, "what adventures I, with the greatest kindness and disinterestedness enabled you to achieve, when our highest dignitaries visited her uncle, and met in the spacious castle? The day had passed in festivities and festal attire, and a part, at least, of the night was to be spent in free loving conversation."

"The way that led to the apartments assigned to the ladies of the court you had well observed," said Edward, "and we succeeded in reaching my beloved Charlotte."

"Who," added the Count, "thought more of decorum than of my comfort, and kept by her an exceedingly ugly guard of honour; so that, while you were very much amused with words and glances, my lot was anything but a happy one."

"Just as you were announced yesterday," said Edward, "I was reminding my wife of the story, and especially of our return. We missed the way, and came to the ante-chamber of the guard-room. Because we had got on so well, we fancied we could go through here also, and pass this post as well as the rest. But when the doors were opened how great was our astonishment! The way was covered with mattresses, upon which the gigantic fellows lay stretched out in several rows, and slept. The night guard at his post stared at us with amazement, but we, in our youthful boldness, stepped quietly over the stretched-out boots, without one of these snoring sons of Anak being awakened."

"I had a great mind to stumble for the sake of the noise," said the Count, "for what a strange resurrection we should have seen!"

At this moment the castle clock struck twelve.

"It is midnight," said the Count, smiling, "and just the proper time. I must now beg a favour of you, my dear Baron. Be my guide to-night as I was yours then. I have promised the Baronness to pay her a visit. We have not seen each other for a long time, we have not spoken alone all day, and nothing is more natural, than that we should desire a confidential hour. Show me the way, I will find the way back, and at all events there is no fear that I shall stumble over any boots."

"I will readily show you this piece of hospitable courtesy," said Edward, "only the three ladies are altogether up in yonder wing. Who knows whether we may not find them all at once, or cause some other piece of work that would have a strange appearance?"

"Do not be uneasy about that," said the Count, "the Baronness expects me. By this time she is certainly alone in her room."

"Thus the matter is easy enough," said Edward; and taking a candle, he lit the count down a private staircase, which led to a long passage. At the end of this was a little door, which Edward opened. They ascended a winding staircase, and on the top on a narrow landing-place, Edward showed the Count a tapestried door to the right, and placed the candle in his hand. The door opened at the first attempt, and admitted the Count, so that Edward was left in the dark.

Another door to the left led to Charlotte's bed-room; he heard some one talk, and listened attentively. Charlotte was asking her maid, if Otilia had gone to bed. "No," replied the maid, "she is down stairs writing." "Light the night-lamp then," said Charlotte, "and go, it is getting late. I will put out the taper myself and go to bed."

Edward heard with delight that Otilia was writing. "She is working for me," he thought triumphantly. Absorbed in his own imagination he fancied that, through the darkness, he could discern her sitting and writing. We thought to approach her, and see how she turned round to look at him. We felt an irresistible longing to see her once more near him. But there was no way from the spot where he stood, to the apartment which she occupied. Now he found himself close against his wife's door, a singular confusion took place in his mind; he tried to move the door, he found it locked, he touched gently, but Charlotte did not hear.

In fact, she was in the larger room adjoining, walking up and down with a great deal of animation. Over and over again, she repeated to herself, what she had already considered often enough, since the Count's proposal. The Captain seemed to stand before her; he still filled the house—he still gave life to the walks—and he was to go; all was to become a void. She said to herself all that could be said; nay, she anticipated, as one generally does, the miserable consolation that even pains of this sort are alleviated by time. She cursed the time which was required to alleviate them; she cursed the deadly time when they would be alleviated.

The refuge which she found in tears, was so much the more welcome, as with her it was unusual. Throwing "herself on" the sofa, she completely abandoned herself to her grief. Edward, on his part, could not stir from the door; he knocked again, and then a third time, somewhat louder, so that Charlotte could hear him plainly through the stillness of the night, and started up alarmed. Her first thought was, that it might—nay, must be the Captain; the second, that this was impossible. She considered that the mind was an illusion; but she had surely heard it—wished, feared to have heard it. She went into the bedroom, and softly approached the tapestried door, which was bolted. Then she reproached herself for her fear. "How, probably, might the Countess want something!" she said to herself, and collecting her strength, she cried out, "Is any one there?" A soft voice answered, "It is I." "Who?" returned Charlotte, who could not distinguish the sound. The Captain's form seemed to stand before the door. The voice, somewhat louder, said, "Edward!" She opened, and her husband was before her. He saluted her jestingly, wrapping up the cause of his mysterious visit with explanations equally mysterious. "Why, I really come," he at last said, "I must confess to you. I have made a vow to kiss your shoe to-night."

"You have not had such a notion for a long time," said Charlotte. "So much the worse, and so much the better," retorted Edward.

She had seated herself in a chair, that her light night-dress might be concealed from his eyes. He threw himself on his knees before her, and she could not prevent him from kissing her shoe, nor when this remained in his hand, from catching her foot, and pressing it firmly to his bosom.

Charlotte was one of those ladies, who possessed of a cool temperament, preserve in marriage, without design or effort, the manners belonging to courtship. Far from alluring her husband, it was always her manner rather to shrink from him, and as she at the same time did not evince any coldness or repulsive severity, she always resembled a loving bride, who feels timid even about what is lawful. In this disposition, and even more so than usual, Edward found her upon this occasion. Most ardently she wished that her husband was away, for the imaginary form of her friend seemed to be reproaching her! But that which should have repelled Edward, acted as an additional attraction. It was obvious that she laboured under some emotion. She had been weeping, and if this is generally a disadvantage to the beauty of persons of a weak disposition, it is an infinite advantage to those whom we are in the habit of seeming resolute and composed. Edward was so amiable, so kind, so urgent. He asked her to let him remain with her. He did not insist upon it, but half jesting, half earnest, tried to persuade her, never thinking that he was only asking for his rights. At last he playfully extinguished the taper.

In the dim light of the lamp, the secret inclination and the imagination of the parties exercised an influence over reality. Edward seemed to hold none but Ottilia in his arms, while the image of the Captain, nearer or farther, floated before the mind of Charlotte. Thus strangely enough was the present most delightfully interwoven with the absent.

But the present has large claims, and will not be despoiled of them. They passed a portion of the night in all sorts of light conversation, and their jests were the more free, because, alas! their heart had no share in them. But when Edward on the following morning awoke on the bosom of his wife, the day seemed to look in upon him with a foreboding appearance, the sun appeared to shine upon a crime. He glided softly from the side of Charlotte, who, when she awoke, was surprised to find herself alone.

PART I.—CHAPTER XII.

WHEN the party had re-assembled at breakfast, an attentive spectator might have observed in the behaviour of the individuals the difference of their internal moods and feelings. The Count and the Baroness met with that cheerful content which is felt by a pair of lovers, when after the pains of separation they once more assure each other of their mutual affections; while, on the other hand, Charlotte and Edward met the Captain and Ottilia with something of shame and remorse. It is the nature of love to believe that its own rights are alone valid, and that all others vanish before it. Ottilia displayed a child-like cheerfulness, and her manner might be called frank. The Captain appeared serious. His conversation with the Count, who had awakened in him all the feelings which had for some time lain dormant, had shewn him but too plainly that he was not fulfilling his proper mission in this place, but was really wasting his days in a sort of half-active indolence. The guests had hardly departed, when other visitors arrived. This arrival was welcome to Charlotte, who wished some diversion from her own thoughts; but it seemed inopportune to Edward, who felt a double inclination to converse with Ottilia, and it was far from agreeable to Ottilia herself, who had not yet finished the copy, which was so much wanted on the following morning. She, therefore, as soon as the visitors had left, hastened back to her room.

It was evening. Edward, Charlotte, and the Captain, who had accompanied the visitors on their way to the carriage, agreed to take a walk towards the pond. A boat, which Edward had ordered from a distance, at a considerable expense, had arrived. They wished to try whether it could be easily moved and managed.

The boat lay moored off the bank of the central pond, in the vicinity of some tall oaks, upon which they had reckoned when considering their plans for the future. A landing place was to be formed here, and an architectural resting-place was to be raised under the trees, towards which, those who crossed the lake would have to steer.

"Where had the landing better be formed, on the other side?" asked Edmund, "I should say by my plane-trees."

"They stand a little too far to the right," objected the Captain. "By landing lower down we should be nearer to the castle, but it requires consideration."

The Captain was already standing at the stern of the boat, and had taken an oar. Charlotte entered it, as well as Edward, who took the other oar, but just as he was about to push off, he thought of Ottilia, and reflected that this expedition on the water might delay him to a late hour. He resolved at once what to do, sprang ashore, gave his oar to the Captain, and with a few hearty excuses hurried back home.

There he learned that Ottilia had shut herself up, and was writing. While on the one hand, the feeling that she was employed on his account was agreeable, he felt, on the other hand, deeply annoyed at not seeing her present. His impatience increased every moment. He walked up and down in the great room, attempted various things, but nothing was able to fix his attention. He wished to see her, to see her alone, before Charlotte returned with the Captain. It was night, and the candles were lit.

At last she entered, radiant with amiability. The feeling that she had done something for her friend, had elevated her above herself. She placed both the original and the copy on the table before Edward. "Shall we compare them?" said she smiling. Edward did not know how to reply. He looked at her, and then he looked over the copy. The first leaves were written with the greatest care, in a delicate female hand, but afterwards the characters seemed to change, and to be in an easier and more free style. But how amazed he was, when he glanced over the concluding pages. "In Heaven's name," he exclaimed, "what is this? why this is my hand!" He looked at Ottilia, and again at the paper; the end especially seemed exactly as though he had written it himself. Ottilia was silent, but she looked into his face, with an air of the greatest satisfaction. Edward raised his arms, "Thou lovest me!" he cried, "Ottilia, thou lovest me!" and they were locked in each others arms. It would have been impossible to distinguish, which had first clasped the other.

From this moment the world was entirely changed for Edward, he was no more what he had been, the world was no more what it had been. They stood face to face—he held her hands—they looked into each others eyes, on the point of embracing once more.

Charlotte entered with the Captain. When they made excuses for their long absence, Edward smiled in secret, "Oh, how much too soon do you come," he said to himself.

They sat down to supper, and passed their opinions upon the persons who had visited them that day. Edward, agreeably excited, spoke of all with indulgence, and of some with approbation. Charlotte, who did not quite agree with him, observed the mood he was in, and bantered him for being so mild and charitable on this occasion, when, generally after a party had taken leave, he had been the severest judge.

With much warmth and in a tone of firm conviction, Edward exclaimed, "It is only necessary to love one being thoroughly, and then all the rest appear amiable!" Ottilia cast down her eyes, and Charlotte looked straight before her.

The Captain took up the subject, and said—"The case is somewhat similar with the feelings of esteem and respect. One learns what is really valuable in the world, only when we find an opportunity of exercising such a disposition on a single object."

Charlotte endeavoured soon to reach her bed-room, that she might dwell on the remembrance of all that this evening had passed between herself and the Captain.

The facts were these: When Edward, springing ashore, had pushed off the boat, confiding his wife and his friend to the uncertain element, Charlotte looked upon the man for whom she had suffered so much in silence, as he sat before her in the twilight, and with the aid of two oars moved the boat in whatever direction he pleased. She felt a deep melancholy, such as she had seldom experienced. The motion of the boat, the splashing of the oars, the quivering of the breeze over the watery mirror, the rustling of the reeds, the last flight of the birds, the twinkling of the first stars—all combined to produce something spirit-like in the general stillness. She almost fancied that her friend was taking her far away to abandon her in some remote spot. A strong emotion prevailed, in her mind, and she could not weep.

The Captain, in the meanwhile, was describing to her how, according to his views, the plans should be carried out. He praised the good qualities of the boat, which could be so easily moved and managed by one person, with two oars. He told her she might herself learn what a pleasant sensation it often was to float alone upon the water, and to be one's own ferryman and steersman.

At these words, the thought of the approaching separation fell upon the heart of Charlotte. "Did he say that intentionally?" thought she. "Does he know of it already, or does he speak by chance only, thus unconsciously predicting my fate?" A deep feeling of melancholy—of impatience overcame her, and she asked him to land as soon as possible, and return with her to the castle.

It was the first time that the Captain had been on these pieces of water, and though he had made a general investigation as to their depth, particular spots remained unknown to him. The evening began to grow dark, and he directed his course where he guessed there was a convenient place of landing, and where he knew he should not be far from the footpath which led to the castle. But he deviated in some measure from this path, when Charlotte, with a sort of uneasiness, repeated the wish to be soon landed. With renewed questions he approached the shore, but still found himself at some distance from it. He had run the boat aground, and all endeavours to move it were in vain. What was to be done? He could only get out into the water, which was very shallow, and carry Charlotte ashore. He carried over the dear burden in safety, but though he was strong enough to avoid tottering or giving her any uneasiness, she turned her arms round his neck, with symptoms of alarm. He held her fast, and pressed her to him. He did not set her down till he came to a sloping plot of turf, and then it was not without trepidation and confusion. She still clasped his neck; he again caught her in his arms, and printed an ardent kiss upon her lips, but in the same moment he fell at her feet, and pressing his lips to her hand, exclaimed: "Charlotte, will you forgive me?"

The kiss, which the Captain had ventured to give, and which Charlotte had almost returned, brought her back to her senses. She pressed his hand, but she did not raise him from the ground. Yet when she bent down to him, and placed her hand on his shoulder, she exclaimed: "We cannot prevent this moment from making an epoch in our lives, but it depends upon ourselves whether it will be worthy of us. You must leave us, dear friend, you must and will. The Count proposes to better your condition, and the proposal gives me both pleasure and pain. I wished to say nothing about the matter till it became a certainty, but the present moment compels me to discover the secret. I can only forgive you and myself if we have the courage to change our situation, since it is not in our power to change our feelings." She raised him from the ground, took his arm as a support, and they returned silently to the castle.

Now she was in her chamber, where she had to feel and look upon herself as Edward's wife. In the midst of the contradictions in which she was involved, she derived great aid from her solid and well-practised character. Always accustomed to self-consciousness and self-command, she did not find it difficult to approach, by serious meditation, the equilibrium which she desired; nay, she could not help smiling, when she thought of the odd visit the night before. Soon a strange sense of foreboding, a joyous but uneasy trembling came over her, and resolved itself into pious hopes and wishes. Deeply touched, she knelt down, and repeated the vow which she had made to Edward before the altar. Friendship, inclination, self-denial, passed before as so many cheerful forms, and she felt inwardly restored. Soon a pleasant weariness took possession of her, and she sank quietly to sleep.

(To be continued.)

* To prevent misunderstanding it may be stated that the copyright of this translation belongs solely to the translator.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE PANTOMIMES AND CHRISTMAS PIECES.

CHRISTMAS comes but once a year, and when it comes it brings good cheer; to some champagne, to others beer; and mirth, and laugh, and jest, and jeer, with pudding, beef, and pies, and deer, and yule-logs blazing far and near in chimney nooks, while winter drear without lets fall his frozen tear upon the season's sheeted bier, and whistling night-winds make us fear for homeless wretch upon the mere, making our gratitude more dear for each awarded blessing here, teaching us deeply to revere and praise our joy-allotted sphere with truthful lip and heart sincere.

The above is intended for our prosy poetical invocation to merry Christmas, that happy season of the year which, in cold and darkness, sheds more warmth and light upon our hearts than the choicest day of sunny May, and in the midst of dearth lends more cheer than Ceres herself had poured at any other period of the twelvemonth from her horn of plenty. But we grow dull, and let a tale grow cold, which must not be pathetically told. The pantomimes are growing year by year less important, less worthy, and far less humorous, and laughter-exciting. Momm no longer presides at the feast. Everything is sacrificed to scenic displays, gorgeous dresses, specious appointments—in brief, fun is eclipsed by upholstery, and instead of a pantomime that formerly was wont to set the house in a roar, we have now an entertainment that elicits admiration and blank surprise. Burlesques, meanwhile, are supplying the place of pantomime, and in a very few years, we fear we shall have to cry coronach over the last remains of our old and time-honoured Christmas friend. Of the five principal theatres of the metropolis, three have provided pantomimes, viz.—Drury-Lane, the Princess's, and the Lyceum; the Haymarket has still adhered to its burlesque, in which it won for itself name and fame; while the Adelphi, disregarding usage, association, public feeling, and old taste, has dispensed altogether with the tribute paid to Christmas by every other house in London, if not in the kingdom, with pantomime or burlesque. But we shall have to allude presently to this strange falling off at the Adelphi, for which we can neither account, nor imagine adequate cause. We shall take the theatres seriatim, according to their degrees of rank and standing, and commence at once with Drury-Lane. The pantomime at this house, it not worthy of bygone times, is at least worthy of the present. Drury-Lane has always been celebrated for the splendid decorations of its Christmas entertainment, and certainly this year it has not fallen off in the gorgeousness, glitter, and magnificence of its stage appointments. The subject of the pantomime is the old legend of St. George and the Dragon, and is written by Mr. or more properly, the Messrs. Morton. The allegorical part, or introduction, is imagined with some spirit, involving the contest of the March of Intellect with Ignorance, and its subsequent victory. In the first scene there are some fine effects produced by the representation of a storm at sea, and the effects of an earthquake. We cannot praise the introduction of the Seven Champions of Christendom in one scene as children, and in the next as grown men. If we do not require truth in a pantomime, we, at least, demand verisimilitude. We may fancy things above our reason, but we cannot receive by any stretch of imagination things contrary to reason. A fairy tale must be consistent with itself, or the most fanciful mind will find no pleasure therein. Thus, when told that there were such beings as fairies, we can imagine, that if they existed, they could confer long life, beauty, wealth, and health on whom they chose; but if it were mentioned in the same breath, that a fairy made one moment of time a century, a child of six years would reject so startling an impossibility. The position in the pantomime is not improved by our being informed that fifteen years are supposed to elapse between two scenes. Besides we could not find out what was gained by this sudden jump from infancy to maturity. We have not room to follow the pantomime in all its details. Mr. Payne, who played Saint George, was so ill on the first night, that the success of the piece was much endangered, but ultimately St. George and the Dragon was highly successful. On the second night, Mr. Payne, having fully recovered, infused greater life and spirit into his hero, by which the pantomime received no small addition of strength. Mr. Wieland made a most capital Dragon. The fight between the Dragon and the Champion of England was excellently managed by Payne and Wieland, and was the best performance of the pantomime. The introduction is written with more tact than fun, and proves that Mr. Morton is less at home in this species of entertainment than in farce. The jokes were spare, and the hits were rare. In the transformation, Mr. Howell was Harlequin; Miss Hicks, Columbine; Mr. T. Matthéwa, Clown; and Mr. Priorson, Pantaloon. These were all excellent in their parts. Some of the practical jokes told well with the audience, but we witnessed nothing particularly new, or particularly happy. But the age is fastidious, and critics, now-a-days, will hardly allow any gradient between the super-excellent and the worthless. In justice we must speak very favourably of the Christmas pantomime at old Drury. It fulfils its intention. It provides variety, splendour, fun, bustle, extravagance and noise, and makes the audience merry, thereby making them happy. If this be not the end of pantomime, we don't know what is. So much for Drury-Lane.

At the HAYMARKET, Mr. Planche has supplied his usual Christmas offering, a burlesque, or Romantic Fairy Extravaganza. It is entitled, The Invisible Prince: or the Island of Tranquill Delights; and is founded, as all Mr. Planche's late pieces of this kind are, on one of Madame D'Anois' exquisite fairy tales. The Prince Lutin of the charming authoress, has furnished the present subject. If we except Fortunio, and perhaps the White Cat, we are inclined to think that the Invisible Prince, is Mr. Planche's best extravaganza. The story, is simple and comprehensible, and is confined to a few scenes. Though, in point of splendid scenic displays, this restriction may militate against the piece in the eyes of many sight-seekers, yet to our thinking it is a boon, and greatly enhances the interest of the story; for however absurd a dramatic production of this sort may be, every one invariably feels an interest in the fate of the hero and heroine, and whatsoever advances their interest, or renders them familiar to the spectator, must benefit the piece. Too often, is every thing sacrificed to these shows and tricks of scenery, until the mind becomes distracted from the personages of the plot, and nobody cares, what becomes of the characters that should interest us. We confess to have been impressed with a favorable disposition towards the hero and heroine of Mr. Planche's new extravaganza on Saturday evening. We should have felt no small disappointment had poor Leander been sacrificed, and Fairbond married the Princess Xquizitelittlepet. Mr. Planche has exhibited great dramatic tact, in The Invisible Prince. He wrote nothing which could be omitted after the first night, — a rare compliment to his judgment and sagacity, be it known, when against every Christmas piece of the year, the chief complaint, was that of lengthiness. We would not anticipate the pleasure of any one of our readers, who intends visiting the Haymarket Theatre, by detailing the plot, and retelling the jokes. The plot will be found more prettily, and pithily told in Madame D'Anois' "Fairy Tales;" and the jokes would suffer much by transplantation. We can assure the reader however, that he will find The Invisible Prince, a piece as dry as Elder wine; full-flavoured as the best Havannah cigar; racy as bottle-bearded Tokay; pointed as Juvenal's style; flashing as horses' hoofs on a wet road by night, and eating as a baby's gums at eight months old. So much for the Haymarket.

The PRINCESS's furnished the new two-act drama, Blanche de Valmy, The seven Maids of Munich, and a Pantomime, for its Christmas novelties, on Saturday evening. The Pantomime rejoices under the appellation of The Enchanted Beauties of the Golden Castle; or, Harlequin and the One-eyed Genie. The two-act drama of Mr. Bayle Bernard, is a respectable thing of its kind, and nothing more. We cannot understand, why the author of The Boarding School, and other admirable farces, should have changed his stage writings, and turned from the whim and bustle, in which he won much merited success, to that drivelling sub-sentiment, so foreign to modern tastes and modern feelings? The Story of Blanche de Valmy, is well enough, we dare say, in the novel from which it is taken; but its two-act seriousness cannot claim one pity, nor its characters, from their brief exertions, awaken our interest. We cannot afford to yield up our feelings under three acts; nor let fall a tear, for less than five. This is no paradox; — examine it well, and if you are able to discover it, you will find the cause. The Pantomime, is very magnificent in its appointments, scenery and decorations. It has been got up, with great care, and all the tricks went off to admiration, on the first night. The machinery, was excellently managed, there was more people employed on the stage in the Pantomime, than ever we had seen previously at this house, at one time. Some of the tricks told with exceeding good effect; that for instance, in which the squib blows a van entirely off the stage without leaving a vestige behind it. A comic song, by Cowell, in the introduction, was much applauded. Mr. Bologna, was Harlequin; Mr. Flexmore, Clown; Mr. Paulo, Pantaloon; and Miss Barbidge, Columbine. Though we observed nothing very salient, or novel, in the jokes practical, or verbal, yet, we are inclined to think, from its gorgeous scenery, splendid costumes, brilliant groupings, capital tricks, admirably managed machinery, and excellent company of pantomimic artists, that The Enchanted Beauties of the Golden Castle; or, Harlequin, and the One-eyed Genie, will have a long and prosperous run.

The ADELPHI this year, has neither Pantomime, Burlesque, Extravaganza, nor Fairy Romantic Drama, to pay the customary compliment to the Christmas holidays. There is substituted instead, a grand melo-drame, entitled Colomba, the Corsican Sister, in which, we are presented with scenic effect, striking situations, and impressive incident, in variety. The personages are numerous, and proceeded each other on the stage, with so much celerity, as to create infinite bustle and activity. The plot is taken from a French story of Prosper Mérimée, which presented sufficient materials to a skillful adapter to work out an interesting drama, but which unfortunately fell into inefficient hands at the Adelphi. The management of the theatre, has done everything within its means to render Colomba, the Corsican Sister attractive, and there is little doubt, that it will obtain some weeks' run, despite the innocent manner in which it has been dramatised. At the same we are grieved, to see an excellent subject so entirely spoiled. By judicious treatment of the original tale the drama taken therefrom, would have turned out a jewel of price to the Adelphi, while we now only witness it endured by an audience too good-natured to express disapprobation, or rendered forbearing in gratitude for all past benefits. The actors with one exception, were very ill suited in their characters. Mrs. Yates had a most indifferent part to enact; Wright had a sorry one, of which he made nothing, — query, could he? and Paul Bedford had the worst of all. We never remember seeing the performers to less advantage. Wright having little to say, and little to do, supplied the deficiency, with gag and grimace, which we were by no means pleased to see, not only tolerated, but applauded. Madame Celeste, was well suited to the character of Colomba, and had the part been written for her by a practised dramatist, as we are convinced it has not, she must have succeeded greatly. As it is, Madame Celeste's performance was unequal, and the success of the drama, the interest of which depended entirely upon her, was for some period of he evening very doubtful; even the Adelphi audience finding portions of the drama which peremptorily demanded their sibilations. We are bound, however, to record the ultimate success of Columba, which was entirely owing to Madame Celeste's spirited acting in the last scene. The fair manageress was summoned at the fall of the curtain and announced Columba, the Corsican Sister for repetition every evening until further notice. A most extraordinary performance of gymnastic feats by Mr. Lees and his pupils followed. These feats are truly wonderful, and far surpass any thing of the kind we have previously witnessed. Mr. Lees' eldest pupil is an astonishing youth, and excited the loudest applauses by several of his gymnastic feats. Mr. Lees and pupils will be found a great source of attraction during the holidays.

SONNET.

NO. XV.

To me the world shews nought but weariness,
And things which other men most precious deem
To me are but the fragments of a dream,
Dream'd on by life, itself a dream—or less.
Dark gloomy thoughts, which without ceasing, press
Upon my heart, alone substantial seem,
'Whelming me in a heavy-rolling stream,
Causing dull agony, that none may guess;
For 'tis that pain that wears the heart away,
And leaves the features tranquil as before,
E'en as the sea, though wrecks within it lie,
May seem a field where sunbeams gaily play.
Trust not my smile,—all hope with me is o'er,
Unless, at times, perchance, I hope to die.

N. D.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MADAME BISHOP, left London on Wednesday, for Cheltenham, to fulfill her first provincial engagement. We shall give further particulars, in our next number.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—In an article, of our last number, quoting from the Morning Chronicle, we stated that Signor Costa had the entire disposal of all engagements, at Covent-garden. We have since, received authority to contradict the statement in toto. Signor Costa is delegated with no such power. He has been assigned the formation of the band and chorus; and even this is subject to certain restrictions.

MADAME MORTIER DE FONTAINE, the vocalist, has returned to town from a provincial tour. This lady's singing was greatly admired by the aristocratic guests, assembled at Western House, Brighton, to whom Lady Hotham gave a Matinée Musicale a few days since. Madame Mortier de Fontaine intends giving a Matinée Musicale, at the Newburgh Concert Rooms, Brighton, under the management of Mr. Wright, on Monday, the 4th of January. Amongst the artistes engaged are, Madame D'Eichthal, the accomplished harpist; M. Bottura, of the Académie Royale de Musique, Paris; and Mr. Lindsay Sloper, the eminent English pianist and composer.

MRS. WOOD.—A Liverpool paper says that Mrs. Wood, the celebrated vocalist, who retired some time since, will shortly appear at the two grand concerts to be given at the concert-hall in that town. She is to receive, it is said, £50 a night.

MONSIEUR COULON gave a concert on Saturday evening at his residence, Great Marlborough Street. The concert was projected to introduce Mademoiselle Coulon, the accomplished daughter of the well-known professeur de danse, for the first time to an English public, as a performer on the pianoforte. The concert opened with a trio of Mayseder, for piano, violin, and violoncello, admirably executed by Mademoiselle Coulon, and Messrs. Sainton and Rousselot. The lady proved herself a thorough proficient in the performance of concerted music. She was also enthusiastically applauded in a duo with Miss C. Hallen. Of Messrs. Sainton and Rousselot, we can hardly speak in terms of adequate praise. Their performances elicited the admiration of all present. Mons. Sainton has taken a high standing in the metropolis as a executant on the violin, and the position he holds as first professor of the violin at the Royal Academy of Music speaks louder in his favour than any eulogium we can bestow. Mons. Rousselot is one of the most elegant and artistic performers on the violoncello in this country. His compositions have exceeding great merit, and are recognised as works of art by every musician. The presence of these two artists contributed in no small degree to encourage Mademoiselle Coulon in her debut. In a fantaisie, on airs from Lucia, the fair debutante was heard to great advantage. The morceau is very difficult, and requires a practised artist to render it full justice. Making every allowance for the nervousness consequent on a first appearance, we may aver that Mademoiselle Coulon's debut was highly successful, and we have little doubt that with time and study she will become one of the most attractive ornaments of our concert rooms. Her reception was most flattering, and unanimous plaudits followed each of her performances. The concert concluded with a duo for piano and violin, in which Mademoiselle Coulon played with much effect, and Mons. Sainton's exquisite mechanism was heard to the greatest advantage.

CHORAL HARMONISTS.—The second meeting this season took place on Monday last, at the City of London Tavern, which, spite of the civic festivities so much respected in our great capital at this happy season of the year, was fully attended, the substantial morceaux offered in the bill of fare acting, it is presumed, as the attraction. Hummell's mass, No. 3, was neatly performed by the band and chorus, as also the solo and chorus, "O thou that taltest." We could have wished for a greater depth of expression in the solo part of the latter, rendered by a young lady possessing a fine voice capable of improvement. A duet for Miss and Mr. Lockey, sang with taste, and Romberg's ode, "Transient Eternal," were well executed. Part second commenced with Cavendish's madrigal, "Come, gentle swains." Mr. Lockey, by his earnest expression and proper enunciation, called forth an encore in a scena, "Lament," by G. Cooper. "St. Cecilia's Day" by Van Bree gave the choir good practice rather than satisfaction to the auditory; this was, however, soon dispelled by a selection from Beethoven's only opera, which passed off better. Mr. Machin sustained his air, "Revenge," as well as the band would allow him. Mr. Dando led the concert. Mr. Westrop conducted, and we were pleased to mark the improvement of the chorus, which must be attributed in a great measure to the assistance of several members of the Sacred Harmonic Society. We feel much pleasure in the encouragement of Amateur Musical Societies, more particularly when we find a Society conducted in such a spirited manner as the Choral Harmonists', which reflects great credit on the committee.

EASTERN INSTITUTION.—The subscribers to the above institution gave a concert on Monday last, which was well attended, although not so fully as we have experienced. Miss Birch and Miss E. Birch, as usual, met with a warm reception. The selection of the instrumental music was entrusted to Mr. Arthur, who led several overtures in an efficient manner. Mr. W. Reed played a solo on the violoncello with great taste, and several other pieces contributed to the amusement of the audience, who left highly pleased with the entertainment.

FRENCH PLAYS.—We have had few novelties this week. M. Perlet has played every evening, but mostly in such of his characters as have already been noticed by us. Except Le Parrain of which we shall speak next week, Monsieur Pique-Assiette is the only new part he has undertaken, and, although superlatively comic, as he ever is in whatever he does, the piece itself is of such slight texture, that it deserves no further mention at our hands. Mlle. Brohan has taken her flight, alas! we fear for another year. We had got accustomed to her free and easy humour; her lively, pert, provoking vivacity had entirely won our hearts. We say it with regret, the pearl of Soubrettes has left our shores, bearing with her the best wishes of her admirers and the grateful acknowledgements of the frequenters of this theatre. M. Perlet's engagement is also drawing to a close, and will terminate with his benefit, when he plays for the first and last time in the Avare, by Molière, of whose Ecole de Maris, (performed on Monday and Wednesday only,) we shall speak in our next.

COLEMAN'S CASINO DE VENISE has attracted a numerous audience during the week; indeed it could hardly fail to do otherwise, from the pleasing nature of the entertainment. The elegance of the mise en scene, the excellence of the orchestra under the able conductorship of Mr. Grattan Cooke, which played a variety of popular compositions, including whose direction the dancing part of the entertainment is Auber's famous overture to the "Crown Diamonds"—The talent of the solo performers combined with the singing of Miss M. O'Connor and Mr. Wrighton, (who, by the bye, is a very sweet ballad-singer) and the urbanity of Mr. O'Brien, under placed, render the Casino de Venise the most amusing place of the kind in London. En passant, the obtrusiveness of the waiters in the refreshment-room, begging for gratuities from the visitors, might be dispensed with.

NOBLE BEQUEST TO THE CHOIR OF LEEDS CHURCH.—The late Mr. Carr, of Kensthorpe, left £4,000 for apprenticing the boys, who form part of the choir of Leeds parish church.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WARREN'S 20 GUINEA COTTAGE PIANO-FORTES

ARE NOW SELLING AT THE
Manufactory, 71, Leadenhall Street,
(Removed from 1 and 2, Liverpool Street, Bishopsgate Street.)

These Instruments are well manufactured of the best seasoned wood, FINE FULL TONE AND GOOD TOUCH. A two years warranty given with each instrument. ESTABLISHED TWENTY-ONE YEARS. The only house in London where a good sound instrument can be obtained at the above low price, (for cash only). SMALL PROFIT AND QUICK RETURNS!

JOHN WARREN, 71, Leadenhall St., opposite Aldgate Pump.

SACRED CONCERTS, CROSBY HALL. FIFTH SERIES.

THIRD CONCERT, TUESDAY, JANUARY 5TH, 1847.

Anthem—"Behold I bring you glad tidings"	Purcell
Misses Rainforth and Bassano—"O lovely Peace"	Handel
Mr. Francis—"O my God, wash Thou me"	Ciampi
Chorus—"Praise, O Zion"	Naumann
Miss Bassano—"Lord and Saviour"	Otto Braune
Trio—Miss Bassano, Messrs. Francis and J. A. Novello—"The hour of vengeance"	Beethoven
Miss Rainforth—"O Lord God"	Marcello
Mr. J. A. Novello	Neukomm
Chorus—"For unto us a Child is born"	Handel
Organ Solo—Miss Mounsey
Miss Bassano—"The blind maiden"	Proch
Trio—Misses Rainforth and Bassano, and Mr. Francis—"Protect us thro' the coming night"	Curschmann
Mr. Novello—(with Chorus)—"Methinks I hear the full celestial choir"	Dr. Crotch
Miss Rainforth—(The Alps)	Schubert
Corale—"Psalm 19th"	J. Sebastian Bach
Mr. Francis—"One thing have I desired of the Lord"	Handel
Miss Rainforth and Mr. J. A. Novello—"Praise Jehovah"	D. Koning
Chorus—"Praise Him in Judah"	Mozart

To commence at half-past Seven, and terminate about Ten.

The remaining Concerts will take place on the following evenings—WEDNESDAY: January 27th, 1847; FRIDAY, February 19th; and FRIDAY, March 5th.

Tickets, 2s. 6d.

MR. HANDEL GEAR

Presents his respectful compliments to his Friends and Pupils, and begs to acquaint them, that he has REMOVED from No. 26, Newman Street, to

No. 23, CHARLOTTE STREET, PORTLAND PLACE, where he continues to give instructions in Singing.—Pupil attended at their own Residences.
23, Charlotte Street, Portland Place, January, 1847.

CLEAVE'S GUIDES TO IN-DOOR AMUSEMENTS.

Now Ready, Price 3d., Postage free, 5d., a new edition of the Whole Art of

CHESS AND DRAUGHTS

By the aid of which all difficulty in acquiring these elegant games is removed—enabling a novice to become a first rate player; The NEW RULES OF CHESS and much other matter of interest is added in this new edition.

A CHESS BOARD AND SET OF MEN—3d. only!

A DRAUGHT BOARD AND SET OF MEN—3d. only!

DANCING!!!—Now Ready for the Season 1847, the BALL-ROOM CHAPERON

An elegant guide to the mysteries of fashionable dancing, simplifying the most intricate POLKAS, MAZOURKAS, VALSES, and QUADRILLES; Full instructions in the ART OF DRESS, ETIQUETTE, &c. The best book on Dancing ever published! PRICE SIXPENCE ONLY!

London: Cleave, Shoe Lane, (one door from Fleet Street.) Sold by all Booksellers.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE

Is acknowledged as the best specific after three years' trial, for improving the voice and removing all affections of the throat, strongly recommended to clergymen, singers, actors, public speakers, and all persons subject to relaxed throats.

The Proprietors have just received the following Testimonial, amongst many others, from MADAME ANNA BISHOP:—

"DEAR SIR,—I am happy to say that all I have heard respecting the efficacy of DR. STOLBERG'S celebrated LOZENGE is perfectly true, as yesterday, feeling myself very fatigued (singing nightly at the Theatre), I took several of the Lozenges, and my voice was very clear, and my throat quite free from relaxation. I am, Dear Sir, Yours truly,

ANNA BISHOP."

"18th November 1846.—Jermyn Street."

Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Churchyard; W. Edwards and Newbery and Sons, St. Paul's Churchyard; Sanger, and Dietrichsen and Hannay, Oxford-street; and retail by all respectable Chymists in the Kingdom.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM

FOR 1847,

A most beautiful Christmas Present, New Year's Gift, and Etrennes.

M. JULLIEN

Has the honor to announce that his

MUSICAL ANNUAL FOR 1847

Is now Published, and is by far the best work of the kind that has ever appeared; contains no less than

THIRTY PIECES OF VOCAL AND FOURTEEN OF INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC,

The greater part of which have never before been published, the copyrights having been purchased expressly for this work, at an immense cost, with the view of rendering it immeasurably superior to any of its predecessors.

The portion which has already appeared comprise those pieces only whose decided success has induced M. JULLIEN, at the request of numerous influential patrons, to include them in this Selection.

The Illustrations, in addition to the elaborately executed Covers, Title, and Dedication pages, include

TWO MAGNIFICENT VIEWS

OF THE

Interior of Covent-Garden Theatre,

The one taken during the brilliant scene exhibited in that splendid arena of the occasion of M. JULLIEN'S GRAND BAL MASQUE; the other a VIEW OF THE THEATRE TAKEN DURING THE CONCERTS,
the grouping of the Figures in both Views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant. To those who have visited the Theatre on either occasion, the ALBUM will form a delightful SOUVENIR, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of the gorgeous scene.

A SPLENDIDLY-COLOURED

PORTRAIT

Of the celebrated Danseuse,

MADLE. FLORA FABRI,

In the admired Pas, LA CASTIGLIANA.

AN ORIGINAL SUBJECT,

THE FORTUNE TELLER'S

Illustrating BAKER's beautiful Ballad of that name.

The whole of this department of the ALBUM has been under the active superintendence of J. BRANDARD, Esq., whose pencil only has been employed in its production.

Nothing more need be said in favour of this ALBUM, and in proof of its vast superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the Contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe: viz.

ROSSINI,	VERDI,	DONIZETTI,	RUBINI,
ROCH-ALBERT,	HOELZELL,	GOLDBERG,	SCHIRA,
SCHULZ,	STOEPEL,	DUPREZ,	JOSE GOMIS,
MASARNAU,	MARATZEK,	BALFE,	JULLIEN,
HATTON,	BARRET,	ALEXANDER LEE,	KÖNIG,
KNIGHT,	BAKER,	FARMER,	LINLEY,
LAKE,	FITZBALL,	MOULD,	HURREY,
FOREST,	ALBERT SMITH,	DÉSMOND RYAN,	&c.

It will thus be perceived that in addition to the latest compositions of the best English Composers, the ALBUM will contain some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany, France, Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting the attention of the Continental dilettanti.

PRICE 18s. AND £1. 1s.

ROYAL CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC

214, REGENT-STREET, AND 45, KING-STREET.

JULLIEN'S

NEW DANCE MUSIC FOR CHRISTMAS.

The British Army Quadrille, the American and Camelia Polkas—Jullien. The Garland Waltz and Casino Polka—König. Adrienne Valse and La fin du Bal Galop—Barret. The above compositions, in addition to being the newest and most fashionable of the day, will be found superior to all others in their applicability to Dancing, the time throughout all of them being carefully marked for that especial purpose.

ROYAL MUSICAL CONSERVATORY,

214, REGENT STREET, and 45, KING STREET.

DOUBLE BASS.

To be Sold, a fine old Double Bass, in excellent condition, and by an esteemed maker. Price £15. May be seen at 199, Sloane Street, Knightsbridge.

JUST PUBLISHED,

THE WHOLE OF THE SONGS, DUETS, CHORUSES, &c., IN

BALFE'S NEW OPERA,

THE BONDMAN,

AS PERFORMED AT THE THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

Written by Alfred Bunn, Esq.

THE MOST FAVORITE SONGS ARE:—

	s.	d.
"Child of the sun"—ballad Mr. Harrison	2	0
"It is not form, it is not face"—ballad. Miss Romer	2	0
"Love in language"—romance Ditto	2	0
"They say there is some distant land"—ballad. Mr. Harrison	2	0
"Go memory, go"—ditto. Ditto	2	0
"When fond remembrance"—song	2	0
"There is nothing so perplexing"—air. Mr. Weiss	2	6

IN THE PRESS.—The whole of the vocal music and various arrangements by all the most popular composers.

CHAPPELL, 50, NEW BOND STREET.

NEW MUSIC, BY CLEMENT WHITE.

JUST PUBLISHED, BY P. E. ROWE,

Music Seller, 19, George Street, Plymouth,

And to be had at all the Music Sellers in London.

	s.	d.
"Ronald"—Ballad	2	0
"He never can be mine"—Ballad	2	0
"Waiting for thee"—Serenade	2	0

MEDICAL GALVANISM.

HORNE, THORNTWHAITE, & WOOD, Successors to E. PALMER, 123, Newgate-street, in submitting their improved ELECTRO-GALVANIC MACHINES, beg to state, that they have availed themselves of the discoveries of De la Rive, Faraday, Smee, and others, by which they are enabled to construct a coil with all the required intensity and quantity of electricity for medical use, thereby effecting both a saving of expense and trouble to the invalid, and placing in his hands an effective, powerful, and simple instrument, that may be excited at a minute's notice, and without trouble.—Price, £3. 3s.; £3. 10s.; and £5. 5s.

PHILOSOPHICAL APPARATUS.—Every description of Apparatus connected with Chemistry, Hydraulics, Hydrostatics, Pneumatics, Frictional and Voltaic
Electricity, Electro-Magnetism, Electro-Metallurgy, Optics, (including the Dissolving Views, Photography, &c.) manufactured and sold by Horne, Thornthwaite and Wood, successors to Edward Palmer, 123, Newgate Street, London.

Foreign orders, enclosing a remittance or order for payment in London, promptly attended to.

FOR COUGHS, COLDS, IRRITATION OF THE THROAT, HOARSENESS, &c.

PECTORAL EMULSION,

Prepared strictly according to the formula of a distinguished Physician in Paris.
This preparation having enjoyed great celebrity for many years on the Continent, as well as undergoing a trial for some time in private practice in this country, is now introduced to the public as the most agreeable, efficacious, and speedy cure for the above affections, relieving the most obstinate Coughs in a few hours. To Singers, Professors, and Public Speakers it will be found invaluable.

PREPARED ONLY BY

TURNER AND SPRATT,

English and Foreign Chymists, 7, TICHBORNE STREET, Haymarket.

In Bottles at 1s. 1d. and 2s. 9d. each.—Importers of French Jujubes and Syrups.

Printed and Published for the Proprietors, at the "Nassau Steam Press,"
by WILLIAM SPENCER JOHNSON, 60, St. Martin's Lane, in the parish of St.
Martin's in the Fields, in the County of Middlesex; where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed post paid. To be had of G. Purkiss, Dean Street, Soho; Strange, Paternoster Row; Wiseheart, Dublin; and all Booksellers.—Saturday, January 2nd, 1847.

The Musical World.

(PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT NOON.)

A RECORD OF THE THEATRES, MUSIC, LITERATURE, FINE ARTS,
FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE, &c.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s. Stamped; 12s. Unstamped; to be forwarded by Money Order or Postage Stamps to the Publisher, W. S. Johnson, "Nassau Steam Press," 60, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross;

Each Subscriber is entitled to an Admission to an Annual Concert, and a Piece of Music, (regular Music sign) Monthly.

No. 2.—Vol. XXII.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 9, 1847.

PRICE THREEPENCE
STAMPED, FOURPENCE

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

We beg leave respectfully to remind our Town Subscribers that the subscriptions for the present year being now due, the Collector will wait upon them immediately. Our Provincial Subscribers will oblige us by an early remittance.

ROBERT BRUCE.

"To the Editor of the Musical World."

MY DEAR FRIEND:—You ask me to write to you on the subject of Rossini's opera as soon as it has been performed. It appears, then, that you share the interest and curiosity which this pretended event has excited among the numerous worshippers at the shrine of Rossini. For my own part, at the risk of appearing in your eyes a rigid puritan in musical taste, I must avow that I was not at all impatient to hail the revival of those effeminate cavatinas, those untruthful passions—in short, of all the hypocritical paraphernalia which are to be found by the side of some pretty bits of melody in the operas of that great corruptor of music, called Rossini, generally known under the nickname of the "Swan of Pesaro." I cannot resist, however, my dear friend, (for you know my impartiality,) from excepting the Barber of Seville, which I hold to be a masterpiece from one end to the other.

But I have often before explained to you what I think of Rossini. It is enough to remind you that I have never been insensible to the beauties which exist in his scores. I do not judge of music from a fixed prejudice, nor from any particular system. Let me simply be allowed to regard Rossini as a man of great, of very great talent. But he has neither the depth nor the love of truth that belong to genius. The really great artist impresses the seal of truth even upon his most ideal productions—but this power, and the passion for perfecting the smallest details of thought and form, are alike deficient in Rossini. The immense facility of Rossini in production, about which so many wonderful stories are told, is no proof of genius, unless the works thus easily produced are perfect in spite of it. But if numberless faults disfigure a few happy thoughts, if these thoughts themselves sin by want of taste in their arrangement, or lose their charm by a succession of vulgar and trivial ideas, there is then nothing astonishing in this fertility of creation, since there is nothing less difficult than to write quickly and to write ill. But here I stop, thinking of your impatience, and compassionating it. Let us, then, proceed in order.

Robert Bruce, after having been announced three or four times, was produced at last on Wednesday, Dec. 30, at the Académie Royale de Musique. The most elegant and distinguished audience filled the beautiful theatre of the Rue Lepelletier, and the royal box was occupied by MM. the Duc de Nemours, the Duc d'Aumale, the Duc de Montpensier, and their ladies, the Duchesses. In the pit was remarked a legion of those "degenerate Romans," pacific cohorts, who demand, nevertheless, nothing better than to come hand-to-hand, the species of combat in which they excel. All their genius is in the palms of their hands; they work, they think, they talk, but above all they applaud with their hands, with an energy, a passion, a regularity, a simultaneousness, which could only have been acquired by painful and laborious study. This well-disciplined multitude rolled about like the black waves of a river which threatens to overflow its banks. Presently I shall speak to you of their devotions which narrowly missed drowning, a poor singer who could not—but—

And now I have arrived at the end of my letter. * * * You must not complain—I have nothing else to tell you, since Signor Rossini told us nothing himself. Open the score of La Donna del Lago, and you have Robert Bruce before you. In addition to this, divers fragments from Armida, or Cyro in Babilonia, or Thorvaldo e Dorsiska, or Zelmira, more or less skilfully interwoven, and the whole rafistolé, badigonné, re-cooked—here diminished, there augmented, by sundry bangs of the great drum and sundry warlike flourishes, and you have an idea of Robert Bruce about as confused as they had who were present at its performance. There is a pretty trio (I think from La Donna del Lago), and a chorus, both of which gave pleasure. The remainder was listened to with sufficient indifference, and all the interest of the evening was concentrated upon a scene in which Rossini had no part, but which was, nevertheless, pronounced the capital point of the score. This was an air sung by Madame Stoltz, with accompaniment (not obligato) of two choruses. One of these choruses was executed by the "Romans" above alluded to, and the other by the public, properly so called. The latter offended by the too zealous ministry of the official clappers of the Opera Director, began to hiss vigorously, and in this manner protested against the praises and applause so imprudently awarded to the air of Madame Stoltz. Thereupon a renewal of enthusiasm, well-fed and well-paid. The public rejoice by hisses in proportion. Madame Stoltz, indignant, turns to the public, and some affirm to have heard her address them in terms by no means reverential—a fact denied by others. At all events (Madame Stoltz), rage in her countenance, began to tear into pieces a very handsome lace handkerchief, and directed threatening looks towards that part of the public, at the extreme left, which was so violently opposed to the chevaliers du lustre. The intelligent part of the public, which confines the demonstration of its discontent to coldness and indifference, succeeded at last in calming the tempest which blew from all sides, and the opera was allowed to proceed to the end. This, then, was the principal event of interest during the evening. The second representation of Robert Bruce was announced for Friday, (Jan. 1st), but it did not take place, Lucia di Lammermoor being substituted. It is generally believed that the "new opera" of Rossini (it is thus designated in the bills) will endure for a few representations, only on account of the magnificence of the decorations and the mise en scene. But this is nothing to me. I should no more have thought of writing to you about this opera than about a performance of Otello or La Gazza Ladra, had not you asked me to send you an account of its reception.

I finish my letter with a piece of good news. Mr. Lumley, director of Her Majesty's Theatre in London, has engaged Henri Panofka as director-in-chief of the choruses, and as the special superintendent of the artistic interests of that great establishment. Every artist will applaud this intelligent choice, which is a new proof of the capacity of the director.

Now that I have shaken off my idleness, allow me to plunge into it once more, and to subscribe myself your devoted friend,

Paris, Jan. 2, 1847,

STEPHEN HELLER.

HANDEL AND SCARLATTI.

HANDEL'S "Suites de Pieces," in two books, edited by MOSCHELES; SCARLATTI'S "Pieces pour le Clavecin," edited by J. B. CRAMER.—CRAMER, BEALE, & Co., 201, Regent Street.

(Second notice.)

IN our notice, last week, we reviewed that book of the Suites de Pieces, which, according to the outward cover, was the second; but since then we have seen other copies, and find the indicated number transferred from one book to the other. We think it necessary to state this, because the enthusiastic praises we bestowed upon the book of Pieces in question, can by no means be applied with equal justice to its fellow, which is a work in most respects of a far inferior order; a work addressing oftener the popular than the refined taste, and evidently written more with an eye towards the advantage of music-sellers than the glorification of art. Be it, then, clearly understood, that the book of Handel's Suites de Pieces which we recommend to the attention of musicians and cultivated amateurs, as a prodigy of genius and art is the one which contains the five fugues. The other book has no fugues at all, which makes the matter clear without further explanation. The number of the book ought, to prevent mistakes, to have been indicated on the title page; and we recommend the spirited publishers to adopt the precaution forthwith. Having explained this, we shall now proceed to speak of the other book—the book which is not the book.

This collection opens with a very long set of pieces in the key of G major. (It may not be out of place to state here, that Handel has not indicated the divisions in this book by the terms Suite premiere, Suite seconde, &c., as he has in the other.) As these have for the most part but little musical interest, a brief survey of their merits must suffice. A quick prelude in 3-4—an allemande—and an allegro in common time, written almost throughout in two parts, are only remarkable for the simplicity of their structure, the meagreness of their harmonic treatment, and the scantiness of their modulations. A courante, which follows, is more interesting; there is more variety of harmony, and more continuity of development; the motivo is pretty, the progressions are natural and pleasing; but the writing bears marks of haste, as though Handel was not very much in love with his task, and wished to get over it as quickly as possible. In the ninth bar, there is a very bare and unsatisfactory specimen of part-writing, which we shall instance:—

Right hand.—C, D, E, F sharp, G, A, F sharp.

Left hand.—A, B, C, B, A, G, D.

Nothing can be more disagreeable than the succession of perfect fifth, major seventh and major ninth, and its resolution to D with a major third by no means excuses it. Such instances, rare in Handel, are more frequent in this book of suites than in any work of his that ever came under our notice. A short aria which follows, in common time presto, makes up for this oversight; it is a fresh and lovely melody, and a perfect gem of two-part writing. A minuet, to which it gives way, is remarkable for containing a long progression in semi-quavers at the commencement of the second part, which is almost the counterpart of a similar passage to be found in Mendelssohn's ingenious Caprice in F sharp minor. Mendelssohn sips the beauties of the old masters as the bee the sweets from the flower-cups; but, like the bee, he makes honey of them, and right content are we to taste what he has gathered and set before us in so savoury a form. Yet these laudable thefts, like pious frauds, are worthy noting, as signs of the times, and should be recorded, if only in justice to the fine old masters who were the first tillers of the soil which after-husbandmen have made so fertile. A gavotte and eight variations upon it, in two parts throughout, come next. These are pretty and sparkling, but somewhat monotonous from the poverty of the counterpoints—a result of the base moving incessantly in thirds with the treble. The suite terminates with a gigue in 12-8 time, on the whole a good specimen. But, take it for all in all, this suite has not an amount of musical interest at all commensurate with its extravagant length, and its predominant style is too trivial to engage the continued attention of those who look, in music, for something more than notes.

The second suite in D minor is also very long, but far superior to the preceding one. It opens with an allemande which has some charming points, albeit the melody does not always flow so easily as in most of Handel's inspirations. An allegro 3-8 (a quick courante), written in two parts, but not otherwise remarkable, comes next, and gives way to a slow air in 3-4 time, a kind of song without words—a most heavenly melody, only disfigured by the shakes and trills demanded by the detestable fashion of the period. Next comes a gigue, and one of the best of them. There are one or two points in this which help to illustrate the superiority of the new method of noting the minor scale, which prescribes the use of the flat sixth when a harmony in the key is indicated by the passage. Handel is always uncertain in this particular, sometimes adopting one method, sometimes the other, as though he felt an instinctive hesitation on the subject. Wherever he uses the old method the passage is just as offensive to the ear as it is grateful when he employs the new. It may not be out of place here to express our fervent hope that Alfred Day's system of harmony will soon be adopted by all sensible musicians. Its rejection at our Academy was a lamentable instance of short-sided prejudice—a farce, in short, by no means creditable to our only musical institution. It was rejected without examination—a conclusion to which our own conviction of its unanswerable truth inevitably brings us,—and this makes the matter worse. Nor has the consequent resignation of Mr. Macfarren from the ranks of its professors at all benefited the Academy. The loss of so conscientious and admirable a musician cannot, indeed, but have greatly injured it in the eyes of all unbiassed persons, competent to judge of the matter. But this by the way. A minuet, with three variations, follows the gigue; it is a very pleasing trifle. The allemande and courante which come next, built upon one progression of harmonies common to both, are very beautiful, especially the courante, which might have been placed in the other book without damaging its musical interest. Still more charming is the grave and melancholy sarabande to which it gives way, with its simple and beautiful harmonies, forming the substratum of two ingenious variations. A short gigue concludes the suite, which has no particular points to eulogize or decry. On the whole the effect of this suite must necessarily be monotonous. Fancy, reader, nine pieces in succession, all in one key, and that key a minor!

The next is a short suite of three pieces—an allemande, a courante, and a gigue, in E minor. These are of the highest order of poetical beauty. The passionate melody of the two first pieces is almost unendurable, so deep is its dejection—so agonising its tenderness. We would give worlds to know in what train of mind was Handel when he poured forth this flood of tristful eloquence, which, to use a fine simile that Coleridge applied to Romeo and Juliet, and Cipriani Potter to the Parisina overture of Bennett, is like a long drawn sigh. The gigue, one of the very finest possible, is replete with beautiful progressions of harmony, and delicious passages of sequence. The whole is as fresh and new, both in melody and harmony, as though it had been written but yesterday. Master Felix!—Master Felix!—that is Master Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy!—where did you dig up some of the most loveliest ideas in your two slow movements (in E minor, too!) of the Seven Characteristic Pieces,* if not from this exhaustless mine of wealth—aye, if not from this very corner of the mine? You are a knowing hand, Master Felix! This suite should be forthwith preferred to the other book. It is too transcendent for association with other than the divinest of divine melodies. By the way, there are one or two places in the allemande and courante (which, by mistake, is headed saraband in this edition) that we strongly imagine must be mistakes, overlooked by the excellent editor. But where there is so much beauty the defects are lost in a veil of borrowed light—like those pictures in the Exhibition which are hung close to the burning splendors of Turner—and he must be a cold critic who would stop to point them out.

A bold and vigorous air, in G major (chaconne), with eight brilliant variations, commences the next suite. The chaconne is in 3-4 time, in character something between a minuet and a saraband, not so lively as the one nor so grave as the other. This is the finest specimen Handel has left us. Next follows a charming adagio, 8-4, in G minor, with six variations in the minor, and five in the major, all of them ingenious, brilliant and effective. Then we find an allemande in G minor, which may compete with any piece in either book. It opens with a long passage in the treble, answered, reversed, by the bass, and then a revel of semiquaver-counterpoint à la Mendelssohn. The whole of the second part is exquisitely beautiful. A passage commencing with a progression from C minor into B flat, repeated afterwards in the relative minor, is of surpassing loveliness. Play it, reader, and judge for yourself. The form of this piece is that usually adopted by Scarlatti, and the cadence at the end of both parts is taken almost notatim from that which Scarlatti affixes to nearly all his movements in the minor key. But though the form is like, the spirit which is its soul, soars far above the level of the old Italian. It is singular that we should have begun our notice of this book in a strain anything but eulogistic, and that as we advance we should find so many beauties opposing our passage, as to make us already strangely incline to alter our verdict of partial indifference into one of hearty approval. A courante follows the allemande, with the same progression of harmony for its basis. And yet how differently treated! The beautiful passage in B flat again appears, in a form scarcely less insinuating. Towards the end of the second part there is an extraordinary effect of surprise produced by the unexpected transition from the chord of E flat to that of C. In the last bar but seven, there is an instance of the ancient minor scale, so hideous, that it must be an oversight. Handel's refined ear could not have tolerated the E natural which occurs in that bar. With Alfred Day's E flat the passage would have been unexceptionable; but as it stands, the shock upon the ear is so violent that it goes far to spoil a movement in all other respects beautiful. This very interesting suite concludes with a gigue, which is the longest and most elaborate of all the specimens Handel has left us—so long, and so elaborate, indeed, so lucid and consistent in design, so complete and grand in development, that it might serve for the last movement of a symphony of the largest pretensions, and we cannot but think that Haydn was much indebted to it for the origin of those rondo movements which are the glories of so many of his finest symphonies. Although one figure of triplets is sustained through nearly six pages, the variety of which it is here made susceptible proves the wonderful mastery of Handel over the entire science of counterpoint, and the prodigal resources of his invention.

The next suite, in B flat, consists of an allemande, courante, sarabande, and gigue—of which, though all are melodious and pleasing, the last is the most interesting and the best. The subject is answered in canon on the octave, the second part taking the subject reversed. It would be impossible to write in three parts more clearly and more naturally. In the last bar of the first part of the allemande, and in the sixth bar of the courante, there are some evident errors in the bass. A superb prelude follows, which contains some of the most surprising and magnificent progressions of harmony that ancient or modern composer has ever conceived. It is followed closely by a charming movement, in which a continuous motion of semiquavers is admirably sustained to the end. This is followed by a delicious aria in the Italian style, with five clever variations. The fourth of these is the undeniable germ of the magnificent chorus of the priests of Bel, in the oratorio of Deborah, which is in the same key. The last suite opens with a quaint minuetto in G minor, diversified by a quantity of turns and graces not by any means to our taste. A chaconne with sixty-two variations, (!) all in G major, finishes the suite and the book. These variations involve almost every conceivable figure of passage that can be founded on a short progression of harmony such as the present, which is nothing more than a modulation from the tonic to the dominant, and back again from the dominant to the tonic, the whole comprised in eight bars of 3-4 measure. The types of almost all the variations of those composers whose exclusive vocation is to write variations may be found in this extraordinary manifestation of fancy and invention.

So much for Handel's Suites de Pieces! If what we have thus hurriedly noted can persuade any of our readers, not already acquainted, to make themselves now acquainted with one of the most interesting and remarkable exhibitions of the genius of the great Handel, we shall only be too happy to have labored successfully in so excellent a cause.

* Published in England by Wessel and Co., under the title of "The Temperaments."

In our next we shall turn our attention to the Pieces pour le Clavecin of Domenico Scarlatti, a composer of very different stamp.

THE RIVAL ITALIAN OPERAS.

ALREADY the mouth-organs of the rival establishments have sounded their notes of opposition, and signs of contention are heralding the opening of the season. The chief subject of difference is the engagement of Jenny Lind at Her Majesty's Theatre; which the Morning Post confidently asserts, but which the Morning Chronicle looks upon in a very doubtful light. There is a show of reason in the arguments put forth by the latter journal respecting the difficulty likely to be encountered by the Swedish nightingale in her approaching advent to this country, and the statements therein made, if true, would doubtless render the engagement of the fair artiste a matter of serious contest between certain parties. Before making any observations of our own thereupon, we shall allow the Morning Chronicle to speak for itself.

"JENNY LIND.—Divers contemporaries, who copy our musical intelligence and private correspondence, without the slightest acknowledgment, every week, have given contradictions to our article on the subject of the Swedish nightingale's visit to this country, as published in the Morning Chronicle of December 21. The contradictions are of two kinds—the first being to the effect, that Mr. Bunn has received from her Majesty's Theatre a sum of money, to resign Jenny Lind's contract for Drury-lane Theatre. It is declared boldly that the fair Swede intends to come to this country, on a guarantee, for the damages and costs that may be awarded against her in Mr. Bunn's action should she sing at the Opera-House in the Haymarket. We can only assure our contemporaries, piratical or otherwise—that so far from Mr. Bunn having been bought off, that he has forwarded to Jenny Lind a distinct intimation of his intention to enforce his claim by every legal means should she attempt to sing in this country at any other theatre but Drury-lane. As for the second assertion of certain journals, we are astonished that for one moment it can be supposed of Jenny Lind she would have the temerity to come to London, with two contracts signed by herself, and attempt to sing under the engagement last made because it is more profitable. Instances in dramatic annals are known of artists having engaged themselves at two theatres in this way; but it is also on record, that the public resented such flagrant dishonesty. We shall be delighted to hear Jenny Lind in London, but we do not believe that from her own sense of honour, as well as from prudential considerations, she will venture here whilst two contracts are in force against her. If Jenny Lind be desirous of convincing the English public that it is not a financial feeling which keeps her from fulfilling her first signed contract with Drury-lane Theatre, but that it really arises from her incompetency to acquire the English language, there is a mode of testing her sincerity which we feel sure the Drury-lane lessee would be too glad to adopt. Let Jenny Lind sing in German, and Mr. Bunn would meet her views in that respect."

To the above statements and contradictions we have to offer two rejoinders, which will tend to prove that the Morning Chronicle is by no means the most authentic mouth-piece of the new Italian Opera, and that, whencesoever it obtains its information, it is either too susceptible of vulgar rumour, or too dim-sighted to discriminate between the true and the improbable. Our first rejoinder to the article in the Chronicle is, that Jenny Lind will positively visit London in April; our second—on consideration—we shall withhold for a future occasion: since it is a grave one.

The second bone of contention between the rival houses is the secession of the band from Her Majesty's Theatre. While the Morning Chronicle asserts that the entire members of the orchestra, with two or three exceptions, have passed over to the Royal Italian Opera at Covent Garden, the Post produces a document which contradicts the statement, and, as far as we can see, leaves the writer in the Chronicle no justification for its assertion. The names of the two artists who have signed the document afford no room to doubt of its authenticity. As "justice to all parties" is our motto, we feel it our duty to give the letter from the Post, and allow our readers to judge for themselves between the contending parties, as to which is censurable, and which is right. The following is the document:—

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING POST.

"SIR—We regret to trespass on your valuable space, but on the part of the gentlemen of the orchestra of her Majesty's Theatre we are compelled to contradict an imputation conveyed in an article of a morning journal of Saturday, to the effect, that the artists employed at the Italian Opera have abandoned the establishment.

"We beg to say that as regards the orchestra alone, having always found Mr. Lumley as punctual and as honorable in all his dealings towards us, as his predecessors were irregular, ourselves and twenty-two others of our colleagues have never contemplated leaving the theatre, and on no account could we ever have thought of engaging in a hostile establishment whilst still in his service. In this feeling we are happy to find ourselves associated with so many artists in other departments of the institution of the highest character and fame.

"Whilst anxious to avoid all imputation of having participated in this extraordinary proceeding, we wish nowise to reflect on our former colleagues. One may easily imagine what deep considerations were, to persons of limited revenues, the offer of increased pay, with the prospect of less labour (the suppression of ballet being promised), and, still more, the fear that no artist not engaging with the hostile party would be employed as heretofore at the Philharmonic and Ancient Concerts.

"We remain, Sir,

"Your most obedient servants,

"A. J. TOUBECQUE, Leader of the Opera.

"J. B. NABAUD, Leader of the Ballet.

"London, Saturday Night."

The recriminative tone persisted in by both the journals will in no wise tend to the benefit of the respective establishments they would uphold, or to advance art in general. We have every desire to see the two houses make use of all fair and legitimate means to outshine each other in their endeavor to render music as complete as possible in its orchestral and vocal departments; but we cannot appreciate that deprecatory style of criticism which would attempt to elevate one establishment at the expense of the other. The field is open to both parties, and the best conducted, in the end, will assuredly obtain the public favour. Meanwhile, we may remark, that the most strenuous efforts are being made on either side to eclipse the other in the musical and ballet departments. At Her Majesty's Theatre the principal vocalists will include the names of Mesdames Castellan, Frezzolini, Tadolini, and, according to the Post, Jenny Lind, with, probably, Anna Bishop; and M. M. Lablache, père et fils, Fraschini, Gardoni, &c. &c., while the Royal Italian Opera will comprise Grisi, Persiani, Brambilla, Mario, Tamburini, Ronconi, Salvi, Marini, and others. Thus, as far as principals are concerned, either Opera may boast of a more efficient vocal corps than has been heard together in the metropolis since the golden days of the combination of Grisi, Persiani, Sophie Loewe, Brambilla, Rubini, Tamburini, Lablache, and Mario. Among the engagements of Her Majesty's Theatre we have forborne to mention Rubini, because we are by no means certified as to his coming. If the great tenor condescend to accept of Mr. Lumley's munificent offer, there is little doubt that he will prove the sun of the musical season of 1847 at Her Majesty's Theatre, as well on account of the novelty of his appearance, as of his high and deserved reputation. At Covent Garden, Tamburini's engagement will be hailed with delight by all admirers of that great artist; while Persiani's appearance, after an absence from London of several years, will excite no small degree of interest. Marini's coming is also looked for with eager longing. His name is high among the highest of serious bass singers in Italy. Of Grisi and Mario it were useless to utter eulogy. The gracious Giulia has long held acknowledged supremacy among the prime donne of Europe; and since the retirement of Rubini, Mario alone has been found worthy to fill the place of first tenor at the operas of Paris and London, the two great art-temples of the musical world. Salvi holds a high reputation on the continent, and is in immense favor at St. Petersburg. We never heard him, excepting in a concert-room, where his singing did not particularly strike us; but we are assured from the best information that his dramatic powers are of the loftiest order. We have thus briefly inspected the operatic forces of the two theatres, and have mentioned sufficient to show the folly of attempting to deprecate one side or the other. We shall say nothing of the opposing ballet corps, seeing that the Royal Italian Opera has not as yet announced its list of artists. In conclusion, we may observe that, following our motto, without favour or prejudice, we shall do our duty by both parties, and lean towards neither.

Since writing the above, we have read an article in the Morning Chronicle purporting to be an answer to the letter that appeared in the Morning Post. But lo! it comes out that the letter in question was sent round to all the daily papers, and consequently the reply of the Chronicle is intended for the subscribers to the epistle, and not the Morning Post. The Chronicle does not deny the fact of two-and-twenty members, in addition to Tolbecque and Nadaud, remaining still faithful to Mr. Lumley, but wriggles out of his previous statement by stating, "We know that as neither these artists, nor their twenty-two colleagues were offered engagements for the Royal Italian Opera at Covent Garden, they have been happily exposed to no temptation." Sylvester, man, where's your logic? It is our opinion that the writer in the Chronicle coins a great many of the musical features of that journal out of his own brain, that he prefers being severe to being logical, and that he would rather be reprehended for his want of truth, than not be praised for the discovery of something strange or new, which had never other existence than the being depicted on the retina of his own visual organs. Surely the Royal Italian Opera has not need of descending to fabrication to uphold its repute.

As an appendix to the above, we beg leave to transcribe two letters which have since been issued by the adverse parties, and have appeared in two of the leading journals of the metropolis. The first is from Mr. Ella, the director of the Musical Union, who, from the prominent position he assumes on every occasion in which the Royal Italian Opera is concerned, would seem to have been chosen the consul and dictator of the Covent Garden band. The epistle runs as follows:—

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING HERALD.

"SIR,—In answer to the unjust imputations in the letter which appeared in your journal on Monday last, purporting to have been written by two of my late comrades of Her Majesty's Theatre, may I request, from your sense of justice, that you will insert a reply on behalf of myself and the 53 colleagues who have thought proper to accept engagements at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden. It is not my intention to unfold the secrets of the prison-house, nor to disclose matters in which the public takes little interest, but I do protest, in the strongest manner, against the insinuations that we have been actuated solely by mercenary considerations, or menaces, to abandon Her Majesty's Theatre. The absence of all sympathy between manager and artist, the personal insults, the tyrannical exercise of power in discharging artists season after season, at the eleventh hour, and the total insecurity of the tenure of the position of any of my colleagues were, in part, the inducements to abandon the old for the new Italian Opera. Within the last few years I have visited all the principal theatres of France, Germany, and Italy, and I have also been twenty-three years a member of the orchestra of Her Majesty's Theatre, and I can conscientiously declare, as an artist, that I never heard a succession of more discreditable and imperfect executions of operas, than during the last season, so totally unworthy of a great lyrical establishment, and of the support of an enlightened English public. Thus, in consideration of art, as well as for the reasons already assigned, we have transferred our services to the Royal Opera, Covent Garden. I have only to add that the engagements of the band of Her Majesty's Theatre were always made from season to season only, and that the present manager never intimated at the close of any season his anxiety for the continuance of the services of the artists for the following year, until after the first announcement of the new Italian Opera, when he discovered that it was then too late.

I have the honour to remain, Sir, your obedient servant,

"JOHN ELLA,

"19, Mortimer-street."

"Director of the Musical Union.

The second letter is from the treasurer of Her Majesty's Theatre, who thus argues, and, as Major Dalgetty would say, vilipends the detractors of the establishment.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

"SIR,—As treasurer of Her Majesty's Theatre I and myself called upon to contradict in the most positive manner the assertions contained in a morning paper of yesterday. During the present direction no member of the orchestra was ever paid less than in former years, and in numerous instances their salaries were increased, whilst under the preceding direction the disturbances arising from non-payment were of the most derogatory and painful nature. During this period no complaint ever reached me. The additional attendance for the performance of the Stabat Mater was paid to all who applied, as the accounts will show, although against the tenor of the orchestral engagement. I challenge the proof of any artist employed in any department during the five years of Mr. Lumley's direction not being paid what was his due, whilst gratuities were constantly given. Not only were all emoluments paid most punctually, but I regret very much to add, that amongst those who have been seduced from the service of the institution, there were several to whom I have often made advances, and others incapacitated from age and accident for efficient service, were kept on the establishment in consideration of the length of their services. To the punctuality observed, it, no doubt, arises that amongst the numberless employes, mechanists, artisans, &c., employed on this stage, and to whom offers were made, not one besides those mentioned have left the establishment, the upholsterer perhaps excepted. One of the members of the orchestra who has complained of tyranny exercised in the discharge of artistes, and consequent uncertainty of position, disproves his own assertion, since he has remained 23 years in his office; others have remained here twice that time; and as to Mr. Lumley, he never dismissed any instrumentalist.

"I remain, Sir, your very obedient servant,

"F. Camden-terrace West, Jan. 6."

"W. T. ROBINSON.

The last letter is a fine specimen of logical ratiocination and accurate writing. The author of the epistle has worked hard to get Mr. Lumley out of no scrape, and in his endeavours to protect him from outward attacks, has sorely wounded him with the shield intended for his defence. Mr. Treasurer is no doubt an Irishman—if he be not, he ought to be. To Mr. Ella's letter we have nothing to add. This gentleman is doubtless about to be appointed leader of the band next season. Nothing less could account for the championship he assumes.

Both these letters appeared the day after in the Post and the Chronicle. The Post affectionately imagines that Mr. Robinson's letter is a complete repulse to Mr. Ella's attack. The Chronicle, in another tone, declares that the letter of Mr. Ella and the answer of Mr. Robinson arrived at the office together. We do not presume to decide between such a magniloquent pair of controversialists. In the words of Voltaire, "Nous ne sommes que de pauvres gens de lettres qui croyons tout ce que l'on nous dit." So that, believing both parties to be right, we cannot offer an opinion without contradicting ourselves in the same breath.

THE AFFINITIES.

from the German of Goethe.

(Continued from page 8.)

PART I.—CHAPTER XIII.

EDWARD, on his part, is in quite a different mood. He thinks so little of sleeping, that it does not once occur to him to undress himself. The copy of the document he kisses a thousand times, that is to say, the beginning, written in Otilia's hand so childishly timid. The end he scarcely ventures to kiss, as he fancies he is looking on his own handwriting. "Would it were some other document!" he says to himself; and yet it is the most beautiful assurance that his highest wish is fulfilled. Does it remain in his hands, and will he not press it ceaselessly to his heart, although it is disfigured by the signature of a third party?

The moon, now on the decrease, is ascending over the wood. The warm night tempts Edward into the open air. He wanders about—he is the most restless, and yet the happiest of mortals. He strays through the garden, and finds it too narrow—he hastens to the fields, and finds them too wide. He is attracted back again to the castle—he finds himself under Otilia's windows. There he seats himself on one of the steps of the terrace. "Walls and bolts," he says to himself, "divide us now, but our hearts are not divided. If she stood before me, she would drop into my arms, and I into hers—and what is required further than this certainty?" All was quiet around him; not a breeze was stirring. So quiet was it, that he could hear under the ground the labours of those industrious animals to which day and night are the same. Abandoning himself completely to his dreams, he gradually fell asleep, and did not awake till the sun arose with its noble glance, and subdued the morning mist.

He found that he was the first person awake in his establishment. The workmen to him appeared to stop away too late—the labour prescribed for the day seemed insufficient to meet his wishes. He asked after several workmen; they were engaged, and at their posts in the course of the day. But even these are for him not sufficient to carry out his plans with rapidity. The mere progress ceases to afford him any pleasure; he wishes to see everything finished—and for whom? The paths must be made straight for Otilia to walk upon them commodiously, the seats must be rightly placed, that Otilia may rest upon them. Even with the new house he gets on as fast as he can. The timber-work must be set up on Otilia's birthday. There is now no settled rule in Edward's thoughts, any more than in his actions. The consciousness that he loves, and is loved in return, drives him into the infinite. How changed to him is the appearance of all the rooms—of all the surrounding objects! He seems to be no longer in his own house. The presence of Otilia has absorbed everything; his mind is quite enwrapped in her; no other consideration rises before him, no conscience addresses him. All that was restrained in his nature breaks loose; his whole being streams towards Otilia.

The Captain observes these impulses of passion, and wishes to prevent unhappy consequences. The plans, which are now carried out, without regard to moderation, and with a one-sided impulse he had made on the supposition that all would live quietly and on friendly terms together. He had effected the sale of the farm, the first payment had been made, and Charlotte, as had been arranged, had placed the money in her fund. But in the very first week she is obliged to exercise more than her usual seriousness, patience and love of order, for in the present hasty way of proceeding, the money allowed will not go far.

Much had been begun, and much was to be done. How could the Captain leave Charlotte in this situation! They consult together, and agree that it will be better for themselves to hasten the works already planned, and for that purpose to borrow money, appointing for the time of repayment those periods at which the instalments for the purchase of the farm, are still due. By a cession of privileges, this was effected almost without loss; they felt that their hands were less confined; and now all was in proper train, and there were workmen enough, they did more at once, and attained the desired end with speed and certainty.

In her heart, however, Charlotte adheres to her well-considered resolution, and her friend stands manfully by her in the same disposition. But this only increases their intimacy. They mutually express their opinions on the subject of Edward's passion, and consult as to what should be done. Charlotte keeps Otilia close to her, watches her more narrowly, and the more she has become acquainted with her own heart, the more can she penetrate into the heart of the young girl. She sees no safety, but in the removal of Otilia.

It seems to her a providential piece of good fortune that her daughter, Luciana, has so much distinguished herself at the school; for her great aunt, informed of the circumstance, is anxious to take her to herself, and introduce her to the world. Otilia might now go back to the school: the Captain, being well provided for, might depart; and all might be in as good a state as a few months ago—nay, much better. Her own position Charlotte hoped speedily to restore to Edward, and she arranged the whole matter so very sensibly in her own mind, that she only strengthened herself in the delusion that it was possible to return to an earlier and more confined condition; and that what had been forcibly detached could again be brought together.

In the meanwhile Edward felt very deeply the obstacles which were set in his way. He soon observed that he and Otilia were kept apart, and that it was rendered difficult for him to speak to her alone, or even to approach her, except in the presence of several persons, and while he was cross on this account, he became so with respect to many things besides. If he could manage to address a few words to Otilia, it was not only to assure her of his love, but also to complain of his wife and the Captain. He did not feel, that through his own impetuous manner of proceeding, he was himself on the road to exhaust the fund; he blamed Charlotte and the Captain for acting contrary to the first arrangement, though he himself had consented to the second,—nay, had occasioned it, and rendered it necessary.

Hatred is partial, but love is still more so. Even Otilia estranged herself in some degree from Charlotte and the Captain. When Edward first complained to her of the latter, saying, that as a friend, and considering his position, he did not act quite uprightly, Otilia heedlessly replied, "It has already displeased me to observe, that he is not quite honest towards you. I once heard him say to Charlotte, 'I only wish Edward would spare us that flute-playing of his; he will make nothing of it, and it is a great infliction to the listeners.' You may imagine how much I was hurt by this remark, when I am so pleased to accompany you."

Scarcely had she said this, than her mind whispered to her, that she should have kept it to herself; now, however, the words were spoken. Edward's countenance changed; never had anything more annoyed him. He felt he was attacked in his favorite requisitions; he was aware that his efforts were childish, and without the least pretension. But what entertained and pleased him, ought at any rate to be treated with some leniency by his friends; he did not think how horrible it is for a third party to have his ears offended by an incompetent talent. He was offended, enraged beyond the power of forgiveness, and felt himself released from all obligations whatever.

The necessity of being with Otilia, of seeing her, whispering something to her, confiding something to her, increased every day. He resolved to write to her, and to ask her to carry on a secret correspondence. The slip of paper upon which this request, laconically enough, was written, lay upon the writing-table, and was blown down by the draught, as soon as the valet entered to curl his hair. To try the heat of his irons, this man was in the habit of picking up pieces of paper from the ground. On this occasion he snatched up the billet, and pinched it in the iron, so that it was scorched. Edward remarking the mischance, snatched it from his hand. He soon set about writing another, but the second time, it did not flow quite in the same way from his pen. He felt some hesitation, some uneasiness, which at last he overcame. The paper was pressed into Otilia's hand, the first time that he could approach her.

Otilia made no delay in answering him. Without reading the slip, he placed it in his waistcoat, which, according to the fashion of the day, was too short to hold it. It worked its way out, and, without being observed by him, fell to the ground. Charlotte saw it, picked it up, and handed it to him, after a hasty glance. "Here is something in your hand," she said, "which, perhaps, you would not like to lose."

He was thunderstruck. "Is this dissimulation?" he thought. "Does she know the contents of the paper, or is she misled by the similarity of the hands?" He hoped—he thought the last. He was warned, doubly warned, but these strange accidental signs, by which a higher Being appears to address us, were unintelligible to his passion. Perhaps, as this led him further on, he felt the confinement, in which he seemed to be placed, more and more unpleasant. The friendly society was at an end; his heart was closed, and when he was compelled to be in company of his friend and his wife, he could not recall or revive in his heart the inclination he had formerly felt towards them. He could not avoid silently reproving himself on this account, but the reproach annoyed him, and he tried to help himself out with a kind of humour, which, because it was without love, wanted even the ordinary charm.

Charlotte's own internal feeling helped her through all these trials. She was conscious of her earnest resolution to renounce an inclination which was at once so noble and beautiful.

How much did she wish to assist the other two! She felt that the mere absence of Ottilia would be insufficient to remedy the evil. She proposes to talk to the dear girl on the subject, but she is unable, for the recollection of her own wavering acts as an impediment. She tries to express herself in general terms, but these general terms are just as applicable to her own situation, which she is afraid to avow. Every hint which she wishes to give Ottilia points back to her own heart. She wishes to warn, and feels that she herself might be in want of a warning.

Without saying a word, therefore, she still keeps the lovers apart, but the affair is not improved. Slight intimations, which frequently escape her, produce no effect upon Ottilia, for she has been convinced by Edward of Charlotte's inclination for the Captain, convinced that Charlotte herself desires a separation, which he thinks of effecting in a decorous manner.

Ottilia, supported by the feeling of her innocence, and on the road to the most ardently desired happiness, lives only for Edward. Strengthened by her love to him in all that is good; on his account more joyful in her sphere of action, and more open towards others, she finds herself in a heaven upon earth.

Thus do all together, each after their own fashion, pursue their ordinary life, with and without reflection. All seems to move in its accustomed course, just as even in monstrous cases, where all is at stake, people go living on, as if nothing was the matter.

PART I.—CHAPTER XIV.

In the meanwhile a letter from the Count to the Captain had arrived. It was rather an enclosure containing two letters, one of which, pointing out cheerful prospects in the future, might be shown to any one; while the other, which contained a definite offer, for the present, of an important place both at Court, and in office with the rank of major, a considerable salary, and other advantages, was to be kept private on account of sundry additional circumstances. The Captain, therefore, only informed his friend of the more distant hopes, and concealed that which immediately concerned the present.

The work now in hand he continued to carry on with energy, and quietly made arrangements, that the whole might progress without interruption in his absence. He himself now feels it expedient, that for many things a fixed term should be settled, and that Ottilia's birthday should cause much acceleration. The two friends, without any express understanding, now work readily together. Edward is quite pleased that the fund is strengthened by the money which has been raised, and the whole work proceeds as rapidly as possible.

The plan of converting the three ponds into one lake the Captain would willingly have opposed altogether. It would be necessary to strengthen the lower dam, to carry away the middle ones; indeed, the whole affair was momentous and critical in several respects. Both works, as far as they could be combined, were already begun, and on this account a young architect, formerly a pupil of the Captain's, came very acceptably. Partly by the appointment of able masters, and partly by hiring laborers, where it was practicable, he forwarded the progress of the undertaking, and promised security and durability to the work. At this the Captain was secretly pleased, as he saw that his absence would not be felt. It was with him a fixed principle not to abandon a work which he had undertaken, and had not completed, without appointing some one who could satisfactorily fill his place. He despised those who create a confusion in their own circle on purpose to make people sensible of their departure, and, acting like uncultivated egotists, wish to destroy that in which they can take no part.

Thus the work was carried on with great perseverance for the solemnization of Ottilia's birthday without this purpose being expressed, or even avowed internally. On account of Charlotte's views, free from envy as they were, there could be no decided festival. The youth of Ottilia, the state of her fortune, her position with respect to the family, rendered it improper for her to appear as the queen of a festal day. Besides, Edward did not wish to speak of the subject, as he intended that everything should, as it were, spring from itself, create astonishment, and please in a natural manner.

All, therefore, silently agreed to the pretext of erecting the timberwork of the house on that particular day without any especial reason. The occasion would admit of a feast being announced for the benefit both of their friends and of the people.

Edward's inclinations were boundless. Desiring to appropriate Ottilia to himself, there was no moderation in sacrifices, gifts, and promises. For some presents which he wished to make Ottilia on her birthday, the propositions uttered by Charlotte seemed much too niggardly. He spoke with the valet who had the care of his wardrobe, and who remained in constant intercourse with the tradespeople and the dealers in fashions. This man, who well knew what were the most agreeable presents, and also what was the handsomest way of making them, immediately ordered in the town the very neatest of chests, covered with morocco leather, studded with steel nails, and filled with gifts worthy of such a covering.

He made Edward another proposal. They had by them a little fire-work, which they had always delayed firing off, and this could easily be enlarged. Edward caught at the notion, and the valet promised to see it carried out. The whole affair was to be kept secret.

The Captain in the meanwhile, as the day approached, made his police arrangements, which he considered very essential, when a mass of persons was called, or attracted together. He had taken precautions with respect to beggars and other annoyances by which the pleasure of a festival is disturbed.

On the other hand, Edward and his confidential valet chiefly occupied themselves with the fire-work. It was to be let off by the middle pond, in front of the large oaks, while the company were to be assembled under the plane-trees, and thus at a suitable distance safely and commodiously to see the general effect, and the reflection from the water, as well as the parts of the exhibition that were to float on the waters' surface.

On this account, but under another pretext, Edward caused the space under the plane-trees to be cleared of brushwood, grass, and moss, and the ground being thus disencumbered, the noble growth of the trees, both in height and breadth, was for the first time properly apparent. Edward was highly delighted. The time of year was about the same as that in which he had planted the trees. "How long is that ago?" he said to himself. As soon as he had returned home, he turned over an old diary, which his father, especially during his residence in the country, had kept with great regularity. It was not possible that this plantation would be mentioned, but another important event which happened on the same day, and which Edward perfectly remembered, would certainly be set down. He turned over several leaves, and found the event in question, but how astonished, how delighted he was to discover a wonderful coincidence! The day and the year of planting the trees, were precisely the day and the year of Ottilia's birth.

(To be continued.)

*. To prevent misunderstanding it may be stated that the copyright of this translation belongs solely to the translator.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

FRENCH PLAYS.—On Monday week we witnessed for the first time this season the performance of L'Ecole des Maris, by Molière. This, although one of the author's first productions, is inferior to none in humour or wit. His anterior pieces held out promises of talent, which were for the first time realised in this. The diction is elegant, easy, and more grammatical than any that preceded it; for it must be remarked that this celebrated author and actor did not appear in Paris until 1658, under the patronage of Monsieur, at a theatre prepared for him by order of his patron in the palace of the old Louvre; and consequently, his diction is sometimes provincial and antique, and occasionally forced. Although we discover traces of great genius and flashes of brilliant wit in the pieces written in the provinces, the principal of which are the Precieuses Ridicules, le Dépit Amoureux, and l'Etourdi, not to mention the Médecin malgré lui, which was almost entirely re-written at a later period, yet there is a heaviness in the plot, a want of individuality in the characters, and not unfrequently a grossness in the language, evidently corrected and altered at a later period, which are not to be found in his later productions. The Ecole des Maris was, as we have said, the first fruit of Molière's residence at Paris, and is in no respect, in our opinion, inferior to those which are generally considered his best pieces. The language is peculiarly chaste and elegant, the verses flow smoothly and freely, and the wit and genius of the author are abundantly conspicuous. The object of the play is evident from the first scene, in which two brothers, Sganarelle and Ariste, discuss which is the best means educating a woman. Both are of mature age; but the former, of a morose and austere temper, advocates austerity and seclusion; the latter, of a gay and lively turn, pleads the necessity of perfect liberty and free agency. The two brothers have been constituted, by the will of a deceased friend, guardians to his two daughters, with full powers over them to marry them themselves, or dispose of them as they may think proper. Of course they now put in practice their favourite notions; and the consequence is, as the sequel shows, that mildness proves to be better than compulsion; for as Lisette rightly observes:

"Pensez-vous, après tout, que ces précautions
Servent de quelque obstacle à nos intentions?
Et, quand nous nous mettons quelque chose à la tête,
Que l'homme le plus fin ne soit pas une bête?"

C'est nous inspirer presque un désir de pécher,
Que montrer tant de soins pour nous en empêcher."

This is the moral of the story, and it is admirably worked out by the manner in which the author makes jealousy the instrument of its own destruction. Isabelle has been remarked by Valère, who has tried every possible means to communicate with the object of his passion, but without success, thanks to the jealousy and watchfulness of Sganarelle. He is in despair; but his mistress, endowed with an invention undiscovered by her guardian, helps him out of the difficulty, by sending this very guardian to complain of his assiduities, and begs of him to desist, as he cannot hope to succeed, even should his intentions be honest. The lover is now convinced that he has been remarked, and the guardian delighted at having so virtuous a pupil, and hugging himself with the anticipation of all the pleasure he shall enjoy in the possession of such a paragon of excellence, exclaims:

"Elle montre le fruit
Que l'éducation dans une âme produit;
La vertu fait ses soins, et son cœur s'y consomme
Jusque à s'offenser des seuls regards d'un homme."

But how great is his delight when she presents him with a letter, prepared for her lover, sealed of course, and expresses her indignation at his having dared to write to her! The officious dupe falls into the trap, and is himself the bearer of the amatory epistle. An admirable scene follows, in which Sganarelle pities the young man, and advises him to give up his useless pursuit, and bears back vows of eternal love and fidelity with a feigned show of despair, to blind the old man. Poor fellow, he says:

"Il me fait grand pitié,
Ce pauvre malheureux tout rempli d'amitié."

Isabelle now pretends that the rascally fellow has dared to propose by the instrumentality of a third party to carry her off—and to confound him, the guardian insists upon their meeting, in order as he says, that he may hear from her own mouth that his assiduities cannot be successful. This scene is admirably managed, and all the parties are of course delighted and the old man most of all, how I pity him after all, poor wretch! and to recompense his word promises her that her marriage shall take place the very next day. In the meantime the lovers are not idle, but Isabelle is surprised by Sganarelle just as she is leaving the house to fly to the object of her choice. She is however soon provided with a plausible story and persuades the old fellow that her sister was in the house, and being in love with Valère, and hearing of his passion rejected by herself, has requested to borrow her name for the occasion, in order to have an interview with him. The old man is indignant, and insists upon her immediate expulsion from the house. This Isabelle undertakes to effect, and having retired, soon re-appears under the disguise of her sister, and enters the house of Valère. Sganarelle now hastens to fetch a magistrate and a notary, and repairs to Valère's house with his brother, whom he forces to accompany him, and who is somewhat astonished at the treatment he receives at the hands of Eléonore, and is taunted by his brother on the education he has thought proper to give his ward. The marriage papers are ready, signed by Valère and Isabelle, and all present sign their consent to them, the two lovers keeping within the house until they obtain the precious document. Then Eléonore appears, and Valère and Isabelle married in reality. The tables are turned, and all are pleased except Sganarelle, who exclaims,

"Je renonce à jamais à ce sexe trompeur,
Et je le donne tout au diable de bon cœur."

On Monday last, M. Perlet played in two of his favourite parts, Le Savant and Le Parrain. We have delayed speaking of the former piece, afraid of being carried away by the enthusiasm with which it inspired us on a first hearing. It is so different from any of his other conceptions, so essentially characteristic, that we were quite taken by surprise, and were confirmed in our opinion, that to appreciate this consummate actor and wonderful genius, he should not be seen in any one of his creations alone, but in the whole range of his characters; and we pledge our critical knowledge that our opinion will be universally adopted, that M. Perlet is the greatest comedian living. This is a truth at which we have arrived by slow degrees, carefully weighing him against the first men of the present time, both in France and England. No man like him can so entirely divest himself of himself, and take upon him the individuality conceived by the author. For the present we will merely point out the principal features of this week's performance, leaving it to the future to indicate the points which stamp and bring out, in such brilliant and bold relief, the impersonations of M. Perlet. The Savant is one of those pieces addressed more to the gentler and more pathetic feelings of the heart than to the risible faculties. It is by Messrs. Scribe and Meuvet, and is well worthy of the reputation of both these gentlemen. The story is simple: so simple, that we scarcely know that there is one; for the principal interest is concentrated in the savant himself, and in the developement of his kind, amiable, and child-like character. The savant is a German student, entirely devoted to books and rare editions. He loves science for its own sake, shuns the world because it interferes with his own pursuits, and from no feelings of misanthropy, and is beloved by all who approach him. But, alas! at thirty-three he is an old man, and his doctor, who is his friend, threatens him with speedy dissolution, advises him to take a little recreation, and prescribes marriage. The gentle Reynolds, whose only fear is the non-completion of his great work, reluctantly consents, on condition the Doctor will undertake to find him a wife. The Doctor agrees to do so, and pitches upon Hélène, a favourite pupil of our Reynolds, to whom he is already attached without knowing it, and by whom he is beloved in return. This marriage is crossed by Frederick Stop, the son of our hero's old schoolmaster, but who withdraws his claim on finding that Reynolds is his benefactor, and the marriage takes place. There is a charm even in the simplicity of such a plot as this; and the quiet humour, excellent feeling, prevalent throughout, the exquisite touches of hearty and real sentiment with which it abounds form a pattern which our dramatists might imitate with advantage. To point out any particular parts would lead us into a review of the whole work, which must not be judged in its details; but as a portrait highly finished and exquisitely coloured, we shall merely say, that in the whole range of M. Perlet's performances, none has pleased us so much as this. It must also be remarked that in the pieces played by M. Perlet, the actors seem to have a more careful conception of their parts; his influence is evident even in the most subordinate characters. The Doctor was very well played by M. Langeval, and Madame Grassau as usual was judicious and pains-taking. The Parrain is a slight farce, in which the miseries of being a godfather are whimsically and laughably put forward. Mr. Scribe has also a hand in this and we should like to know in what he has not had a hand these last five and twenty years. M. Perlet acquitted himself of the egotistical old bachelor to admiration, and elicited shouts of laughter, especially when it is discovered that after all they have baptized the wrong child. Madame Grassau was excellent as the old nurse; indeed the whole play was well cast and well executed. Of the Avare, given on Wednesday for M. Perlet's benefit, we can say but little this week, our space being confined. We having already indeed gone beyond the limits allotted us. This part is perhaps the triumph of the actor—that to which he has devoted most care and is most highly finished and developed. We must, however, mention the scene when he has lost his cassette, where his triumph was complete, but in which dangers are so thick set round the actor that the least approach to exaggeration in his part would turn to the absurdly ridiculous. M. Perlet was admirable and elicited frequent marks of approbation; his triumph was complete in this as well as in the following scene when he accuses Valère, and confounds his daughter with his treasure. The house was well attended, and M. Perlet was called before the curtain after the performance. The evening's entertainments concluded with the Rendezvous Bourgeois, in which M. Cartigny was as good as ever. A word of praise to that very useful and intelligent actor, M. Dumery, is the least we can bestow on his clever performance in La Famille Improvisée, which preceded L'Avare on Wednesday night. J. DE C.—E.

DRURY LANE.—We have nothing new to record in our present weekly notice. The Bondman still continues its career with success, and draws good houses. The Pantomime improves considerably since its first representation, and is received nightly with great applause. Mr. D. W. King has undertaken the part of Ardenford, in the Bondman, in consequence of the illness of Mr. Harrison, and acquits himself very creditably.

THE HAYMARKET.—This theatre has varied its performances during the week. London Assurance, Money, Look before you Leap, and The Round of Wrong, have added diversity to the attractions. The Invisible Prince continues to be received with immense favor.

PRINCESS'S.—The Night Dancers is alternated with the Seven Maids of Munich, and the Pantomime is given every evening with increased effect.

ADELPHI.—As we imagined, the new piece of Colomba, the Corsican Sister, in losing its novelty, has been deprived of its chief source of attraction. We should be glad to see Colomba superseded by something more sterling, and better adapted to the means of the establishment.

SONNET.

NO XVI.

A RAY falls on my heart, serenely bright,
And ev'ry dark recess that form'd a fair,
Where crouch'd some hideous figure of despair,
Now sparkles with the magic of that light.
Soften'd becomes my soul's eternal night,
And even Joy displays his image fair,
Stealing upon me with a timid air,
As one who ventures with a doubtful right.
This tranquil state—oh, is it made to last—
This pause amid my bosom's hurricane—
This breath of peace that calms the fever'd brow,
Or comes it to alleviate the past,
Only to make more bitter future pain?
All, all on thee depends. Then answer thou.

N. D.

REVIEWS ON BOOKS.

"Christmas Carols with the Old Tunes." Edited by EDWARD F. RIMBAULT, LL.D., F.S.A.—CRAMER, BEALE, & Co.

MR. RIMBAULT, in his introduction, which displays considerable research, has attempted to explain the meaning of the term "Carol," by ascribing it to songs intermingled with dancing, and traces it back to a period antecedent to the fifteenth century. He has not furnished us with the derivation of the word. Mr. Rimbault's book seems but the precursor of a more elaborate and complete work. The editor has supplied but six Christmas Carols. Doubtless, for a book intended to be nothing more than a seasonable and amusing present at this period of the year, Mr. Rimbault has performed his task to the extent required, and we must award him great praise for the zeal and ingenuity he has shown. The Book of Christmas Carols is an admirable little work, and should find a place on the desk of every lover of the strains of bye-gone times, and the quaint rhymes of "hoar antiquity." The work is beautifully got up.

"Nursery Rhymes with the Old Tunes." Collected and edited by EDWARD F. RIMBAULT.—CRAMER, BEALE, & Co.

WELCOME, old Friends! Dear, kind, soothing, half-lost, but never-forgotten old Friends! welcome once more to our hearts. Ye make us children again, and bring back the familiar faces of our childhood, and the green meads, and the laughing waters of our happy home, and the cheery fireside, and the stories of old nurse, and summer sports, and dawning hopes, and loves bubbling from the wild current of our young hearts, and joy, and mirth, and prank, and all the lost entrancements of heedless juvenescence. Ye are gone for ever, but memory leaves us your shadows, and lo! at a word, like visions in a magic mirror, ye pass before as, as bright, but as evanescent. Show us the man that could hear the songs of his youth unmoved, and we will set him down as senseless as a block, a stone, or any other inert mass of matter. For our own poor part, we are not ashamed to confess, that the old song, "There was an old Woman tost up in a blanket," screamed by some crone far gone in years, has more power to move us than "Fra Poco" thrillingly warbled by Rubini. This is not a matter of taste, but of feeling. If we go on we shall grow melancholy. Nevertheless, we must tell an anecdote of our boyhood. The first time we heard "Hey, my kitten, kitten"—but no, we cannot go on—the tears are stealing to our eyes, and we must e'en turn from suggestions of the past, to thoughts of the present. Mr. Rimbault has accomplished his task in the "Nursery Rhymes," still more happily than in the "Christmas Carols." The book is altogether better, and more valuable, inasmuch as the subjects are more familiar, and will therefore meet with greater appreciation. The old airs are all supplied, and arranged for the piano, with the melody and a simple bass. This is as much as was required in a volume of nursery airs. The preface contains some excellent information. If Mr. Rimbault is neither a Ritson, nor a Percy, he has at least brought forth as original a work on minstrelsy, as either the compiler of "The Reliques," or the editor of the "Robin Hood Ballads." We most heartily recommend the "Nursery Rhymes" to all classes and to all ages.

"The Silver Swan;" a Fairy Tale. By MADAME DE CHATELAIN.—GRANT AND GRIFFITH.

"The Silver Swan" is a neatly constructed story, and is written in a succinct, easy style. The characters are amusing, the plot is entertaining, and the moral striking. Madame de Chatelain has, for some time, been a worshipper of the muses, and has heretofore appeared in print as Mademoiselle Pontigny. Her effusions are remarkable for ease and grace.

REVIEWS ON MUSIC.

"Ronald," Ballad, Words by COVENTRY PATMORE; Music by CLEMENT WHITE.

"He never can be Mine," Ballad, written by DESMOND RYAN, composed by CLEMENT WHITE.

"Waiting for Thee," Serenade, written by DESMOND RYAN, composed by CLEMENT WHITE.—P. E. ROWE.

MR. ROWE, the music-seller at Plymouth, has just published the three very pretty songs above named. Of these Ballads, we hardly know to which to give the preference. "Ronald" is written in the old ballad fashion, and contains a very striking melody. It is composed appropriately to the words, which are indited by a true poet. Coventry Patmore's lyric muse is original and graceful, and is replete with the deepest sentiment. If words be of any value in a song, the verses alone of this ballad would re-pay the purchaser in the perusal. If it were sung in public, by some favorite vocalist, we have no doubt that "Ronald" would become one of the most popular songs of the day. We know ballads, inferior in every respect to this, that have gone near to make a publisher's fortune. "He never can be mine," perhaps is the least happy of Mr. White's three songs. It is tender enough, and the melody is well fitted to the poetry, but it is too sentimental for our nerves, though doubtless the song would delight all who are more romantically inclined than we are. The last song of the three is a most charming and graceful ballad, and does infinite credit to the composer. The very first bar of the melody is striking, and at once captivates the ear, and the whole song is written spontaneously, and without effort. The ballads of Mr. Clement White are carefully arranged, and present no difficulties, either to the singer or performer.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847.

(From the Liverpool Chronicle.)

If any thing were wanted to prove the great advance that music has made in England during the last few years, we think there is nothing more likely to do so than the number of beautiful musical albums which have been brought out this year. The only one we have seen yet is Monsieur Jullien's, and a magnificent one it is. We cannot give our readers a better idea of this splendid production, than by quoting a part of the prospectus:—"It contains no less than thirty pieces of vocal and fourteen of instrumental music. The illustrations, in addition to the elaborately executed covers, title, and dedication pages, include two magnificent views of the interior of Covent-garden theatre, the one taken during the brilliant scene exhibited in that splendid arena on the occasion of M. Jullien's Grand Bal Masqué; the other a view of the theatre taken during the concert, the grouping of the figures in both views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant. To those who have visited the theatre on either occasion, the album will form a delightful souvenir, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of the gorgeous scene. A splendidly coloured portrait of the celebrated danseuse, Madlle. Flora Fabbri, in the admired pas, 'La Castigliana,' is also given with 'The Fortune Teller,' illustrating Baker's beautiful ballad of that name. The whole of this department of the Album has been under the active superintendence of J. Brandard, Esq.; whose pencil only has been employed in its production. Nothing more need be said in favour of the musical department of this album, and in proof of its vast superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe; viz, Rossini, Verdi, Donizetti, Rubini, Roeh-Albert, Heuzel, Goldberg, Schira, Schulz, Stœpel, Duprez, Jose Gomis, Marsanau, Maretsek, Balfe, Jullien, Hatton, Barret, Alexander Lee, König, Knight, Baker, Farmer, Linley, Lake, Fitzball, Mould, Hurrey, Forest, Desmond Ryan, Albert Smith, &c. &c. It will thus be perceived that, in addition to the latest compositions of the best English composers, the album will contain some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany, France, Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting the attention of the continental dilettanti." Every word of the prospectus is perfectly true, and some of the songs, ballads, &c., are of a very superior description, more particularly "The Fortune-teller," the words of which are by G. Linley, and the music by Baker. The instrumental portion will be in great demand for parties and balls this Christmas, as it includes several of the most popular quadrilles, polkas, waltzes, &c., as played at M. Jullien's concerts at Covent-garden theatre, including the celebrated "British Army Quadrille." The illustrations themselves would formerly have cost three times as much as the whole book, which is, considering the variety and excellence of its contents, worth treble its price.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

DEAR SIR,—Your pages a few weeks ago contained an address,—"To Women, and English Women in particular." Will you allow me, through the same channel, to publish a few remarks on the subject so well advocated by your fair correspondent: I allude to the proposal for a monument to be erected to the memory of our poet, Shakespere, by the ladies' subscriptions. And here, that I may not be misunderstood, let me add, that I am one of his devoted admirers, and that I thank him from my heart for showing forth the virtues of our sex. But he has slept in peace for 230 years with no other memorial than the one he so nobly carved for himself—one that will outlive the stone pillar, or the sculptured statue—for as long as the English language is known on the earth shall the writings of our immortal bard be treasured in the hearts of all true lovers of poetry. Let him then still slumber on for a little while longer with his fame for his monument; and let us not in a time when every paper is rife with accounts of death from starvation—when every penny might help to save a life, let us not now, I say, collect our mites together to enrich the pocket of some wealthy architect, and to lay gilt on gold; but let us rather give of that we are able to him that needeth. It was but last week, and that in a city where charity is bestowed liberally, that a woman in the hour of her greatest trial had not even a handful of straw to keep her from the cold earth, or a rag to cover her new-born babe, while five others were crying for food. True, she might have gone to the Union, but for what? To be separated from her dear ones—to be deprived of liberty—to be imprisoned, in fact, for the crime of poverty. And this we know to be but one case among thousands. O let then the penny and the donation of the rich be added together, and distributed among such as these, till the name of the English woman shall be mentioned with thankfulness by thousands. And then shall each subscribers' name instead of being enclosed in a stone to be read, perhaps, when the dust of its owner shall be returned to dust; but more likely never to see the light—instead of this shall each name be written in heaven, to be read when all shall hear and be repaid ten-fold, for "Charity covereth a multitude of sins." If I hear that subscriptions are received at Messrs. Coutts and Co., or any other place for this purpose, my mite shall not be wanting, and O if every woman that can spare a penny will do likewise, how many a heart will be gladdened. I humbly pray that it may be so. I remain, dear Editor, yours faithfully,

AN ENGLISHWOMAN.

Sir, I have gone into my subject at much greater length than I at first intended, and find on reading it that it is rather a sedate article for a journal of the description of the Musical World. I should, however, if you could save a corner, be glad to see it in print, as the suggestion it contains may be useful.—Bristol, Dec. 16th, 1846.

PROVINCIAL.

RYDE.—On Tuesday evening last a music class of the Literary Institution commenced, under the leadership of Mr. Dawes, Organist; it is to be hoped Mr. Dawes will succeed in improving the musical taste of Ryde, which is at present at a low ebb.—Dec. 17th, 1846.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—Mr. Pearsall has been giving his musical lectures here, with great success. A Miss Hunt assists him in the vocal illustrations.

CHELTENHAM.—Mr. Alban Croft's concert last week, at the Assembly Rooms, obtained a highly respectable audience, and much better as to numbers than either of the two previous ones, though by no means better than it deserved, for the music was excellent. Mrs. Croft sang very effectively all her songs, and was deservedly greeted with warm applause. Her "Auld Robin Gray" had some exquisitely musical touches about it. Miss and Master Croft sang "Per Vally" and another Italian duet very sweetly indeed, and in a way that told of careful teaching; and the latter also gave us "Scenes that are brightest" with surprising effect for one so young. The performances altogether went off remarkably well.

MANCHESTER.—MECHANICS' INSTITUTION.—The Directors of this useful Institution, always anxious to introduce the first talent to their numerous subscribers, made arrangement with Miss Whitnall, to give a grand concert on Monday evening last.—As soon as the doors were thrown open the rush into the Lecture Hall was terrific, the house was instantly filled in every part, and those parties who generally occupy the best seats in the boxes, were glad to secure seats in the pit.—There is no doubt, but in a short time the lecture hall will become too small to contain half the number of subscribers to this valuable Institution. The performers engaged on this occasion were Miss Whitnall, Senior Sappio, Mr. H. V. Lewis, and Mr. John Parry. A variety of glees, songs, and duets, were given during the evening with good effect, and much applause was elicited by Mr. John Parry, in the two songs which he gave, entitled the "London Season, or as Captain Clifford says,"—the other, "Family Argument Foreign Affairs."—(A short maternal course of the French language.) He was encored in both songs, but as a general principal, he did not repeat them, but gave two others entitled "Marriage," and the "Fine young English gentleman of the present time." The company separated about 11 o'clock, highly delighted with the evening's entertainment.—Manchester Courier.

TUNBRIDGE.—An evening concert of vocal and instrumental music took place in our Town-Hall on Wednesday evening, Dec. 23, consisting of glees, duets, songs, and instrumental pieces. Miss Cole and Miss Greaves, two young ladies from the Royal Academy of Music, were the principal vocalists, and sang the songs, &c., allotted to them in excellent style. We may mention, in particular, the duet, "The flight of the swallow" (by Kucken, a German composer), very effectively sung by the two ladies, and eliciting an unanimous encore. The difficult cavatina, "Ah! Rammento," by Mercadante, was very chastely executed by Miss Cole, accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Cullum in his usual masterly style. Parry's duet, "Flow gently, Deva," was excellently given by Messrs. Snelling and Humphrey; indeed, it was quite a treat, and was received with great applause. Hobbs' popular ballad, "A friend in distress," sung by Mr. Humphrey, merited and received a hearty encore. The grand feature of the evening was

Mr. Morfill's performance on the violin, consisting of De Berliot's 6th air, and a piece by Mayseder, which were played in the most masterly style. His tone, in the adagio passages was most exquisite, and his rapid passages were brilliant in the extreme. The other instrumental pieces were Mozart's symphony (No 1), and his matchless overture, "Zauberflöte," played in a style that reflected the greatest credit on the gentlemen composing the band. Altogether the concert was well got up, and we have seldom seen a better selection of pieces than that contained in the programme. The managers of the concert are exceedingly pleased at the success of their efforts to afford their neighbours delightful evening's amusement, which, they are assured, was the case on this occasion. (From a Correspondent.)

CHELTENHAM.—(From a Correspondent.)—Madame Anna Bishop has given no less than three concerts here this week, at the Assembly Rooms, and with immense success. Her voice is indeed MELODIOUS, if ever voice deserved that epithet. Every note goes to the heart; and there it remains. She is both wonderful and pleasing; and that is the case with very few performers, either vocal or instrumental. She was encored, una voce, in most of her Italian songs, as also in that pathetic ballad, "John Anderson, my Jo," in which, indeed, she appealed to the hearts of her auditors, and was really triumphant! Such a triumph has been very seldom witnessed in Cheltenham; NOR WILL IT EVER BE FORGOTTEN!!! No wonder that Madame A. B. should be prima donna assoluta of the Theatre San Carlos, Naples; but what an honor to England, where Madame Anna Bishop is born! Not even a Billington is to be compared to her! Mr. Clanchettini conducted these concerts, and performed an extemporaneous fantasia at the first; as also, at the second, his uncle Dussek's celebrated "Notturmo Concertante," (op. 68.) for the piano-forte and the violin; in which he was most artistically accompanied by his friend, Mr. R. Brett. Mr. R. B. also performed Ernst's celebrated "Carnaval de Venise," and an elegant fantasia by Artot, a pupil of the celebrated Baillet. Mr. and Mrs. Alban Croft also appeared at these concerts, and to the greatest advantage; for they not only sang well, but good music, and that is not often the case with vocalists. Madame Anna Bishop is a truly classical lady as ever appeared in this world. She can only enjoy what is really good! —P.C.—

MANCHESTER.—A miscellaneous concert was given by the Musical Society on Tuesday evening, in the large room of the Town Hall. The principal vocalists were Miss Parsons, of London, Mrs. Yardly, of Manchester, and Mr. E. L. Hime, of Manchester. Mr. T. Maude presided at the piano-forte. There was a very large attendance of subscribers, most of the principal families of the town and neighbourhood being present, as well as a great number of the general public; in fact, the room, which is a very large one, was completely filled. The selection comprised songs, glees, and duets, by some of the most celebrated composers; the concert opened with the overture to "Semiramide," followed by the beautiful madrigal, written in 1597, Dowland's "Awake, sweet Love, thou art returned." One of Lover's songs sung by Mr. Hime, was encored most rapturously. Then followed, "Where the bee sucks." A song, by Miss Parson's, "Oh, the merry days when we were young," was most applauded. The overture to "Masaniello" was performed with great precision. In the "Cavatina" (Donna Carites) Miss Parsons was encored, when she substituted a favorite air: "In the air, roving abroad in the night." Mr. Hime was loudly encored, when he sang "Lucy Niel." The concert closed with the chorus "Welcome, welcome, Lady Fair." The audience were evidently much delighted, both with the performance and the selection.—Manchester Courier.

SALISBURY SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS.—The second concert for the season (under Mr. Aylward's management), on Wednesday evening last, at the Assembly Rooms, was attended by a brilliant and crowded audience, there having been no less than 500 persons present. The great attraction of the evening was the engagement of the Distin Family, who played with their accustomed talent and success. The elder Distin, in "The Soldier tired of War's Alarms," was loudly encored. The principal vocalist on this occasion was Miss Dolby, who in the unavoidable absence of Miss Rainforth, detained in London by severe indisposition, with much kindness and good-nature, consented to supply her place, and proved herself a worthy substitute. Miss Dolby was in fine voice, sang delightfully, and was more than once unanimously encored. Mercadante's air, "A te riede," Linley's ballads, "Thou art gone from my gaze," and "Primroses deck the bank's green side," and the Scottish ballad, "Willy Gay," were deliciously sung by Miss Dolby, and deservedly applauded. Mr. Ransford sang several songs and loudly in the course of the evening, and experienced a very favourable reception. In the "Gipsies' Laughing Song" he was encored. Among the instrumental performances, was a fantasia on the violoncello by Master Aylward, having for its theme the melody "The last Rose of Summer," which was played with so much taste and expression as to elicit well-merited applause. This young gentleman does credit to his father's tuition.

A trio for flute, violoncello, and piano-forte, by Mr. and Master Aylward and Mr. Willy, jun., was nicely played, and afforded much pleasure. Mr. Willy, jun., accompanied the songs with judgment.—Salisbury and Winchester Journal.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MADAME BISHOP sang three times last week at Cheltenham. Her reception on each occasion was enthusiastic. She was encored in most of her songs; and at the morning concert, on Saturday, the enthusiasm was so great, that the fair cantatrice sang ten times; for not only were four of the morceaux redemanded, but she was obliged thrice to repeat a very charming chansonnette, "Je suis la Bayadere," in which Madame Bishop accompanied herself on the tambourine.—Morning Post.

BRIGHTON.—A matinée musicale was given by Madame d'Eichthal, the harpist, on Thursday week, at Weston House, the residence of Lady Hotham. Madame d'Eichthal is a harpist of superior merit, uniting the qualities of correct execution and graceful expression. She played several pieces with good effect and was warmly applauded. The selection was varied by some German and French songs of Madame Mortier de Fontaine, which were deservedly received with great favour. The attendance was fashionable and numerous.—From a Correspondent.

MR. BIRD, Organist of Walthamstow, gave his patrons a great musical treat last Monday evening. Mr. Turle conducted. The vocal corps consisted of Miss A. Williams, Miss Ellen Lyon, Mr. Howe, Mr. Barnaby, Mr. Kench, Master Turle, and four other young vocalists. A duet composed by Kalliwoda, admirably rendered by Misses A. Williams and Ellen Lyon, and Mr. Kench's "Last Man," were the prominent features of the evening, but the whole programme was capitally performed and conducted.

MR. J. L. HATTON gave one of his musical entertainments on Thursday evening at the Marylebone Institution, Edward street, Portman-square. The vocal performance was diversified with pianoforte playing from authors ancient and modern. Mr. J. L. Hatton gave sundry manuscript songs of various merits. His introduction to the entertainment, and the interspersed verbal portions, were happily sprinkled with anecdote and information. The concert was on the whole excellent, but we have not room at present to particularize. We shall shortly speak of these entertainments at length. Mr. Hatton is an excellent musician, and his efforts are worthy serious attention.

MADAME BISHOP has given three concerts during the past week at Cheltenham, in each of which she excited the greatest enthusiasm. At her last concert she was encored in every song, with one exception, and was called upon to repeat a French air twice, in which she produced a novel effect by accompanying herself on the tambourine. Her execution of this chansonnette proved that Madame Bishop is a great artist, whether she interprets the most difficult or the most simple music. A third cavatina, from Ugo di Parigi, exhibited to perfection the rare and artistic resources of this most accomplished vocalist.—Morning Herald.

MR. J. L. DOWNE, principal Flautist of the Italian Opera, New Orleans, gave a concert at Blagrove's Rooms, Mortimer Street, on Tuesday evening. The concert was remarkable for the introduction of names of artists, instrumental and vocal, unknown, or little known, if we except Nicholson, the Oboe player, and Hancock, the Violoncellist. The vocalists were, Mrs. Alexander Gibbs, (formerly Miss Graddon,) Mr. John Roe, Miss Allen, Miss Collins, Signor Furtado, and Mr. Weeks; Messrs. Hancock, Nicholson, Casolani, Dean, Reed, and Downe. Mr. Downe played two solos on the flute, and was greatly applauded. His execution is brilliant, and his tone clear and distinct. He performed an Italian air, with variations, in a superior manner. Mr. Nicholson played a fantasia on the oboe in his usual masterly style; and Mr. Hancock, on the violoncello, gave great effect to a trio of Corelli's, which was encored. Miss Allen distinguished herself in a song from the Night Dancers, and the rest of the ladies, by their endeavors, gave interest to the entertainment. Mr. Charles Blagrove presided at the piano.

MADAME ANNA BISHOP.—This charming English vocalist, who of late years has astonished and delighted the lovers of music in the principal continental cities, took the leading part in three grand concerts at the Assembly Rooms, during the past week. These recherché entertainments were given under the auspices of Messrs. Hale and Son, the first of which took place on Wednesday evening, and was but thinly attended, owing no doubt to the want of sufficient publicity; the other two had to boast of a company more numerous, and fashionable. Madame Anna Bishop sang selections from the Maid of Artois, and Loretta, in exquisite style, which elicited great applause. The pathos and execution thrown into these gems of composition had a thrilling effect upon the audience, who were lost in admiration at the grace with which the whole were given. Mr. and Mrs. Alban Croft, Mr. Cianchettini, and Mr. Robert Butt, proved able auxiliaries, and seldom have concerts altogether, gone off with greater eclat. At the morning concert on Saturday, Madame Bishop was encored four times; and on the execution of the French song, she received a double encore, which manifested the estimation in which she is held. Madame Bishop's triumph in London, during the present season, has been perfect and unquestionable, such as sufficiently indicates that she will be permitted to continue her career in this country with the same eclat which so long marked her prosperous efforts in the great capitals of Europe. The opera chosen for her first appearance in London a few months since, was Balfe's Maid of Artois, in which a rôle was allotted to her rendered memorable for its having been first selected for that queen of songstresses—poor Malibran, of whose triumphs it was one of the noblest and the best. In the revival of an opera, which since that time, had been suffered to die away from public recollection, save in the single song, The Light of other Days, Madame Bishop has presented the rare gift of musical excellence combined with dramatic intensity; and as such, her first provincial tour is calculated to excite feelings of no common interest among those who look forward to the opportunity now about to be afforded them of personally appreciating the bird-like purity of intonation, and the refined and delicate, but brilliant points of execution, which are so remarkable in the vocalism of this English warbler—this prophetess in the land of her birth. We understand that this celebrated cantatrice is engaged at Brighton during the present week; for the then ensuing three weeks she proceeds to Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester, and other places in that neighbourhood. The first week in February will be divided between the two University towns, Oxford and Cambridge. On February the 8th, she purposes going to Dublin, where she performs until the 22d, and thence to Belfast and Cork. On the 1st of March she takes Edinburgh for a fortnight, and Glasgow for three days, returning south again to Bath and Bristol for four days, and during passion week she will be at Exeter for the sacred concert there. In short, the British syren has not a day disengaged between and this the beginning of April.—Cheltenham Journal.

TAUNTON AND SOMERSET PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—We have pleasure in stating that there is every reason to hope that a society, upon an extended basis, and having for its objects the cultivation of music, and the providing of a source of entertainment for the inhabitants of this town, will shortly be formed. The following are some of its principal features, as stated in a circular just issued:—"It is proposed that the society shall be open to persons residing in all parts of the county, and that it shall be governed by a president and committee, assisted by a treasurer and secretary. [A number of influential gentlemen have signified their willingness to become members of the committee: and it is hoped that the office of president will be taken by some nobleman.] That the principal gentry of the county be requested to become patrons of the society. That during four months in the year, the members shall meet weekly for the purpose of performing instrumental and vocal music; and that during the remaining eight months the meetings shall take place at intervals of a fortnight. That sacred and secular music shall be performed. That the amount of subscription shall be about five shillings per annum. That a public music library be established in connection with the society. That prizes shall be offered for the best compositions of music by members. That during the winter season there shall be five public concerts,—two of sacred, and three of secular music. Members to have the option of taking part in the performance or not." We hope our musical friends all over the county will join the society without delay.—Taunton County Gazette.

WAITING FOR APPLAUSE.—Perhaps all readers are not acquainted with the following fact. A certain singer was engaged to sing at the rooms at Margate; and having a pretty good opinion of himself, wrote in the leader's book at a particular place, "wait for the applause." The leader, as in duty bound, stopped the band; but, alas! there was no applause; when the disappointed vocalist turned sharply round and said, rather forte, "Why don't you go on?" The mischief-loving leader replied, much more loud, "We are waiting for the applause." This was heard by several of the audience, and a general titter pervaded the room.

MOLIQUE'S THIRD SET OF SIX GERMAN SONGS.—(Wesell & Co.)—The third set of Herr Molique's songs is, in our opinion, not so good as the fourth set, which was our pleasing task to notice a short time since. It seems, however, impossible for this elegant and characteristic composer to send a work into the world without impressing it with some marks of great musical interest. Thus, although the songs before us have been unable to obtain very great popularity, there are three at least of them which must be always admired: These are No. 293, "Cottage fair" (Huttelein's, a most pretty and playful little song, set to one of the most charming of all the beautiful lyrics of Ruckert; No. 295, "O still my heart's fond beating" (O stille dies verlangen) the expression of which is poetical as the music is beautiful; the restless and passionate character of the work is well portrayed in the broken melody of the voice parts and the continual motion of the accompaniments; and No. 296 "Come dearest come," (Komm, Liebchen, Komm), a very melodious serenade, and perhaps the most vocally effective of the whole set.—Morning Post.

CROSBY HALL.—The Third Concert of Sacred Music, for the season 1846-7, took place on Tuesday evening, and was well attended. The concert, as usual, was under the direction of Miss Mounsey. The programme was by no means interesting, the selections made, for the most part, being neither suited to the Crosby Hall audience, nor adapted to the powers of the principal singers and choir. For instance, the chorus, "Unto us a child is born," having for its interpreter no more than thirty vocalists, could hardly produce the idea of sublimity and immensity intended by the composer. The names also of Ciampi, Otto Braune, and Naumann, introduced into the scheme, reflected no great credit on the direction. There were, however, many excellences in the concert to which we would call attention. We shall first state that the principal singers were the Misses Dolby and Bassano, and the Messrs. Lockey, Francis, and J. A. Novello. The two ladies gave Handel's fine duet, "O lovely peace," from Judas Maccabeus, with great effect, their voices consorting in an admirable manner. Mr. Lockey was encored in the recitative and air from the same oratorio, "'Tis well, my friends," which he delivered with power and energy. Beethoven's most charming trio, "O, shall we then behold the Lord," from the Mount of Olives, was rendered with much grace and expression by Miss Bassano, with Messrs. Francis and Novello. The ensemble at the end was beautifully given by the three artists. Miss Dolby sang an air of Miss Mounsey's, "Save, Lord, and hear us," and received very great applause. The composition has considerable merit. The second part, commencing on the words "Praise the Lord, O my soul" contains a highly pleasing and expressive melody, and by its arrangement evidences proofs of Miss Mounsey's talents for writing sacred music. Miss Dolby's singing deserved great credit. She sang with the true feeling and expression of an artist. Mr. J. A. Novello was heard to little advantage in an air of Neukomm's. His fine voice and chaste style were entirely thrown away. Miss Bassano gave Proch's favourite song, "The blind girl to her mother," and interpreted it with much taste and judgment. There is little, or nothing, in Proch's air: nevertheless the sentiment which the words convey is capable of being felicitously expressed by an artist of sensibility and impulse. Miss Bassano displayed these two qualities in her singing, and in addition exhibited a degree of energy, which we have hopes will bring her laurels on another arena. We must, however, make one exception to Miss Bassano's singing of "The blind maiden," viz.—the manner in which she draws the penultimate note of the song, endeavouring thereby to produce a lasting effect. To us this vicious taste completely nullified the vocalist's previous excellences, and made us entertain doubts of Miss Bassano's judgment; but when we recalled to mind the numberless English songstresses who have recourse to this useless claptrap, we could hardly attach particular blame to the young artist, to whose many merits we have borne now, as oft, honorable testimony. We would entreat of Miss Bassano to eschew altogether this vile, modern, indigenous propensity. Miss Dolby gave two solos in the second part, and produced a great sensation by her splendid singing. The first was an air of Marcello's, of no particular merit; the second was Andre's "Unto thee, O Lord, I cry," which was finely adapted to Miss Dolby's contralto voice; she sang it with exquisite taste and passion, and was rapturously encored, but—here again we must be critical—she nearly marred all the effect she produced by an ineffective and useless cadence at the close. Bach's magnificent corale, "The Firmament, the Heavens that stand," was well given by the choir, and the concert terminated with a Hallelujah of Mozart. At the commencement of part second Miss Mounsey performed an organ concerto of Handel's, for which she obtained the unanimous applause of the audience.

STEWART'S VIOLIN HOLDER.—The utility of this simple and highly efficient apparatus, for facilitating the holding of the Violin, has been acknowledged by all professors of that instrument, and is now in course of being universally adopted. The holder may be carried in the waistcoat pocket, and attached to the violin instantaneously, when required. We ourselves have tested the use of the instrument, and are warranted in strongly recommending so admirable and efficient a contrivance. To the beginner, above all others, it will prove of the greatest service in facilitating his progress, and rendering compassable, in a brief period, difficulties which at present, can only be surpassed by a long course of practice. Mr. Stewart, has conferred a boon, on all violin players by his ingenious invention.

CHORAL HARMONIES OF NATURE.—Sitting here, I can discriminate almost every sort of tree, as it is called upon, either solo or in score, to take part in the grand choral harmonies of the tempest. Now it roars deep and still among the oaks behind this bookroom; anon, breathes hoarse and hollow upon the dark old Scotch pines of the cider-mill grove; groans through the sycamores and lime avenue, "that weather-fends my cell;" rattles the bony boughs of the skeleton ash; howls through the elms; hisses (and each obviously different) in the cedars, spruce, and silver fir; whistles through the larch; whispers in the Weymouth and aphorously; and suddenly whisks a solitary cypress; while the evergreens, and dry-leaved hornbeams, keep up a constant accompaniment, each after his kind.—Mr. Dovaston, in Loudon's Magazine of Natural History.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—So much has been said respecting a new Italian opera that any information relating to the arrangements for the season at Her Majesty's Theatre, cannot fail to be interesting. From authentic sources we have learnt that Mr. Lumley, in providing for the ensuing campaign, has succeeded beyond his usual success. Three of the greatest lyrical composers of the age will contribute new works for the season. Lablache, a host in himself, will be supported by Gardini Frascini Superchi (Verdi's favourite hero,) Colletti and Staudigl. The orchestra is composed of artistes of tried abilities, at the head of whom are Tolbecque and Nadaud, and a chorus of extraordinary power has been selected with great care. The ballet will be under the direction of Paul Taglioni and Perrot. The pas de quatre and the pas de deux, will be revived, with the aid of Taglioni, Lucile Grahn, Cerito, Carlotta Grisi, and Rosati, a young Italian dancer of distinguished ability. We believe we might add, that the vocal department will be enriched by other talent of no ordinary power.—Times.

THE Duke and Duchess of Bedford have been entertaining a large party at Woburn Abbey; and the "Theatre-Royal, Woburn Abbey," as it is called, has been opened for private theatricals, the performances being under the patronage of the Duchess of Norfolk. The actors and actresses were all distinguished personages.

MUNICH Dec. 25.—JENNY LIND.—In consequence of the extraordinary sensation she created on her last appearance, as Suzanna in Mozart's Figaro, the royal management of the theatre, by particular desire, induced this inimitable artist to appear once more in the same opera, on the 27th, to the delight and gratification of all lovers of the musical art. On Christmas eve, about fifty admirers of the Swedish nightingale prepared a feast at the Odeon, in honor of the queen of song. On her entering the saloon, which was splendidly decorated, accompanied by the celebrated historical painter, Kaulbach and his lady, she was taken by surprise, with a Weihnachtsbaum (the German Christmas tree) ornamented, with valuable presents. Among these was a most splendid broche from his Royal Highness the Duke of Bavaria. The entertainment was enlivened with toasts and poetical effusions, in honor of her fair guest.—Morning Post

THE FIRST NIGHT OF ROBERT MACAIRE.—(From Hervey's "Theatres of Paris.") After continuing his dramatic apprenticeship at the Odeon, where he was still condemned to play the confidants, though in tragedy instead of in spectacle, Frédérick offered his services to the manager of the Ambigu, who had just accepted L'Auberge des Adrets, a melodrama which appeared to him (and was in reality) sufficiently commonplace to admit of the principal character being intrusted to a debutant. He did not, therefore, scruple to admit the young actor into his company, and gave him the part of Redmond to study. The eventful night came, and the two first acts of the piece having gone off very heavily, L'Auberge des Adrets was generally regarded as a failure. Frédérick, however, suddenly hit upon the ingenious idea of making Redmond a comic instead of a melodramatic rascal, and began to introduce all kinds of drolleries into his part, which backed by the equally laughable acting of Serres, put the audience into an ecstasy of delight, and decided the triumphant success of piece and performer. One of the authors had sent his bonne to see the first representation, and was waiting anxiously for her return in order to know the result, when, to his surprise she came back hardly able to speak for laughing, 'Ah, sir,' she exclaimed, as soon as he had recovered her breath, 'what an excellent piece! how funny it is! I am sure I never laughed so much in all my life!' 'What! cried the amazed and indignant author, 'laugh at my melodrama! This comes of intrusting the leading character to an actor sans conscience!' However, on going himself to see the piece, he laughed like the rest, and following the example of his collaborateur, pocketed his author's dues with great good humour."

RACHEL.—She does not come on the stage to recite a lesson; but to speak as the spirit prompts her; she does not act, she feels; with her adoption of the Roman or Grecian dress, she adopts the Roman or Grecian character; she is no longer Rachel, but Camille or Hermione. This is the great secret of her influence over the masses; she stands before them, but is not of them; they have neither time nor inclination to criticise her dress, her manner, or her look; they are spell-bound by the reality with which she invests each of her personations. She has a power, unknown to other actresses, of rivetting the attention of her audience, and this power consists in her entire ignorance of, and contempt for, the conventional traditions of the stage. She imitates no one, not even herself; but keeps perpetually alive the curiosity and interest of the spectator by some new reading of a passage, some peculiar look or gesture, suggested by the inspiration of the moment, and forgotten by her as soon as that moment is past. The very claqueurs themselves are puzzled; they know not when to applaud, or when to be silent. While reserving their hired enthusiasm until some cabalistic word, the preconcerted signal for its explosion, shall have been pronounced, they are confounded by the legitimate bravos of the audience, who are impelled, by some magical and wholly unexpected effect of her acting to applaud for themselves."

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

FABRICO.—We have so many original articles on hand, that we must beg to decline, with many thanks, our Correspondent's humorous and entertaining anecdote.

HARRINGTON.—Subscriptions are thankfully received from Amateurs, for the Royal Society of Musicians, by the treasurer, Mr. Parry, 31, Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WARREN'S 20 GUINEA COTTAGE PIANO-FORTES

ARE NOW SELLING AT THE

Manufactory, 71, Leadenhall Street,

(Removed from 1 and 2, Liverpool Street, Bishopsgate Street.)

These Instruments are well manufactured of the best seasoned wood, FINE FULL TONE AND GOOD TOUCH. A two years warranty given with each instrument. ESTABLISHED TWENTY-ONE YEARS. The only house in London where a good sound instrument can be obtained at the above low price, (for cash only). SMALL PROFIT AND QUICK RETURNS!

JOHN WARREN, 71, Leadenhall St., opposite Aldgate Pump.

MR. HANDEL GEAR

Presents his respectful compliments to his Friends and Pupils, and begs to acquaint them, that he has REMOVED from No. 26, Newman Street, to

No. 23, CHARLOTTE STREET, PORTLAND PLACE,

where he continues to give instructions in Singing.—Pupils attended at their own Residences.

23, Charlotte Street, Portland Place, January, 1847.

Mr. and Mrs. W. H. WEISS

Beg to inform their friends and the Public, that they have REMOVED FROM BEDFORD STREET, to 23, Mornington Place, Hampstead Road.

NEW QUADRILLES FOR THE NEW YEAR,

BY RUDOLPH NORDMANN,

THE POPULAR AUTHOR OF "LES RAVISSANTES," &c. &c.

- | | |
|---|---|
| 1. Les Triomphants, Solo 3s., Duets 4s. | 5. Les Ravissantes, Solo 3s., Duets 4s. |
| 2. Le Rodeur, Solo 3s., Duets 4s. | 6. Noces Royales, Solo 3s., Duets 4s. |
| 3. Les Seduisants, Solo 3s., Duets 4s. | 7. Prince of Wales, Solo 3s., Duets 4s. |
| 4. Sonnambula, Duets 4s.; Reveries, Duets 4s. | 8. Aurore Borealis, Solo 3s., Duets 4s. |

NEW POLKAS,

By the same Author—LA BELLE UNION, 3 Polkas, favorites, par Henri Herz, arrangés par Nordman, 3s. Also, a great variety of Polkas, Waltzes, &c., by Adolph, Marschan, Strauss, Labitzky, &c. &c.

Published by T. BOOSEY and Co.,

FOREIGN MUSICAL LIBRARY, 28, HOLLES STREET

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE

Is acknowledged as the best specific after three years' trial, for improving the voice and removing all affections of the throat, strongly recommended to clogmeny singers, actors, public speakers, and all persons subject to relaxed throats.

The Proprietors have just received the following Testimonial, amongst many others, from MADAME ANNA BISHOP—

"DEAR SIR,—I am happy to say that all I have heard respecting the efficacy of DR. STOLBERG'S celebrated LOZENGE is perfectly true, as yesterday, feeling myself very fatigued (singing nightly at the Theatre), I took several of the Lozenges, and my voice was very clear, and my throat quite free from relaxation. I am, Dear Sir, Yours truly,

ANNA BISHOP."

"18th November 1846.—Jermyn Street."

Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Churchyard; W. Edwards and Newbery and Sons, St. Paul's Churchyard; Sanger, and Dietrichsen and Hannay, Oxford-street; and retail by all respectable Chymists in the Kingdom.

ASSEMBLY ROOMS, LONG'S ROYAL HOTEL, CLIFTON, NEAR BRISTOL.

Mrs. LONG begs respectfully to inform the Public, that the above Rooms are let for Concerts, Lectures, &c., on the following terms, viz.—

	£	s.	d.
The Large Room, for a Morning	2	2	0
Do. Do. for an Evening	3	3	0
The Smaller Room for a Morning	1	11	6
Do. Do. for an Evening	2	12	6

Clifton, Bristol, Dec. 18, 1846.

JULLIEN'S

NEW DANCE MUSIC FOR THE NEW YEAR.

The British Army Quadrille, the American and Camelia Polkas—Jullien. The Garland Waltz and Casino Polka—Koenig. Adrienne Valse and La sa du Bal Galop—Barret. The above compositions, in addition to being the newest and most fashionable of the day, will be found superior to all others in their applicability to Dancing, the time throughout all of them being carefully marked for that especial purpose.

ROYAL MUSICAL CONSERVATORY,
214, REGENT STREET, and 45, KING STREET.

JULLIEN'S

VOCAL MUSIC FOR THE NEW YEAR.

JUST PUBLISHED:—

"The Preference," and "The Castle and the Cottage," Balfe; Venetian Serenade, Roch Albert; "O how can I smile," Baker; "Go not to the Rhine," Glover; "O meet me in the Flow'ry Dell," Hatton; and "I lov'd thee in those early years," G. Linley. The above new and fashionable compositions, which are admirably adapted for the festive circle, are now being sung with unprecedented success by the most eminent vocalists at the principal concerts in town and country.

ROYAL MUSICAL CONSERVATORY,
214, REGENT STREET, AND 45, KING STREET.

NEW MUSIC, BY CLEMENT WHITE.

JUST PUBLISHED, BY P. E. ROWE,

Music Seller, 19, George Street, Plymouth,
And to be had at all the Music Sellers in London.

"Ronald"—Ballad	2	0
"He never can be mine"—Ballad	2	0
"Waiting for thee"—Serenade	2	0

MEDICAL GALVANISM.

HORNE, THORNTHWAITE, & WOOD, Successors to E. PALMER, 123, Newgate-street, in submitting their improved ELECTRO-GALVANIC MACHINES, beg to state, that they have availed themselves of the discoveries of De la Rive, Faraday, Smee, and others, by which they are enabled to construct a coil with all the required intensity and quantity of electricity for medical use, thereby effecting both a saving of expense and trouble to the invalid, and placing in his hands an effective, powerful, and simple instrument, that may be excited at a minute's notice, and without trouble.—Price, £3. 3s.; £3. 10s.; and £5. 5s.

PHILOSOPHICAL APPARATUS.—Every description of Apparatus connected with Chemistry, Hydraulics, Hydrostatics, Pneumatics, Frictional and Voltaic Electricity, Electro-Magnetism, Electro-Metallurgy, Optics, (including the Dissolving Views, Photography, &c.) manufactured and sold by Horne, Thornthwaite and Wood, successors to Edward Palmer, 123, Newgate Street, London.

Foreign orders, enclosing a remittance or order for payment in London, promptly attended to.

FOR COUGHS, COLDS, IRRITATION OF THE THROAT, HOARSENESS, &c.

PECTORAL EMULSION,

Prepared strictly according to the formula of a distinguished Physician in Paris. This preparation having enjoyed great celebrity for many years on the Continent, as well as undergoing a trial for some time in private practice in this country, is now introduced to the public as the most agreeable, efficacious, and speedy cure for the above affections, relieving the most obstinate Coughs in a few hours. To Singers, Professors, and Public Speakers it will be found invaluable.

PREPARED ONLY BY

TURNER AND SPRATT,

English and Foreign Chymists, 7, TICHBORNE STREET, Haymarket.
in Bottles at 1s. 1d. and 2s. 6d. each.—Importers of French Jujubes and Syrups.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM

FOR 1847,

A most beautiful Christmas Present, New Year's Gift,
and Etrennes.

M. JULLIEN

Has the honor to announce that his

MUSICAL ANNUAL FOR 1847

Is now Published, and is by far the best work of the kind that has ever appeared; contains no less than

THIRTY PIECES OF VOCAL AND FOURTEEN OF INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC,

The greater part of which have never before been published, the copyrights
having been purchased expressly for this work, at an immense cost, with the view of rendering it immeasurably superior to any of its predecessors.

The portion which has already appeared comprise those pieces only whose decided success has induced M. JULLIEN, at the request of numerous influential patrons, to include them in this Selection.

The Illustrations, in addition to the elaborately executed Covers, Title, and Dedication pages, include

TWO MAGNIFICENT VIEWS

OF THE

Interior of Covent-Garden Theatre,

The one taken during the brilliant scene exhibited in that splendid arena of
the occasion of M. JULLIEN'S GRAND BAL MASQUE; the other a VIEW OF THE THEATRE TAKEN DURING THE CONCERTS,
the grouping of the Figures in both Views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant. To those who have visited the Theatre on either occasion, the ALBUM will form a delightful SOUVENIR, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of
the gorgeous scene.

A SPLENDIDLY-COLOURED

PORTRAIT

Of the celebrated Danseuse,

MADLE. FLORA FABBRI,

In the admired Pas, LA CASTIGLIANA.

AN ORIGINAL SUBJECT,

"THE FORTUNE TELLER,"

Illustrating BAKER's beautiful Ballad of that name.

The whole of this department of the ALBUM has been under the active superintendence of J. BRANDARD, Esq., whose pencil only has been employed in its production.

Nothing more need be said in favour of this ALBUM, and in proof of its vast superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the Contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe: viz.

ROSSINI,	VERDI,	DONIZETTI,	RUBINI,
ROCH-ALBERT,	HOELZELL,	GOLDBERG,	SCHIRA,
SCHULZ,	STOEPEL,	DUPREZ,	JOSE GOMIS,
MASARNAU,	MARATZEK,	BALFE,	JULLIEN,
HATTON,	BARRET,	ALEXANDER LEE,	KOENIG,
KNIGHT,	BAKER,	FARMER,	LINLEY,
LAKE,	FITZBALL,	MOULD,	HURREY,
FOREST,	ALBERT SMITH,	DESMOND RYAN,	&c.

It will thus be perceived that in addition to the latest compositions of the best English Composers, the ALBUM will contain some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany, France, Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting
the attention of the Continental dilettanti.

PRICE 18s. AND 21. 1s.

ROYAL CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC

214, REGENT-STREET, AND 45, KING-STREET.

MUSICAL LIBRARY.

PIANO-FORTES BY BROADWOOD & WORNUM, A SERAPHINE
BY GUNTER, A HARP BY EHARD, VIOLINS, VIOLONCELLO, A DOUBLE BASS, FLUTES BY RUDALL AND OTHERS,
A SPANISH MAHOGANY BOOKCASE FOR MUSIC, SINGLE AND DOUBLE VIOLIN CASES, STRINGING AND NULLING
FOR PIANO-FORTE WORK, &c.

PUTTICK & SIMPSON,

Auctioneers of Music and Literary Property,

Will Sell by Auction,

AT THEIR GREAT ROOM, 191, PICCADILLY,

On Tuesday, January 12, and following day,

At One precisely.

The valuable and extensive collection of Music, Piano-forte Music, Operas, Instrumental Music, Handel's Works, Sacred Music, Vocal Music, Glee, Works on the History and Theory, Musical Instruments, &c. Catalogues are now ready.

EXETER HALL.

ENGLISH VOCAL MUSIC.

The Committee of the Hullah Testimonial Fund, beg leave to announce a series of

FOUR CONCERTS,

Illustrative of the History of English Vocal Music.

A NEW ORGAN

Will be erected by Mr. Robson, expressly for these Concerts. An Orchestra will be provided for the second, third, and fourth Concerts.

THE FIRST CONCERT

Will be held on

MONDAY, JANUARY 12,

At eight o'clock.

Principal Vocal Performers—Miss Ralston, Miss Doby, Mr. Manvers, and Mr. Lester.

Tickets—Area, 2s.; for the Series, 6s. Western Gallery, 3s. 6d.; for the Series, 10s. 6d. Reserved Seats, 7s.; for the Series, £1 1s. May be procured of Mr.
Parker, Publisher, 445, West Strand; of the principal Music Sellers; and at 101, St. Martin's Lane.

ROMAN STRINGS FOR VIOLINS AND VIOLONCELLOS.

J. HART, 14, Princes Street, Soho,

Respectfully informs the Profession and Amateurs of Music, that he has just imported a CASE OF

FINE ROMAN STRINGS,

And made arrangements for a constant supply every three months.—J. HART particularly invites attention to his

SPLENDID COLLECTION OF VIOLINS AND VIOLONCELLOS, Comprising STRADIVARIUS, GUARNERIUS, AMATI, and other celebrated makers.

ALSO,

J. STEWART'S

CELEBRATED

REGISTERED VIOLIN AND TENOR HOLDER,

So highly recommended by MM. SAINTON, TOLBECQUE, BLAGROVE, H. FARMER, T. COOKE, HOPE, EMILIANI, NADAUD, &c. &c.

. The Trade Supplied.

DISTIN'S MILITARY QUADRILLE,

(2nd Edition)

Is now Published for the Pianoforte,

BY DISTIN AND SONS,

At their Musical Establishment, 31, Cranbourn Street, Leicester Square, Price 3s.

CORNET and FLUTE ACCOMPANIMENTS, 1s. extra.

A large assortment of Sax Horns, Sax Trombas, Sax Cornets, &c., as performed on by Messrs. DISTIN, on five occasions, before Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen; and lastly, at Arundel Castle, on Thursday, December 3rd, 1846.

Distin's Cornet à Pistons (in case) £5 6s.; Distin's Right-key'd Coroa Flutes, £2 2s.—The Cornet à Piston taught by Messrs. Distin—Terms, £3 3s. per Qr.
A Drawing of the Instruments forwarded on receipt of two postage stamps.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, at the "Nassau Steam Press,"
by WILLIAM SPENCER JOHNSON, 56, St. Martin's Lane, in the parish of St.
Martin's in the Fields, in the County of Middlesex; where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed post paid. To be had of G. Purkess, Dean Street, Soho; Strange, Paternoster Row; Wiseheart, Dublin; and all Booksellers.—Saturday, January 9th, 1847.

The Musical World.

(PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT NOON.)

A RECORD OF THE THEATRES, MUSIC, LITERATURE, FINE ARTS,
FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE, &c.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s. Stamped; 12s. Unstamped; to be forwarded by Money Order or Postage Stamp to the Publisher, W. S. Johnson, "Nassau Steam Press," 60, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross.

Each Subscriber is entitled to an Admission to an Annual Concert, and a Piece of Music, (regular Music size) Monthly.

No. 3.—Vol. XXII.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1847.

PRICE THREEPENCE
STAMPED, FOURPENCE

SOCIETY OF BRITISH MUSICIANS.

At the Fifth Concert, which we have hitherto left unnoticed, the following programme was executed:—

PART I.—Quintet, in E flat, Pianoforte, Oboe, Clarinet, Horn, and Bassoon, Messrs. W. Rae, Jennings, Key, Calcott, and Keating, Mosart.—Duet, "Remember me," Miss Ellen Lyon and Miss Cubitt, T. M. Mudie.—Song, "The Blind Boy," Mr. Bodda, Kate Loder.—Serenade, (MS.—first time of performance), Miss Ellen Lyon, E. Perry.—Trio, (MS.) No. 2, in D, Pianoforte, Violin and Violoncello (first time of performance), Mr. J. B. Calkin, Master Day, and Mr. Lucas, J. B. Calkin.—Quartet, in G minor, (MS.), two Violins, Tenor, and Violoncello, Messrs. Jos. Banister, Gattie, Thomas, and Quinton, (his first appearance at these Concerts), H. Graves.—Song, (MS) "I never can forget thee, love," Mr. Bodda (first time of performance), J. R. Tutton.—Song, "The Gipsy Maiden," Miss Cubitt, A. Fesca.—Quintet, in D minor, No. 2, Pianoforte, two Violins, Tenor, and Violoncello. (first time of performance in this country), Messrs. F. B. Jewson, Gattie, Jos. Banister, Thomas, and Lucas, Spohr.—Ternetto, "Se di là," (Agnes) Paer, Miss Ellen Lyon, Miss Cubitt, and Mr. Bodda.—The Vocal Music accompanied on the Pianoforte by Mr. W. Dorrell.

It is too late now to criticise the performance of this programme, or the materials out of which it was constituted. The great novelty was decidedly Spohr's quintet, the second he has produced. With all the characteristics of the great musician's style this quintet exhibits many features that are absolutely new, and the composition as a whole is masterly, brilliant, and effective. It will, doubtless, win the attention of our pianists generally, and become a stock-piece in the approaching concert season. Mr. F. B. Jewson sustained the pianoforte part with great ability. His execution was energetic and finished, and his general reading showed how entirely the young pianist entered into the feeling and intention of the composer. Mr. Jewson was admirably supported by Mr. Gattie (first violin), Mr. Joseph Banister (second violin), Mr. Thomas (tenor), and Mr. Lucas (violoncello), about as capable a quartet to help out a pianist as England could well muster—all accomplished performers, and all zealous and right-minded artists. The quintet was well received, and the slow movement re-demanded, though the executants did not respond to the evident desire of the audience. Mr. Calkin's trio and Mr. Graves' quintet, both the works of acknowledged favourites, were ably executed and warmly received. Among the vocal pieces, which were nearly all MS., we must specialise Mr. Mudie's charming duet, which was nicely sung by Misses Ellen Lyon and Cubitt. It is worth asking—why, in the course of six concerts, we have only been favoured with one composition from the pen of this excellent musician? Mr. Mudie's absence in Edinburgh is certainly no reason for overlooking his claims upon the society as one of the best composers in its ranks. A word must record our favourable opinion of Miss Kate Loder's pleasing song, the serenade of Mr. Perry, and the song of Mr. Tutton, the worthy founder of the society. Miss Ellen Lyon to one and

Mr. Bodda to the other two of these vocal essays rendered the fullest justice. Fesca's song is uninteresting, and Paer's trio somewhat perruque; they were both well sung however. It is unnecessary to praise Mr. Dorrell's method of accompanying; it has been long and honourably proved.

The sixth and last meeting was superior in all respects, and perhaps, indeed, the very best of the whole series. The following programme, rich in novelties, instrumental and vocal, will carry out our verdict.

PART I.—Sonata in A, Op. 69, Pianoforte and Violoncello, Messrs. S. J. Noble, and W. F. Reed, (their first appearance at these Concerts).—Beethoven.—Duet, "Saper vorrei," Miss and Mr. Lockey, Haydn.—Song, "A Farewell," Miss Duval, Walter C. Macfarren.—Double Quartet in B minor, (MS.—first time of performance), W. S. Rockstro; Messrs. Thirlwall, A. Streather, W. Dawson, T. Westrop, Westlake, R. Blagrove, W. F. Reed, and Guest.—Song, with pianoforte duet accompaniment, "In the silver beams of Luna," Miss Lockey, Spohr.—Quintet in G minor, Pianoforte, Violin, Tenor, Violoncello, and Double Bass, Mr. Lindsay Sloper (his first appearance at these Concerts), Messrs. Thirlwall, Westlake, W. F. Reed, and C. Severn. G. A. Macfarren.—Scene, (MS.) "Lament," Mr. Lockey, G. Cooper.—Grand Duet in F, Pianoforte, Mosart, Messrs. Walter C. Macfarren and W. Dorrell.—The Vocal music accompanied on the Pianoforte by Mr. Walter C. Macfarren.

Beethoven's fine sonata found able interpreters in Messrs. S. J. Noble and W. F. Reed. The former, one of the cleverest pupils of the best of masters (Mr. W. H. Holmes), promises to rank high among the most finished pianists in whose education the Royal Academy has had a hand. The latter, a brother of Mr. T. German Reed, the director of the Haymarket musical arrangements, is a very improving violoncellist. Mr. and Miss Lockey must be praised for introducing a gem of Haydn's so little known and so lovely wital. This is not the first mark of attention which Mr. Lockey has paid to the neglected works of one of the greatest of masters. We must also eulogise the excellent manner in which the duet was rendered by the amiable brother and sister artists. Mr. Walter C. Macfarren's song must be admired for its frank and pleasing melody, its original and musician-like accompaniment, and its faithful adaptation to the sentiment of one of the most exquisite of Alfred Tennyson's minor poems. Let the reader judge of the beauty of the verses:—

Flow down, cold rivulet, to the sea,
Thy tribute wave deliver;
No more by thee my steps shall be
For ever and for ever.

Flow, softly flow by lawn and lea,
A rivulet, then a river;
No more by thee my steps shall be
For ever and for ever.

But here will sigh thine alder tree,
And here thine aspen quiver,
And here by thee will hum the bee,
For ever and for ever.

A thousand suns will stream o'er thee,
A thousand moons will quiver;
But not by these my steps shall be
For ever and for ever.

Miss Duval sang this with true feeling, and merited the encore she received. Owing to the non-arrival of some of the violins, the instrumental piece that was to follow was delayed, and Mr. Cooper's song—a composition aiming at more than a common mark, and hitting it after a certain fashion, followed next. Mr. Lockey's irreproachable singing gained an encore which the gravity of Mr. Cooper's music could hardly have expected to attain. The double quartet of Mr. Rockstro is entitled to serious attention as the work of a very young and a very promising musician. The author has studied under the wing of the greatest living composer—Felix Mendelssohn; it is to be presumed, therefore, that the gifts of nature have been well fostered. Taking him as we at present find him, Mr. Rockstro has dispositions that augur well for his future career. He has fancy, earnestness, strong musical feeling, and a taste that rejects every idea that is vulgar. With these qualities, so admirable in a young musician, he combines unusual facility in the mechanical resources of his art. His double-quartet is a very favourable specimen of his talents. He has not overlooked the examples of this grand species of chamber music which have come from the pen of the illustrious Spohr; still less has the Ottetto of Mendelssohn escaped his observation. His love for these authors has led him occasionally into more than an imitation of their beauties. Nor has Sterndale Bennett been allowed to pass the young composer's barrier without paying the toll. But all this augurs favourably of his discernment, and shows that his reading has been in the right direction. The first and last movements of the double quartet are, in our opinion, the best. They are well constructed and developed with clearness and decision, while the subjects, if not strikingly original, are happy and well contrasted. We would especially call attention to the second motivo in the Allegro con Fuoco, which is exceedingly quaint, and is doubled in importance by the ingenious manner in which it is handled further on in the movement. The Andante has some points of instrumentation that are both original and charming; but in striving after constant variety of colour Mr. Rockstro has fallen into the sin of incoherency. The division of the two quartets becomes meagre and monotonous from the want of contrast; and this gives a rambling and patchy effect to the movement, which has none of those rich and grand masses of full and sustained harmony of which Spohr's double-quartets present such fine examples. In the scherzo there is not much to remark, beyond the fact of its being rhythmical and pretty. The reception of this work cannot but have been grateful to Mr. Rockstro, and the appreciation of what he has thus far done so well will, doubtless, stimulate him to do still better. We cannot say much in praise of the execution of the young composer's work, which evidenced a want of rehearsal that should have been remedied before its public performance. The composition of a beginner is even more entitled to this careful pre-examination than that of a more experienced hand. The first step is the great step, and it should be taken with every legitimate support, to prevent the possibility of its being a false one. The vocal piece which followed, "In the silver beams of Luna,"* one of the most delicious chamber-compositions of Spohr, was very quietly and effectively sung by Miss Lockey, and the pianoforte accompaniment for two performers was capitably played by Mr. Lindsay Sloper and Mr. W. C. Macfarren.

But the capital morceau of the whole programme was the quintet in G minor, by G. A. Macfarren, a work as remarkable for its musicianship as for its genius. Mr. Macfarren put the society into action by his symphony in F minor, the first piece performed in the first concert ever given by the members. The years that have elapsed have gradually helped to the full development of that genius which then promised so much. It is now in its full meridian and the appearance of the masterly opera of Don Quixote, a work of profound scholarship and the highest genius, and which would confer honour upon any school of art, at once established its composer in the estimation of musicians among the first of the age. Every work that Mr. Macfarren has since produced has borne the stamp of matured style and ripened talent which are exemplified to such rare perfection in Don Quixote. The quintet performed on Monday night is one of the completest and most masterly of these works. It consists of an allegro in G minor, a grand and energetic movement—a barcarole in the major, a strain of soothing melody—a bolero in C minor, full of character and elaborated with the ingenuity of a thorough musician—and a finale in the original key, passionate and elevated, and sparkling with artistic beauties and ideas at once new and striking. From beginning to end this quintet is full of melody, properly so called; not made out of short impertinent bits of tune, but of phrases long drawn out, developed with felicity, colored with rhythmic variety, and satisfying the ear and the understanding with cadences well calculated and complete, neither weakened nor interrupted by ante-climax nor ill-considered and extravagant modulation. To make a long matter short, the quintet is a noble work, fulfilling all the highest conditions of art, and contenting the judgment while it delights the ear. It is seldom we can have the gratification of speaking thus unreservedly of the work of a countryman, and we are too happy to do so, when occasion presents, to be at all backward in uttering what we think to the last syllable. It gives us almost equal pleasure to speak of the execution of this quintet. Mr. Lindsay Sloper made his debut in the principal part, and proved to the Society the value of their recent acquisition in his person. He played, indeed, so finely, that if the composer were not thoroughly satisfied he must be very hard to please. The other executants aided him most efficiently, and Mr. C. Severn especially must be praised for the admirable style in which he rendered the very elaborate obligato bass part of the bolero, a feat of no common difficulty. The applause bestowed by the audience showed clearly their appreciation of the quintet and its performance. Mozart's fine pianoforte duet in F major, was executed with great brilliancy and power, by W. C. Macfarren and Mr. Dorrell, who kindly consented to undertake it at the last moment, it being impracticable to make up another quartet. With this the concert ended. Mozart was the climax—and happily so, for what could come after him with effect? Mr. W. C. Macfarren was the accompanist of the evening, and performed his duty most ably. Thus concluded the present series of chamber concerts. We shall shortly refer to the Society in general terms.

THE RIVAL ITALIAN OPERAS.

THE war progresses with increasing fury. In answer to a semi-official statement published in the Morning Post of Friday, setting forth a catalogue of the attractions which Mr. Lumley has secured for the coming season, the Morning Chronicle publishes a rejoinder, which is by no means remarkable for the faith it reposes in the promises of the rival mouthpiece. As the extract from the Times, which we cited in our last week's number, contained the information embodied in the Post article, stripped of its garniture of irony and recrimination, it is unnecessary for us to do more than refer our readers to its contents. We quote the answer of the Chronicle entire:—

"HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—A semi-official statement as to the ensuing campaign, has been published by a contemporary. It is drawn up with that flippancy and impertinence which pass for wit and humour amongst waiting-maids and yellow plushes, but as a journal of more solidity contains nearly the same details, the article is entitled to some notice, although it cannot be accepted, of course, as a prospectus, a document now of paramount importance in matters operatical. We learn, then, that the patriarch Lablache will return to London next season—we presume for opera buffa only, in which he will be right welcome. Staudigl, as we stated in yesterday's columns, has been engaged; his singing in Italian will of course be an experiment, but it is one which the manager has done quite right to make. Superchi, for whom Verdi did not compose Ernani, as it has been stated, and Coletti are amongst the new comers. The former is of no note, the latter is a clever artist, not a Tamburini or a Ronconi, it is true, but at all events a welcome substitute for Fornasari. Gardoni and Fraschini are mentioned as the tenors. The former will be useful in the secondary parts; the latter has a fine voice, but has no style. We have given the names of all the announced vocalists, for the lyrical troupe is not yet completed as we are assured—a very unnecessary declaration, inasmuch as no prime donne nor contraltos are at all alluded to. For the ballet there is great attraction and strength. Perrot and Paul Taglioni are the ballet masters, with Taglioni, Cerito, Carlotta Grisi, Lucile Grahn, and a new Italian dansseuse named Rosati. Three new ballets "by three poets of European fame," are promised. The next pledge we must give verbatim—"Three of the greatest composers of Europe, with their chefs d'œuvre, written expressly for Her Majesty's Theatre, will contribute to the glories of the season." This is incomprehensible. If three new operas are to be written, they cannot be chefs d'œuvre as yet—whatever they may be—only, the puff preliminary even is rather too premature. We have heard of Verdi's opera founded on Lord Byron's "Corsair"—of Rossini's pasticcio Robert Bruce, that has just failed in Paris, and of Meyerbeer's Camp of Silesia. Verdi's opera was promised last season, but it was never heard of—a fact that we bear in mind in reading all semi-official promises that may be disavowed at the end of a season. It is stated that a chorus of 70 is under probation; and the singers, it is added, are not "venerable mummies," but "young and well looking." This may be gratifying to roué patrons, but the musical public will require artists who understand their choral duties. The orchestral announcement is most ominous. The only new names mentioned are L'Anglais, a good contra-basso from Turin; Piat, the violoncellist; Pizzi, a flautist from Milan; and a M. Zeiss, of whom we know nothing. Of the old artists specified there are Tolbecque, Nadaud, Deloffre, Watts, and Wagstaff (violin); and Pilet (violin-cello). If these players, some of whom are clever artists, and others quite incompetent, are the "stars," we tremble indeed for the band. No conductor's name is mentioned in the list. On the whole, there is nothing striking about the introductory Programme but the ballet, and that is very strong; but the operatical arrangements look at present weak and suspicious. We are glad to be told that such a mass of talent is now to be had in Europe, as the Morning Chronicle last season was so bitterly reproached for having doubted the transcendentalism of the "triple troupe." If we shall have contributed to the importation of new and powerful singers, and to the production of operas, expressly composed for Her Majesty's Theatre, we shall have achieved something for art and artists, and we will then be quite willing to accept the welcome signs of managerial penitence for the past. The public will be the gainers by honourable competition.

There is more sound than reason in this answer. As Mr. Lumley is not answerable for the statements of the Morning Post, or any other journal, there was no necessity for making the article in question a subject of serious discussion. But this is not our only objection to the Chronicle attack. Among other things that are well enough, there are some which are ill enough, and the ensemble is a gachis of impeachable and unimpeachable propositions. Es. gra:—why should Lablache be confined to comic opera? Is he not as great in Henry VIII. as he is in Dr. Bartolo—in Mose as in Leporello—and so on ad infinitum? And what matters it whether Superchi is or is not the original in Verdi's Ernani? Does it make him a better or a worse singer, to have had, or not to have had the first experiment in an opera of questionable merit? Again the Chronicle is quite abroad about Gardoni, who is beyond controversy, one of the most accomplished tenors in existence, and by no means fitted for second rate parts. Lastly, nobody ever hinted that Verdi was one of "the greatest composers in Europe." We defy the Chronicle to explain that assumption on its part. It is not in the Post article, and if not there, where should it be looked for? Why, too, abuse the unoffending members of Mr. Lumley's orchestra? and why omit the name of M. Lavigne, the oboist, certainly the best of the recent acquisitions? To conclude, why omit the names of MM. St. Leon and Louis D'or from the list of dansseurs who are to constitute the principals of the ballet company? (We suppose because they did not appear in the first article which the Post adventured.) We admire independence, and should wish this opera-question fairly argued. But let praise or censure be the result of reflection and conviction, not of pique and prejudice. The Chronicle will damage its own cause by pursuing any other course than a fair and dispassionate one.

MRS. BUTLER'S RETURN TO THE STAGE.

THE following correspondence between Mrs. Butler (Miss Fanny Kemble) and Mr. Bunn has been published in the morning papers:—

"London, Jan. 9.

"Madam,—In entertaining the question you were polite enough to submit to me—that of your return to the stage—I was actuated by a sincere desire to resuscitate, as far as the limited talent of the country would admit, the precarious position of the drama—an effort only to be made with a chance of success, through the moderate expectations of its professors. The establishment of Drury Lane, being exclusively devoted to opera and ballet, would require considerable reinforcement to admit of your performances being sustained in a manner due to the public, to yourself, and to the character of the theatre. My present expenses are nearly £200 per night, and I could not calculate on a less nightly addition than £50, in the engagement of extraneous talent, and in preparation. If, then, to this £250 per night, be added the £100 demanded by you, there would be a certain liability of £350. on each of your performances. I question if an average receipt could be realised to that amount, to say nothing of the detriment caused to three nights in the week by a predominant attraction on the others. If it would suit you to lend your powerful co-operation to the re-establishment of the drama on the highest terms awarded to your illustrious relative, Mrs. Siddons, viz. £50 per night, I would devote all my means to the furtherance of so laudable an undertaking, and immediately engage with those artistes essential to the upholding of it.—I have the honor to be, Madam, your obedient servant,

A. BUNN.

"Mrs. Butler.

"P. S. If, however, your performances were confined to readings and to dramatic scenes, I think the nightly sum you ask might be realised."

The following is the reply of Mrs. Butler.

"Bannisters, Southampton, Jan. 10, 1847.

"Sir—You desired I would state my lowest terms for acting at Drury Lane, and I did so. I regret that they did not suit you.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

FRANCES ANNE BUTLER.

"To Alfred Bunn, Esq."

This, nevertheless does not effect the question of Mrs. Butler's return to the stage, which is indeed in want of some renovating stimulus.

In regard to this correspondence the Morning Post remarks as follows:—"In giving publicity to the above, we are enabled to throw some additional light on the matter. About ten days since the Drury Lane management received a communication from Mrs. Butler, intimating her intention of returning to the stage, and suggesting that, as Drury Lane and the Haymarket were the only theatres at which she could appear (Covent Garden being out of the question) she should be glad to hear the views of the former management on the subject. Mr. Bunn wrote to Mrs. Butler, expressing his perfect readiness to enter into an arrangement with her, and requesting to be informed of the amount of remuneration she would expect. Mrs. Butler in reply named £100. a night, on the first ten nights and £75. a night for every subsequent night, with an additional payment to be agreed upon for the production of one or two of her own new plays. (Here follows the correspondence which appeared in the Standard.) In justice to Mr. Bunn we should further state, that in demanding the respective sums of £100. and £75. a night, Mrs. Butler by no means intended those terms to apply to an engagement for a limited number of performances. The understanding suggested by herself was, that her first appearance should take place immediately, and that her performances should follow thrice a week until the end of May."

—Morning Post.

PERLET AND LEMAITRE.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

To the frequenters of this theatre the transition from Perlet to Lemaitre could not but offer a striking contrast. Perlet, so studied and so polished—Lemaitre, so droll, but so original. Both admirable and entertaining in their way, their object is attained through a very different source. Perlet's performances are the result of sound observation and patient study of human nature in various conditions of life, and as affected by various circumstances. The endless eccentricities of character are not overlooked by him, but in embodying them he strives (and how successfully!) to subdue rather than exaggerate them, rendering them conformable, within limits, to a general standard. Even in the accidental extravagancies of real life, he observes that there is still a strong prevailing tendency to a moderation and uniformity; witness his admirable lesson on the act of drunkenness which he gives us in Les Trois Crispins, wherein he shows that the real drunkard is not half so unsteady as his imitator, and for the reason that the real drunkard is constantly striving to keep his perpendicular, and the assumed drunkard constantly exerting himself to lose it. Perlet is a splendid artist. His school is of the highest order, and his assumptions are always marked with the happiest imitative powers, regulated by the soundest judgment. With this preparation, and this guiding principle, Perlet always plays up to himself, and within himself—he never plays to an audience. We never knew an actor in comedy in whom the power of abstraction was more remarkably exemplified. In Lemaitre we find the very reverse of all these qualities. He is no imitator; he has studied nobody but himself, and the whims and humours of his audience. Yet he is natural—he is all nature, exuberant nature. But it is his own nature, his own humour, totally unschooled by the observation of other natures. He is a spoiled child, Perlet an industrious patient scholar. Where Perlet could tame down a natural propensity to extravagance, or subdue an eccentric habit within the limits assigned by his judgment, Lemaitre hugs himself in his extravagancies, and cultivates eccentricity as the principle and not the accident. Let it not be supposed that we would detract from the merit of M. Lemaitre, or grudge our tribute of applause and thanks for the huge mirth he occasions us; far from it, he is at once one of the most original and entertaining of low comedians on the stage, but his advent immediately upon the heels of the most excellent existing high comedian suggested reflections upon the diverse features of their respective schools upon which it was impossible to avoid offering a passing word. [The above excellent remarks have forestalled some observation it was our intention to offer on the same subject. As we agree entirely with the clever writer, it is unnecessary for us to repeat what he has so well and forcibly expressed.—ED. M.W.]

CHRIST CHURCH, COVENTRY.

(From a Correspondent.)

ALL who feel an interest in any matter connected with the progress of music, and especially with that lofty style of it, which tends to dignify and enoble the service of our sanctuaries, will read with pleasure the subjoined particulars of a new organ recently erected in this church. The musical portion of the service at Christ Church had long been a subject of universal complaint, having been conducted with an instrument originally intended for a private apartment (the gift of a gentleman late of this city), and therefore truly defective and inefficient. In the course of the past year a subscription was commenced and liberally responded to, for the purpose of obtaining an instrument worthy of its position in this beautiful church. The builder chosen was Mr. John Banfield formerly of London, but now resident in Birmingham; who has accomplished his task in a manner exceeding the most sanguine expectations of the committee. The organ which is not surpassed by any for the fulness, grandeur, and sweetness of its tones, consists of the following stops:—

Great Organ, or Lower Manual, (compass, from GG to F in alt., with GG sharp.)
Open Diapason metal throughout.
Stopt ditto.
Dble. Diapason (Stopt) throughout Principal.
Twelfth.
Fifteenth.
Sesquialtera, 4 Ranks.
Trumpet through.
Clarion ditto.
Cremona to E below middle.
The Swell Organ, or Upper Manual, compass from E below middle to F in alt., contains—Stopt Diapason.
Open ditto.
Principal.
Hautboy.
Horn.
Harmonicon; with Double and Stopt Diapason Bass carried down to GG.

There are two Octaves, and two notes of Pedal Pipes from CCC to E, full scale, with the same amount of German Pedals.

The mechanism includes—

Coupler, Swell, and Great Manuals.

Pedals Great.

Pedals Choir, or Upper Manual Pedal Pipes; and six Composition Pedals, to give the following mixtures, viz:—

Stopt Diapason and Cremona.

Double Diapason.

Stopt Ditto.

Diapasons and Principal.

Diapasons, Principal, Twelfth,

Fifteenth, and Clarion.

Full Organ.

The case, designed by Mr. Akroyd, of Coventry, is extremely handsome and elegant, and in perfect keeping with the architecture of the church.

By the interest and exertions of Mr. Simms, the organist of St. Michael's and Christ Church, (to whom the order for the organ was entrusted, and who liberally presented a donation of £90), the whole has been completed at a cost of £330. It was opened on Sunday, the 27th of December last by Mr. Simms, who presided with his usual taste and ability—the musical service was ably sustained by the Coventry Choral Society under his direction.

FELIX CODEFROID.

In a review of two of its late concerts, dignified by the appellation of fêtes, the France Musicale thus apostrophises the talent of our excellent friend, the well-known harpist and musician—'Felix Godefroid is the king of harpists!' Is this artist a giant, who at his first appearance, has been received with deafening applauses? He is indeed a truly musical genius. Fancy in your own mind, a little man with a round and open countenance, with a high forehead, eyes dark and piercing, large black brows and black hair, of twenty-six years or upwards, and you will have the portrait of Felix Godefroid. Behold him at the moment when he strikes the harp under his powerful grasp: his little hands and lower limbs seem to have some superhuman power. If Godefroid is not of the family of giants as regards size, he is so at least as far as regards intellect, and that is infinitely better. Hear his fantasia on Robert le Diable; what an astonishing composition—for Godefroid is also a grand composer!—The most beautiful songs of the lyric drama are reproduced in every manner with an originality of execution, which was hitherto considered an impossibility on the harp. There are two chefs d'œuvre in this morceau, the chef d'œuvre of Meyerbeer, and that of Godefroid. Twenty times was the artist interrupted in the performance by bravos, and at the end he was recalled with enthusiastic acclamations.

Hear him yet again: Godefroid executed one of those charming fantasias, the motive of which Paganini has immortalised. It is impossible to know anything more poetical, more seductive than this bagatelle, where tenderness and irony are intercommingled, in so bizarre a fashion. It was the Carnaval de Venise with its sports, its follies and its caprices. This brilliant composition, bristling with the most arduous difficulties, fraught with the most marvellous traits, replete with so much smiling, so much passion, so many freaks of folly and intrepidity, finishes with a bold piacato. The saloon was electrified by prodigies of execution, the audience clap their hands, they recall the artist, they make him repeat this admirable fantasia, to which the performer added new feats of difficulty, new and splendid improvisations; the triumph was complete. At the second concert, in place of repeating the Carnaval de Venise, which the audience also re-demanded, he performed his Valse des Sylphes, a charming composition, where the air is deliciously blended with the fantasia, whilst one hand pursues the theme with a constancy that nothing can disconcert, the other hand more rapid than the empyrean swallow, flings round a thousand notes coquettish, rapid, æriel, sparkling, transparent as pearls. This morceau, like the two others, has been received with the most maddening applauses. One word for the harp upon which Mons. Godefroid performed. The instrument, manufactured by Erard, of London and Paris, is a veritable master-piece of mechanism. Let the greatest detractor of the harp hear Erard's instrument, and I immediately set him down as a converted man. [We should feel sorry had the amiable and accomplished harpist no better eulogist than the writer, whose article we have just translated. M. Godefroid is a highly talented musician as well as a very superior performer on the harp, and is deserving of a more creditable criticism than the one we have selected, which we have given, partly to exhibit the French mode of eulogizing a favorite performer. In our humble estimation, the article is a curiosity.—Ed. M. W.]

ON DIT.—It is reported that sundry of the members of the press have subscribed together, to present a piece of plate to the musical editor of the Morning Chronicle, as an acknowledgement of their sense of the independent course he has pursued in regard to the rival Italian operas. This is a new interpretation of the word independent.

THE AFFINITIES.

from the German of Göthe.

(Continued from page 19.)

PART I.—CHAPTER XV.

At last the morning, so anxiously expected, dawned upon Edward, and many guests successively arrived. Invitations had been sent to a considerable distance, and several persons who had missed the laying of the foundation stone, which had been described as very interesting, felt the more inclined not to miss this second solemnity.

Before dinner, the carpenters appeared with music in the courtyard, bearing their splendid wreath which was composed of many waving hoops of leaves and flowers, placed in gradation, one over the other. They uttered their greetings, and requested the ladies to grant them silk ribands and handkerchiefs for the usual decoration. While the gentry dined, they continued their joyous procession; and after they had remained a long time in the village, and there, also, had obtained several ribands from the female residents, they, at last, proceeded, accompanied and expected by a great multitude, to the heights upon which the house stood.

When dinner was over, Charlotte, in some measure, kept back the company. She desired no solemn, formal procession, and they therefore assembled on the spot, in distinct parties, without rank or order. Charlotte delayed with Ottilia, but this did not improve the matter, for Ottilia being nearly the last who appeared, it seemed as if the drums and trumpets had waited for her alone, as if the whole solemnity was to begin immediately on her arrival.

To take off the rough appearance of the house, it had been adorned in architectural style, with green twigs and flowers, according to a plan of the Captain's, but without his knowledge. Edward had caused the architect to mark the date with flowers on the pediment. This was all very well, but the Captain came in time to prevent the name of Ottilia from being likewise introduced. She managed, with a great deal of tact, to frustrate this scheme, and to remove the letters which were already formed of flowers.

The wreath was set out, and was visible at a great distance round. The ribands and kerchiefs fluttered in the air, and a short oration was rendered almost inaudible by the wind. The solemnity was now at an end, and the dance in front of the edifice, upon the levelled space, which had been surrounded with leafy branches, was now to begin. A spruce young carpenter led up to Edward a smart peasant girl, and asked Ottilia, who stood by, to join in the dance. The two couple soon found others to follow their example, and Edward managed to change his position, by taking the hand of Ottilia and going through the figure with her. The younger members of the party mixed joyously in the dance of the rustics, while the elder folks amused themselves by looking on.

Before they dispersed about the walks, it was agreed that they should meet again at sunset by the plane-trees. Edward was first at the spot, arranged every thing, and consulted with the valet who had to manage the fireworks on the opposite side.

The Captain remarked these preparations with some displeasure. He wished to point out to Edward what a great crowd of spectators would be occasioned, but his friend asked him somewhat sharply, to leave to him alone this part of the solemnity. The people had already thronged to the dikes which had been cut on the upper side and despoiled of their turf, so that the soil was uneven and insecure. The sun set; twilight approached, and during the interval before a greater darkness, the guests under the plane-trees were served with refreshments. The spot was found incomparable, and pleasing anticipations were formed as to the future view of the lake, so wide, and surrounded with such various objects.

An evening so calm that not a breath of air was stirring promised well for the night's entertainment, when suddenly a frightful cry arose. Great masses of earth had detached themselves from the dikes, and many persons were seen to fall into the water. The ground had given way under the pressure of the ever increasing multitude. Every one wished for the best place, and now none could move either backwards or forwards.

All sprang up, and hastened towards the spot, but for the sake more of looking than of acting; for what was to be done when no one's exertions would avail? The Captain, with a few of the more resolute, quickly made the crowd move down from the dike towards the bank, that sufficient room might be afforded to the useful persons who were endeavouring to pull out those who were sinking. Partly by their own exertions, partly by those of others, the whole party were now brought upon dry ground, with the single exception of a boy, who, by striving too anxiously, had moved away from the dike, instead of approaching it. His strength appeared to fail him, and now only a foot, now a hand was seen above the surface. Unfortunately, the boat was on the opposite side, filled with fireworks; it could only be moved slowly, and assistance was delayed. The Captain had taken his resolution; he cast aside his upper garments, all eyes were directed towards him, and his able, powerful form inspired every one with confidence; but a shriek of astonishment arose from the throng when he plunged into the water. Followed by the eyes of all, he soon, as an experienced swimmer, reached the boy, and brought him, apparently lifeless, to the dike.

In the meanwhile the boat came up, the Captain entered it, and made accurate inquiries of those present, whether all were really saved. The surgeon took charge of the lifeless boy; Charlotte came up and requested the Captain to take care only of himself, to return to the castle, and to change his clothes. He delayed until some cool, intelligent persons, who had themselves assisted in saving several lives, assured him in the most solemn manner, that all were now in safety.

Charlotte sees him return home, remembers that the wine and tea, and other necessities, are all locked up, and thinks that in such cases people generally make mistakes. She hurries through the scattered party, which is, however, still under the plane-trees. Edward is occupied in telling every one to remain, informing them that in a short time he will give the signal, and the firework will begin. Charlotte approaches, and requests him to postpone an entertainment, which would now be misplaced, and which, indeed, could not be enjoyed at the present moment. She reminds him what is due to the person recently saved, and to him who saved him.

"The surgeon will do his duty," replied Edward, "he is provided with everything, and all interference on our part would be a mere hindrance."

Charlotte adhered to her purpose, and beckoned to Ottilia, who at once prepared to depart, when Edward, catching her hand, exclaimed—"We will not finish this day in an hospital! She is too good for a sister of charity. Without our assistance the apparently dead can wake, and the living can dry themselves."

Charlotte was silent, and departed. Some followed her—others followed these; in fine, as no one wished to be the last, all followed. Edward and Ottilia found themselves alone under the plane-trees. He insisted that she should remain, notwithstanding her urgent, anxious entreaties that he would return with her to the castle.

"No, Ottilia," he cried, "the extraordinary does not happen on the smooth, ordinary path. The surprising occurrence of this evening brings us more rapidly together. You are mine! I have often said it, and sworn it already. We will no more say it, or swear it—now it shall be."

The boat came over from the opposite side, rowed by the valet, who asked, with some confusion, when the firework was to begin.

"Fire it off now," exclaimed Edward. "It was ordered for you alone, Ottilia, and now you alone shall see it. Allow me to sit by you and look at it also." Modestly he placed himself at her side, without once touching her.

Rockets ascended whizzing; maroons thundered, balls of fire went up, squibs turned about and banged, wheels hissed, first singly, then in pairs, then all together, and ever with increased violence. Edward, whose bosom was on fire, pursued these fiery apparitions with a lively glance of satisfaction, while to Ottilia's gentle, but excited mind this noisy flashing appearance and disappearance was rather painful than pleasant. She timidly leaned against Edward, to whom this approach, this confidence gave a perfect feeling that she now belonged to him entirely.

Night had scarcely resumed her dominion than the moon arose, and illumined the paths of the returning pair. A figure, with a hat in its hand, stopped before them, and asked them for alms, saying that he had been overlooked on the occasion of this festivity. The moon shone full on his face, and Edward recognised the features of the beggar who was so intrusive on a former occasion. But, in his present happy state, he could not be angry, nor could it once occur that on this day a heavy penalty had been imposed upon begging. He did not feel long in his pocket, but flung the man a piece of gold. He would willingly have made every one happy, as his own happiness seemed boundless.

At home all had happened as had been wished. The activity of the surgeon, the circumstance that all necessary articles were ready at hand, the assistance of Charlotte—all worked together, and the boy was restored to life. The guests departed, both to see something of the fireworks at a distance, and to reach their peaceful homes after such scenes of confusion.

The Captain, who had quickly changed his clothes, had taken an active part in the attendance on the boy. All was quieted, and he found himself alone with Charlotte. With friendly confidence he now explained to her that the time of his departure was near. She had gone through so much that evening that this discovery made little impression upon her. She had seen how her friend sacrificed himself—how he had saved another, and was saved likewise. These strange events seemed to predict an important but not unhappy future.

On Edward's entrance with Ottilia, the approaching departure of the Captain was announced to him. He suspected that Charlotte knew more of the matter before, but he was too much occupied with himself and his own designs to feel any annoyance on this account. On the contrary, he heard with attention and satisfaction the good and honourable situation which was to be given to the Captain. His private wishes, breaking through all restraints, anticipated the progress of events. He could already see the Captain united with Charlotte, himself with Ottilia. No greater boon could have been given him on the occasion of this festival.

But how astonished was Ottilia when she entered her room and found the precious little chest on her table. She opened it without delay, and found all so beautifully packed and arranged that she did not venture to unpack, scarcely to lift them. Muslin, cambric, silk, shawls, lace vied with each other in costliness, fineness, and elegance. Nor had jewels been omitted. She perfectly saw that the design was to give her more than one complete suit of clothes from head to foot; but all looked so valuable and so strange that she did not venture to appropriate it to herself, even in thought.

(To be continued.)

. To prevent misunderstanding it may be stated that the copyright of this translation belongs solely to the translator.

SONNET.

NO XVIL.

Love seiz'd my heart in an unguarded hour,
Invading the domain by slow degrees,
And coming softly, as the gentle breeze
That scarcely bends the lightly-trembling flow'r,
While I, forgetful of his mighty pow'r,
Thought his assaults my idle soul would please,
That I might watch him, smiling at my ease,
As men watch foes from some unshaken tow'r.
At first I smil'd to see thee smile again,
And then I lik'd to see thine eye grow bright.
And then I thought thee fairer than before.
Thus cautiously did love secure his reign,
But now he rises in his awful might,
An earnest love—the jest of love is o'er.

N. D.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

HAYMARKET.—His Majesty the Conde Montemolin honored this theatre with his presence on Thursday evening and was much gratified with the performance of She stoops to Conquer, The Woman Hater, and The Invisible Prince, which attracted a crowded auditory, and filled the theatre in every part on the opening of the doors. A new comedy, in five acts, by Dion Bourcicault, is in rehearsal.

FRENCH PLAYS.—On Monday last we witnessed the first appearance of Mr. Frederick Lemaître for this season, and, indeed, these two years. If we may judge from the early crowded house, the good humour of the audience, and the excitement and curiosity displayed at every motion, every gesture of the actor, he is no ordinary favourite, and will, no doubt, turn up a good card for the management. In giving our opinion of Mr. F. Lemaitre's acting, we must not be supposed to judge him by the ordinary standard, either of tragedy, comedy, or melodrama; nor indeed by any standard or rule hitherto observed or existing. It was in the part of Robert Macaire that he struck out a new path for himself, apart from all previous stage conventionalities. This piece, written in the most serious of moods, became through his genius, and we maintain that it was genius, a vehicle of bitter satire and severe castigation on the manners of the day; it laughed to scorn the weaknesses and hollowness of society; it turned into ridicule the uselessness and absurdity of mere duty and feeling, unless upheld by a higher and more moral conviction; it taught a noble lesson in the punishment of vice and recklessness; for, although amused at the eccentricities of the hero, we felt no compunction at his final death. Since the Marriage de Figaro, by Beaumarchais, no piece has caused so great a sensation. Both these dramas created the most painful surprise in the minds of many, and there were men who gravely shook their heads, and wondered what society would come to next, when the order of things was thus inverted, and the most sacred ties turned into ridicule, and, what was more, loudly applauded; they predicted ruin to society, and wondered that some sudden punishment did not crush the infidels; both were prescribed by the censorship, but too late, the blow had been dealt, the idea had gained ground and spread abroad, and Figaro and Robert Macaire became the vehicles of a long, numerous, and spirited succession of caricatures, which, by turns, attacked every folly, every vice, and every ridicule of the times. Politics, quackery, letters, education, speculations of every sort underwent the ordeal, and were held up to the public gaze. As regards the change effected by the actor we have every reason to be pleased with it. He did away with those tyrants, the delight of the gods of our minor theatres; he mingled the burlesque with the terrible in such a manner as to amuse, nay, instruct by both; and he has detracted nothing from the interest by knocking the murderer and assassin off his stilts, and high flown phraseology. Don César de Bazan is evidently of the same school, modified and improved it is true, but still bearing the impress of the reform effected in this department of dramatic acting. We shall not venture into any detail of the plot of a play produced at all the theatres of London, (we remember its being played at six houses the same night); neither shall we make any comparison between the French and English actors, we never do; indeed, the difference of language, bearing of the actors, and points of the dialogue is so great, that any analogy is out of the question. The reckless, profligate, thoughtless spendthrift; the ruined, houseless outcast; the high-minded, proud nobleman, were admirably portrayed in turns—at the same time, the chivalry and elegance of the Spanish Don, although almost entirely laid aside at intervals, were never entirely abandoned, and sprung up as soon as an opportunity afforded. His first scene was admirable, and his quarrel with the Captain on his refusal to paragon Lazarille, both affecting and exquisitely ludicrous; so also was his interview with Don José, who offers to grant any favour he may demand, full of good feeling and generosity. In his interview with the King he appears the high-minded, chivalric nobleman, defends his wife, and reproaches the monarch with his perfidy. This was nobly and well acted, without exaggeration, or bombast, and met with deserved applause. M. Langeval played the part of the King exceedingly well, and Mlle. Clarisse was favourably received—however, we must see this lady in some other part before we pronounce our final judgment on her. She certainly is superior to most actresses as a vaudeville singer, although unequal to the music injudiciously introduced into this piece, and which had much better have been cut out altogether, or altered to something within her means. We certainly do not expect to find a finished singer at the Porte St. Martin; on the other hand, we have a right to quarrel with any attempt to overstep the bounds of nature. M. Cartigny did the small part allotted him in his usual careful and judicious manner, and Mlle. Vallée as the page, looked exceedingly pretty, and acted with infinite grace, earnestness, and vivacity.

On Wednesday Don César de Bazan was repeated, together with the Dot d'Auvergne.—J. DE C—E.

PRINCESS'S THEATRE.—The debut of Miss Bassano, on Tuesday evening, at this house, has been the only dramatic feature of the week. Considerable excitement had, for some period, pervaded the musical circles, and much interest was created to witness the fair vocalist's first appearance on the English stage. Miss Bassano heretofore had been recognised as a very popular singer at concerts, oratorios, and festivals. She was a pupil of the Royal Academy of Music, and studied under Signor Crevelli. She proceeded to Italy about three years since, where she underwent a course of musical and histrionic tuition, to befit her for the stage, to which, for some period of time she had turned her attention and her hopes. Miss Bassano appeared, for the first time on the stage, in Italy. She performed the leading characters of several favorite operas, and obtained, according to the continental journals, considerable success. Miss Bassano returned to this country last season. When she quitted England, her voice was a very fine contralto, rich, racy, and even. Since her continental training, her voice has undergone a serious alteration. Miss Bassano no longer possesses a contralto voice. It has now become a true mezzo-soprano, combining the low notes of the contralto with the upper notes of the soprano, but restricted in both. Miss Bassano's organ is, for the most part, formed by education. In losing much of the mellowness and evenness of her natural tones, Miss Bassano has sacrificed what formerly were the chief excellences of her voice. She has supplied these defaults with power and brilliancy, and has rendered thereby her vocalizing more effective and dramatic. If she have lost the greatest charms of her vocal powers she has substituted those which will befit her more in producing high results in stage performances. Miss Bassano has, by her musical education, given up much; she has likewise gained much: and as her endeavours were directed with a view to the stage, we cannot blame her for adapting her voice to render her assumption of prima-donna parts practicable. The opera chosen for the fair vocalist's first appearance was Donizetti's Anna Bolena. We have heard and read many criticisms, deprecating the selection of this opera for Miss Bassano's debut. It is alledged that Anna Bolena is represented by the loftiest lyric artists only, such as Grisi and Pasta, while secondary vocalists entirely forego its assumption; that the whole performance demands the highest dramatic conception, and greatest tragic powers; that there is little melody to display the fine or delicate qualities of the voice, so necessary for a debutante to exhibit; that, in short, no opera could have been fixed upon which would more lamentably expose the deficiencies of a novice and that, in consequence, Miss Bassano made an unfortunate selection in Anna Bolena. We grant all the premises of the above rationale to be true, but we deem the conclusion false. In the first place, it will be granted, that when the dramatic or lyric personation of a débütante is of the loftiest kind, the indulgence of the public will be in proportion to the difficulty of the conception and performance: in the next place, the audience are not so likely to draw comparisons in a representation seldom seen and not often, when seen, rightly appreciated: in the last place, passion and power, are more easily assumed on the stage by a beginner, than ease, grace, and repose, which experience and study can alone provide. With this view before us we think Miss Bassano acted wisely in taking a character like that of Anna Bolena for her first appearance. The fair débütante was received with great favour throughout the evening, and if applause be a criterion of success, no one could be more eminently successful than Miss Bassano on Tuesday night. Her performance and her singing were repeatedly cheered throughout the evening; she was called for after the first act, and received the same compliment at the end of the opera. Miss Bassano's singing is particularized by energy and judgment; she has evidently studied hard, and has been taught well; her voice is powerful and managed with skill, while she exhibits considerable ability in her histrionic essays. With all these recommendations, Miss Bassano could hardly fail from proving successful in Anna Bolena, especially when we remember the previous favoritism she had obtained with the public, and consider the indulgence that, under such circumstances, was necessarily extended to her. And yet, justice compels us to say, that notwithstanding all these favourable combinations tending to make a great lyric artist, Miss Bassano has seasons of toil and study to undergo, before she can ever hope to be a great dramatic singer. We have given her credit for all the talent she possesses; we would now point out, but with a lenient pen, the faults, that if persisted in, must for ever militate against her obtaining a high position in her art. Miss Bassano has been kindly treated by fortune; she is gifted with a highly capable, if not a charming voice, and has an expressive face, and a neatly-moulded form. She possesses in her acting the substratum of all dramatic power, impulsiveness, and seems to have a keen sense and sensibility of the character she assumes. Miss Bassano's vocal powers are unsuited to such parts as Anna Bolena. Her voice is neither sufficiently high to enable her to fulfil the range of characters given to modern prima-donnas; nor is it flexible enough to adapt itself to the general tone of Italian music. In her acting, her movements are evidently those of a practitioner, being wanting in repose and dignity, while most of her attitudes are devoid of grace and purpose. There is, however, evident talent in her performance; she projects herself into her character with much earnestness, and whether the impersonation be false or exaggerated, it is by no means divested of vitality. This shows that the real dramatic talent is inherent in the young artist, and requires culture only to bring it to perfection. We have thus spoken openly and candidly of Miss Bassano as a singer and an actress; in the fairest spirit of criticism have we judged of her faults and her merits. Let not this fair and promising artist be led away by the momentaneous acclamations of enthusiastic audiences, or the fatal prejudices of kindred and acquaintances. Let her not fancy she has nothing to learn; let her studies be deep and untiring, and she may then obtain, what her young ambition now aims at obtaining, a place among the highest lyric names of this country. We can only offer a word or two concerning the other artists who performed in the opera. Mr. Leffler's common style was too manifest in Henry the Eighth; Miss Sarah Flower sang the music of Smeaton very prettily; Miss Georgiana Smithson was not particularly well suited to the character of Jane Seymour; and Mr. Allen was all that could be desired as Percy. This gentleman decidedly proves himself, the oftener we hear him, the best artist on the English stage. He sang exquisitely on Tuesday night. The female chorus was excellent; the male chorus indifferent; and the orchestra, under the admirable direction of Mr. Loder, achieved all that could be anticipated from its slender means. Would that the deficiency of our theatrical bands could be amended.

The English version of Anna Bolena, by Mr. Charles Jeffreys, is carefully adapted from the original and written with great ease and harmony. The songs are all excellently done, and exhibit much poetic feeling in the author. When the twofold difficulty of translating the Italian words into English so as to fit them to the original music, and at the same time of rendering them into poetic numbers, be taken into account, the merit of Mr. Charles Jeffrey's version will be duly appreciated. Some of the songs are likely to obtain considerable popularity in their English form. We may instance the song of Smeaton, "O that I never more might see," (Deh non voler); the cavatina, charmingly sung by Miss Bassano, "Speak not again of bygone days," (Come innocente); and Percy's two airs, so deliciously given by Allen, "Ah! how bright were those blest days," (Ah! così), and "Cherish life, I do conjure thee," (Vivi Tu).

A new farce called School-day Frolics, was produced on Wednesday evening with success, which want of space hinders us from noticing till next week.

MY HOME IN THE CITY:

(From the "Illuminated Musical Almanac.")

I.

My home in the City, dear mother,
I know is uncommonly dark;
But, believe me, your son thinks no other
Would do half so well for a clerk!
'Tis true the sun's ray never glides there,
Through windows all dusky and dun;
But one beautiful vision abides there,
A great deal more bright than the sun.

II.

The poor artist pining above me,
Who's toiling from morning till night,
Hath a fair girl who's learning to love me,
And she is my angel of light!
It gives me a sort of heart-fulness
To leave that dear home: when I do
'Tis not on account of its dulness,
But only—to come and see you!

III.

Oh! soon from the want-chains that bound him
Her father will merge in his pride,
With the halo of Fame shining round him,
And she for my beautiful bride!
You'll never shed love on another
When I bring her hither to dwell;
For she'll teach me to sing, dearest mother,
"My home in the City, farewell!"

F. W. N. BATLEY.

REVIEWS ON BOOKS.

"Christopher Tadpole." No. 5. By ALBERT SMITH.—RICHARD BENTLEY.

THE number of the present month is more narrative than any of the preceding. Mr. Gudge takes a journey on purpose to get Christopher into his power, and is about to take him into his domestic establishment as a page. Dr. Aston's curiosity-shop is described with much point and humour. We shall extract it, as the most favourable specimen which the number offers:—

"The doctor's curiosities, when they were removed from the institution, were placed here. First there was his air-pump; a curious machine between a large coffee-mill and a small fire-engine, which, put in action, made grievous moans and other expressions of internal suffering, and performed aerial conjuring tricks to any extent. Then there was the electrifying machine, which nobody could be got to come within ten feet of, even in its quiescent state, for fear it might go off and blow them into bits. There were things in bottles, too, of wondrous form; dreadful lizards, which people in foreign countries were reported to find in their beds when they retired to rest, and boots and pockets when they got up; kittens with two heads of melancholy expression; scorpions and centipedes that the doctor had tried to domesticate and breed, and happily failed. All the old brasses were hung up as well—the gentleman in armour with the lankey legs and impossible shoes, making footstools of vividly-conceived dogs; the ladies in the powerful head-dresses, with hands inconveniently bent back in prayers, as if their wrists were hinges; the unintelligible anecdotes of their births, marriages, and deaths underneath them, as difficult to read as samplers, out of which clever people made anything they pleased without chance of contradiction; they were all there."

Mrs. Grittles, the old housekeeper of Dr. Aston, is a clever and happy sketch. Sprouts's soirée is well recounted, and exhibits the author in his proper sphere of relation. The scene is very amusing, and displays Mr. Albert Smith's knowledge of character, and his intimate acquaintance with the manners and customs of the humble classes of society. This is no faint praise to a writer of modern romances. We have no fault whatever to find with the present number of "Christopher Tadpole."

"Dombey and Son," No. 4. By CHARLES DICKENS.—BRADBURY AND EVANS.

MR. DICKENS has, in this number of his new work, directed his powerful pen against the system of precocious education. Impressed with the beneficial results following his exposure of the Yorkshire cheap schools, the author has flown his wit at higher quarry, and has laid bare the flagrant and absurdities of certain Academies of pretence, who undertake to train up youths in the way they should go. Our readers shall have Mr. Dickens' own description of the Academy he has selected to satirize.

"In fact, Doctor Blimber's establishment was a great hot house, in which there was a forcing apparatus incessantly at work. All the boys blew before their time. Mental green-peas were produced at Christmas, and intellectual asparagus all the year round. Mathematical gooseberries (very sour ones too) were common at untimely seasons, and from mere spouts of bushes, under Doctor Blimber's cultivation, every description of Greek and Latin vegetable was got off the driest twigs of boys, under the frostiest circumstances. Nature was of no consequence at all. No matter what a young gentleman was intended to bear, Doctor Blimber made him bear to pattern, somehow or other.

The picture of Doctor Blimber, the head of this choice institution, is vividly and graphically drawn, and realises the very impersonation of pomposity and self-conceit.

"The Doctor was a portly gentleman in a suit of black, with strings at his knees, and stockings below them. He had a bald head, highly polished; a deep voice; and a chin so very double, that it was a wonder how he ever managed to shave into the creases. He had likewise a pair of little eyes that were always half shut up, and a mouth that was always half expanded into a grin, as if he had, that moment, posed a boy, and were waiting to convict him from his own lips. Inasmuch, that when the Doctor put his right hand into the breast of his coat, and with his other hand behind him, and a scarcely perceptible wag of his head, made the commonest observation to a nervous stranger, it was like a sentiment from the sphynx, and settled his business."

The stupid and pernicious custom of forcing a quantity of learning upon young minds at once, is very happily exposed in a scene where Paul is given a number of books to study, whereby nothing but confusion is produced in his brain. The author handles it in his own peculiar view of humour.

"They comprised a little English, a deal of Latin—names of things, declensions of articles and substantives, exercises thereon, and preliminary rules—a trifle of orthography, a glance of ancient history, a wink or two at modern ditto, a few tables, two or three weights and measures, a little general information. When poor Paul had spelt out two, he found he had no idea of number one; fragments whereof afterwards obtruded themselves into number three, which slid into number four, which grafted itself on to number two. So that whether twenty Romuluses made a Remus, or hic hæc hoc was troy weight, or a verb always agreed with an ancient Briton, or three times four was Taurus a bull, were open questions with him.

Our friend, Walter Gray, is about to depart for the West Indies, whither Mr. Dombey dispatches him, having procured him some official employment. We hardly sympathize with the early dawning love of Walter for Florence. Florence is a mere child, and can hardly be supposed to awaken any feeling whatsoever akin to the tender passion in a youth. Besides, boys seldom or never, in their first love, devote their sighs to such of the fair sex as are younger than themselves. But again the author has described, or rather betokened Walter's affection with so much purity, and has sketched the character of Florence, with such exquisite delicacy, that we can hardly blame himself, much less Walter, for being in love with her, since we are assuredly in love with her ourselves.

"January Eve, a Tale of the Times." By GEORGE SOANE, B.A.—E. CHURTON, HOLLES STREET.

A most admirable little Christmas story has Mr. Soane provided for his readers, neatly constructed and elegantly written. "January Eve" is a tale founded entirely on human interest; and though we are led until the last page to believe that the author has dealt in the immaterial world, we find no instruments used, save such as are open to mortal apprehension. Mr. Soane has exhibited great art and tact in the development of his story, and the denouement is striking and satisfactory. The author of "January Eve" is the writer of the very pleasing version of Giselle to which Mr. Loder's music is wedded. Mr. Soane is also well known as an elegant and accomplished prose writer. A work of his, entitled "Robin Goodfellow, or the Frolics of Puck," was most favourably received by the public and the press some years since.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

THE CRITIC OF THE MORNING POST.

DEAR SIR,—If you will allow me, I will now answer other attacks made upon me by the Post, and with the addition of this letter, I shall have defeated the critic at every point.

But the critic may say, "I have the advantage of a paper, whose circulation is more than double Mr. Flower's." This is false consolation, because I can circulate truth amongst those who are able to appreciate it, and forward amongst them my views of science. Six wise men who read the truth, are more powerful than nine foolish ones, who can be deluded by unsound arguments—"the still small voice" of truth, will find its way in time.

Had the critic known that Rossini had employed a similar harmony to the one which he calls "too ugly, and unmusical to be mimicked, in ordinary phraseology," he would have reserved his severity for a more becoming opportunity. The passage referred to, is the too last bars in my "Pascaglia." This attack is as unhappy as the one wherein Mozart was accused, (not I) of making "the most unharmonious progressions of all the harsh and unmusical things that even this work contains." I never could have supposed that criticism would have come to such a low ebb, as to have used the above language, to describe one of the most striking and prominent features of the beautiful aria, "Wenn der Freude Tränen fliessen," from the celebrated opera "Die Entführung aus dem Serail," wherein Mozart has employed these "uneuphonious progressions!" no less than twelve times during this short song! Not only does Mozart make use of these progressions, but all the great masters too. The Post critic, therefore, seems well read in music!

I come now to an important part of my system, and one which the Post objects to, viz., my having introduced nine new terms to express such movements of a dissonance as have hitherto been considered unworthy of especial notification. We are taught to consider that the dissonance E, for instance, may be thus treated; E, G.

F, if resolved, moves to E, or E flat.

F, if suspended, remains on F.

F, if retarded, leaves F.

F, if enharmonically changed, becomes E sharp, (which, in my essay is designated "transmutation," because this term corresponds with the others, and is more decided in its meaning.)

But in classical music, we find that composers employ other movements besides these, and that they also form a legitimate solution, or treatment of a dissonance: how is it, then, that no terms have been given to them? This is readily explained. Early writers on the theory of music had neither a Sebastian Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Cherubini, Spohr or Mendelssohn, consequently their laws were as limited as they were often defective. When any distinguished composer before Bach's time intended to employ a dissonance, otherwise than in the above methods, theorists immediately set that down as a matter of "licence," instead of which they should have examined the effect, and if found good, passed it into a law; but this they did not do. Bach gave the death-blow to old fashion, and trite notions of harmony, and it ought to have been the study of theorists long ago to have built upon safe and copious systems of treating harmony upon the immortal works he has left behind. Old theories should have long been disregarded that proved the comparatively rude state of music before his time.

Now that the writings of the great masters are not wholly accounted for (except by the shuffling word licence), by the ancient law-givers, it is high time that a new code of laws should be made; and as the treatment of dissonance forms an important branch of the theory of music, I have, I believe, omitted no movement of a dissonant note, (as employed by the great masters;) giving to each of them such terms as I thought, best described each particular species of movement.

I will, again, take F, as the dissonant note, and treat it in four ways, quite different from the foregoing E, G.

F, if it ascend to F sharp, is called transversion.

F, if it be transplanted to another voice of the harmony, is called translocation.

F, if it be altogether retained, is called retained diversion.

F, if it ascend to a minor, and a major second, is called conjunct diversion.

There are nothing like licences in music: why then should the above ways have no nomenclature?

I showed in my last letter that my "fixed rules of dissonances," explained 2288 harmonic varieties, and that without these, only 192 could be produced. This would not be the case, however, if any of the chords mentioned in my Essay had been omitted, and as the Post objected to some of them, I will now enter upon this subject.

A system of harmony that gives as many chords as are employed by the great masters, cannot fail of embodying all the combinations of which their music is composed; to omit one of them, then, cannot be satisfactory or methodical.

The theory of acoustics is sufficiently understood to guide the inquirer to all the different vibrations of a generator; but what assistance has this been to the musical theorist? Do we not call D for instance, the root of the minor triad of D, F, A? then why seek the aid of one theory which does not bear upon the commonest law of another? I never subscribe to musical theories which are fragile from the very foundation. Is not a minor triad almost as natural to the ear as a major triad? Being, then, bereft of the theory of acoustics, the safest and simplest principle for ascertaining the roots of the chords is this—trace out what scales procure all the combinations of notes that are used by the great masters; then call harmonious intervals, or duads, all those that when heard together, contain one of these combinations.

A sound principle of chords, then, depends upon a sound principle of duads; because duads are the very foundation of chords.

The number of chords founded on the fundamental intervals, I. III. V. VII., amount to sixteen and there are neither more nor less than this number, all these chords are necessary to the students' improvement; and that system which gives fewer, takes away the materials, as it were, that developes and explains classical harmony.

I will conclude by thanking you Mr. Editor, for bearing my defence against the Post, in your enlightened musical Periodical.

Dear Sir, yours truly

FARMER FLOWERS.

Jan. 14th, 1847.

Errata, to my last letter. "Nor is resolution identical with suspension, nor is suspension identical with retardation. (not, "resolution")

False relations, (not, "relatives.") I perceive the critic had little penetration for he cannot see how the figures I, III, V, VII, &c., can be by adding two, (not "one.")

POEMS UPON LITTLE EDITH.

BY COVENTRY PATMORE.

I.

Think of cloudlets, light and tender,
Underneath the moving moon,
Full of love to that bright lender
Of their beauty in the noon;
Think of ripples, smooth, unriveted,
Travelling regularly on,
Swiftly, delicately, driven
By the white breast of the swan;
Think of lambs, just shorn, at leisure
Filing past a narrow lane,
With repeated bleats of pleasure,
To their green abodes again;
Think of whatsoever feedeth
Tranquil woods; and I will find Gentler charms in little Edith,
Edith of the thoughtful mind.

II.

A song to little Edith, for she is very fair!
Her eye-lids are the snow-flakes, amidst the black night-air,
When, dropping large and leisurely, they show the coming thaw;
And her eyes, beneath, the softest are that ever daylight saw.
A song to little Edith for she is full of grace!
In her motion flows the fairness which broods upon her face;
Urgent sometimes, never hurried, her spirits hold free sway,
And royally neglect the time, as things immortal may.
A song to little Edith, thrice graceful and thrice fair!
Her outward grace and beauty are true tokens to declare
Her bosom's holy beauty, her spirit's higher grace,
Which make the sacred missal to the gold and jewell'd case.

III.

I say, "I must amend me,
And be like little Edith!"
She does not comprehend me;
Some riddle she infers:
And while, with sweet demureness,
My countenance she reads,
I quail before the pureness
Of that child's smile of hers.
I sigh, "She is unto me
As April to December!"
With marvel does she view me,
My meaning to divine.
Thank God! my heart's compunction
Subsides, when I remember
Our everlasting junction,
Through Christ, her Lord and mine.

PROVINCIAL.

CANTERBURY.—On Wednesday the room was thronged at the concert of the "Original Catch Club." In addition to the customary entertainments, Mr. Farquharson Smith sang two songs, and Messrs. Ashby and Harding, a duet, each of which were well received. The duet from L'Elisir d'Amore was one of the most attractive pieces of the evening. Amongst the visitors were Colonel Perce, and several others of the gallant heroes of Afrik and Sohraon, belonging to the 16th Lancers, now quartered at Canterbury.

Between the first and second parts of Mr. W. H. Palmer's concert, the Messrs. Ashby and Harding, from the Theatre, of whom we have before spoken in favourable terms, introduced the duet from "The Puritans," "Il rival salvar tu dei." We understand this piece is one of the small number that the Messrs. Ashby and Harding intend putting before us, with the aid of costume and scenic effect, between the plays at the Theatre.—Kentish Gazette.

CANTERBURY.—Mr. Longhurst gave his seventh Soirée Musicale, at the Assembly Rooms, Bargate-street, on Monday last, and we have the pleasure of according our approbation of the performances generally, but would wish more especially to notice the brilliant execution of Mr. Longhurst on the piano, and Mr. Marsh on the harp, in a grand fantasia, which elicited much applause. We would also name Master Nicholson, whose youth renders his performance on the flute truly astonishing; his solo of "Di Tanti Palpit," gave universal pleasure. Mr. Whitnall, on the violin and Master Saunders, in the song of "Let me Wander," were loudly applauded. The attainments of Master White on the piano reflected the highest credit on Mr. Longhurst, his preceptor, and the whole performance was well calculated to advance Mr. Longhurst in his professional career.—(From a Correspondent.)

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—(From a Correspondent).—Theatricals, under the management of the new Lessee, Mr. Davis, seem to increase in popularity. The pantomime is a production which reflects the highest credit on the scene painter, machinist, and costumer, and the graceful dancing of Mr. Shaw and Miss Nosadale, as Harlequin and Columbine, has elicited bursts of approbation from a succession of crowded houses. On Friday evening the boxes were quite full at first price, to witness the performance of Mr. Davis in "Richelleu;" he made quite a hit on its first representation, and judiciously gave it as the first piece, on the crack box-night of the week. The Cardinal was most ably represented by him, and the enthusiasm with which he was called before the curtain, shewed the high estimation in which he was held by the discriminating audience by which he was surrounded. De Mauprat was beautifully played by Everett—this gentleman, in juvenile tragedy, is equal to any one on the stage. But where was pretty Mrs. Gurner that she did not play Julie? Miss Winstanley was pleasing and ladylike in the part, but she lacked the accomplishments of such an artist as Mrs. Gurner, besides which the name of the latter, combined with that of Mr. Davis, is always an attraction.

BRIGHTON.—(From our own Correspondent).—Madame Mortier de Fontaine gave a concert on the 4th inst. She is a very clever and pleasing vocalist, and the stamp of intelligence and feeling is impressed upon all she does. Her efforts were received most warmly by the audience. We trust that Mad. Mortier de Fontaine will be frequently heard at the London concerts next season. The oftener she appears before the public the more she will be liked by audiences, her style being at once agreeable and unaffected; moreover, she is a very excellent vocalist, educated in a good school. The other singer was Signor Bottura, a basso of repute. The programme was diversified by solos on the harp and piano-forte by Mad. D'Eichthal and M. Lindsay Sloper, both of which were loudly applauded. The room was not so well filled as we could have desired, and as Mad. Mortier's talents deserved.

BATH.—Mr. and Mrs. Millar gave a Soirée Musicale on the 30th ult., at their residence, 13, Old Sydney-place. The following programme was performed:—

PART I.—Round, "The Indian Drum," Sir H. R. Bishop; Air, Mr. Millar, "O Fortune! ton caprice," Meyerbeer; solo (violin), Mr. Cooper, "Le Carnaval de Venise," Paganini; Air, Mr. Pyne, "Then you'll remember me," Balfe; Aria, Mrs. Millar, "Fommo Ciel!" (violin obbligato), Mr. Cooper, Pacini.

PART II.—Duett (violin and piano-forte), Mr. Cooper and Mr. W. Browne (Guillaume Tell), Osborne and De Beriot; Air, MS., Mr. Millar (first time), "I fly with thee, Adina, dear," written expressly for him by Sir H. R. Bishop; Duett Mr. Pyne and Mr. Millar, "Flow gently Deva," Parry; Trio, "Vanne a coles," Mrs. Millar, Mr. Pyne, and Mr. Millar, Costa; Fantasia (piano-forte), Mr. W. Browne, Hummel; Duett, Mrs. and Mr. Millar, "Doux aye" (Guillaume Tell), Rossini; Terzetto, "Vadasi via di qua," Martini.

The attendance was fashionable, and the performances gave entire satisfaction. In our account of the recent concert at Clifton, our correspondent omitted to say, that Mr. Millar undertook the whole of the tenor part with the greatest ability.

DEVIZES.—A concert was given in this town on Thursday evening, Jan. 7, by Miss Kate Ward, of the Royal Academy of Music. The vocalists engaged on this occasion were Miss Ransford, (whose pleasing voice is well known to the habitués of the Royal Academy Concerts,) and Mr. Ransford, her father. Mr. Lindsay Sloper presided at the piano-forte, and performed two fantasias in the course of the evening, and Miss Ward, also secured the services of the Messrs. Pitman, from Bath. This young lady possesses a soprano voice of charming quality, and her style is pure and expressive; she was much applauded throughout the evening, and was encored in Mozart's, "Non mi dir," and in Linley's Ballad, "Spirit of Air." The programme gave general satisfaction, several other pieces being encored; all Mr. Ransford's characteristic Gipsy Songs obtained that distinction. Miss Ransford sang an aria from Linda and "The Fairy Bride," ballad, so effectively, that, at the conclusion of the latter, she was unanimously called upon to repeat Donizetti's air. Mr. Pitman is a clever performer on the violin, and his fantasia was received with great favour. Mr. Lindsay Sloper joined the Messrs. Pitman in a trio of Mayeader, which was a brilliant and effective performance. Herz's Lucia, and Weber's Invitation pour la Valse gave our admirable young pianist an opportunity of displaying his finished execution, animated style, and unaffected expression to the greatest advantage. The last piece was the favourite; but Mr. Lindsay Sloper received with great enthusiasm in everything he played. The concert was numerous and fashionably attended.—(From a Correspondent.)

MANCHESTER.—At the usual weekly rehearsal of the Hargreaves choir, on Tuesday last, the members presented to them zealous and accomplished conductor, a mark of respect, which was highly honourable to both givers and recipient. It consisted of an elegant conductor's baton, made of green ebony, with silver handle, and surmounted by a figure of Apollo and a decorative device, also in silver,—enclosed in a morocco case lined with silk. The handle of the baton had the following inscription engraved thereon:—"Presented to John Waddington, junr., Esq., by the choir of the Hargreaves Choral Society, Christmas, 1846." The baton was presented by Mr. Charles Anthony, (professor of music, pianist of the Chorlton-upon-Medlock Gentlemen's Glee Club, and also a member of the Hargreaves choir,) in a neat speech, expressive of the high esteem in which Mr. Waddington is held, in both a personal and a professional sense, by the whole choir. Mr. Waddington who was taken quite on surprise, replied with much feeling, declaring that he was totally unprepared for such a splendid mark of respect, but this from no other source could it have come with so much satisfaction to his own feelings, as, with the members of the Hargreaves choir, he had especially laboured to advance the prosperity of the society, and the choral music in the town generally. We believe that the baton, which was made by Mr. Simmons, St. Ann's-Square, is valued at upwards of six guineas, and is the result of a subscription confined entirely to the members of the choir, (many other subscriptions having been refused,) and limited to one shilling each.—Manchester Courier.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PHILADELPHIA.—(Extract from a Letter.)—My dear Friend,—In the greatest possible haste (half-past eleven o'clock at night), I write these few lines, having just heard that the steamer leaves New York to-morrow, at one o'clock. Your letter and printed copy of the Cracovienne have come safely to hand. I will publish it with pleasure; and it is now engraved, waiting your orders. Please let me know exactly the day and hour when you wish it to appear, and if in the power of man, it shall. By the steamer from Boston, you will receive letters and papers, informing you of many events, &c., &c. By the next steamer, you will receive some papers which will please you much. I send you a few now. One thing I tell you—your fame is growing hourly. Mr. Waterman, president of the Philharmonic, told M. De Meyer the other evening at Herz's concert,—"I tell you what it is, there's none of them like Wallace; he has soul, feeling, taste, and skill; his genius I adore: and tell him from me, the first time you write to him, that come when he may—and the sooner the better—he is sure of a whole-souled welcome; and I only keep the chair of our society till he comes to join with heart and hand, in giving him a glorious bumper." The pleasure your first signature, since your departure from this country, gave me it is impossible to describe. Do write soon; I am anxious to have the Cracovienne published.—

No. 52, South 4th Street, Philadelphia, Dec. 27, 1846. C. M.

VIENNA.—The first English concert (assisted entirely by Englishmen), was given at Vienna, on Dec. 13, 1846, by our young countryman, William Streather, harpist, pupil of Parish Alvars. The concert commenced with Mendelssohn's overture to Fingal, performed by the opera band, under the direction of Professor Helmesberger. Mr. Streather performed a concerto in E flat, composed by his master, and a fantasia on melodies from Rienzi; the audience testifying their approbation by calling the young performer before them at the conclusion, and greeting him warmly. Mr. Pratten played a fantasia on the flute, and was much applauded. Mr. Gregg, a pupil of Staudigl, sang Benedict's "Rage thou angry storm," and gave great satisfaction. The concert was very well attended—Meyerbeer, Staudigl, and nearly 150 professors and composers being present; the English Ambassador, Lord Ponsonby and his lady, Prince Esterhazy, and many fashionables honoured the concert with their presence. Mr. Streather will shortly return to London from Vienna, where he has been some time studying under Parish Alvars.—(From a Subscriber.)

PARIS.—Lablache has made his first appearance for the season at the Italiens, in Don Pasquale. Mario has recovered from his illness, and played in the opera. Grisi of course enacted the heroine. The Gazza Ladra is in rehearsal for Grisi, Gardoni, Colletti, and Lablache. Persiani's singing in the Elisir d'Amore is more charming than ever. Carlotta Grisi has left for Rome, where she has an engagement of one month. Liszt's marriage was a report without foundation. Robert Bruce is proceeding slowly; nothing averse to its success, however, has occurred since the first performance. Adolphe Adam has purchased the Cirque Olympique, which will be converted into a third lyric theatre.

MILAN.—The Carnival season has commenced here. The SCALA opened on the 27th ult. with Verdi's Attila, without any great effect. Marini, however, was very fine in the principal character. Moriani and La Tadolini were the other chief executants. Two ballets, a grand and a petit, both failed. Perrot and Fanny Elssler are waited for with impatience, the former has been ill and the public is furious.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MADAME BISHOP commenced her three weeks engagement with Mr. Simpson, Lessee of the theatres of Birmingham, Liverpool, &c., on Monday last. The Maid of Artois was announced at Birmingham for that evening, but could not be produced for want of rehearsals, and Mr. Simpson in consequence, took Madame Bishop to Leamington to sing at a morning concert. On the same evening she sang at Coventry; on Tuesday at Worcester; on Wednesday at the Town Hall, Birmingham; on Thursday at Wolverhampton; and last night she appeared at the Birmingham Theatre in the Maid of Artois. Madame Bishop is creating an immense sensation every where. We have received letters from correspondents at Leamington, Coventry, and Birmingham, all extolling her to the skies. If we were to print all the letters they would fill our journal. We see by the bills and papers that Madame Bishop has followed our suggestion, and invariably sings Meyerbeer's Cavatina, "Come rapida," at the concerts, and invariably receives an encore. She is also encored every where in "John Anderson my Jo," and "Je suis la Bayadere." Madame Bishop was assisted at the Birmingham concerts by Mr. Arthursen, the tenor, and Mr. Corri, the bass. M. Bochsa was also engaged, and played a fantasia of his own composition with very great effect. We shall have more to say anon Madame Bishop's provincial tour next week.

THE RIVAL ITALIAN OPERAS.—The directors of Her Majesty's Theatre, and of the New Italian Opera in Covent Garden, it appears, are making strenuous efforts to open the approaching campaign with éclat. It is announced officially that Covent-Garden Theatre will open the first week in April; Her Majesty's Theatre, we believe, will open some weeks earlier. From the preparations of both parties, there can be no doubt that the entertainments at both houses will be of unprecedented magnificence. While the Covent-Garden company will include Grisi, Persiani, Mario, Tamburini, Salvi, Ronconi, and Marietta Brambilla, the company in the Haymarket will comprise Jenny Lind, Castellan, Lablache, F. Lablache, Gardoni, and Staudigl. Of the engagement of Jenny Lind and of Staudigl we have information which we are assured is correct. The Covent-Garden orchestra, under the direction of Costa, will be of unprecedented strength, besides including the élite of the old Opera band; while on the other hand, Mr. Lumley has been busily recruiting in Germany and France, and has engaged M. Panofka, a Parisian composer and violinist of high talent and reputation, as principal director of the choruses. The approaching competition will necessarily stimulate the efforts of both houses to form a rich and varied repertoire. At both, it is said, some of the greatest works of the German school—including operas of Gluck, Mozart, and Meyerbeer—and likewise works of the older Italian masters—will be brought forward. Covent-Garden is to have a ballet as well as Her Majesty's Theatre. This was not at first expected; but since it is to be so, there will of course be the same rivalry in the ballet as in the opera department. The labours in the rebuilding (as it may almost be called) of Covent-Garden Theatre go on without intermission, and we are told that it will be next in magnitude and splendour to the Scala and the San Carlo. We heartily wish success to both houses, and trust that a fair and honorable competition between them may be good for themselves as well as for the public. At all events, if the preponderance of public patronage shall incline to either, we shall only say, detur digniori!—Daily News.

MRS. BUTLER.—We have it from the best authority to state, that the celebrated actress, Mrs. Butler (Fanny Kemble), will re-appear on the stage. This will indeed be a real boon to the modern stage.—Times.

THE NEW CHRISTMAS PANTOMIME of St. George and the Dragon increases each night in attracting fashionable and crowded audiences to Drury Lane. The private boxes have been filled with the most distinguished families of the aristocracy. The theatre, on Saturday will, doubtless, present a scene of intense excitement, it being "the juvenile night," upon which occasion the pantomime will precede the other attractions, thus affording the younger members of families the opportunity of witnessing the splendours and drolleries of the Christmas annual, and of retiring sufficiently early to allay any parental apprehension of the result of late hours.—Morning Post.

A FALSE REPORT.—"It is stated in a Sunday paper," says the Morning Post, "that some alarm was occasioned last week within Covent Garden Theatre, owing to a portion of the building giving way; but that the architect was sent for, and prompt measures taken to prevent any serious damage. People ought to be careful how they pull old houses about their ears. [There is not a word of truth in the report, which may be accounted for by the paper in question being a known enemy to the establishment. In its swagger about independence, the Sunday Times is too apt to overlook the truth. We have a score to cast up with this magniloquent print which we shall take an early opportunity of effecting.]

ANCIENT BRITONS.—Lord Robert Grosvenor will preside at the 133d festival of the Honorable Society of Ancient Britons, on St. David's Day, which will be celebrated, as usual. The society has experienced a loss in the death of Sir Charles Morgan, one of its vice-presidents, who contributed 50*l.* annually towards the Welsh charity school. The present Baronet, however, follows his example.

PARIS.—The theatres, balls, concerts, exhibitions, and other places of public entertainment, are made to contribute a certain proportion of their receipts towards the relief of the city. The amount of the fund obtained from this source in 1845 was 1,046,526*fr.*

MADAME ANNA BISHOP has been delighting crowded audiences at the Brighton Theatre during the past week. Her singing and acting in the third act of The Maid of Artois, and her fine dramatic and vocal exertions in La Sonnambula, have been greeted with the greatest enthusiasm. The style in which this charming cantatrice rendered the plaintive Scottish ballad, "John Anderson, my Jo," and Rossini's "Tu che accendi," the celebrated cavatina from Tancredi, stamped her as the most finished artiste on the British stage. Her benefit took place on Friday night, upon which occasion every box was taken, and the theatre attended by a full and fashionable audience.—Morning Post.

MR. J. L. HATTON's second entertainment at the Marylebone Literary Institution, Edward Street, took place on Thursday evening. Mr. Hatton still continues his specimens of classical pianoforte music, which, in our estimation, constitute the best portions of the concert. The selections were taken from the works of Corelli, Bach, Handel, Mozart, and Beethoven. Mr. Hatton interpreted the music of these great masters with a true sensibility of their meaning and power. "O Ruddier than the cherry" was given with fine effect by Mr. Hatton, who also introduced songs by Curschmann, Hunnemann, and others. A most excellent entertainment, concluded with "The adventures of Robinson Crusoe," a comic song capably written, and sung with spirit and humour by Mr. Hatton. No lover of true classical music should absent himself from these concerts.

ILLNESS OF MISS FAUCIT.—We regret to say that the sudden illness of Miss Faucit disappointed a large audience last evening. The house was full, including the boxes, when it was announced that Miss Faucit, who was to play Mrs. Haller, was too ill to appear. Of course, the audience immediately rose and departed. We understand that Miss Faucit would have played at any risk, but her physician told her that if she did she would certainly rupture a blood-vessel, and that the consequence might be fatal; and, with judicious imperativeness, he would not allow her to quit her chamber.—Cork Examiner.

DEATH OF MR. HAWKINS, THE VOCALIST.—This gentleman, well known in the musical world as an accomplished vocalist and a good musician, expired on Saturday last, universally regretted. Mr. Hawkins was for many years first alto singer of Westminster Abbey and the Royal Chapel.

DEATH OF MR. W. KEARNS.—This accomplished musician, justly celebrated for his intimate knowledge of the properties of instruments in the orchestra, and distinguished also as a teacher of singing, expired on Monday week, at his residence, Princes Place, Kennington. Mr. Kearns was an Irishman by birth, but has been a resident in the metropolis for thirty years. He was a member of the Philharmonic Society, the Ancient Concerts, and the band of Her Majesty's Theatre. He was a very superior violinist. Mr. Kearns' decease is universally regretted. He has left a large family to deplore his loss.

DEATH OF MR. JOSEPH CALKIN.—Death has been busy of late among musicians. We have to add to the list the demise of the above gentleman, which took place about a fortnight since, at his residence in Pall-mall. Mr. Calkin was one of the tenor players of the Philharmonic band for many years. The Royal Society of Musicians, of which he was a member, are deeply indebted to him for his active exertions in its cause. Mr. Calkin died in his 67th year.

A STAGE VETERAN.—Our old favourite, Deshayes, died lately in Paris. With Deshayes depart the last glories of ancient choregraphic art, which began when Louis XIV.

danced, and was handed down, through Gardel and Noverre, to Deshayes. He was himself the very prototype and living compendium of this art at the time when conventional grace and dreamy poetry were preferred to energy of thought and execution. A more amiable and more courteous personage never existed in the realms of the fantastic toe, nor was he devoid of inventive talent. Her Majesty's Theatre having been indebted to him for Bochsa's celebrated Benyowsky, and several other excellent ballets. Last season he came to visit the beloved precincts again, and being invited to a dinner with Taglioni, Cerito, and many of the first of the light-heeled fraternity, all the memories of his glories were revived, and he had so many toasts on the subject to drink in champagne, that he grew glorious himself afterwards; floated in clouds of dreamy reminiscences, like the heroes of Ossian; and instead of going to bed, strolled into the fields, and nearly broke his neck in a pit. However, he recovered with broken shins, and lived to die amongst his household gods in Paris, loved and esteemed by all who knew him.—Sus.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Mademoiselle Steffanoni, the celebrated prima donna of the Scala at Milan, the San Carlo at Naples, and the Felice at Genoa, has been engaged for this theatre. Report speaks in the highest terms of the artiste's personal attractions and vocal talent.

CROSBY HALL.—Mr. Dando has announced his series of quartet concerts for the present year, for Mondays, Jan. 25, Feb. 8 and 22nd, and March 8; Tuesday, March 23; and Monday, April 5. The quartet will be represented by Messrs. Dando, Gattie, W. Thomas, and Lucas.

MADAME BISHOP sang in three concerts last week at Cheltenham, and on each occasion obtained the most triumphant success I ever witnessed in a concert room. The applause consequent upon each of her efforts was deafening. She was called on to repeat every song but one. She was encored three times in the French ballad, "La Bayadere." This was at once the most graceful and most striking specimen of simple vocalization I ever heard. You can have no notion of the effect it produced. We poor Cheltenham folks considered Madame Bishop, before we had heard her, as merely a bravura singer, the brilliancy of whose voice was not suited to the interpretation of cantabile singing, nor to the rendering of simple melody. We were never more mistaken in our lives. Madame Bishop is the exquisite vocalist, whether she sings the most florid music of the Italian school, or the most unpretending melody. She is, indeed, one of the very greatest singers I ever listened to. Mrs. Alban Croft sang three charming songs very nicely. These songs are from the pen of our talented townswoman, Mrs. Francis Herrick, and speak highly for the musical acquirements of that lady. The poetry is by L. E. L., taken from her "Songs of the heart." The ballads given on this occasion by Mrs. Alban Croft are called, "The Blighted heart," "The wasted heart," and "When the violet bloometh." The concert gave infinite satisfaction. Madame Bishop's singing created an immense sensation in Cheltenham.—(From a Correspondent.)

MISS INVERARITY, the vocalist, died on the 27th December, at Newcastle-on-Tyne, of disease of the lungs. Miss Inverarity was a native of Edinburgh, and was born in March, 1813. She was niece of the Scotch poet, Ferguson. She made her first appearance in London, at Covent-Garden, 1830, in Cinderella. She afterwards appeared in Azor and Zemira and The Maid of Judah with great success. She was an immense favorite at Edinburgh. In 1836, she married Mr. Martyn, the bass-singer, with whom she went to America, where her talents were greatly appreciated.

MADAME D'EICHTHAL, harpist to the Emperor of Austria and Her Majesty the Queen of the Belgians, has arrived in town for the season.

MR. W. VINCENT WALLACE's new opera for Drury-Lane is nearly completed, and will be put into rehearsal forthwith. Rumour already speaks in very high terms of the new composition, by the author of Maritana.

EXETER HALL.—The Messiah was performed, for the third and last time, by the Sacred Harmonic Society on Friday last; the performance calls for no particular notice, offering the same peculiarities of style which had been observable in the Society's exposition of Handel's master-pieces for the last twelve years—the same faults and the same excellences. The principal singers were Madame Caradori Allan, Miss Hawes, Mr. Manvers, and Mr. Phillips. Haydn's Creation is to be played on the 19th and 26th inst., with Miss Birch, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. Phillips for principals. In addition to the engagement of Mendelssohn to conduct the performance of his oratorio, Elijah, in April, the second part of which he has been busily engaged in re-scoring, we understand that arrangements have been entered into with Spohr to conduct three of the Society's performances during the season, on which occasions the works of this great master will be produced under his own immediate superintendence. We cannot but hail with the liveliest pleasure this new feature in the Society's proceedings, and look upon these spirited movements as harbingers of that progress which has for so long a time been desirable in the proceedings of a Society which has already done so much for music, but is yet capable of doing a great deal more.—From a Correspondent.

MADAME BISHOP appeared on Thursday and Friday evenings at the Brighton Theatre, in her favorite part of Isoline in the Maid of Artois, and met with the greatest possible success. She introduced in costume, the grand scena, "Tu che accendi," from Tancredi, during the evening, and sung in addition several popular ballads. Madame Bishop's reception proved the Brighton audiences to be true appreciators of the best style of singing. The Brighton Herald speaks in the most lavish terms of praise of the fair vocalist's talents.—Morning Herald.

THE NEWLY-FOUND PORTRAIT OF SHAKSPERE.—The supposed portrait of Shakspeare, which we announced some weeks since on the credit of the editor of The Builder, to have come into the possession of the Bishop of Ely, has now been seen by our contemporary, as he states, and he is inclined to favour the opinion of its genuineness. It is, he states without the beard, closely resembling the engraving in the folio edition to which were appended Ben Johnson's well-known lines. The painting is on a panel, 1 foot 8 inches by 1 foot 3½ inches—and when found was in an old ebony frame, covered with dirt and disregarded. It was bought for a few shillings, solely on the ground of its likeness to Shakspeare. The date and age (1603, ætat. 39) serving to confirm this impression, were not discovered till afterwards; these are in the left-hand corner of the picture, at the top—in the same position as they are in the portrait of Cornelius Janson, dated 1610.—Athenæum.

THE WIDOW of the late Frederick Cooke, the celebrated tragedian, now resident at St. Louis, U.S., has presented the gold watch of her husband to Mr. Charles Kean.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847.—Studded with delight for country cousins, crowded with the newest polkas, waltzes, and songs, embellished with views of the bal masque and promenade concerts, with the celebrated conductor himself in full fig, white waistcoated, accurately trowered, and neatly bewhiskered, with Flora Fabbri, moreover, rising on tiptoe—in short, as a perfect mirror of all the notabilities of a London season, this book takes precedence of all albums, as M. Jullien himself does of all conductors, both in costume and gesticulation. Young ladies residing in old country houses and in out of the way places, may be expected to scream with ecstasy as they turn over its pages. They will be enabled to dance, to sing, to chat, to criticise, and laugh out of it extempore; wherever it goes it will dissipate gloom, and the dullest parish in England may acquire somewhat of the air of the beau monde from its pages. Need we say more? Jullien's Album must, and will be, included in all country commissions.—Atlas.

HULLAH TESTIMONIAL FUND.—Four concerts, illustrative of English Vocal Music, under the superintendence of Mr. Hullah, are announced to take place, in aid of the erection of a new music hall. This is directing musical energies in the right way. Mr. Hullah, the projector and conductor, is entitled to the praise of all musicians. The first concert takes place on Monday evening next. The programme already issued is on a grand scale. The chorus will consist of Mr. Hullah's upper singing schools.

MADRIGAL SOCIETY.—The 106th anniversary festival will be celebrated on the 21st inst. Lord Saltoun, permanent president of the society, will come from Scotland expressly for the occasion.

THE FAVOURITE VIOLIN of Beethoven is, it is said, to be sold at Hubteldorf, near Vienna; it is an Amati of 1667.

CASE OF COPYRIGHT.—An interesting case of copyright, came before the Jury Court, of the first division of the Court of Session, on Wednesday and Thursday, the 23d and 24th instant, and was as follows:—The late Archibald Constable, publisher, applied to the late Dugald Stewart to furnish preliminary dissertations on mental philosophy, for the supplement to the 4th, 5th, and 6th editions of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and at completion paid him the sum of £1600, being a sum equivalent to double the rate at which Sir Walter Scott, and other distinguished contributors, were remunerated. On the failure of Constable, Adam and Charles Black purchased the property of the "Encyclopædia," and after some years issued a 7th edition, in which the dissertations of Stewart were included, besides being published in a separate form, in common with other treatises furnished to the work—but were in the latter edition withdrawn from sale when the complainant objected. The action was brought by Professor Stewart's son, on the ground that his father had disposed of the dissertation for insertion in the supplement alone, and he craved damages from Messrs. Black, for the copies "piratically" sold by them in the subsequent edition, as well as in a detached shape. The Jury unanimously found for the defendants.

LEOPOLD DE MEYER.—A curious case came before the Fourth Ward Court lately, in relation to the lion pianist. It appeared from the testimony that De Meyer employed a literary gentleman, named Burkhardt, to translate a puff from the German to the English language for the purpose of publishing it in a morning print as an editorial commendation of his performances. Burkhardt charged 25 dollars for his work, but the lion pianist was unwilling to pay more than 10, and hence this suit. It was testified by one individual that the effect of the puff could not be calculated, and that he would be willing to give 50 dollars for such a one previous to giving a concert. The jury sided with the plaintiff, and as it was proved that he had already received 10 dollars, they returned a verdict in his favor of 15 dollars.—New York Evening Post.

THE DISTIN FAMILY.—The Lecture Hall, Greenwich, was crowded to excess on Monday evening, on the occasion of Miss Moriatt O'Connor's concert, at which the above talented family assisted, and mainly contributed to the attraction of the evening. The Messrs. Distin were encored in several morceaux performed on the Sax-horns and Sax-tubas. A trumpet solo by Mr. Distin was greatly applauded, and was repeated. Three glees were excellently rendered by Messrs. Henry, William, and Theodore Distin. Miss Moriatt O'Connor sang two songs with much effect, obtaining a hearty encore in one instance. Miss Baynes accompanied all the vocal pieces with efficiency. We scarcely remember on any former occasions to have seen the Lecture Hall so densely crowded.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A LADY SUBSCRIBER.—(Bridgewater).—We would do anything in our power to meet the wishes of our correspondents—but what CAN we do? Shall we publish her letter, or another one that she may be pleased to write? Seriously, we think our fair subscriber takes too much to heart at the silly expressions made use of in disrespect to herself in a silly country paper, which we again assure her nobody reads but some silly old women who rent cottages in the outskirts of the town where it is published. Leave "Orpheus" to his Eurydice;—she will scratch his eyes out if he continues to misbehave himself, we warrant. DU RESTE, we are at the service of our Bridgewater fair unknown—let her but indicate what course we should pursue, and as the arrow the impulse of the bended bow, shall we follow the bent of her direction.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WARREN'S

20 GUINEA COTTAGE PIANO-FORTES

ARE NOW SELLING AT THE
Manufactory, 71, Leadenhall Street,
(Removed from 1 and 2, Liverpool Street, Bishopsgate Street.)

These Instruments are well manufactured of the best seasoned wood, FINE FULL TONE AND GOOD TOUCH. A two years warranty given with each instrument. ESTABLISHED TWENTY-ONE YEARS. The only house in London where a good sound instrument can be obtained at the above low price, (for cash only). SMALL PROFIT AND QUICK RETURNS!

JOHN WARREN, 71, Leadenhall St., opposite Aldgate Pump

FOR COUGHS, COLDS, IRRITATION OF THE THROAT, HOARSENESS, &c.

PECTORAL EMULSION,

Prepared strictly according to the formula of a distinguished Physician in Paris. This preparation having enjoyed great celebrity for many years on the Continent, as well as undergoing a trial for some time in private practice in this country, is now introduced to the public as the most agreeable, efficacious, and speedy cure for the above affections, relieving the most obstinate Coughs in a few hours. To Singers, Professors, and Public Speakers it will be found invaluable.

PREPARED ONLY BY

TURNER AND SPRATT,

English and Foreign Chymists, 7, TICHBORNE STREET, Haymarket.
In Bottles at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each.—Importers of French Jeunees and Syrups

Mr. and Madame G. A. MACFARREN

Beg to inform their friends and the Public, that they have

REMOVED TO

55, YORK TERRACE, REGENT'S PARK.

JULLIEN'S

NEW DANCE MUSIC FOR THE NEW YEAR.

The British Army Quadrille, the American and Camelia Polkas—Jullien. The Garland Waltz and Casino Polka—König; Adrienne Valse and La fin du Bal Galop—Barret. The above compositions, in addition to being the newest and most fashionable of the day, will be found superior to all others in their applicability to Dancing, the time throughout all of them being carefully marked for that especial purpose.

ROYAL MUSICAL CONSERVATORY,

214, REGENT STREET, and 45, KING STREET.

JULLIEN'S

VOCAL MUSIC FOR THE NEW YEAR.

JUST PUBLISHED:—

"The Preference," and "The Castle and the Cottage," Balfe; Venetian Serrade, Roch Albert; "O how can I smile," Baker; "Go not to the Rhine," Glover; "O meet me in the Flow'ry Dell," Hatton; and "I lov'd thee in these early years," G. Linley. The above new and fashionable compositions, which are admirably adapted for the festive circle, are now being sung with unprecedented success by the most eminent vocalists at the principal concerts in town and country.

ROYAL MUSICAL CONSERVATORY,

214, REGENT STREET, AND 45, KING STREET.

THE "BEAUFORT POLKA,"

(WITH ELEGANT TITLE PAGE.)

Composed and respectfully dedicated (by permission) to the LADY BLANCH SOMERSET, by C. MILBOM, Jun., is just published, at

MILBOM AND SON'S Pianoforte and Music Saloon,

2, ARGYLE STREET, BATH;

And to be had of every Music Seller in London and the United Kingdom.
Solo, 2s.; colored 3s.; Duet, 3s.

NEW MUSIC, BY CLEMENT WHITE.

JUST PUBLISHED, BY P. E. ROWE,

Music Seller, 19, George Street, Plymouth,

And to be had at all the Music Sellers in London.

"Ronald"—Ballad	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	2	d.
"He never can be mine"—Ballad	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	2	0
"Waiting for thee"—Serenade	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	2	0

MEDICAL GALVANISM.

HORNE, THORNTWATTE, & WOOD, Successors to E. PALMER, 123, Newgate-street, in submitting their improved ELECTRO-GALVANIC MACHINES, beg to state, that they have availed themselves of the discoveries of De la Rive, Faraday, Smee, and others, by which they are enabled to construct a coil with all the required intensity and quantity of electricity for medical use, thereby effecting both a saving of expense and trouble to the invalid, and placing in his hands an effective, powerful, and simple instrument, that may be excited at a minute's notice, and without trouble.—Price, £3. 3s.; £3. 10s.; and £5. 5s.

PHILOSOPHICAL APPARATUS.—Every description of Apparatus connected with Chemistry, Hydraulics, Hydrostatics, Pneumatics, Frictional and Voltaic Electricity, Electro-Magnetism, Electro-Metallurgy, Optics, (including the Dissolving Views, Photography, &c.) manufactured and sold by Horne, Thornthwaite and Wood, successors to Edward Palmer, 123, Newgate Street, London.

Foreign orders, enclosing a remittance or order for payment in London, promptly attended to.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE

Is acknowledged as the best specific after three years' trial, for improving the voice and removing all affections of the throat, strongly recommended to clergymen, singers, actors, public speakers, and all persons subject to relaxed throats.

The Proprietors have just received the following Testimonial, amongst many others, from MADAME ANNA BISHOP:—

"DEAR SIR,—I am happy to say that all I have heard respecting the efficacy of DR. STOLBERG'S celebrated LOZENGES is perfectly true. As yesterday, feeling myself very fatigued (singing nightly at the Theatre), I took several of the Lozenges, and my voice was very clear, and my throat quite free from relaxation. I am, Dear Sir, Yours truly,

ANNA BISHOP."

"18th November 1816.—Jermyn Street."

Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Churchyard; W. Edwards and Newbery and Sons, St. Paul's Churchyard; Sanger, and Dietrichsen and Hannay, Oxford-street; and retail by all respectable Chymists in the Kingdom.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM

FOR 1847,

A most beautiful Christmas Present, New Year's Gift, and Etrennes.

M. JULLIEN

Has the honor to announce that his

MUSICAL ANNUAL FOR 1847

Is now Published, and is by far the best work of the kind that has ever appeared; contains no less than

THIRTY PIECES OF VOCAL AND FOURTEEN OF INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC,

The greater part of which have never before been published, the copyrights having been purchased expressly for this work, at an immense cost, with the view of rendering it immeasurably superior to any of its predecessors.

The portion which has already appeared comprise those pieces only whose decided success has induced M. JULLIEN, at the request of numerous influential patrons, to include them in this Selection.

The Illustrations, in addition to the elaborately executed Covers, Title, and Dedication pages, include

TWO MAGNIFICENT VIEWS

OF THE

Interior of Covent-Garden Theatre,

The one taken during the brilliant scene exhibited in that splendid arena of the occasion of M. JULLIEN'S GRAND BAL MASQUE; the other a VIEW OF THE THEATRE TAKEN DURING THE CONCERTS, the grouping of the Figures in both Views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant. To those who have visited the Theatre on either occasion, the ALBUM will form a delightful Souvenir, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of the gorgeous scene.

A SPLENDIDLY-COLOURED

PORTRAIT

Of the celebrated Danseuse,

MADLE. FLORA FABRI.

In the admired Pas, LA CASTIGLIANA.

AN ORIGINAL SUBJECT,

"THE FORTUNE TELLER,"

Illustrating BAKER's beautiful Ballad of that name.

The whole of this department of the ALBUM has been under the active superintendence of J. BRANDARD, Esq., whose pencil only has been employed in its production.

Nothing more need be said in favour of this ALBUM, and in proof of its vast superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the Contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe: viz.

ROSSINI,	VERDI,	DONIZETTI,	RUBINI,
ROCH-ALBERT,	HÖLZELL,	GOLDBERG,	SCHIRA,
SCHULZ,	STÖPEL,	DUPREZ,	JOSE GOMIS,
MASARNAU,	MARATZEK,	BALFE,	JULLIEN,
HATTON,	BARRET,	ALEXANDER LEE,	KÖNIG,
KNIGHT,	BAKER,	FARMER,	LINLEY,
LAKE,	FITZBALL,	MOULD,	HURREY,
FOREST,	ALBERT SMITH,	DESMOND RYAN,	&c.

It will thus be perceived that in addition to the latest compositions of the best English Composers, the ALBUM will contain some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany, France, Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting the attention of the Continental dilettanti.

PRICE 18s. and £1. 1s.

ROYAL CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC

214, REGENT-STREET, AND 45, KING-STREET.

Sovereign LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY,

No. 5, ST. JAMES'S STREET,
LONDON.

Trustees.

Sir A. Brydges Henniker, Bart.
B. Bond Calvert, Esq., M.P.

Henry Pownall, Esq.,
Claude Edward Scott, Esq.

Directors.

CHAIRMAN, Lieutenant-Colonel Lord
Arthur Lennox.
DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN, T. C. Granger,
Esq., M.P.
John Ashburner, Esq., M.D.
T. M. B. Batard, Esq.
Philip P. Blyth, Esq.

Henry Broadwood, Esq., M.P.
Sir James Carmichael, Bart.
Charles Farebrother, Esq., Alderman.
William Tulloh Fraser, Esq.
John Gardiner, Esq.
Aaron Asher Goldsmid, Esq.
Henry William Pownall, Esq.

Assurances granted on favourable terms.
The Rates of Premium, of which the following are specimens, are on the lowest scale consistent with security:—

Annual Premiums for Assuring £100.

Age.	For One Year.	For Seven Years.	For Whole Life.
£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
20	1 1 0	1 1 8	1 13 7

A new plan of Accumulative Assurance, by depositing instead of paying Premiums, thus:—

By the Deposit Plan, commencing at the age 20, £40 per Annum secures the assured at the age of	£ s. d.
20 a Policy for.....	949 10 4
30 ".....	1779 1 0
40 ".....	2495 0 0
50 ".....	3111 18 8
60 ".....	3650 0 0

Deferred Annuities, to commence at any specified age, granted either with or without return of the Premiums, in case the age at which the annuity is to commence is not attained.

H. D. DAVENPORT, Secretary.

EXETER HALL.

ENGLISH VOCAL MUSIC.

The Committee of the Hullah Testimonial Fund, beg leave to announce a series of

FOUR CONCERTS

Illustrative of the History of English Vocal Music.

A NEW ORGAN

Will be erected by Mr. Robson, expressly for these Concerts. An Orchestra will be provided for the second, third, and fourth Concerts.

THE FIRST CONCERT

Will be held on

MONDAY NEXT, JANUARY 18,
At eight o'clock.

Principal Vocal Performers—Miss RAINFORTH, Miss DOLBY,
MR. MANVERS, and MR. LEFFLER.

Tickets—Ages, 2s.; for the Series, 6s. Western Gallery, 3s. 6d.; for the Series, 10s. 6d. Reserved Seats, 7s.; for the Series, £1 1s. May be procured of Mr. Parker, Publisher, 445, West Strand; of the principal Music Sellers; and at 101, St. Martin's Lane.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

The nobility, gentry, and public are respectfully informed, that the
NEW THEATRE

Will Open the first Week in April,

For the performance of the

LYRICAL DRAMA.

On a scale of efficiency in every department never before attempted in this country.

THE BALLET

Will include the names of the most celebrated artists. The prospectus for the arrangement of the season will be issued in due course. Mr. Boake, Director.
January 9th, 1847.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, at the "Nassau Steam Press," by WILLIAM SPENCER JOHNSON, 60, St. Martin's Lane, in the parish of St. Martin's in the Fields, in the County of Middlesex; where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed post paid. To be had of G. Purkiss, Dean Street, Soho; Strange, Paternoster Row; Wisheart, Dublin; and all Book-sellers.—Saturday, January 16th, 1847.

The Musical World.

(PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT NOON.)

A RECORD OF THE THEATRES, MUSIC, LITERATURE, FINE ARTS,
FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE, &c.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s. Stamped; 12s. Unstamped; to be forwarded by Money Order or Postage Stamps to the Publisher, W. S. Johnson, "Nassau Steam Press," 60, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross.

Each Subscriber is entitled to an Admission to an Annual Concert, and a Piece of Music, (regular Music size) Monthly.

No. 4.—VOL. XXII.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1847.

PRICE THREEPENCE
STAMPED, FOURPENCE

NOTICE!

Our Subscribers will be presented with No. 5, A GRAND TRIUMPHAL MARCH, composed expressly for this Journal, by M. MOSCHELES.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

THE manager of this establishment has politely furnished us with a written copy of the prospectus he intends to issue of the arrangements for the coming season. It is with uncooled pleasure that we select the principal points in this document for the information of our readers. Viewing it as a whole, there has never been in our memory of the Opera a programme so thoroughly interesting in a musical point of view. Hitherto directors have imagined that, provided there was a brilliant array of executive talent in their prospectuses, it mattered not one straw what was the quality of the music to be executed. In the written programme before us we find that Mr. Lumley has considered it expedient to adopt quite another view, and so fully are we persuaded of its soundness, that we at once tender him our congratulations and our heartiest wishes for his success. But we must not, in our zeal for Mr. Lumley's new politics, endeavour to blink the fact that opposition has had a beneficial interest in promoting them. Mr. Lumley, it is true, has been the resuscitator of the Italian Opera in this country. He found it tottering and decayed; he renovated and made it weatherproof. He found it out of credit and in ill odor; he restored it to integrity and reputation. He found ill-paid and unpaid artists, an interior in disorder, a band and chorus in revolt, shabbiness and poverty rampant within the walls, and as with the wand of an enchanter, he turned all this topsy-turvy, made that which was bad good, that which was shabby decent, that which was poor wealthy. The ill-paid artists he turned to millionaires, the unpaid he made comfortable citizens. The disorder of the interior he marshalled into symmetry and regularity, the band and chorus he reduced to discipline and raised to perfection and magnificence, and the whole establishment he as completely changed, as when in a pantomime or Easter spectacle, the scene, which was a dark cavern, vanishes away and gives place to a gorgeous palace in fairy land. Mr. Lumley, it must not be denied, effected all this, and at the same time benefited himself, carved out a position among the great ones of the earth, nourished himself with rich wines and juicy viands, and clad in ermine, walked per alta. And who shall blame him? The labourer is worthy of his hire, and Mr. Lumley has nobly earned his position. Yet in all that he did we had reason to remark no change in the musical politics of his predecessors. He differed from them inasmuch as that he gave sumptuous entertainments and paid the cost to a fraction:

whereas they gave but meagre fare, and left even that unliquidated, hungry creditors in vain crying, "give, give!" at the porch. Herein he merits all the eulogy that has been bestowed upon him. Nor can we overlook the splendid condition to which Mr. Lumley has raised the ballet at his establishment, and the rare diplomacy by means of which he has effected what, until his advent, was the utter despair of managers:—viz., the simultaneous co-operation, in one entertainment, on the same night (the importance of the subject will excuse the tautology) of the great luminaries of Terpsichore. At first, Mr. Lumley contrived to bring Fanny Elssler and Cerito—the one in the prime of her reputation, the other in the dawn of her celebrity—together, in a pas de deux. This naturally created a furor, and utterly bewildered the stalls and the Omnibus. But the consummation of this policy in the Pas de Quatre, when Marie Taglioni, Lucile Grahn, Fanny Cerito, and Carlotta Grisi consented to abandon their solitary spheres of despotism, and unite in one republic for the administration of delight to the habitués of Her Majesty's Theatre—and moreover, the persistence in this policy, exemplified in the brilliant Pas de Déeses, were triumphs of managerial tactics, of which Mr. Lumley had every reason to be proud, little Perrot's share in the transaction being equally considered. In this also Mr. Lumley rose above all the managers that had gone before him.

But, in the written prospectus which lies upon our table, the Ultima Thule of a musical manager's aspirations (or at least what should be so) is shadowed forth in portentous prophecy. The greatest composer in the world has consented to write an opera, on the subject of one of Shakspeare's undying plays, and this will be interpreted by singers, and an orchestra and chorus worthy of the task, under the immediate direction of the author. Here then we are forced to congratulate ourselves and without risk of being dubbed egotists. At the trying moment, when a vast and organized opposition threatens the perdition of Her Majesty's Theatre, to whom does the manager fly for aid, to whom does he address himself to rescue him from danger? Reader, we tell you a truth—for it is written on the forehead of the manuscript prospectus that has been placed in our hands—the weapon which Mr. Lumley will use in his defence, the sword that he will brandish in the visage of his enemies, assumes the shape of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, the king of modern German musicians. This is our answer to the scoffers who have laughed at us for advocating the necessity of resorting to some such measure to serve as a staff for the Italian Opera, which of late years has been gradually dying of its own dullness. Cimarosa and Paisiello could sustain the Opera on its legs—Rossini could do it also, and without assistance—Mercadante, Donizetti, and Bellini, could effect it after a manner—but Verdi, and the like of him, cannot. The disease of the Italian Opera has grown into a head, and Verdi is the fungus to which all the bad humours have flowed from the various parts. To re-establish health, this fungus must be lopped off, and a wholesome plaster be applied. The plaster will be Mendelssohn—but beware of applying it before the cancerous tumor, in which all the most virulent poisons of the disease are concentrated, be removed. It will not do for Mendelssohn to patch up Verdi—he must sit upon his vacant throne. Verdi must abdicate and Mendelssohn reign in his stead. But let us proceed to speak of the written prospectus in detail.

We shall follow the written prospectus in the order of its arrangement. It commences with a list of the engagements for the operatic department. The first of these is the celebrated Jenny Lind, who, apparently disregarding of the menaced law-suit of a rival manager, has made up her mind to place her reputation at the tribunal of an English public. Report has been busy on this matter. Some have it, that the debut specified in Mr. Bunn's engagement with Jenny Lind is so large as to render it incompatible with the interests of Her Majesty's Theatre for Mr. Lumley to pay it. Others affirm that the engagement has been assigned by purchase from Mr. Bunn to the Covent Garden speculators. But the majority assume that there is no stipulated fine in the original engagement with the Drury Lane manager, and that, in consequence, when Jenny Lind has appeared at Her Majesty's Theatre, an action for damages will be laid by Mr. Bunn, or the holders of the engagement, whoever they may happen to be at the time. Be this as it may, we have had ocular evidence, in the Swedish nightingale's own handwriting, that she considers herself engaged to Mr. Lumley, and the inference to be drawn can only be that she intends to risk the consequences, whatever may come of it. In which case the public will be the gainers, and Mr. Lumley entitled to an acknowledgment of his bold and enterprising speculativeness. The other cantatrice of note is the modest and talented Made. Castellan, who will always find admirers, while the combination of unassuming manners and artistic power, in the person of a young and charming female, shall be found worthy of attention. Made. Del Carmen Montenegro, a Spanish artist, not unknown to this country—Mlle. Sanchioli, who during the whole of last season supported the abuse of the Chronicle and the flattery of the Post with perfect equanimity—Signora Vietti, a new contralto—Mad. Daria Nascis, and Mlle. Tagioni, also unknown here, complete the catalogue of female vocalists. The list of the male singers is unusually strong:—Signor Fraschini, the tenor from the San Carlo at Naples, in whose favour fame has blown loud flourishes, with a trumpet of many valves—Signor Gardoni, from the Académie Royale in Paris, whom we have both heard and seen, and to whose fine talent and prepossessing appearance we can bear testimony—Signor Superchi, a baritone, for whom it is said (as though it were a matter of some importance) that Verdi wrote the opera of Ernani—Signor Coletti, a bass, who since the season he passed in London five years ago, has earned a large meed of fame in Italy and France—Herr Staudigl, whose venture on the Italian stage cannot but be a matter of lively interest to his London friends—Frederic Lablache, whose improvement lately has induced us to entertain hopes that eventually he may supply the place of his great progenitor—Signor Corelli, a useful second tenor, well known to the habitués of Her Majesty's Theatre—and lastly the great Lablache himself, the hero of a thousand triumphs, incontestably the most consummate artist of the day. Nothing could well be stronger than this, and we do not expect that even the Morning Chronicle will be disposed to direct its artillery against so compact and well-appointed a phalanx. So much for the vocalists.

But we have yet more particulars to record about the opera department. One promise we shall dismiss without comment:—Signor Verdi, having recovered from his indisposition, has been for some time engaged on the composition of an opera, the subject of which is founded upon the Robbers of Schiller. Better than this, the Robert Bruce, which has been unhandsomely fathered upon Rossini, but which is interesting on its own account, will be presented early in the season. Better still, Meyerbeer is coming to preside at the rehearsals of his Camp of Silesia, in which Jenny Lind and Fraschini will sustain principal characters. Report dilates in glowing terms upon an air in this opera in which the celebrated vocalist and the flauto primo contend in a skirmish of florid incredibilities of execution; a Meyerbeerian version of the famous scene in Le Brun's Rossiniol. The presence of Meyerbeer will be an immense stimulus to the perfect execution of his work. He is known to be a most particular and exacting director, and one not likely to let a single error pass without correction. No fears need be entertained of the hurried production of the Camp of Silesia, while Meyerbeer is at hand to watch its progress in rehearsal. This must be regarded as one of the grand points of the season. But a still grander remains to be recorded—that which was shadowed forth in our preamble. Mr. Lumley has prevailed upon Dr. Mendelssohn to compose music to a libretto of Scribe, founded on the Tempest of Shakspeare. The opera is to be produced at Her Majesty's Theatre, with Jenny Lind as Miranda, Staudigl as Caliban, Gardoni as Ferdinand, and Lablache as Prospero. To dilate upon this would be superfluous. The appearance of an opera from the pen of Mendelssohn, as the Morning Herald justly remarks, will form an epoch in the history of music. Since the composition of Fidelio no event of such importance to the art has occurred. It will be hailed with acclamations by the musical world, as the appearance of a new planet in the system of which Mendelssohn is the bright and burning sun. Mr. Lumley deserves the thanks, not only of the immediate followers of the musical profession, but of the civilized world at large. He has been the means of gifting the art with a new truth—another stone in the great spiritual edifice which the master-minds of music have been rearing since its infancy. The opera of Mendelssohn will be all this, for the composer of Elijah cannot afford to retrograde. Add to these a repertoire of the popular works of Mozart, Cimarosa, Rossini, Mercadante, Donizetti, and Bellini, and a richer feast of anticipation never welcomed the gaze of an undecided subscriber reading his prospectus.

The orchestra is next to be considered. On this point we have reason to believe that Mr. Lumley has vanquished one of his chiefest difficulties. He has, by a large amount of exotic assistance, added to three and twenty staunch veterans who would not, or as the Chronicle insists (which we do not insist), could not go to the new establishment, contrived to bring together an orchestra of magnificent pretensions. Besides Tolbecque, the leader of the opera, Nadaud, leader of the ballet, and other scions of the ancient stock, the following foreign stars (among numerous others) have been secured:—first oboe, Lavigne, from Brussels, (excellent); first clarinet, Dell' Uomo, (from Milan); first contra-basso, Anglois, (Turin); first violoncello, Piatti; first bassoon, Koesel and Templini; (both are put down as first); first flute, Elie, (Paris); first trumpet, Zeiss; (Brussels, admirable):—and many others too numerous to mention. That this large influx of foreigners, who may be regarded as perpetually fixed in the country is much to be regretted, no one who considers the subject can doubt. It will help to impoverish still further a very impoverished class, by dividing their already slender resources. But what was Mr. Lumley to do? The Opera cannot exist without a band, and band-compilers for Italian operas have no faith in English professors. We are sure that neither Signor Costa, nor the seceders (or "the rebels," as the Post facetiously terms them) foresaw this inevitable result of the secession from the dominion of Mr. Lumley. Alas! to think of what changes may be made in a few years in the physiognomical surface presented by our orchestras at the Philharmonic, the Ancients, Exeter Hall, and the Provincial Festivals! How many veterans will be set aside for new comers and whiskered parvenus, who shall say? But this is now unavoidable and our artists must be on the look out: Mr. Willy must hoist a standard and all the "natives" will flock to him as to a captain. He, perhaps, may lead them on to victory.

The chorus engaged by Mr. Lumley amounts to about eighty in number, and to the fresh voices and efficiency of these we had an opportunity of testifying the other night, when we heard them execute several compositions under the direction of our excellent friend, Balfe.

That Balfe continues to occupy the post of conductor of the orchestra is a fact on which we congratulate the Opera frequenters, in the teeth of the Chronicle. We consider him eminently qualified for the position, and nothing we have heard or seen has had any influence in persuading us to the contrary. Moreover, Balfe is a zealous and conscientious artist and labours hard in his vocation. And, to conclude, Balfe's name is European and would confer honour upon any lyrical establishment whatever.

The Ballet must be shortly dismissed. Here, indeed, Mr. Lumley is fortified on all sides, and is as unassailable as the Castle of Ehrenbreitstein, on the Rhine. The queens of the ballet are to be Lucile Grahn, Cerito, and Carlotta Grisi. This last engagement is another source of congratulation to ourselves—for have we not often said that the opera without Carlotta was as the heavens at night without the moon? But now we have the moon and all the stars, and strong hopes even of the sun—of Taglioni, who will once more, it is anticipated, (would that we could say it was certain) dance in the Pas de Quatre, and the Pas de Déeses, and in another Pas, which is to out-pas all Pas that have preceded it—the Pas de la Constellation, another child of Perrot's brilliant fancy. Then, moreover, we are to have a new planet in the system—Carolina Rosati from Milan, of whom report speaks, as the Post would say, egregiously. Besides these, a Madlle. Maurthier, (from Milan) whom we are assured is a full moon of beauty, and whom the Post declares to resemble one of Correggio's soft-eyed, rosy-shouldered nymphs; and to conclude; Madame Petit Stephan, Mdle. Caroline Bancourt, Mdle. Honoré, Mdle. Elise Montfort, Mesdames Thévenot, Julian, L'Amoureux, Emilie, Fanny Pascal, Bertin, and a host of minor satellites. The male dancers will include the inimitable Perrot, St. Léon, a certain M. Louis D'Or, (who, by rights, should be wedded to Mdle. L'Amoureux), MM. Gosselin, Venafr, Gouriet, Bertrand, and who not? The ballet-masters will be M. Paul Taglioni, and M. Perrot. The ballet composer, as usual, Signor Pugni.

Among the novelties of the season is to be a ballet, written expressly for Her Majesty's Theatre by Heinrich Heine, the poet, the object of which, according to the Post, is by seeking for a subject among the German black-letter folios, "to unite the mysticism of Goethe with the peculiarities of the modern ballet"—a singular means to produce a singular end, neither of which do we presume to understand.

The theatre will open in the middle of next month, with Donizetti's La Favorite, in which Gardoni will make his first appearance—and a new ballet by Paul Taglioni, which will be illustrated by the début of Carolina Rosati.

All this is plainly set down in the written prospectus which has been supplied to us. We have not interpolated one word, exaggerated one promise. If all be fulfilled as is here sketched out, who can doubt that Her Majesty's Theatre will have a brilliant season, and Mr. Lumley a new triumph?

MEMOIR OF PALESTRINA.

GIOVANNI PIERLUIGI, surnamed Di Palestrina, from the small town of that name in the principality of Rome, where he was born, was one of the most illustrious musicians of his time. Spite of his claims to the reverence of posterity, the name of his family, the circumstances of his parents, the date of his birth and death, are subjects of doubt and discussion. M. L'Abbé Baini, director of the pontifical chapel, expended his time in laborious researches respecting the life and works of Palestrina. Thirty years, however, employed in the task did not always conduce to the discovery of incontestable truth; and the Abbé himself is frequently reduced to relate contradictory traditions, and to discuss and leave undecided questions so long agitated. The utmost result of M. Baini's efforts seems to be that the parents of Pierluigi were indigent, that he died early in February, 1594, at the age of 70, and consequently that he was born in 1524. There is reason to suppose that he prosecuted his first literary and musical studies in quality of a choir-boy. According to Pettrini, he arrived at Rome in 1540, in order to apply himself to the study of music. At this period the best musicians of Italy were French, Belgians, or Spaniards. The first regular school of music instituted at Rome by Gondimel, had for contemporary disciples Giovanni Annimuccia, Stephano Bettini, Alessandro Merlo, and Giovanni Pierluigi di Palestrina, the most celebrated among the composers. In September, 1551, under the pontificate of Jules the Third, he was chosen master of the choir-children of the Giulia chapel at 17 years of age. By a special decree of the chapter, the title of chapel-master was conferred upon Palestrina, the first time it was bestowed upon any one holding the situation of director of the choir-children. In 1554 he published the first selection of his compositions, in which were found four masses for four voices, and one for five. Submitting himself to the influence of the school in which he was educated, Palestrina wrote these masses in the style of his predecessors, but exhibited in the composition a superior mode of harmonic treatment. In this respect, the first mass, which is written entirely upon the ancient chant, Ecco Sacerdos Magnus, may be considered a work of great excellence for the period, although this mass, as well as the last, is disfigured by that extreme endeavour after the minute proportions of notation, of which the ancient masters of the French and Flemish schools made a monstrous abuse, about the end of the fourteenth and commencement of the fifteenth century. Pope Jules the Third, to whom Palestrina dedicated his first book of masses, recompensed him by entering him among the choristers of the pontifical chapel without examination, and contrary to the rules of the chapel, the strictness of which he himself enforced by a former decree. The superior talent which was apparent in this first work, seemed to the sovereign pontiff motive sufficient for an exception. His suit was signified to the college of the chapel singers on the 13th of January, 1555; but, unfortunately, Palestrina had more genius than voice, and this circumstance exposed him to the jests of the other singers, who admired him on compulsion, and conferred on him with bad grace the usages of politeness. Jules the Third expired on the 23rd of March, 1555; Palestrina was then deprived of the high protection which defended him against the malevolence of the college, about five weeks after his admission into the chapel. The succeeding pope, Marcellus the Second, was well inclined towards Palestrina, and would have proved a prop of support to him had he lived. The death of Marcellus, which took place twenty-three days after his succession to the apostolic chair, was but the precursor of more lively griefs than had heretofore troubled the existence of the composer. Palestrina was married early. He had four sons, three of whom died in their youth. Hygin, the surviving son, was editor of the two last books of his father's masses. After the death of Pope Marcellus, his successor, Giovanni Caraffa, who ruled the church under the title of Paul the Fourth, summoned resolution to attempt effecting a reformation in the clergy of the court of Rome. His attention was first directed to the pontifical chapel, among whose singers were found many married men, contrary to the existing ecclesiastical law. These singers were, Leonardo Barré, Domenico Ferabosco, and Palestrina. From the moment of his admission the latter found little sympathy among his colleagues; nevertheless, as soon as the Pope ordered his expulsion from the chapel with the other two, the college took up his defence, in conjunction with that of Barré and Ferabosco, and strongly represented that they had given up advantageous posts for their situations, and that their appointments at the chapel had been stipulated as lasting for life. Spite of all argument and remonstrance, the inflexible Paul did not the less persist in his determination to expel married singers from his chapel, and issued an express decree on the subject in stern and humiliating terms. The only compensation offered to the expelled musicians for their loss was a pension of three crowns each per month. Overpowered by this calamity, Palestrina fell ill. In this situation his ancient colleagues came to see him, abjured the hate they had formerly shown to him, and became his most zealous friends. So celebrated a musician could not remain long without employment in a city containing so many splendid churches, in which music flourished triumphantly. He was offered the place of chapel-master of the Santo Giovanni di Lateran, to replace Luppachino, and he entered on his office in this cathedral on the first day of October, 1555, two months after his expulsion from the pontifical chapel. On this occasion a difficulty presented itself regarding the pension he had received from the Pope, which, according to precedent, would cease from the moment the pensioner entered upon any new employment. The chapter, nevertheless, decided that the pension should be continued, and the Pope himself confirmed the decision. Palestrina remained chapel-master in the church for five years, and during that period composed some of his best works,—among which we may mention his admirable Improperii for the office of Holy Week. The salary of his situation was so trifling that he was induced to accept the post of chapel-master of the Santa-Maria Maggiore, of which he took possession on the 1st of March, 1564, and which he held until the 31st of March, 1571. These ten years constituted the most brilliant epoch in the life of the master.

(To be continued.)

MADAME BISHOP IN THE PROVINCES.

(From the Birmingham Journal.)

January 16th

THE début of this famed cantatrice, who has reaped the richest laurels even in the land of song, has been most successful. On Wednesday evening she appeared at the Town Hall, and at once established herself in the good opinion of the audience, and taught even the initiated amongst her hearers of what music is capable, and that though the means of enjoyment have been well ransacked, there may be another new pleasure left. The audience was not so numerous as we expected, but the enthusiasm was unbounded. An overture and a tenor air protracted the appearance of the lady, and whetted curiosity. When she appeared, the applause was tremendous, and must have been gratifying to the interesting debutante. A brief sketch of her personale may not be unacceptable. She is rather below the middle height, and approaches that standard which, as loyal subjects, we are bound to consider a good one, which the altitude of our Queen has furnished. Her figure is compact and elegant; her face intellectual rather than beautiful, the fire of her dark eye lighting up the quiescence of her features. Her head is small, her forehead square, compact, and well developed. Her eyes are singularly expressive—sparkling, frowning, and laughing, and reflecting every phase of feeling. That prominent feature, of which, excepting in the case of ideal ladies, the less that is said about it the better, is, in this case, rather aspiring in its character, and gives the lady's face an air of unquestionable good humour. She dresses with exquisite taste, and withal has a lady-like deportment, winning grace, and dignity of manner. Such is this prima donna. Of her vocal powers it is less easy to speak in the calmness of every-day compliment. Her opening piece was a cavatina from Donizetti's "Ugo di Parigi," difficult of execution, but in the air prodigal of beauties. Her execution of the recitative at once placed us at ease as to her capabilities both of voice and execution. The former, as our readers are already aware, is a pure soprano, of great compass and richness, rather than the more insipid quality of sweetness. Her upper notes remind us of the luscious roundness of the tones of a flute, and the middle register is especially voluptuous. Her voice is not possessed of that bell-like clearness so frequently found in soprano voices, but has what may be called a veiled quality, which adds to its power, and the gorgeousness of its effects. Her execution is remarkably perfect—characterised by neatness in the introduction of her embellishments, of which she is occasionally lavish; and her execution of floritures is no less finished and artistic. In the cavatina we have mentioned, her chromatic runs were executed with surprising certainty and taste. She leaps from octave to octave with ease, and produces an effect startling and delightful. Her falls are particularly beautiful and occasionally she introduces a half note, which melts away into a flood of the most harmonious embellishments, and then glides almost insensibly into the note upon which she has so tastefully dwelt. The romance from the opera of "Loretta," "On the banks of Guadalquivir," a delightful snatch of melody, developed the superb character of her swell, and the beauty of her modulation. This air was vociferously encored. The next cavatina, by Meyerbeer, "Ah, come rapida," evoked her histrionic powers. In the third movement, where the action of the libretto is spirited, she displayed great energy and fervour of feeling. It is scarcely necessary to say, that it is not reasonable to expect that a vocalist proficient in the florid ornaments of the Donizetti school of music can do justice to the simple and unadorned ballads to which Burns loved to wed his matchless poetry. Yet "John Anderson, my Jo" was thus treated. This requires something approaching to genius. We have repeatedly heard this beautiful and touching air, which tradition tells us was at one time a chant in the "haly kirk," sung by the bright particular stars of ballad singing, but until Wednesday night we had no conception of the pathos of the music or the potency of the verse. Madame Bishop's execution of it was toned to the very essence of pathos. No extraneous ornament was introduced; it was given in its unadorned loveliness, and at the "rest" which immediately precedes the close of the air, the most intense sympathy was manifested, and rendered the succeeding burst of applause absolutely deafening. It is such music as this that fulfils the high purposes of the art, but its true interpretation is rarely met with. The shadow of the noble monument that covers the resting-place of the poet; the storied urn and animated bust that endeavour to perpetuate the image of one of Nature's noblest sons, would not yield the poet so much delight as could the glorious exposition of his sentiments, as given by Madame Bishop, if he were cognisant of the events of this nether world. No wonder that the hall rung with reiterated plaudits, and little marvel is it that the echo of the melody still plays upon our memory. The quaint and pretty French air, "Je suis la Bayadere," in which she accompanied herself on the tambourine, assisted by the harp of M. Bochsa, formed a pleasing finale to a very delightful concert. The voice of Mr. Arthurson, who assisted, is a high-pitched tenor, limited in compass, and deficient in expression. His style is cold and inanimate, and though there is a degree of sweetness in his notes, they are bald and colourless. Mr. Corri's pipe is a comical one, uncommonly harsh and most perseveringly monotonous. We need scarcely add, that M. Bochsa's fantasia on the harp was a luscious piece of instrumentation; occasionally giving forth tones like the breathing of Shakspeare's Ariel, then swelling into the majestic harmony of a full orchestra, and again in fitful sweeps and gusts giving expression to strains wild, brilliant, or plaintive.

MONS. JULES DE GLIMES, the fashionable conductor and vocal professor, arrived in London, from Brussels, on Wednesday.

The "Maid of Artois," at the Theatre on Friday night, afforded us an opportunity of judging of the histrionic powers of the gifted lady. Madame Bishop's execution of her part was marvellously perfect. The first scena is a difficult piece and by no means pleasing, yet she masters it effectively, and again at once carried with her the sympathy of her auditory. In the second part there is a pleasing though not an original melody, "Oh, what a charm." This she sang with characteristic simplicity. Her triumph, however, was in the last act, where weary and athirst she resigns herself to death. The air, "Oh, beautiful night," was sung with most exquisite pathos, and the grand finale, so complicated in its construction, and magnificent in its effects, was delivered with that finished grace, and buoyancy and brilliancy of voice, which forms so prominent a feature in the style of the accomplished artiste. We observe that she appears again in the same opera on Tuesday, when we counsel the attendance of all lovers of the divine art.

MUSIC AT MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

On Thursday last the following sacred selection was given at the third concert for the present season of the Hargreaves Choral Society. The night was intensely cold and foggy—the cold was in some degree mitigated by the Free Trade Hall being so well filled—but neither the bright glances of the fairer portion of the audience, nor the brilliancy of the gas lights could dispel the gloom that was caused by the fog—and this threw such a damp on the concert that the first part passed off very heavily indeed, and must have no little tended to discourage the artists engaged.

PART FIRST.
Overture.....	"St. Paul"..... Mendelssohn.
Chorus....	"Lord, thou alone art God".... (St. Paul) .. Mendelssohn.
Recitative....	"Deeper and deeper still" }..... (Jephtha).... Handel.
Air.....	"Wait her angels"..... }
Air.....	"Return O God of Hosts"..... (Samson).... Handel
Chorus.....	"To dust his glory"..... }
Song.....	"Ave Maria"..... Cherubini.
(Clarinet Obligato, Mr. Leonard.)
Motet (full choir).....	"Sanctus"..... Palestrina.
Christmas Hymn....	"Adeste Fideles"..... Arranged by Novello.
Duet.....	"Forake me not".... (The Last Judgment) Spohr.
Song.....	"Honour and arms"..... (Samson)..... Handel.
Chorus.....	"With thunder armed"..... (Samson)..... Handel.
PART SECOND.
Motet.....	"Praise Jehovah"..... Mozart.
Recitative..	"Oh, worse than death".... }.. (Theodora).... Handel.
Air.....	"Angels ever bright and fair" }.. (Theodora).... Handel.
Chorale.....	"Alla Trinita beata"..... (A.D. 1545) Palestrina.
Air.....	"Total eclipse"..... }..... (Samson).... Handel.
Chorus.....	"Oh, first created beam" }..... (Samson).... Handel.
Air.....	"Lord God Almighty"..... Neukomm.
Chorus..	"Then round about the starry throne" .. (Samson) .. Handel.
Chorale.....	"Luther's Hymn"..... Harmonized by S. Bach.
(Trumpet Obligato, Mr. Ellwood.)
Solo and Chorus.....	"Alma Virgo"..... Hummel.

As will be seen above, the concert was scarcely of that high character that the Hargreaves Society is now expected to produce. When sacred music is given, some complete work—some mass or cantata—or some entire oratorio is far more worthy of the powers and resources of the Hargreaves directors, their inimitable choir and excellent band; and, we think, would be far more pleasing to the body of subscribers generally, than any such selection as the one given on this occasion. There is a patch-work and want of continuity of interest about them at the best—and then, except given by such a society, what chance have we in Manchester of hearing the greatest works of the greatest composers? In London you have them given by the Sacred Harmonic Society at Exeter Hall—then let our Hargreaves Society follow their good example. But to the performance. We must not notice each piece after our already lengthened remarks. Mr. Manvers was in good voice, and acquitted himself well in all he had to do. Unfortunately any singer who attempts to give "Deeper and deeper still," or "Total eclipse," is put into comparison with Braham, (we mean with Braham as he was, not now,) it is scarcely fair, but the thoughts will revert back to the splendid dramatic delivery of Braham in his best days so "long as memory holds her seat." Mr. Manvers, or any other tenor, may succeed better with these songs in the next generation! By the way, although Mr. Manvers was not quite so successful in the dramatic in his recitative, he gave us some theatrical pronunciation in his song, which he would do well to alter,

"Wait her angels to the skies-ies."

Why make skies into two syllables? Mr. A. Sapio is a bass or barytone of very moderate pretensions; he might well have chosen some song more suited to his limited power than "Honour and Arms." It may seem ungallant to speak last of the lady principals, but though last we do not think least of their talent. Miss Cubitt has a sweet and pleasing quality of voice, with a plain style of sticking to her text, which pleased us more than the ornaments introduced by her more showy competitor, Miss Elisa Birch—of course the voices are different, the former being a mezzo soprano, the latter, at present, a somewhat thin and high soprano; they both appear young too, so doubtless are far from being at the zenith of their powers. If they would allow us to give each a word of advice it would be to Miss Cubitt to infuse a little more animation and feeling into her manner, and to Miss E. Birch that she should be more certain of her intonation before she ventures on so much ornament; and she should not, when singing in English, Italianize her words, as "Taake, oh, taake me to your care!" her "Angels ever bright and fair," but for this, would have merited and no doubt received an encore.

The chief gems of the concert, both as to music and performance, were Mozart's Motett; Palestrina's Chorale (which was encored); and the chorus from Samson, "Then round about the starry throne," a bit of Handel that our choir revelled in accordingly. Great praise is due to the performance of Martin Luther's Hymn, as a chorale, by the choir, and to Mr. Elworth's admirable trumpet accompaniment, as also to Miss E. Birch, band, and chorus, for the "Alma Virgo" of Hummel's, (a most lovely composition, the orchestral accompaniment especially, are very beautiful) which made a good finale to one of the tamest concerts given for some time by the Hargreaves Society. We trust there will be something of a higher character in store for us at the next, or fourth concert, which is fixed, we see, for the 25th of February. Elijah is promised but cannot be done, it is expected, before April.—May we have Staudigl and Mendelssohn on that occasion!

THE RIVAL ITALIAN OPERAS.

Of the Due Rivali, Her Majesty's Theatre has made the first official announcement. The substance of the prospectus for the ensuing season (for particulars of which see our leading article) has appeared in all the morning journals of Thursday, with the exception of The Morning Chronicle. The Times, Herald, and Daily News are little more than statistical, while The Morning Post spins out its notice to a column and three parts in length. From the splendid array of talent put forth, and the magnificent promises held out by Mr. Lumley in his prospectus, we should have thought that even the Morning Post might have rested satisfied with the mere edict of so superlative a bill of fare: but, no! that zealous advocate thinks otherwise: it considers a small grain of irony necessary to flavour the programme. Grisi's "years" are again made the subject of discussion. One would absolutely be led to believe, from reading the articles in the Morning Post, that Madame Grisi was "fallen into the vale of years," instead of being, as most indubitably she is, in the very prime of womanhood. The Morning Post states that Madame Grisi has been fifteen years at Her Majesty's Theatre. We beg to correct our contemporary on this head. Mademoiselle Grisi made her first appearance in London in April 1834, and consequently Mademoiselle Grisi has been twelve, not fifteen, years at the Opera. The same journal accuses the prima donna of absolutism, meaning thereby to convey to its readers that Madame Grisi usurps all the leading characters in the theatre in which she is engaged. Justice bids us politely to contradict this assertion. The principal parts which the accomplished cantatrice has personated since her first advent to this country, could hardly have been undertaken, with success, by any prima donna who has been since engaged at Her Majesty's Theatre. Grisi is undoubtedly a great tragic actress, and has won her laurels, as well in the histrionic, as in the lyric department of the opera. Her performances of Norma, Semiramide, Desdemona, Anna Bolena, Elvira in the Puritani, Ninetta, and other parts, are proofs of her superior tragic powers. The only comic parts she assumed at Her Majesty's Theatre for several seasons, were Norina in Don Pasquale, and Rosina in Il Barbiere. That she does not exert the absolutism ascribed to her by the Morning Post, even in parts which she has peculiarly made her own, may be instanced by her resigning her favourite character of Rosina in Il Barbiere to Persiani in Paris. The article in the Morning Post, however, from its important and elaborate statements deserves more consideration than we have room to devote to it this week. Next week we shall review it at length.

In an article on this subject, which appeared in the Morning Herald, of Monday, our contemporary follows up some statements and conjectures about the engagements at Her Majesty's Theatre for the forthcoming season, with the following excellent remarks:—

"In the mean while the public is diverted with the squabbling that is going on between the organs of the elder Theatre, and those of the new undertaking in Bow-street. What is said on the one side is flatly contradicted on the other, and the quarrel has reached a point when all courtesies are laid aside—when impertinence is met with impertinence, and vulgar imputation with defiance and rejoinder. Folks who are collaterally connected with the two establishments have rushed into print, and their letters have been sufficiently piquant to gratify the lovers of professional dispute; and, no doubt, more of the same sort are in store, which will be equally acceptable. Beyond, however, the amusement derived from these charges and recriminations, the public care very little for the real facts at issue, and the partisans on either side would show better taste and better generalship were they to abstain altogether from open scurrilities, which are neither calculated to strengthen the interests they defend, nor give their respective establishments credit in the eyes of the world. Mr. Lumley has no doubt found a direct practical antagonism to his Theatre—one conducted with largeness of view and helped by pecuniary sufficiency. It behoves him, therefore, to meet the danger which might otherwise threaten him with boldness and activity, and we apprehend he has done so, if we were to place any faith whatever in the hints which have oozed out of his engagements, present and prospective. The public will judge for themselves, and the competition no doubt will be productive of something very near perfection in either case. But for our own part, we have no hesitation in expressing the conviction, which we have from the first entertained, that there is not a public for two Theatres of this class, the costliness of which must inevitably keep them both beyond general accessibility, to the fatal narrowing of the receipts and the gradual absorption of the means of maintenance. This, however, only concerns those who choose to incur the heavy responsibilities in question, and indulge in golden dreams undisturbed by fears and misgivings—backed, let it be added, by the powerful incentives of personal animosity and the rancorous spirit of revenge."

We do not understand the last sentence, but with the rest of the observations we cordially assent. Coming from so impartial a quarter, they ought to have double weight with the contending parties.

The Morning Chronicle of Thursday contains an article respecting the progress of the alterations and modifications of Covent Garden. It speaks in high terms of what has been already done, and states that the New Italian Opera will be ready for performances in April. A Sunday journal contradicts flatly the coming of Jenny Lind to Her Majesty's Theatre. We can as flatly contradict the assertion of the Sunday journal. Jenny Lind is engaged, and were there any direct necessity, we could inform the said journal of the very night upon which Jenny Lind will appear at Her Majesty's Theatre. We are also able to say, that the order for the dresses and decorations in La Fille de Regiment, one of Jenny Lind's favourite operas, has been already issued by the management.

The Morning Chronicle of yesterday treats the prospectus of Her Majesty's Theatre with the utmost coolness, and is entirely sceptical concerning the principal attractions held forth in the announcement. Our readers shall have the entire article.

"Our contemporaries published yesterday a notification of certain arrangements for the ensuing season at Her Majesty's Theatre. We need scarcely assure our readers that this circular is not the official prospectus, which has not yet been issued. As the main hope of having a presentable prima donna rests on JENNY LIND, and we are only told by the Times that she will "no doubt" come, it is evident there is every doubt. We know that overtures have been dispatched to Mr. Bunn (who is at Brighton on account of ill health) to ascertain at what amount he fixed his damages if Jenny Lind broke her contract with him, with an intimation to meet any reasonable arrangement; but we have reason to believe that Mr. Bunn will listen to nothing of the kind, and still greater reason to believe that unless he does abandon his contract Jenny Lind will not visit us. The idea of Meyerbeer coming unless the matter be arranged with the Swedish Nightingale, is absurd, for he not only drew up Jenny Lind's contract with Drury-lane Theatre, but specifically undertook to produce his opera there, the Camp of Silesia, which can only be given on a very large stage, as in the second act there are more than 300 people required at one time, with four distinct military bands. The opera of Mendelssohn is mere moonshine. It is true that he has promised to write an opera for Jenny Lind, when he has a good libretto; but, to our knowledge, he has refused shoals of poems; and it is not a fortnight since he declared that he had no opera ready, and, what is of more importance, no chance of any as he had not yet met with a libretto that he could approve of. To suppose that Mendelssohn would accept a French translation of Shakspeare's Tempest for an Italian opera, two of the principal parts to be supported by a Swede and a German, is to draw too largely on our credulity. Another reason that prompts us to regard the circular of our contemporaries as idle gossip is, that Rossini's pasticcio Robert Bruce, which has just proved a signal failure in Paris, as such a musical fraud deserved, is announced amongst the novelties."

In addition to the above remarks of the Chronicle, we publish a letter of Mr. Bunn's which appeared in the Morning Post of yesterday, as bearing closely upon the question so long at issue between the partizans of the Rival Operas.

"To the Editor of the Morning Post."

"Sir,—My attention has been directed to the following paragraph in the Morning Herald of this day, relating to the arrangements of the ensuing season at Her Majesty's Theatre:—

"At Easter Jenny Lind absolutely comes, and what is more, remains, throughout the whole of the season; the direful threatenings of Mr. Bunn, to whom she was last year under certain imputed obligations, being either removed by negotiations or regarded with defiance."

"The 'imputed obligations' between Mlle. Jenny Lind and myself, consist of a formal contract drawn up by M. Meyerbeer, (who undertook to produce his opera of the Camp of Silesia with her at Drury Lane,) and it was executed in the presence of the British Minister at Berlin. Mlle. Lind has made a forcible appeal to me to give up this contract, which I have most certainly refused to do. My 'direful threatenings' may be 'regarded with defiance,' but are not at present removed by negotiation; for, while I am ready to admit that a negotiation is under consideration, I beg to say the contemptible offer of compensation recently made me has been utterly rejected.—I have the honor to be, Sir, your most obliged servant,

"A. BUNN,

"York Hotel, Brighton, Jan. 21."

We abstain as yet from offering further remarks upon the advent of the Swedish Nightingale, having already pledged ourselves as being able to state the very night upon which she would make her first appearance at Her Majesty's Theatre.

It is gratifying to us to find, that La Critique Musicale, one of the most independent and able of the Parisian musical papers, has given us full credit for our impartiality regarding the Rival Opera Houses. "The Musical World," it remarks, "a special journal devoted to the art of music, and one generally well informed, has hitherto taken no position for either side. An impartial observer, it principally confines itself to publishing the correspondence emanating from the organs of either party. It declares itself the friend of both establishments, and expresses its wishes for the prosperity of both. Will the hope of The Musical World ever be realised? We fear not. In this instance, as in every other, fortune will make two unequal parts of its favours." With this eulogium we shall conclude this week's remarks on the Rival Italian Opera Houses.

EXETER HALL.

In aid of the "Hullah Testimonial Fund," the object of which is to aid the spirited disciple of Wilhem in his praiseworthy object of erecting a large music-hall in London for his own purposes and for general musical performances on a vast scale, the first of a series of four concerts was given on Monday night. The design of these concerts is one of high interest and importance. It is to illustrate by examples the history and progress of English vocal music from the earliest times up to the present moment. Though we are no devoted admirers of the old English school of music, we cannot but admit the utility of these performances considered in the light of popular elementary lectures. Of course the first concert was likely to be the driest, and the least interesting, but even that contained much that was delightful and much more that was instructive. Our best mode of giving an idea of its nature will be to insert the programme.

PART I.—SACRED MUSIC.

Hymn . . .	Gloria in excelsis, Deo . . .	Chorus . . .	Tye, c. 1540
Anthem . .	Call to remembrance . .	Soli and Chorus .	Farrant, c. 1564
Prayer . . .	Hear the voice and prayer . . .	Semi-chorus . .	Tallis, 1567
Anthem . .	Sing joyfully . . .	Chorus . . .	Byrd, c. 1580
Metrical Psalm .	Ye children which do serve the Lord . .	Semi-chorus and Chorus of Tenor Voices . . .	Allison, 1602
Anthem . . .	O Lord my God . . .	Soli and Semi-Chorus . . .	Bull, c. 1600
Hymn . . .	Te Deum . . .	Double Choir . .	O. Gibbons, c. 1610

PART II.—SECULAR MUSIC.

Part Song . .	In going to my lonely bed . . .	Chorus . . .	Edwardes c. 1550
Ballet . . .	Sing we and chant it . .	Chorus . . .	Morley, 1595
Part Song . .	Awake, sweet love . . .	Soli . . .	Dowland, 1597
Madrigal . .	Lady, when I beheld . .	Chorus . . .	Wilbye, 1598
Madrigal . .	All creatures now . . .	Chorus . . .	Bennet, 1601
Song . . .	Shall I seek to ease my grief . . .	Mr. Manvers . .	Farabosco, 1609
Madrigal . .	The silver swan . . .	Chorus . . .	O. Gibbons, 1612
Song . . .	Sweet Echo . . .	Miss Rainforth .	H. Lawes, 1634
Part Song . .	Where the bee sucks . .	Soli . . .	Wilson, 1644
Song . . .	I long to sing the songs of Troy . . .	Mr. Leffler . .	H. Lawes, c. 1650
Song . . .	Whilst I listen to thy voice . . .	Miss Dolby . .	" "
Song . . .	Chloris yourself you so excel . . .	Mr. Manvers . .	" "
Dialogue . .	Daphne, shepherds if they knew . . .	Miss Rainforth and Miss Dolby . .	" "
Song . . .	Why shouldst thou swear . . .	Mr. Leffler . .	" "
Song . . .	As I walked forth . . .	Miss Dolby . .	Johnson, "
Song . . .	Go, young man . . .	Miss Rainforth .	H. Lawes "
Duet . . .	Bacchus, Iacchus . . .	{Mr. Manvers and Mr. Leffler . .}	" "
Part Song . .	The Walts . . .	Chorus . . .	Saville, c. 1660

The whole of the first part, though capably executed by the choristers, who were selected from Mr. Hullah's upper-singing schools, was inevitably monotonous and dull. The total absence of rhythmic melody, the peculiarly Gothic nature of the harmonies, and the unfinished part-writing in the works of these old masters, which abound in every species of contrapuntal fault, makes listening to an uninterrupted succession of them a wearisome task to modern ears. The second part was more musically interesting, and agreeable in proportion. The works of Henry Lawes preponderated much more than their merits authorised, since nothing could well be more spiritless and devoid of character. The part-song of Edwardes has some sweet melody, sometimes, however, disfigured by laboured attempts at imitation and elaborate counterpoint. It was beautifully sung. Morley's ballet is pretty and fanciful; it was well rendered, and encored with unanimity. This was the first bit of decided tune, with beginning, middle, and end, that we had heard during the evening. John Dowland's part-song is also pretty and melodious; but this again is spoiled by attempts at imitations in the part-writing. The madrigals were unhappily chosen, partaking too largely of the sombre and fragmentary style of the ecclesiastical music. Mr. Manvers was encored in the song of Ferabosco, in which, nevertheless, we could discover no merit whatever. Orlando Gibbons' madrigal is as ugly as a piece of music can easily be. If the "Song of the Swan," about which it treats, at all resembles it, then is the "Song of the Swan" unworthy of its reputation. Wilson's part-song is almost the same as that to which the name of Dr. Arne has most unwarrantably been affixed. It was excellently sung, and encored with clamorous enthusiasm. Mr. Seguin sang the "Anacreontic Ode," by Lawes, much better than its dullness merited, and the same may be said of Miss Dolby in "Whilst I listen to thy voice." The duet of the two nymphs is very absurd; but was well sung, nevertheless, by Misses Rainforth and Dolby. The best song of the whole lot was "A forsaken lover's complaint," by Robert Johnson—a plaintive and simple melody, harmonized with unpretending sweetness. Miss Dolby's execution of this charming trifle was not only graceful and finished, but full of exquisite tenderness and pathos. She was encored with one voice by the whole audience. In such songs as these Miss Dolby has no superior, her voice and style are alike suited to them. Miss Rainforth also gained a boisterous encore for her animated and spiritual delivery of "The young maid's resolution," the only one of the songs of Lawes that presents the ghost of a tune, with the exception of "Love's scrutiny," a song to which Mr. Seguin (who is to be doubly praised for having upon very short notice supplied the place of Mr. Leffler) rendered more than justice. The words of this latter song might with advantage have been reconsidered by the managers of the concert ere they had been admitted into the programme of a modern concert; they are positively indecent. We are none of your straight-laced persons, and are not likely to be offended by ordinary matters. But when we find nothing but filthy profligacy helped out by a villanous display of heartlessness, with no poetic beauty to redeem it, we cannot find it in our hearts to set decorum at defiance—and such are the words of this song, which are about as good as the music to which they are allied. The bacchanal duet has little merit, but was well sung by Messrs. Manvers and Seguin, and Saville's pretty "Waits" concluded the concert merrily. On the whole the selection was monotonous. Mr. Edward May must be praised for the efficient manner in which he conducted the entire performance—and Mr. Oliver May, a musician whose great merits ought to bring him more frequently before the public, deserves the highest praise for the admirable style in which during the first part he presided at the organ, and during the second at the pianoforte, filling up with extreme cleverness the accompaniments of almost all the pieces, the authors having left them with nothing but a figured bass to help out the melody. The second concert is announced for Monday, February 8th. The Hall was well attended. The organ, by the way, was erected by Mr. T. Robson, expressly for the occasion, the committee of the Sacred Harmonic Society having declined to allow their own instrument to be used for the occasion. On this particular a correspondent has forwarded us some particulars for insertion, which want of space compels us to defer till our next.

GREGORIANIZERS V. HARMONIZERS.

No. 2.

(From The Manchester Courier.)

We alluded in a former article to the "fertile fancy" of the Gregorianizers, and we have since been much entertained by some amusing examples. One unassuming proposition is this—"The defenders of harmony are only those persons who know nothing of Gregorian music." This is concise and satisfactory. The bull has gone forth, and we are merely extinguished. With all due submission, however, to our rampant adversaries, we opine that there is something malignant in utter annihilation. We might have been allowed to descend to the grave with the consoling thought that we had met the foe with fearless, though unsuccessful bravery. This is denied us. We might have said, with honest Sir John, "We fought a full hour by Shrewsbury clock." But no, we are disbanded and cashiered, as unfit for duty, and must henceforward be considered as the Chelsea pensioners, of Tetracordian warfare. Our pen trembles in our palsied hand. What will harmonizers say to the establishment of a musical star-chamber, to be designated "the Hypo-mixo-lidio-phrygian order of knighthood?" Who could have anticipated the passing of an act for the suppression of sacred harmony? We quote from memory a rough draft of "The Gregorianizers' Relief Bill." "Whereas sundry rebellious persons have from time to time assembled for the purpose of singing divine compositions, known as "harmonized church song," be it hereafter enacted, that any person or persons suspected of this enormity shall be liable to imprisonment, unless the words be profane, without bail or mainprize." Tremble, ye lovers of Tallis, Tye, Purcell, and Gibbons. For our part, we confess our dreams are ever and anon disturbed with visions of these belted knights. We avoid with scrupulous care the abrupt corners of our streets, lest we should be laid low with a hypo-mixo battle-axe. Before we retire to oblivion we will remind our Quixotic antagonists of two or three defects. They tell us of their laborious researches, intense application, years of study, &c., they publish the result of all these, we pursue them, and yet, strange to say, "we remain in entire ignorance." While reading some of their speculations, we rub our eyes, and feel strongly inclined to refer to the title pages, to ascertain whether the work is not "Belzoni on Egyptian antiquities." That learned traveller informs us, that when he examined the ancient catacombs, he attached a piece of thread to the entrance carrying one extremity in his hand, to enable him to return without difficulty. What would have been his consternation, if after-travellers had amused themselves, and tired their readers with ingenious disquisitions on the texture of the thread, its colour, its probable length, and peculiar properties? What should we say to the antiquary who should present us with the figures from an Egyptian tomb, not as valuable curiosities, but as true copies of nature. Place these before the child,—the uncouth posture, the right-angled anatomy, and perhaps the small discrepancy of the arms extending to the ankles, and he will tell you in other words "the harmony of proportion is wanting." Let us not be thought to undervalue the disinterested exertions of the antiquarians. We would not rush in and break the slender thread of history, and then plunge into the secret caverns, and recesses of our own invention, or our florid imagination. We are indebted to the guide, not only for our internal ramblings, but for our safe retreat. The upholders of mere antiquity seem to think that the great and beautiful must not be trusted by themselves; they must be put in leading-strings. We must abandon harmony, because "horrid examples" exist. The question is frequently asked, "What is the distinguishing feature of ecclesiastical harmony?" To the musician we might discourse on broad and fundamental harmonies. To the unmusical we say, What is the difference between a chapter of Isaiah and "Drink to me only?" between the triumphs of Rubens and the sign-board of a country inn? between the sculpture of Chantrey and the roughed wax-work of a hair-dresser's window? Do we close the scriptures because men misquote? Should we demolish all sculpture if some fanatic proposed the insertion of glass eyes, vermillion cheeks, and an elaborate wig?

The broad volume of Nature is open before us. Let the study of her beauties be pursued with humble simplicity, and the truth-loving student will not depart unrefreshed. Let him throw open the windows of his soul, and inhale the fragrance of her breath. Her dasied meadows, her flowing fields are all his. She sighs in the soft language of evening after her fallen votary-man. She thunders in her anger, and yet perverse man pursues the vagaries of his own imagination, and invents for himself a standard of beauty, as imperfect as it is presumptuous; as grovelling as it is fallacious. He seeks instruction with preconceived notions. Can he wonder if he reap disappointment. In this age of intellectual supremacy, we would not for one moment be misunderstood. We regard with intense satisfaction every approximation to the simplicity of primitive doctrine; but the arts, the divine handmaids of the church, must advance with the great stream of time. No earthly power can stem the torrent. No mortal can make the attempt without experiencing shipwreck and complete overthrow. We do not wish to lay too much stress on the discoveries of finite man. They are loud proclamations of his former ignorance; yet we do not return to the principles deduced from that ignorance. Sir Isaac Newton supposed himself a child playing with pebbles on the sea-shore, yet we do not dispute gravitation. If the cup of a man's terrestrial happiness be small, there can be no impiety in attempting to fill it. The Gregorianizers launch the vessel of discovery, and descend the stream buoyant with hope; then, like the disaffected crew of Columbus, they mutiny. "Take us," cry they, "to our own ancient stream, our native obscurity. You talk of antipodes, you say the world is round, and that everything in nature has its echo; but, oh, let us not lose sight of shore." This fresh water fry cannot live in the swelling waters of progression; they must return to the wildness of by-gone ignorance,—to the ruggedness of dim antiquity. Refinement and finished magnificence are not for them. These musical Calibans disdain the elegant attire which nature has so bountifully displayed; they cast the ponderous remains on shore, meagre and unsightly. We exclaim with Trinculo, "Verily it hath an ancient and fish-like smell." These Robinson Crusoes must, forsooth, live in solitary grandeur,—in sumptuous misery. St. Ambrose did not employ harmony, and Mr. Crusoe eschewed kerseymere, and in the plenitude of our simplicity, we conjecture, for one very excellent reason, they did not possess the article in question. In vain Nature's sonorous monitors proclaim the rules of harmony. The bells peal forth their sweetest chords from tower to spire, her hills and dales repeat the sound; she reverberates with rapture. The feathered songsters warble forth their praise; but man alone must descend to second infancy. In profane matters, indeed, he may employ the high resources of harmony, but in celebrating the glories of his Creator, barbarity must be his guide, and ancient groping after truth his maximum in art. The practical part of the question presents insuperable obstacles, which we will hereafter explain. The sustaining a long and solemn tone is an artistical exertion, not a natural property of the vocal organ. How will voices out of tune blend with the organ? Will a 1000 rough, uncultivated voices be more endurable than 20, 12, or 2?

THE AFFINITIES.

from the German of Göthe.

(Continued from page 34.)

PART I.—CHAPTER XVI.

THE next day the Captain had disappeared, and had left a gratefully expressed letter for his friends. He and Charlotte had, on the preceding evening, taken a sort of half-leave of each other, couched in monosyllabic words. She felt that the separation was to be eternal, and resigned herself accordingly; for in the Count's second letter, which the Captain had at last communicated to her, mention was made of an advantageous marriage; and although he paid no attention to this point, she looked upon the matter as certain, and gave up all thoughts of him.

She now conceived she had a right to exact from others that power which she had exercised over herself. What had not been impossible to herself must be possible to others also. With this view she commenced a conversation with her husband with the more openness and confidence, as she felt that the matter must once for all be brought to an issue.

"Our friend has quitted us," she said; "we are now towards each other as we were formerly, and it depends upon ourselves whether we can completely return to our old position."

Edward, who heard nothing, but that which flattered his passion, thought that by these words, Charlotte alluded to her previous state of widowhood, and was throwing out vague hints of a separation. He answered smiling, "Why not? it only requires a mutual understanding."

He felt he was much mistaken, when Charlotte proceeded thus: "We have now only to remove Ottilia elsewhere, for a double opportunity presents itself to place her in a position which would be most desirable. She can return to the school, now my daughter has gone to her great aunt, or she can be taken into a superior family, and there, with an only daughter, have all the advantages of a suitable education."

"But," said Edward tolerably composed, "Ottilia is so accustomed to our friendly society, that she would hardly be pleased with any other."

"We have all been spoiled," said Charlotte, "and you not the least. In the meanwhile an epoch has come which demands consideration, and which earnestly warns us to think what will be the most advantageous for the members of our little circle, and also to undergo some sacrifice."

"At any rate I do not think it fair," said Edward, "that Ottilia should be sacrificed, which will be the case, if at the present moment she is forced to be among strangers. The Captain has been sought here by his good fortune, and we may let him go, not only without regret, but with pleasure. Who knows what is in store for Ottilia. Why should we be in a hurry?"

"What is in store for us is pretty clear," replied Charlotte, with some emotion, and as it was her design to speak out plainly, she continued, "You love Ottilia, and are making yourself accustomed to her. Inclination and passion are also created and fostered on her side. Why should we not speak out in words, that which every hour acknowledges? Shall we not have so much foresight as to ask what is to come of this?"

"If an answer cannot be given at once," said Edward, collecting himself, "at least as much as this can be said, that we first resolve to await the instruction of the future, when we cannot exactly say what will come of a matter."

"In the present case," retorted Charlotte, "no great foresight is required, and at all events we may say this, that we are neither of us young enough to go blindfold into an improper course. No one can any longer look after us; we must be our own friends, our own tutors. No one expects to see us driven to extremities; no one expects to find us culpable or ridiculous."

"Can you blame me," said Edward, who could not answer the plain open speech of his wife; "Can you blame me, if I take Ottilia's interest to heart. I do not speak of a future interest, which is not to be estimated, but of the present. Think for yourself honestly, and without self-deceit, what it would be to tear away Ottilia from our society, and place her among strangers. I at least do not feel cruel enough to counsel such a change."

Charlotte clearly perceived the resolution of her husband, in spite of his dissimulation, and now, for the first time, she felt how far he was estranged from her. With some emotion she cried out: "Can Ottilia be happy if she divides us—if she deprives me of a husband, and his children of a father?"

"As for our children, I should have thought they were provided for," said Edward with a cold smile; but he added, somewhat more timidly, "Why should the worst be imagined at once?"

"Because the worst lies nearest to passion," returned Charlotte. "Do not, while there is yet time to profit by it, reject the good advice and assistance I offer. In obscure cases those must act and assist who see most clearly. I am such a one in the present case. Dear dearest Edward, do be persuaded by me. Can you counsel me at once to renounce my well-earned happiness—the holiest rights,—in a word, to renounce you?"

"Who says anything of the kind?" said Edward, with some confusion.

"Yourself," replied Charlotte; "while you wish Ottilia to be kept near us, do you not yourself allow of all the consequences? I will not press you; but if you cannot subdue yourself, at any rate you will not be able to deceive yourself much longer."

Edward felt how perfectly she was in the right. An uttered word is a terrible thing when it at once expresses what the heart has long permitted, and it was only for a moment's evasion that Edward said, "I do not clearly know what you propose."

"My plan," replied Charlotte, "was to consider both propositions, for there is a great deal of good in both. The school appears most suitable for Ottilia when I consider what the girl is now. But, on the other hand, the grander position promises more when I consider what she's to become." She then explained to her husband in detail the two positions, and concluded with these words. "For my own part, I should prefer the lady's house to the school for several reasons, but on this account particularly, because I do not wish to increase the inclination, nay the passion which the young man at the school felt for Ottilia."*

Edward appeared to assent, but it was only to obtain a respite. Charlotte determined to do something decisive at once when she found she had no immediate opposition from Edward, embraced the opportunity of appointing the departure of Ottilia within the next few days. Every thing had already been got ready quietly for her departure.

Edward shuddered, he considered he was betrayed, and looked upon the really amiable discourse of his wife as preconceived, artful, and systematically contrived, to separate him for ever from his happiness. He seemed to leave the whole affair in her hands, but internally he had formed his resolution. Only to gain breathing time and to avert the inevitable evil of Ottilia's removal, he determined to quit the house himself, and indeed not unknown to Charlotte, whom he managed to deceive by saying that he would not be present at Ottilia's departure; nay, that he would not so much as see her from the present moment. Charlotte, who thought she had gained him to her wishes, rendered every assistance. He ordered his horses, gave his valet the necessary directions as to what was to be packed up, and how he should follow him, and then, without forethought, sat down and wrote:

EDWARD TO CHARLOTTE.

"The evil that has befallen us, my love, may be curable, or it may not, but this I feel, that if I am not to be driven to immediate despair, I must have respite for myself—for us all. While I sacrifice myself, I may make demands. I quit my house, and will only return when the prospects are more favourable and more calm. You, in the meanwhile, shall possess it, but with Ottilia.

"I will know that she is with you, and not with strangers. Take care of her, treat her as you have hitherto done, nay, even with more kindness and tenderness. I promise that I will carry on no clandestine intercourse with Ottilia. Rather let me be for a time altogether ignorant how you are going on, and I will imagine the best. Imagine the same of me. On this point, above all, I insist with the greatest urgency; make no attempt to settle Ottilia elsewhere, or to bring her into any new connections. If she goes beyond the circle of your castle and park, and is entrusted to strangers, she belongs to me, and I will take charge of her. If you have any regard for my inclinations, my wishes, my pains; if you humour my fancies, my hopes, I will not resist the chance of recovery, if it presents itself."

The last sentence flowed from his pen, but not from his heart. Nay, when he saw it on the paper, he began to weep bitterly. That he, in any manner whatever, should resign the happiness—aye, the unhappiness—of loving Ottilia! Now, for the first time, he felt what he was doing. He departed without knowing what might be the consequences. For the present, at least, he was not to see her, and with what certainty could he promise himself that he should ever see her again? But the letter lay written, the horses stood at the door, and he dreaded every moment lest he should see Ottilia, and find his resolution shaken. He collected himself. He considered that it would be possible for him to return any moment that he pleased, and that by absenting himself he might draw nearer to his wishes. On the other hand, he pictured to himself Ottilia forced out of the house, if he remained. He sealed the letter, hurried down the steps, and sprang upon his horse.

When he rode by the inn, he saw sitting in a bower, the beggar whom he had liberally rewarded the evening before. The man was sitting comfortably at his dinner, and rising as Edward approached, bowed respectfully—even with something of adoration. This very form had appeared to him yesterday, when Ottilia was leaning on his arm, and it now painfully reminded him of the happiest hour of his life. His anguish increased; the feeling of what he had lost was insupportable, and looking once more after the beggar, he exclaimed, "Oh, thou enviable man, thou canst feast on yesterday's alms, while I cannot feast on yesterday's happiness!"

(To be continued.)

† This despair of resigning even unhappiness is a beautiful touch.—TRANSLATOR.

* To prevent misunderstanding it may be stated that the copyright of this translation belongs solely to the translator.

SONNET.

NO. XVIII.

HEAUTONTIMORUMENOS.

STRANGE is the task assign'd to me by fate;
In mine own hands the deadly torch is plac'd
That I, by slow degrees, my life may waste,
And countless forms of agony create.
Of none may I complain—none, none, I hate,
But most are kindly. I myself have trac'd
The path, that by no cheerful flow'r is grac'd,
Myself have piled the soul-oppressing weight.
In place of joy I have this sullen pride,
That I create the world in which I dwell,
I do the work that cannot be undone,—
A work of misery and nought beside,
But still mine own—I stand in mine own hell,
I stand and burn alone—alone—alone.

N. D.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

HAYMARKET.—Nothing novel of late has been produced at this house. The first piece performances are, however, varied nightly—the Invisible Prince still holding its firm place. Mr. Planche's clever two-act comedy, Who's your Friend; or, the Queensberry Fête, has been performed during this week, Mr. Webster taking Charles Mathews's original part of Giles Fairland. Mr. Webster plays the part, to our thinking, with a happier tact and a nicer discrimination than Mr. Charles Mathews, and the majority of the audience on Wednesday night seemed to lean to our opinion, as Mr. Webster's performance was received throughout with very considerable applause. We know no one, indeed, on the present stage who can represent the rough and hearty natures of countrymen like this actor. He never forgets the rustic to assume the gentleman. He is in earnest with his part, and acts it con amore; and the rough humour, which is a characteristic of his comedy, aids him materially in such impersonations. Mrs. Glover played her original part of Lady Bab Blazon. She was the same as ever—let that be her eulogy. On Tuesday evening Her Majesty and Prince Albert honored the theatre with their presence. The royal couple laughed heartily at the drolleries in The Invisible Prince, and remained till the last finale was sung. The house continues to be crowded every night. All the boxes are taken several days in advance. We are delighted with this success. The enterprising manager deserves every encouragement at the hands of the public.

* Charlotte alludes to the teacher, whose letters appear in the early part of the romance.—TRANSLATOR.

ADELPHI.—Notwithstanding the absence of pantomime, the Adelphi performances draw capital houses. The Phantom Dancers is the main cause of attraction. We understand a new drama of great interest is in preparation for Madame Celeste.

PRINCESS'S.—The new farce at this theatre, entitled Schoolboy Frolics, is a very amusing trifle, is excellently acted, and is received with great laughter nightly. Miss Marshall has a capital part, a mischief-loving romp—male, not female—and plays it with great spirit. It is a part something between Cherubino and Little Pickle, requiring all the amorous tendencies of the one, and all the fun and frolic of the other. We have not seen Miss Marshall for a long time in a character so well suited to her. She kept the whole house alive.

Miss Bassano's performances are bringing crowded and fashionable audiences nightly. We are sorry to see The Night Dancers withdrawn from the bills to make room for The Seven Maids of Munich.

OLYMPIC.—A new drama, entitled Gaston Dubarry; or, a Night in La Bertaudiere, has been produced at this theatre with much success. The plot is entirely taken from the French. The drama is of the mixed school, comprising intricacies, contretemps, embarrassments, complications, involvements, and other interesting excitations. It is very well acted.

FRENCH PLAYS.—On Monday last M. Frederick Lemaitre again played in the Dame de Saint-Tropez, by order of Her Majesty, who honoured the theatre by her presence. The house was the best we have seen this season; the stalls were almost all occupied, and scarcely a private box was empty. We are glad at these indications of prosperity, and record them with unfeigned pleasure and satisfaction. Hitherto we have had every reason to be content with the exertions of the enterprising lessee: he has given us the best actors of the French capital, and the St. James's Theatre may boast of a company little, if at all, inferior to the first in Paris, and certainly superior to any beyond the Boulevards. Last Monday we were confirmed in our former opinion of M. Frederick Lemaitre. As regards the piece, it is of the purely melodramatic school. Written at a period of extraordinary excitement, when the famous trial of the notorious Madame Laffarge had caused a thrill of horror and disgust throughout Europe; when opinions ran high against and in favour of this modern Brincoilliers—just at the moment of the publication of her sickening, rapid, poisonous lucubrations, called by her Memoires, and blindly read, and we shuddered at the thought believed by many; this play caused a certain sensation to which, judging it on its own intrinsic worth, it had no right whatever, even from the most vapourous waiting-maids, or the most philanthropic of medical students, or long bearded moyen âge-rapins. Having disposed of the piece, we shall proceed to point out a few of the most salient parts of the performance. In the first place, we were deprived of one-half of the actor—we had his energy without his humour—his pathos without his satire—his tragedy without his comedy; that which distinguishes him from all living actors—the contrast between the severe and the buffo, the grave and the sarcastic, did not exist; and these are so mixed up and blended together, the public are so accustomed to the mélange from him, that more than once they distorted the words put into his mouth, gave them a different meaning, and indulged in laughter when tears were required at their hands, both by the author and actor. The first three acts were somewhat tame and tiresome; but the last scene of the fourth was a complete triumph, and the crowning effort of the actor. The accusation of his wife—the agonies he endures from the effects of the poison—the trembling, convulsive writhing of his whole frame—the fixed, vacant eye—the dropping of the jaw, produced a sensation which cannot be conveyed by mere description. Not a sound was heard throughout the theatre: a pin might have been heard to drop in any part of the house—all were bent forward, greedily intent on catching every word, every gesture; and when the curtain went down on this scene of horror the applause was deafening, and the actor was obliged to come forward to receive the felicitations of the audience. For the fifth act, the discovery of the real assassin was well managed, and the death scene was effective, although deficient in colouring when compared with that in the fourth. This, of course, was no fault of the actor's, the author is alone to blame for introducing an anti-climax, which destroys the effect of the dénouement. It would not be fair to judge M. Frederick Lemaitre from this piece; his genius is essentially versatile, change is his element; he requires a wide field, unlimited scope to be seen to advantage; a part that requires patient, careful study, elaborate finish, attention to detail, would not suit him, he would be cramped in it; that which constitutes the great comedian, the finished actor, that which elevates Perlet above all the men of the present day, is entirely wanting in Lemaitre. The one can never err, and is more refined, more polished, more brilliant every time you see him; time adds to, but cannot detract from his merit; even physical infirmities can scarcely impair his powers, for he does not depend upon them for his effects; his acting will rarely cause the house to rise as one man, or vociferate forth thunders of applause on some particular gesture or exclamation, but it will command universal attention, elicit frequent and deep-felt marks of satisfaction, please by the exquisite finish of all the parts, by the unity of conception, the absolute abandonment of everything else to the one thing in hand, and when all is over, we feel that we are satisfied with the actor and ourselves—that we have not been duped into exaggeration, but have, perhaps, rather underrated than overrated the artist. The other acts from impulse; he is great on great occasions—he carries us away with him whether we will or not; everything depends upon the humour of the moment; he does not improve, for he is no greater now than he was ten years ago; his health has a painful and most decided influence on his acting, even in those parts where no great energy is required; he astonishes to-day in a part in which he will merely succeed to-morrow. He cannot always adapt himself to a part: the part must be suited to his genius. His effects are not produced by the elaborate finish of details, but dashed off with a bold, daring, desperate hand, and consequently are dependant for success on accident; he is child of impulse. Nature has gifted him highly; occasionally, he sports with her gifts—he rejects the pearls. In conclusion, we must not be supposed to infer that M. Frederick does not deserve the popularity which he enjoys; far from it. In drawing the above parallel between the two actors, we have merely indulged in one of those trains of reflection which have frequently struck us on witnessing their performance; and we have endeavoured to put our readers on their guard against the seductions of the latter, more specious than solid; and point out the sterling worth of the former, whose conceptions will bear the closest analysis, and stand the test of the severest criticism.

We must not forget to mention that Mademoiselle Clarisse deserves the highest commendation for the feeling and tenderness which she threw into her part. Her surprise when taunted by the multitude, her honour and agony when accused by her husband, were well conveyed, and gave a most favourable impression of her powers.

On Wednesday this same piece was again repeated.

J. DE C.—E.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

MISS BASSANO.

SIR,—Permit me to correct an error in your account of Miss Bassano last week. You assert that her voice was a decided contralto before she left England, and that since that period she has been forcing it upward from its natural pitch. This is quite a mistake; Miss Bassano's voice is now lower than ever it was, not only in compass but in quality, the upper notes having been formerly the best, as the middle ones are now; in fact, nature never intended her voice for other than what it now is. As I have known Miss Bassano from her childhood, and may, therefore, be allowed to be a competent authority on the subject, you will oblige me by the insertion of these lines.—I am, sir, your most obedient servant,
Kentish Town, Tuesday, 19th January. J. G.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

BERLIN.—(From a Correspondent.)—Mademoiselle Antonina di Mendi, cousin of Madame Malibran and Mademoiselle Viardot Garcia, who made so favourable an impression upon our aristocratic dilettanti during the latter part of last season, has been paying a visite artistique to Berlin, where she has been received with the most flattering marks of approbation; the freshness of her voice, the neatness and elegance of her style, and though last not least, her graceful deportment, have combined to render her an object of most attractive interest alike in private and public society. She has been singing with the greatest success at court, in company with Mademoiselle Viardot Garcia; the critics give their general assent, that age alone is required to make her a worthy vocal member of the Garcia family. Other foreign journals also announce a similar success having befallen this charming young artist in a recent tour through Belgium.

VENICE.—Mademoiselle Lucile Grahn was engaged for the three months of the carnival at the sum of 40,000 livres, and in quitting the Venice theatre has given up that amount, wishing to overthrow the old system of Italian pantomimes in order to introduce the modern French ballets. The artistes employed in the choregraphic department united with Grahn to defeat the old system. A cabal, similar to that of which Marie Taglioni was last year the victim at Milan, was organized against Lucile Grahn, and when she came on the stage for the first time in the ballet of the Gypsy, a dozen individuals in the pit received her with shouts and threats. The young lady remained a moment as if thunderstruck, and then, with a gesture full of calmness, ordered the curtain to be dropped, and, in spite of everything which could be done to retain her, quitted the city immediately. Venice will long suffer from this event, for what foreign artiste of celebrity would come and expose herself to a similar cabal.—According to an account given in a Venice journal, the disturbance was partly caused by the prices of admission having been unexpectedly raised. Lucile Grahn is now at Milan, whence she will proceed to Vienna, at the expiration of her engagement.

PROVINCIAL.

LIVERPOOL.—The introduction to the lecture season, which commenced last night at the theatre, was a grand concert on Tuesday evening, at the Collegiate Institution, when there was a full and fashionable auditory. The performers were, Miss Birch, Madame F. Lablache, Mr. Manvers, and Signor F. Lablache, the veteran Lindley, Mr. Carte and Mr. Hopkins. Miss Birch was in good voice, and sung well, especially in the aria "Lo! here the gentle lark," and the other performers acquitted themselves well. Macfarren's song by Madame F. Lablache "Ah, why do we love?" and which was the gem of the evening, being encored. Mr. Manvers appears to have improved. The concert terminated at a quarter to eleven.—Liverpool Mail, Jan. 16.

HALIFAX.—On Tuesday evening week, a grand performance of Sacred Music took place in the Parish Church, Halifax, with the organ and a chorus of sixty voices. The first part was from the Messiah; the second was a capital selection, and included Handel's choruses, "Your harps and symbols raise," "Immortal Lord," and "From the Censor." Mrs. Sunderland was the principal vocalist, and sang with her accustomed taste and feeling. Mr. Frobisher, who enjoys considerable provincial reputation as an accomplished organist, presided with great ability; indeed, he fairly promises to become one of our greatest players. The choruses were given in most excellent style. The attraction at this performance was so great that the church, which is one of the largest in the kingdom, was crowded in every part. It was estimated that there were not less than from 7,000 to 8,000 persons present. Hundreds went away unable to gain admittance.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MR. WILSON will give an entertainment on the "Songs of the Highlands," at the Princess's Concert Room, Oxford Street, on Tuesday evening, the 26th, in behalf of the fund being raised for the Distressed Highlanders. Mr. Wilson has been giving a series of Scottish Entertainments at the Music Hall, Dublin, during the last fortnight with his accustomed success.

EXETER-HALL.—The Sacred Harmonic Society performed the "Creation" on Tuesday evening. This favourite composition of Haydn invariably collects a large audience, whether on account of the lightness of its style, compared with the more severe demands of Handel on the attention, being more appreciable by the general public, or whether on account of its being the only oratorio of that master, we are unable satisfactorily to determine. We incline to the former opinion, as it cannot be doubted that, to the unpractised ear, the flowing melodies with which the composition abounds, the "fitting" (if we may use such a term) of the words to the music, and the brilliancy pervading so many of the morceaux, as so much more adapted to captivate the senses, than that severe school in which Handel writes, and which requires so much attention, and time, properly to appreciate. The performance of Tuesday night partook of the sameness which usually characterises this Society's efforts. For the reasons which we have above stated, it partook a little more of the light and shade necessary in all compositions, but in no other respects was there much difference. The air and chorus, "The marvellous work," was encored. "The Heavens are telling" was rendered unintelligible by the efforts of the organist, the total disregard of time by the chorus, and the want of understanding of its nature by the conductor. We regret that the organ is so much used at these concerts.

Apart from the instrument itself not being of the first order, it is not required in an orchestra so complete as this is; and when used, it should be sparingly, and in so masterly a manner as not to clash with the instrumentation. Its obtrusiveness was particularly remarkable also, in Mr. Phillips's air, "Now Heaven in fullest glory shown." The use of the pedal on the words, "With heavy beasts the ground is trod," was in very bad taste. Mr. Lockey made his first appearance in the tenor part of this oratorio at these concerts, and the chaste style of his singing the music allotted to him deserves approbation. He was encored in the air, "In native worth," and deservedly so. Miss Birch was the soprano. The duet for soprano and bass, "Graceful consort," sung by her and Mr. Phillips was effectively performed. The oratorio was announced for repetition next Tuesday. We observe that the committee have publicly advertised the engagement of Spohr to conduct several of his compositions during the season, which we intimated in our last week's number.

THE ANCIENT CONCERTS will take place this season on Wednesday, March 10th and 24th; April 21; May 5th and 19th; June 2nd, 16th and 30th. Handel's Messiah will be performed on the 7th of July.

MR. HAWKINS.—A burial service by Drs. Croft and Purcell was performed in Westminster Abbey, on Tuesday morning, by the members of the choir, assisted by those belonging to the Chapel Royal, and several professional persons, as a tribute to the memory of the late Mr. Hawkins, whose remains were deposited in the Cloisters on that day.

THE MELODISTS CLUB will meet for the first time this season, being the twenty-third, on Tuesday next, at the Freemason's Tavern. The prize given by W. Dixon, Esq., for a cheerful song, to be sung and accompanied by Mr. J. L. Hatton, will be awarded at the meeting in February. Sir Andrew Barnard will give a prize for a Druidical Ode and Chorus, to be sung by Mr. Machin, &c., &c., in the course of the season. The musical members of the club only are to be the candidates, of whom there are twenty.

CHORAL HARMONISTS.—The third Concert took place this season as usual, at the London Tavern, and its performance altogether was more successful than the last meeting. Spohr's "Last Judgment," principal parts by the Misses Williams, Messrs. Lockey, Machin, and Peek, occupied the first part: the choir (kept under good restraint by Mr. Westrop) executed their portions admirably. This society, instituted many years back for the practice of choral music, offers to amateurs, and professors even, the pleasing opportunity of hearing and studying our old choral music, sacred and secular. The efficient performance of the latter description of part-writing is rendered scarce in London, by restrictions imposed upon our largest choral society. We are led to this remark by Bennett's (1590) madrigal, "All creatures now are merry-minded," which opened the second part of the concert, with an encore. This madrigal was written, with many others, in honour of Queen Elizabeth, and which is a fine specimen of our primitive part-writing. The Misses Williams sang the duet from Der Freischütz, "Come be gay," which produced an encore. Mr. T. H. Severn's "The Spirit of the Shell" was performed in a manner gratifying to the public, as every effort was used to represent the conception of this talented native composer. The band, led by Mr. Dando, redeemed a little unevenness in their execution of the Serenata, by a masterly performance of Weber's beautiful overture Oberon, which concluded the concert.

CAMILLO SIVORI.—A correspondent in a Philadelphia journal thus writes in respect of this violinist.—"I forbear any attempt (as all attempts must be futile) to describe Sivori's playing: it is ethereal and cannot be condensed into language. This is the sober truth—it runs into and all about the heart, gushing now hither, now flitting thither, taking up with magic force its inscrutable emotions and sentiments, and whatever of poetic feeling is there, and carrying them along at will, till one is enchanted. This is the only word in the English language which gives the faintest idea of the effect of Sivori's inspiration. A female writer in New York has ventured to describe what seems to me indescribable: after listening to him, her critique is not only without astuteness, but is vapid and palls. Let all who can—go to hear him, if ever he plays in this city; (which if I were him, would never be graced by a repetition of a concert,) for all who do not hear him may be assured they can learn nothing from those who have had that delight. The eyes which see not his eyes when he is inspired, and the ears which do not hear the dulcet song following that inspiration, and the heart that has not been seized and held by his music, can form no conception of his poetry of sound. And so becomingly modest withal! But how often is high genius thus characterised. This communication is no puff of Sivori—the writer does not know him nor any one in the remotest manner connected with him or his interests—besides, Sivori cannot be puffed! Ole Bull could be and was, most effectually, to his hearts content and his pockets joy, (if pockets can have joy,) and I think mine danced with it last night owing to the vacancy made by some paltry coin melted away into the ethereal essence of the heart's best banquet and the dulcet song of Sivori's violin."—The letter is signed W. P. C. B. Since Sivori's arrival in America he has given six concerts at New York, nine at Boston, three at Philadelphia, two at Baltimore, and two at Washington. Besides this he has played at three of the Philharmonic Societies. His success has been very great, and perhaps a more legitimate one than that of Ole Bull.

THE PRICE OF GENIUS.—We are happy to find that, notwithstanding the alleged extinction of the drama, the price of dramatic genius has suffered no abatement. According to the latest state of the market, 100% a-night has been asked, and 50% a-night has been refused, by a fair ex-actress.—Punch.

CONCERT AT GREENWICH.—The concert which we announced last week, as been given at the Lecture Hall by Miss Moriatt O'Connor, was, in reality, given by Mr. Carte, the flute-player, the mistake having crept into our columns from an oversight in the letter of our correspondent.

NEW THEATRES.—It is currently reported that a new theatre for the legitimate drama is shortly to be built, and will be put under the direction and sole management of Mr. Macready. Mr. Buckstone's new theatre, the site of which is already fixed upon, in Leicester Square, will be commenced as soon as the list of shareholders is completed.

FANNY KEMBLE.—Speaking of literary matters, it has transpired that Mrs. Butler (Fanny Kemble that was) has two or more new plays ready if any manager can be found to accept her services on the terms declined by Bunn, viz. £100 a night for ten nights, and £75 for every subsequent night, the plays to be a matter of special bargain extra. Bunn's offer of £50, the highest sum, as he says, ever paid Mrs. Siddons, is considered by professionals and amateurs as most liberal, particularly as the engagement would entail another £50 a night in procuring dramatic talent necessary to afford her performances something like adequate support. With such a monstrously extravagant demand as this, in the very lowest epoch of the drama, what nonsense it is to clamour about the extortions of foreign actors. It is, however, fortunate for the traditional reputation among present playgoers of the great ornaments of the stage, that Mrs. Butler is not to reappear. Were she to do so, the admiration entertained by those who remember in their prime Downton, Kean, Young, and the rest of the great race, of whom Farren and Mrs. Glover are the last, would be put down by the present generation to the score of mankind's natural partiality for the "scenes of their youth, when every sport could please." Fanny Kemble was the "Boz" of the stage—the pet of a coterie who succeeded in persuading the public to accept, as wonderful genius, abilities very respectable in themselves, but which would never have been regarded as anything more than respectable, were it not for incessant panegyrics of people who had the general ear, and from other causes which occur probably but once in a century, and then leave behind them a reputation that becomes a standing mystery to those who created it. Actors, however, unlike authors, once they retire famous, are famous for ever, provided they do not break the spell by an inopportune reappearance before a strange or fastidious audience; the justice of an author's temporary celebrity may at any time be tested by his works. If Mrs. Butler value the preservation of the renown that undoubtedly belongs to her, no matter how acquired, she will not furnish the present class of play-goers with materials for astonishment at the Fanny Kemble mania of fifteen or sixteen years ago.—Birmingham Journal.

M. LEON-PILLET.—"The most contradictory reports have been circulated respecting the renewal of the privilege of the Opera. One party asserts that M. Leon-Pillet will resign his direction of the Opera, while others more strenuously affirm that he will still hold it, and that all will remain as heretofore. Certain journals have spoken of an interview between M. Leon-Pillet and M. Cavé, director of the FINE ARTS; but they have been rather premature in stating the result of this interview, since a definite ministerial decision must first intervene. We ourselves can positively state, that M. Leon-Pillet will still hold the privilege of the Opera, and his reinstatement will take place with a proviso that will equally satisfy the minister and the director, viz: that Leon-Pillet will have an associate. We will return to this important question, which has so much influence upon the destinies of the musical world."—La Presse Musicale.

AN INHARMONIOUS CHORUS.—Some nights since, the chorus employed in "The Bondman" committed, in the prompter's opinion, divers acts of insubordination. It was impossible to identify any particular offender, and a fine of sixpence was inflicted upon all the males. Every opposition was offered to this, and on Saturday night the entire body refused to go on in "The Bondman," unless their sixpences were restored to them. This the manager refused, but Mr. Harley, the stage director, drew his purse strings, and yielding to every man his little coin, peace and harmony were restored.—Daily News.

MUSICAL EDUCATION.—It may be said there never was a period in England when music was more cultivated than at the present day; nevertheless, the manner of its cultivation tends to deprive it of its beneficial qualities, and often renders it an evil rather than a good. It is too generally regarded and employed amongst us as one of our most trifling and frivolous amusements, instead of being studied and prosecuted as a noble science and a beautiful art, calculated to exercise the intellect—to refine the taste—to elevate the moral and religious sentiments, and to soften the heart. The substantial knowledge of the olden time is at present poorly compensated by executive dexterity. Music, as fashionably, (and, consequently), as generally cultivated, is reduced to an exhibition of flexibility of throat and rapidity of finger. The best performer is he or she who can produce the greatest number of "demisemiquavers" in a second of time! We trust, however, that there is a prospect of better times. A desire for solid musical education is on the increase, and we are glad to see that Mr. Hackett, who has lately been appointed to the important office as organist of St. Peter's Church, and whose musical skill is well known, announces his intention of combining, with the practice of the piano-forte or organ, the theory of music. This is an advantage, of which, we doubt not, many will avail themselves.—Liverpool Mail.

THE SUNDAY TIMES AND COVENT GARDEN.—The above weekly journal has made the amende honorable for its mistatement respecting the works in progress at Covent Garden. The following letters will explain all:—

"To the Editor of the Sunday Times.

"Mr. Editor—On reading your paper of Sunday last I was surprised to find a paragraph stating that a portion of the building was giving way, which caused great excitement among the workmen, and that it was only allayed by the timely calling in of Mr. Smirke. I am sure, from your usual kindness and sense of justice to Mr. Albano and those employed under his directions, you will insert the following contradiction.

"I can say throughout the pulling down of the interior of the old theatre, and making the various and extensive alterations, there has not been the least cause to fear that any portion of the old well-built building was giving way, and neither was Mr. Smirke called in, as your correspondent calls him (but he means, I suppose, Sir Robert Smirke); and I can likewise testify that the greatest possible caution and care has been used by all those employed on the works under Mr. Albano's direction to prevent any such occurrence or inconvenience to the works or workmen. And I have Mr. Albano's instructions to invite any gentlemen of the press (or architect), that are willing to view the work now in progress, they will be at liberty to do so by sending their card to the office.

"THOMAS JULIAN.

"Covent Garden Theatre, January 14, 1847."

"Mr. Editor—The paragraph which I sent you last week, respecting Covent Garden Theatre, had its origin in a rumour which was very prevalent at the west end of the town; but which, I have found on inquiry, was utterly devoid of truth; not a single untoward event has occurred, during the progress of the extensive alterations which are making in that theatre, the walls of which are of immense thickness, and calculated to last for ages. I regret, exceedingly, that I should have been the innocent cause of giving a moment's uneasiness to any persons connected with that establishment.

"YOUR REPORTER."

This settles the question.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

AN OLD BELLows BLOWER.—The second letter has unfortunately been mislaid, but we shall be delighted to hear at all times from our kind correspondent, and the oftener the better.

A LADY SUBSCRIBER.—Many thanks for the suggestion of our fair and courteous correspondent. We will take it into consideration—though to accomplish it effectually would be little less than the labour of Hercules which involved the cleansing of the Augean stables.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

DESTITUTE HIGHLANDERS.

Mr. WILSON

Will give an Entertainment on the

SONGS OF THE HIGHLANDS,

IN THE PRINCESS'S CONCERT ROOM, CASTLE STREET, OXFORD ST.

On Tuesday Evening next, Jan. 26, at Eight o'clock,

The proceeds of which will be given to the fund for the relief of the destitute Highlanders, when it is hoped there will be a great gathering of the sons of the mountain and the glen, who have an ear for their native strains, and a heart that can feel for the distress of their poor countrymen. Tickets and programmes may be had at the principal music shops.

THE "BEAUFORT POLKA,"

(WITH ELEGANT TITLE PAGE.)

Composed and respectfully dedicated (by permission) to the LADY BLANCH SOMERSET, by C. MILSON, Jun., is just published, at MILSON AND SON'S Pianoforte and Music Saloon,

2, ARGYLE STREET, BATH;

And to be had of every Music Seller in London and the United Kingdom. Solo, 2s.; colored 3s.; Duet, 3s.

WARREN'S 20 GUINEA COTTAGE PIANO-FORTES

ARE NOW SELLING AT THE
Manufactory, 71, Leadenhall Street,
(Removed from 1 and 2, Liverpool Street, Bishopsgate Street.)

These Instruments are well manufactured of the best seasoned wood, FINE FULL TONE AND GOOD TOUCH. A two years warranty given with each instrument, ESTABLISHED TWENTY-ONE YEARS. The only house in London where a good sound instrument can be obtained at the above low price, (for cash only). SMALL PROFIT AND QUICK RETURNS!

JOHN WARREN, 71, Leadenhall St., opposite Aldgate Pump

TO AMATEURS AND PROFESSORS OF THE VIOLIN
AND TENOR

J. STEWART'S
REGISTERED VIOLIN AND TENOR HOLDER.
J. HART

Respectfully informs Amateurs and Professors of the Violin and Tenor, that he is now prepared to supply them with the above INSTRUMENT, which, for ease of application and efficiency, surpasses anything of the kind that has yet been offered to the public. J. H. is borne out in this assertion by the opinion of some of the first violinists of the country, who have acknowledged its superiority by adopting the same, conceiving it to be the grand desideratum to the above instruments.

JUST IMPORTED, A CASE OF
FINE ROMAN STRINGS,

Of which a fresh supply will be received every three months.

J. HART'S

Musical Instrument Warehouse, 14, Princes-street, Soho,
Where may be seen a fine collection of Cremona and other Instruments, comprising Stradivarius, Guarnerius, Amati, and other celebrated makers.

FOR COUGHS, COLDS, IRRITATION OF THE THROAT, HOARSENESS, &c.

PECTORAL EMULSION,

Prepared strictly according to the formula of a distinguished Physician in Paris. This preparation having enjoyed great celebrity for many years on the Continent, as well as undergoing a trial for some time in private practice in this country, is now introduced to the public as the most agreeable, efficacious, and speedy cure for the above affections, relieving the most obstinate Coughs in a few hours. To Singers, Professors, and Public Speakers it will be found invaluable.

PREPARED ONLY BY

TURNER AND SPRATT,

English and Foreign Chymists, 7, TICHBORNE STREET, Haymarket.
in Bottles at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 6d. each.—Importers of French Jujubes and Syrups.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE

Is acknowledged as the best specific after three years' trial, for improving the voice and removing all affections of the throat, strongly recommended to clergymen, singers, actors, public speakers, and all persons subject to relaxed throats.

The Proprietors have just received the following Testimonial, amongst many others, from MADAME ANNA BISHOP:—

"DEAR SIR,—I am happy to say that all I have heard respecting the efficacy of DR. STOLBERG'S celebrated LOZENGE is perfectly true, as yesterday, feeling myself very fatigued (singing nightly at the Theatre), I took several of the Lozenges, and my voice was very clear, and my throat quite free from relaxation. I am, Dear Sir, Yours truly, ANNA BISHOP."
"18th November 1846.—Jermyn Street."

Berchay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Churchyard;
W. Edwards and Newbery and Sons, St. Paul's Churchyard; Sanger, and Dietrichsen and Hannay, Oxford-street; and retail by all respectable Chymists in the Kingdom.

ASSEMBLY ROOMS, LONG'S ROYAL HOTEL, CLIFTON, NEAR BRISTOL.

Mrs. LONG begs respectfully to inform the Public, that the above Rooms are let for Concerts, Lectures, &c., on the following terms, viz.—

	s	d.
The Large Room, for a Morning	2	2 0
Do. Do. for an Evening	3	3 0
The Smaller Room for a Morning	1	11 6
Do. Do. for an Evening	2	12 6

Clifton, Bristol, Dec. 18, 1846.

JULLIEN'S NEW DANCE MUSIC FOR THE NEW YEAR.

The British Army Quadrille, the American and Camelia Polkas—Jullien. The Garland Waltz and Casino Polka—Koenig. Adrienne Valse and La fin du Bal Galop—Barret. The above compositions, in addition to being the newest and most fashionable of the day, will be found superior to all others in their applicability to Dancing, the time throughout all of them being carefully marked for that especial purpose.

ROYAL MUSICAL CONSERVATORY,
214, REGENT STREET, and 45, KING STREET.

JULLIEN'S VOCAL MUSIC FOR THE NEW YEAR. JUST PUBLISHED:—

"The Preference," and "The Castle and the Cottage," Balfé; Venetian Serenade, Roch Albert; "O how can I smile," Baker; "Go not to the Rhine," Glover; "O meet me in the Flow'ry Dell," Hatton; and "I lov'd thee in those early years," G. Linley. The above new and fashionable compositions, which are admirably adapted for the festive circle, are now being sung with unprecedented success by the most eminent vocalists at the principal concerts in town and country.

ROYAL MUSICAL CONSERVATORY,
214, REGENT STREET, AND 45, KING STREET.

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, and the British Army and Navy.

J. KOHLER'S NEW PATENT LEVER INSTRUMENTS.

J. KOHLER having brought to perfection and obtained Her Majesty's Letters Patent for the above invention, which he has applied to the CORNOPEAN, TRUMPET, CORNETTO, TROMBONES, and FRENCH HORNS, he can now with great confidence, after an experience of Five years in bringing the action to its present state of perfection, recommend them to her Majesty's Army and Navy, and all Professors and Amateurs. The advantages that this Patent gives to these Instruments are;—

1. All the Tones and Semitones produced by the Patent Lever are quite as perfect as the Natural Notes on the Instrument.

1. The intervals on the DIATONIC and CHROMATIC Scales are perfect, the compass greater, and the most rapid and difficult passages may be performed with a precision, freedom, and fulness of tone, and comparative ease to the performer.

3. Combinations in harmony, which never before could be performed at all by any Brass Instruments, may now be executed with perfect ease, and Ten or Twelve Instruments on this principle can produce a more rich and sonorous effect than Twenty Four could do on the old principles. The harshness of tone in the former Brass instruments is entirely done away with, and a set of these Instruments heard together, produces Military and harmonious effects never before heard.

These Instruments are now in use in HER MAJESTY'S PRIVATE BAND, FIRST LIFE GUARDS, ROYAL HORSE GUARDS, GRENADEIR GUARDS, FUSILIER GUARDS, ROYAL ARTILLERY, 60TH ROYAL RIFLES, &c. Testimonials, Drawings, and Prices, forwarded on application to J. KOHLER'S Manufactory, 35, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London.

MEDICAL GALVANISM.

HORNE, THORNTHWAITE, & WOOD, Successors to E. PALMER, 123, Newgate-street, in submitting their improved ELECTRO-GALVANIC MACHINES, beg to state, that they have availed themselves of the discoveries of De la Rive, Faraday, Smee, and others, by which they are enabled to construct a coil with all the required intensity and quantity of electricity for medical use, thereby effecting both a saving of expense and trouble to the invalid, and placing in his hands an effective, powerful, and simple instrument, that may be excited at a minute's notice, and without trouble.—Price, £3. 3s.; £3. 10s.; and £5. 5s.

PHILOSOPHICAL APPARATUS.—Every description of Apparatus connected with Chemistry, Hydraulics, Hydrostatics, Pneumatics, Frictional and Voltaic Electricity, Electro-Magnetism, Electro-Metallurgy, Optics, (including the Dissolving Views, Photography, &c.) manufactured and sold by Horne, Thornthwaite and Wood, successors to Edward Palmer, 123, Newgate Street, London.

Foreign orders, enclosing a remittance or order for payment in London, promptly attended to.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847,

A most beautiful Christmas Present, New Year's Gift,
and Etrennes.

M. JULLIEN

Has the honor to announce that his

MUSICAL ANNUAL FOR 1847

Is now Published; and is by far the best work of the kind that has ever appeared; contains no less than

THIRTY PIECES OF VOCAL AND FOURTEEN OF INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC,

The greater part of which have never before been published, the copyrights
having been purchased expressly for this work, at an immense cost, with the view of rendering it immeasurably superior to any of its predecessors.

The portion which has already appeared comprise those pieces only whose decided success has induced M. JULLIEN, at the request of numerous influential patrons, to include them in this Selection.

The Illustrations, in addition to the elaborately executed Covers, Title, and Dedication pages, include

TWO MAGNIFICENT VIEWS OF THE

Interior of Covent-Garden Theatre,

The one taken during the brilliant scene exhibited in that splendid arena of
the occasion of M. JULLIEN'S GRAND BAL MASQUE; the other a VIEW OF THE THEATRE TAKEN DURING THE CONCERTS,
the grouping of the Figures in both Views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant. To those who have visited the Theatre on either occasion, the ALBUM will form a delightful SOUVENIR, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of
the gorgeous scene.

A SPLENDIDLY-COLOURED

PORTRAIT

Of the celebrated Danseuse,

MADLE. FLORA FABBRI,

In the admired Pas, LA CASTIGLIANA.

AN ORIGINAL SUBJECT,

"THE FORTUNE TELLER,"

Illustrating BAKER's beautiful Ballad of that name.

The whole of this department of the ALBUM has been under the active superintendence of J. BRANDARD, Esq., whose pencil only has been employed in its production.

Nothing more need be said in favour of this ALBUM, and in proof of its vast superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the Contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe: viz.

ROSSINI,	VERDI,	DONIZETTI,	RUBINI,
ROCH-ALBERT,	HÖLZELL,	GOLDBERG,	SCHIRA,
SCHULZ,	STEEPEL,	DUPREZ,	JOSE GOMIS,
MASARNAU,	MARATZEK,	BALFE,	JULLIEN,
HATTON,	BARRET,	ALEXANDER LEE,	KÖENIG,
KNIGHT,	BAKER,	FARMER,	LINLEY,
LAKE,	FITZBALL,	MOULD,	HURREY,
FOREST,	ALBERT SMITH,	DESMOND RYAN,	&c.

It will thus be perceived that in addition to the latest compositions of the best English Composers, the ALBUM will contain some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany, France, Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting
the attention of the Continental dilettanti.

PRICE 18s. AND £1. 1s.

ROYAL CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC
214, REGENT-STREET, AND 45, KING-STREET.

Sovereign LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY, No. 5, ST. JAMES'S STREET, LONDON.

Trustees.

Sir A. Brydges Henniker, Bart.
B. Bond Cabbell, Esq., M.P.

Henry Pownall, Esq.
Claude Edward Scott, Esq.

Directors.

CHAIRMAN, Lieutenant-Colonel Lord

DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN, T. C. Granger,

Esq., M.P.

John Ashburner, Esq., M.D.

T. M. B. Batard, Esq.

Philip P. Blyth, Esq.

Assurances granted on favourable terms.

The Rates of Premium, of which the following are specimens, are on the lowest scale consistent with security:—

Annual Premiums for Assuring £100.

Age.	For One Year.	For Seven Years.	For Whole Life.
20	£ 1 1 0	£ 1 1 8	£ 1 13 7

A new plan of Accumulative Assurance, by depositing instead of paying Premiums, thus:—

By the Deposit Plan, commencing at the age 20, £40 per Annum secures the assured at the age of

20 a Policy for.....	£ s. d.
20	949 16 4
30	1779 1 0
40	2495 0 0
50	3111 19 8
60	3650 9 0

Deferred Annuities, to commence at any specified age, granted either with or without return of the Premiums, in case the age at which the annuity is to commence is not attained.

H. D. DAVENPORT, Secretary.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

The nobility, gentry, and public are respectfully informed, that the
NRW THEATRE

Will Open the first Week in April,

For the performance of the

LYRICAL DRAMA

On a scale of efficiency in every department never before attempted in this country.

THE BALLET

Will include the names of the most celebrated artists. The prospectus for the arrangement of the season will be issued in due course. Mr. Beale, Director.
January 9th, 1847.

NEW SONGS

AND PIANOFORTE MUSIC, Particularly adapted for Teaching.

PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Gems of Balfe's opera, the Bondman, arranged by Charles W. Glover	2 0
"They say there is some distant land," from the Bondman, by W. C. Macfarren	2 6
Fantasia on "Sul campo della gloria," from Belisario, by F. Hüntgen	3 0
"Melodie Allemande," op. 147, ditto	3 0
"Retour au Chateau," air national, op. 144, ditto	3 0
"La Serenade," op. 146, ditto	3 0
The favourite air "Lucy Neale," arranged by Chantieu	2 0
Ditto "Va Pensiero," ditto	2 0
"Pestal," by Rimbault, (very easy)	1 0
"Lucy Neale," ditto, ditto	1 0
The celebrated "Bridal Polka," (4th edition,) Solo and Duet, each	3 0

SONGS.

"Dream on, young hearts," by Spörle; a gay melody, with a very easy accompaniment, and pleasing words; (third edition)	2 0
"The Irish Emigrant," words by Lady Dufferin, music by Barker	2 0
"In the Greenwood Tree," as sung by Miss Steele, music by B. Richards	2 6
Ditto, as a Duet	2 6
"Go, memory go," one of the favourite songs from the Bondman, Balfe	2 0
"They say there is some distant land," sung by Mr. Harrison	2 0
"Sweet Spring," song, G. A. Macfarren	2 0

CHAPPELL, 50, NEW BOND STREET.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, at the "Nassau Steam Press,"
by WILLIAM SPENCER JOHNSON, 60, St. Martin's Lane, in the parish of St.
Martin's in the Fields, in the County of Middlesex; where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed post paid. To be had of G. Purkiss, Dean Street, Soho; Strange, Paternoster Row; Wiseheart, Dublin; and all Booksellers.—Saturday, January 23rd, 1847.

The Musical World.

(PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT NOON.)

A RECORD OF THE THEATRES, MUSIC, LITERATURE, FINE ARTS,
FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE, &c.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 18s. Stamped; 12s. Unstamped; to be forwarded by Money Order or Postage Stamp to the Publisher, W. S. Johnson, "Nassau Steam Press," 60, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross.

Each Subscriber is entitled to an Admission to an Annual Concert, and a Place of Music, (regular Weekly and Monthly).

No. 5.—VOL. XXII.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 30, 1847.

PRICE THREEPENCE
STAMPED, FOURPENCE

NOTICE.

Our Subscribers are presented this week with a GRAND TRIUMPHAL MARCH, composed expressly for this Journal, by M. MOSCHESLES.

THE RIVAL ITALIAN OPERAS.

"Audi alteram partem."

We would fain allow this subject to drop for the present, and let the two operas alone until the proper time arrives for discussing their merits on the occasion of their actual demonstration. But the press has taken so unexpected a position, and its various organs have argued on either side with such vehemence, and in many cases with such indiscreet betrayal of partiality, that we should be forgetful of our duty towards our readers and the public, were we to refrain from doing our utmost to place the subject in its proper light, and clear away the mist of malaria which has arisen from the unhealthy soil of party feeling to wrap it in obscurity. The plain question stands thus: Mr. Lumley, the Director of Her Majesty's Theatre, by some means or other, with which neither the public nor the press has anything to do, has given such cause of discontent to the principal members, vocal and instrumental, of his company, as to induce them to leave him in a body, and not to stop at this, but to found a rival establishment of their own. Our high opinion of Mr. Lumley, and our sense of the improvements he has effected in the condition and prospects of Her Majesty's Theatre, cannot be doubted. We have never been backward in giving expression to our sentiments on this point, and Mr. Lumley would be the last, we are sure, to tax us with misappreciation of the services he has conferred upon the public in his capacity of director of the largest and most important musical theatre in the world. But were we to consult exclusively the interest of Mr. Lumley, or any other servant of the public, we should derogate from the duty which we owe to our readers, who expect, and have an imperative right to expect from us the truth, unadulterated by personal prejudice of any kind whatsoever. This we shall endeavour to do. We have nothing to expect from either party, and hold in very small account the attempts of certain active denizens of one of the parties to injure us by studious vituperation of The Musical World in quarters accessible to their insinuations. We court neither, prefer neither, and fear neither. Our principal object in this paper is to show that both suffer from the mistaken zeal of certain of their adherents, and the violent and injudicious method of its expression. We shall from week to week, until the Operas commence proceedings, devote a portion of our space to extracts from the various journals which take an interest in the subject; and by a comparison of their opinions and asseverations, we shall hope to arrive at the truth, so as to be enabled to lay it before our readers naked and bare for their consideration. With this promise we unite another, viz., that throughout our discussion of this engrossing and, in some respects, unpleasant topic, we shall be influenced by no personal considerations whatever.

Last week we gave a detailed account of a written prospectus which had been politely forwarded to us by Mr. Lumley. Since then this prospectus has been printed and advertised in the public journals, with the solitary exception of the Morning Chronicle. Why the Morning Chronicle was excepted may readily be devined by those who have remarked the style in which that journal, during the last twelve months, or thereabouts, has descanted on the performances at Her Majesty's Theatre. The publication of this prospectus has however been the signal for a charge of literary artillery from the adherents of either side. It may be as well, in a few words, to inform our readers, all of whom may not be acquainted with the subject, what policy the various influential journals pursue in respect of this mooted question. The Times, with the acumen and the spirit of independence which are its characteristics, enters in no way into the controversy; and in giving the outline of Mr. Lumley's programme confines itself to a simple statement of facts, or such as it has every right to consider facts, there being no conceivable reason why Mr. Lumley's pledges to his patrons and the public should be doubted. The Herald, with a like feeling, has even gone further than the Times, in accompanying its announcement of the opera prospectus by a declaration of impartiality which we transferred to our pages last week. The Daily News, following the same line of policy, has put forth a like reprobation of party feeling, which has also appeared in the pages of this journal. But now comes the other side of the question. The Athenæum, a journal respectable from the talent with which it is edited, and influential from its position and circulation, has by the general tone of its articles about the opera created an impression by no means favourable to its impartiality. The unmingled disapproval which it bestowed on all Mr. Lumley's efforts last season, to say nothing of the biting and sarcastic vein of doubt and ridicule in which it discourses of the prospects of the coming season, leaves small room for belief that the musical critic of the Athenæum is in any way favourable to Her Majesty's Theatre. Still we are bound to add, that this evidence of acrimonious feeling towards the old establishment is joined to no puffing or inflated eulogy of its rival. One word must dismiss the two journals which remain to be signalized—the Morning Post and the Morning Chronicle. These are purely and unconditionally partisans, the former, of Mr. Lumley's establishment, the latter of his opposers. The talent and industry evinced by these journals in the discussion of the question is as nearly as possible equal.

With these preliminaries let us proceed to state the occurrences of the week. The Chronicle, as our readers are aware, replied to the prospectus of Mr. Lumley, and the comments thereupon of certain journals, by an article in which the advertised engagement of Jenny Lind and the promised opera of Mendelssohn were treated (to quote the Chronicle phraseology) as "mere moonshine." In Saturday's Times however, appeared the following:—

"HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—By letters from Vienna we are enabled to announce, that Mademoiselle Jenny Lind will leave that capital in February, in order to arrive in London early enough to prepare for her debut at the reopening of Her Majesty's Theatre after Easter. As to the claims made by Mr. Bunn on this distinguished artiste, whatever their merits may be, they only apply to a special period long past. We have reason to believe that an offer has been made in the most fair and honourable manner to enter into an investigation of any demands for compensation that Mr. Bunn can possibly have."

That Mr. Bunn regarded the offer referred to in a very different light may be gathered from the fact of his having addressed a letter to the public journals in which he applies to it the expressive epithet "contemptible," and asserts his determination to reject it and any other that might be made. This letter appeared in our last week's impression. Touching the other point, the opera of Mendelssohn, the following remarks appeared in the Times of Monday, when the prospectus of Mr. Lumley, which had previously only been seen by the representatives of the public press in a written form, had been officially advertised in the columns of that journal.

"The official publication of the programme for the approaching season confirms all that was published in this journal, and, of course, sets at nought the doubts which have been uttered because the statements of Thursday last were not officially made. With respect to a conjecture set on foot that a translation of Shakspeare's Tempest would not be acceptable to Dr. Mendelssohn as a subject for an opera, it may be mentioned that there is in London a letter from the eminent composer, in which he expresses his great satisfaction at M. Scribe's poem, accompanied with sundry suggestions. It is just the sort of letter that would come from a person actually at work on a subject. With respect to the appearance of Jenny Lind, we have, on the one hand, the positive and official assurance of the fact by the manager of Her Majesty's Theatre, and on the other hand, the statement, confirmed by Mr. Bunn, that she is under a contract with that gentleman which will prevent her appearing elsewhere than at Drury-lane. It is not our office to give legal opinions, but it seems to us very doubtful whether the existence of a contract with one manager could prevent the appearance of a performer at the theatre of another, and whether an affair of the sort might not be readily settled by paying into court a sum which a jury might consider a fair compensation. In other words, it seems a matter of damages, and not of injunctio. Moreover, it is said by some parties that the contract only refers to a period long past, and has nothing to do with this year, 1847. This is of course an affair for lawyers to consider, but the fact of the discussion shows the very great importance which is attached to the engagement of Jenny Lind, even by those who can scarcely be considered favourable to Her Majesty's Theatre. In a letter, dated January 7, she notifies her intention of leaving Vienna in February, in order to arrive in London in March. We are informed that Coletti, whose engagement is mentioned in the programme as under negotiation, is now actually engaged. On his account, it is said, Verdi's opera, I due Foscari will be produced very early in the season."

It will be remarked that the Times merely intends to convey in this, that the doubts thrown by certain parties upon the genuineness of the prospectus were set at rest by its official publication in a printed form in the advertising sheets of the morning papers. The writer, moreover, though insinuating that a letter from Mendelssohn on the subject of the opera spoken of was in London, does by no means state the fact of having seen that letter, which proceeding from so grave an authority as the Times, would have settled the question definitively. Nor does the Times, while informing its readers that a letter from Jenny Lind, "dated Jan. 7, notifying her intention of leaving Vienna in February, in order to arrive in London in March," at all pledge itself that she is coming to Her Majesty's Theatre, which is not precisely synonymous with the fact of her coming to London. Information from the Times is information—that all the world believes. No one can therefore blame it for being guarded and chary of its announcements. In the meantime the Chronicle is not idle, but endeavours to strengthen the position it has assumed by further argument, in the form of letters, and extracts from letters, with comments thereupon. That somebody must be wrong is sufficiently evident from the contents of the document. But let us give them in order. On Monday we read, with no little astonishment, the following remarks in the Chronicle, which prefaced a letter from Mr. Bunn to Jenny Lind, that we shall cite further on.

"JENNY LIND.—It is with great gratification we are enabled to announce to our readers, that the great obstacle to the appearance in this country of Jenny Lind has been removed, and that there can now be no reasonable doubt as to her début being made at Drury Lane in due course, the lessee having in the handsomest manner consented to her singing either in German or Italian, at her option. Although this important concession will subject Mr. Bunn to a considerable increase in his nightly expences, and he might at once have realised a considerable sum without any risk, we think that he has displayed a proper feeling in thus keeping faith with the public, after he has announced in two successive seasons the advent of the Swedish nightingale, whom we sincerely congratulate on this happy result. Jenny Lind will indeed be delighted to have the opportunity of proving that her alleged reason for not having up to this moment fulfilled the contract with Mr. Bunn, signed in January, 1845, in the presence of the Earl of Wesmorland, our minister in Berlin, was really true, that she was unable to conquer the difficulties of the English language, and that no mercenary considerations of a more lucrative contract had entered her mind. Next to the delight of admiring the genius of an artist, there is always the additional pleasure of being able to acknowledge the value of character. Good faith, honour, and punctuality in the observance of dealings with managers, are a guarantee that artists will not disappoint the public. The game of outbidding is always a dangerous one, both for manager and artist, as was proved signally in the case of Gardoni, the tenor, who was bought off from Milan for Paris, and from Paris in turn for London, and if he were worth the purchase, might no doubt be secured for any other lyrical capital."

We agree with the last paragraph entirely, considering that an engagement should not only be legally but honourably binding. Managers will henceforth have no confidence whatever in celebrated artists, if a compact made with them on liberal terms can, ere completed, be violated at caprice. But this by the way. From all the preceding remarks we expected at least to peruse a document which should placé the advent of Jenny Lind to Drury Lane beyond all question. How we were disappointed in reading what follows, may be easily imagined. "We subjoin," pursues the Chronicle, a copy of Mr. Bunn's letter to Jenny Lind, and in a few days her name will doubtless appear in the Drury Lane bills officially." The letter is as follows:—

"London, January 23, 1847.

"MADAME.—The manager of Her Majesty's Theatre has this day issued a programme of his season's arrangements, a copy whereof I enclose you, at the head of which you will find your own name. Although, in common with others, I have little faith in any prospectus issued from that theatre, it is necessary I should bring the circumstance to your knowledge. For my own part, I do not believe you have signed any but a conditional engagement with the management of Her Majesty's Theatre, deeming it impossible that an artiste of such celebrity and character could visit this country liable to the consequences of two attested contracts, and prepared to forfeit the one for the larger offer subsequently held out in the other. As it is alleged that the proposed violation of your engagement with me is based upon your inability to master the English language, I repeat the offer contained in my letter of the 30th of last March, that you sing in either German or Italian, and thus remove any objections, on your part, to your appearance at Drury-Lane Theatre. I have resolved to repudiate any offer of a compromise, not based on the important condition of your début in England taking place in this theatre; as well to enable me to keep faith with the public, as to silence the groundless representations resorted to by the friends of Her Majesty's Theatre. I therefore trust, that having got rid of all impediment, you will apprise me by the first post of the precise time I may expect you, to enable me to make every necessary preparation. I am, Madame, your very obedient servant,

"A. BUNN.

"Mademoiselle Jenny Lind, Vienna."

Digitized by Google

Which merely goes to say, that Mdile. Jenny Lind may sing at Drury Lane if she please, and choose her own language, be it German or Italian. No one doubted it. But does this letter at all warrant the introductory remarks of the Chronicle? Most assuredly no! The Chronicle then proceeds to say:—

"We might break off here, but as it is declared by a contemporary that Jenny Lind had resolved to come to London and set Mr. Bunn's conduct at defiance, we reprint her own letter on the subject, printed in our columns Jan. 7, 1846, the original of which is in French:—" and accordingly the letter is printed in full, or rather a translation thereof. Here it is:—

"How shall I reply for so much kindness? You will tax me with ingratitude, but I hope that your opinion of my good faith will not be affected. I have written to Mr. Bunn to request him, as a favour, to return my signature, and to free me from a promise which it is impossible for me to keep. I admit that I was wrong to allow myself to be persuaded that the English language would be easy enough for me to appear on the stage. I am now convinced of the utter impossibility of such an attempt, and I hope that Mr. Bunn is gentleman enough not to seek to profit by the circumstances which led to that fatal signature—my position in respect to M. Meyerbeer, whose opera (the Camp of Silezia) was the principal condition. Truly I was teased, surprised, and I signed, not knowing how and what, between the acts of the opera, under the influence of my part. Finally, if I have made a blunder (bévue), I cannot be the victim of a counsel as destructive as it was inconsiderate. Never shall I be enabled to sing in English; my habits (dispositions) are opposed to it; but if ever I had sufficient confidence to believe myself capable of being able to sing at the Italian Opera, at the Queen's Theatre, you may believe in my word of honour that the affair of Drury Lane would prevent me from doing so. I must deplore the enthusiasm which caused me to sign the promise to appear there, for it deprives me for ever from the happiness of seeing your fine country, and to seek for the suffrages of a great people. May I then request you to exercise your influence with Mr Bunn to relieve me from a burthen which weighs on my mind and saddens me? I repeat to you that I do not calculate on signing any other engagement in England. I have the honour to be, with the most perfect consideration, your very humble servant,"

"Copenhagen, Oct. 18, 1845."

To which the Chronicle annexes the following paragraph in eulogy of the Swedish nightingale's unbroken faith:—

"We can only add to the above explicit declaration, that from every authentic information which has reached us respecting Jenny Lind's intentions, she has, much to her honour, invariably confirmed the resolution she has so forcibly expressed in her letter, not to sing in London until Mr. Bunn's contract was placed in her hands."

But the Chronicle overlooks the fact that he is writing in the year 1847, January 23, and that the letter of Jenny Lind is dated 1845, October 18, which makes all the difference in the world, the long interval which has elapsed since, without any signs of Mademoiselle Jenny Lind's anxiety to fulfil her engagement proving beyond question her indifference, or her regret for having accepted it.

But on this point we have more to advance in another place. Not content with the above, the Chronicle attacks the Mendelssohnian feature of Mr. Lumley's programme, with even more vehemence, in the next day's paper. After quoting some remarks of his own, which appeared in our number of last week, and some counter-remarks from his opponent, the Morning Post, and one of its constant satellites, the Sunday Times, the critic introduces to his readers, with an appropriate preparatory flourish, the following most startling letter from Mr Buxton, Mendelssohn's "confidential agent and publisher in London:—"

"12, Newgate-Street, Jan 23, 1847.

"Dear Sir—You may, if you like, flatly contradict every word the Post and the Times have put forth respecting Mendelssohn having made any arrangement with the Italian Opera House. Up to the 16th of January he had neither seen a libretto nor written a note towards an opera; and he is the last man in existence to make an engagement without being sure he can keep it. As far as Mendelssohn is concerned it is all fabrication. It even depends on my letter, which I have written to-day, whether he comes over this year or not.—I am, Sir, your most obedient servant,

"E. Buxton (Lewer, and Co.)"

That the above letter is somewhat difficult to get over no one can deny, who is aware of the extreme intimacy that exists between Mr. Buxton and Dr. Mendelssohn. The following day, however, we sent at an early hour for our Post, expecting to find in its columns some kind of statement which, while it shamed the Morning Chronicle, would set the matter entirely at rest. Judge of our astonishment on reading what follows:—

"HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—The only notice we think it necessary to take of the barefaced assertion of a morning contemporary, in which our authority is called into question, is, that what we stated in reference to the programme of Her Majesty's Theatre, was founded upon documents of the most clear and undoubted nature. As regards the falsehoods published, they are parts of the wretched system unblushingly adopted last year, and which was ultimately exposed, so as to deprive the concoctions of those parties of all character, and end it. That it should have increased tenfold in virulence, at the present juncture, does not surprise us; but what does astonish us is, that any hope should be entertained, after the innumerable exposures, that it should this season meet with the gullibility necessary to give it currency. The amusing part of this affair is, that the natural tendency of these malevolent inventions and intrigues is to excite an interest in, and to do good to the very parties attacked."

We very much query the latter part of this article, in reference to the "interest excited." That curiosity is excited, and in no small degree, we cannot doubt—curiosity to know which of the two parties has had the boldness to place itself in an equivocal position before the public. The season's events will decide the question, and at the end either the Chronicle or the Post must hide its head in shame.

In respect to the difficulty with Jenny Lind, our opinion differs from the general one. Having no possible right to doubt the promises contained in Mr. Lumley's prospectus, a document on the truth of which depends not merely his faith as a manager, but his honor as a gentleman, we profess our entire belief of every word it contains, and feel confident that the indecision of the celebrated songstress depends altogether on a timidity and nervousness which are very natural in her position. She has in some degree compromised her great patron, Meyerbeer, in the Drury Lane affair; and it is not at all to be wondered at that she should dread being received in England by opposition from a set party, no matter on what grounds, which would most probably be the case if she sang at Her Majesty's Theatre previously to the claims of Mr. Bunn being satisfied, by law or by compromise. Jenny Lind is wise enough to know that even a partial failure in England would be almost a death-blow to her on the continent, and she is perfectly justified in holding back until all danger of opposition be smothered. Her talent must have full and fair play, and if it be as magnificent as Germany declares, her triumph will be certain, and Mr. Lumley's enterprise rewarded. The same feeling which prevents us from entertaining any doubts whatever about the engagement of Jenny Lind, inspires us, in the face of Mr. Buxton's letter, with equal confidence in the promised opera of Mendelssohn, the most splendid feature in the prospectus. It is possible that Mr. Buxton may be mistaken, but it is not probable that Mr. Lumley would take so great a liberty with the illustrious composer, as to use his name without his authority; especially since the non-fulfilment of the pledge given to the Opera subscribers would compromise the honour of Mendelssohn no less than that of the manager of the establishment. This would indeed be an ungrateful return for all the favours which the English public has so lavishly heaped upon the composer of Elijah. No—Mr. Lumley is too wise, too prudent, and too much of a gentleman thus to commit himself. The name of Mendelssohn cannot, like that of a modern Italian, be made the pivot of a job, or the commodity of a market. With this belief, we reiterate our approval of Mr. Lumley's programme, and our assurance of his success. The error of those who doubt the candour of the Opera proceedings must be traced to a mistaken notion of making the director of that establishment answerable for the absurd philippics of certain of his literary champions.

We had intended to have examined the article on Mr. Lumley's prospectus which appeared in the Morning Post, but on reflection it would be waste of time and space. Such an odd, incoherent jumble cannot possibly be hurtful to the Opera, since the satire it contains will utterly escape the majority of readers. We cannot refrain, however, from expressing our astonishment, that the name of Mr. Balfe, the conductor, should have been overlooked by the writer, in an article which condescends to mention the very meanest of the subordinates, in the minuteness of its detail. Surely Mr. Balfe is entitled to some distinction at the Opera, not merely as the director of the orchestra, but as Mr. Balfe, the composer. In forgetting him, the Post has committed, at least, a blunder.

THE NEW THEATRE IN LEICESTER SQUARE.

THE Morning Post of Thursday contains an article, in which is set forth the names of several noblemen who have subscribed largely to the erection of the new theatre in Leicester Square. The only portion of the article to which we attach any importance is contained in the following sentence:—"A further sum of from £25,000 to £30,000 will be necessary for its completion." We have not the slightest doubt of this. The sum mentioned would go very near completing the building of a theatre of the size laid down in the article of the journal. We can therefore imagine that the lordly money subscribed amounts to little or nothing. It is ridiculous to fancy that a home for the legitimate drama is required in the neighbourhood of the Haymarket. Mr. Webster has accomplished everything requisite to sustain the legitimate drama at his theatre, and he is not always successful. He engages the best actors in the country, he employs the most established authors, he leaves nothing undone to uphold the character of the Haymarket Theatre, which is at present the only temple of the west end set apart for the highest order of dramatic entertainment, and yet Mr. Webster does not roll in gold. He succeeds because he provides entertainments excellent in their kind, and admirably represented; but he does not always meet all the success he merits. Another theatre!!! We shall believe it when we witness its first performance. Like Thomas, we must touch to be persuaded.

MADAME BISHOP IN THE PROVINCES.

(From the Birmingham Journal, January 23.)

SINCE our last Madame Bishop has appeared at the Theatre in the characters of Isoline and Amina. On Tuesday a full house applauded to the echo the brilliant vocalism of the fair cantatrice, and as she was supported by the respectable acting and singing of Mr. King, she appeared to far greater advantage than on the first evening. Other engagements prevented our attendance on Thursday night, when she appeared in the character of Amina, in the opera of "Sonnambula." We understand, however, that it was a highly finished performance. In the ornate portions of the music, her voice showered down floods of brilliant notes; her pathos was no less remarkable, and the finale was the essence of musical voluptuousness. Last night she again essayed the part of Isoline, and with still greater success than before. In the desert scene, particularly, her expressive energy, and the modulation of her voice, were heard to great advantage. Nothing could exceed the play of her feelings as she gazed on the arid waste, and supported the inanimate form of her affianced. Wailing in accents of despair, yet ever and anon bursting forth in a transport of hopeful rapture, she alternately gave expression to the gloomiest fears and passionate devotion with power, and truth, and purity. What a fine conception is displayed in the strength which she preserves while her lover is insensible, and in the reaction that follows; and how well does her voice express the heart-sinking, the burning thirst, the love, "strong in death," and the faint dull glimmering of the lamp of life as it wavers, and sinks, and flashes into momentary brilliance, before it is quenched for ever. This was a powerful scene, fitly finished by her matchless execution of the gorgeous finale. Certainly the lady is justly entitled to a high place in the role of song; may we hope that she will again delight us with her graceful and bewitching warblings.

(From our own Correspondent.)

You may rely upon what the Birmingham Journal has stated of Madame Bishop's success. There is not a word of it exaggerated. She has become one of the greatest favourites with the Birmingham folk they have had for years. Madame Bishop sung on Monday the 18th instant at Lichfield: on Tuesday the 19th at Birmingham, where she repeated to a crowded audience The Maid of Artois: on Wednesday the 24th she sang in a concert at Shrewsbury: on Thursday in La Sonnambula at Birmingham, with immense success: on Friday also at Birmingham in the Maid of Artois. On Saturday she appeared at the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, where she obtained a complete ovation. She was greeted at each entrée with three rounds of applause and was encored in all her songs. After the concert, when Madame Bishop was stepping into her carriage, she was greeted with cheers by the members of the Philharmonic Choral Society, who assisted at the concert. From all I have heard from several gentlemen connected with the musical profession, it is my belief that Mr. Simpson has not acted with a judicious view to his own interests. He is acknowledged to be a very able theatrical manager, but entirely innocent of making arrangements for concerts. Instead of securing the aid and good will of the local publishers and professors in the different towns where Madame Bishop was engaged, he proceeded entirely on his own individual strength without any assistance from, and often against the interests of musical societies, and the consequence was, that great as was the attraction of Madame Bishop, it was not so great as it might have been made by skilful management. Madame Bishop's success could not have been greater. Mr. Simpson is blamed by all acquainted with the ways and means of regulating concerts for the want of tact he has displayed in his new management. It is to be hoped he will gather knowledge from experience. In conclusion, I can assure you, without any exaggeration of criticism, that Madame Bishop has excited a great furor in all her performances.

MEMOIR OF PALESTRINA.

(Continued from our last.)

THE reputation of Palestrina spread rapidly with the publication of his first book of masses. Each succeeding effort seemed but to strengthen and confirm his genius. It was about this period that the ecclesiastical authority resolved to work a reform in church music, which was by most considered indispensable. A few words respecting the abuses which had originated the notion of this reform may not be here out of place. The composition of entire masses and motets upon an old chant, or a profane melody, was introduced by music writers for the church about the thirteenth century, as one may see in the motets of Adam de la Hale for three voices. This custom was carried to such ridiculous extent, that while three or four voices sang in fugued counterpoint the Kyrie-Eleison, the Gloria in Excelsis, or the Credo, the person who chanted the melody gave the ancient words, or even those of the French or Italian Chanson, sometimes sufficiently gross and lascivious. The French and Belgian musicians were especially fond of this kind of composition, not having been acquainted with any other for almost two centuries, and had introduced the taste for it into the pontifical chapel, when the seat of the church government was at Avignon. When the translation of the government to Rome took place, the French, Gallo-Belgic, and Spanish singers followed the papal court, and prepared the Italians to march upon their footsteps. The first schools of music in Italy were established by foreign musicians, who taught their principles to their scholars. The scholars naturally were led to adapt themselves to the style and manner of their masters. Certain vulgar melodies had obtained so much celebrity, that every composer of note of the period, yielding to the popular demand, deemed it indispensable to take one or other of them as a theme for a mass or a motet—more than fifty musicians having written masses upon the famous Chanson, L'Homme Arme. Palestrina did not escape the contamination of the school in which he was educated. He likewise had recourse to the same Chanson, and upon it he wrote a mass for five voices, the fifth of his third book, in which he expended the greatest researches on the proportions of notation. This mass, a veritable musical enigma, put many musicians of the sixteenth century to the torture, and gave rise to the long commentaries of Zacconi in his Prattica di Musica, and of Cerone in the twentieth book of his Melopeo, to explain the system. The mass was not published till 1570; nevertheless it bears the stamp of having been written long previously; since after having laboured from 1563 to reform these monstrous abuses and insane subtleties of music, and having given in others of his ecclesiastical works, models of perfection, we cannot well believe that he would have fallen back upon his rejected errors seven years after.

The ridiculous and indecorous medley of profane and sacred music became an object of censure to the Council of Bale, and subsequently to the Council of Trent. The assembly of the latter having been closed in the month of December, 1563, the Pope, Pius the Sixth, nominated the cardinals, Vitellozzi and Borromée, who joined with themselves eight members conversant with musical affairs, principally selected from the choir of the pontifical chapel. At the first meeting of the commission it was resolved—first, that for the future the choristers should refrain from singing masses or anthems in which words of different construction were used; and, secondly, that masses written on themes of profane songs should for ever be banished from the churches. In France, where the decrees of the Council of Trent were treated with contempt, musicians still persisted for more than twenty years in following the old custom in their church music; but in Italy, and more immediately in Rome, the enactments of the commission were strictly enforced. But as yet there existed no models for the musician, if we except the masses called Sine Nomine, if such could be called models. These Sine Nomine masses, moreover, were overcharged with puerile researches of counterpoint, which darkened or annihilated the sense of the sacred context. The cardinal, chosen by the pope to execute the decrees of the Council, particularly insisted upon the necessity of rendering these texts intelligible. They proposed as models for imitation the Te Deum of Constant Festa, and, above all, the Improprie, written by Palestrina. The singers of the pontifical chapel replied, that these unskilful morceaux could not supply a standard for their masses, from which neither figured counterpoint nor cannons could be banished. The discussion was only terminated by a resolution highly honourable to Palestrina, and which proves that the superiority of his talent was at that time acknowledged beyond dispute, it being resolved that they should solicit the master to compose a mass, which should both combine the majesty of the divine service, and fulfil the exigencies of the art, such as they demanded at this epoch. If he attained the end proposed, music would be preserved for the church; in the contrary case, a resolution would have followed, which would probably have reduced all sacred music to the simple sing-song chant. Palestrina was far from being dismayed at the responsibility imposed on his genius. Moved with a holy enthusiasm, he composed three masses for six voices, which were heard for the first time at the house of the Cardinal Vitellozzi. The two first were considered beautiful; but the third excited the most intense admiration, and was considered by all who heard it as one of the most delightful inspirations of the human mind. From that time it was resolved that music should be preserved in the pontifical chapel, and in the churches of catholic worship; and that the masses of Palestrina should become models for all compositions of the same class. The third mass, which was received with such enthusiasm, was published by Palestrina, in the second book of his masses, under the title of Missa Papa Marcelli. This name, bestowed by the composer on his work, has given rise to an anecdote recorded by Bevardi, and many other writers, in which they inform us that, in consequence of the defective state of music, Marcellus the Second desired to banish it from the churches, and that Palestrina had prayed him to suspend his judgment until he had heard this mass; and that after he had heard it, the pope immediately altered his determination. The few days occupied by the pope in possession of the apostolic seat renders this history of small probability: in addition, M. Baini furnishes proofs of that which he relates, with respect to the Council of Trent, concerning choral music. If we admit the anecdote of Pope Marcellus, we must suppose that Palestrina had twice preserved religious music from the anathema with which it was threatened, which is hardly to be admitted. The motive which induced him to confer the name of Pope Marcellus on this mass is then unknown; but that is of little importance. It is certain, that Pope Pius the Fourth, after hearing this beautiful production on June 9, 1565, remunerated Palestrina by nominating him composer to the pontifical chapel, at a salary of four crowns monthly, which added to his pension of five crowns, increased his revenue to nine crowns per month, about fifty shillings sterling. Pope Gregory the Fourteenth, moved with pity by the distress in which so celebrated a musician had passed the greater portion of his days, afterwards increased these emoluments, so little commensurate with his talents.

Few historical monuments of the art afford so much interest to the student as this mass of Pope Marcellus. It distinguishes one of those rare periods, in which genius breaking down the barriers that surround the spirit of the times, suddenly opens a clear way, and traverses it with the steps of a giant. To have composed an entire mass at the epoch in which Palestrina flourished, without having recourse to imitation or fugued counterpoint, would have been considered nothing better than an imprudent undertaking, because it must needs have arraigned that which constituted the principal merit of the musician of the times. Besides, Palestrina could hardly have been insensible or averse to that style in which he was educated. We shall not therefore, be astonished to find in Pope Marcellus's "Mass" the fugued counterpoint as well as imitation, notwithstanding the obstacles which these must have thrown in the way of his accomplishment. But the manner in which he has triumphed over these difficulties, and the faculty of invention he has employed in this work, equal at least to his learning, must always excite our surprise and warmest admiration. We are astonished, upon hearing this mass, to perceive how the illustrious master has been able to give to his composition a character of angelic sweetness, by traits of harmony broad and simple, in opposition to the fugued importations rich in artifice, and consequently giving birth to a variety in style before unknown. These fugued entrées, for the most part, brief and contained in a few notes, are disposed in such a manner that the words can be always heard with the greatest ease. With regard to the composition, to the purity of the harmonies, to the art exhibited in making the different parts combine in a simple and natural manner, in distinguishing the particular kinds of voices, and making six parts progress with all the combinations of science, in the small space of two octaves and a half—all is beyond praise; and considering the era in which it was composed, the mass of Pope Marcellus may be truly considered a great effort of genius.

(To be continued.)

THE AFFINITIES.

from the German of Göthe.

(Continued from page 53.)

PART I.—CHAPTER XVII.

OTILIA, hearing some one depart, went to the window in time to see the back of Edward. She thought it strange that he left the house without seeing her, or wishing her a good morning. She became uneasy and more and more thoughtful, when Charlotte took her for a long walk, and talked on all sorts of subjects, but, as if designedly, did not mention her husband. She was, therefore, still more struck when, returning home, she found the table laid out with only two covers.

We do not like to miss even trifles to which we have grown accustomed, but it is only in important cases that such a loss gives us pain. Edward and the Captain were wanting. Charlotte had, for the first time since a long period, arranged the dinner, and it seemed to Otilia as if she was displaced. The two ladies sat opposite to each other; Charlotte spoke quite unconcernedly about the Captain's departure, and of the small hopes that existed of seeing him soon again. One thing consoled Otilia in her present condition, and that was the belief that Edward had ridden after his friend, to accompany him for a short distance.

But when they rose from table, they saw Edward's travelling-carriage under the window, and when Charlotte asked, somewhat angrily, who had ordered it, she was answered that it was the valet, who was going to pack up something else. It required all Otilia's self-possession to conceal her pain and her surprise.

The valet entered, and asked for his master's drinking-cup, a few silver spoons, and several other articles, which to Otilia seemed to signify a more distant journey—a longer absence. Charlotte drily refused his request, and said that she did not know what he meant, as he had himself, under lock and key, all that belonged to his master. The cunning man, who was really only trying to speak with Otilia, and on that account to get her out of the room on some pretext or other, was obliged to excuse himself, and adhere to his request, which Otilia was willing to grant. Charlotte, however, still refused, the valet was forced to depart, and the carriage rolled off.]

It was a frightful moment for Otilia, she could not understand it, she could not conceive it; but thus much could she feel—that Edward was torn from her for a considerable time. Charlotte felt for her position, and left her to herself. We do not venture to describe her pains—her tears; her sufferings were infinite. She only prayed God that He would help her through this day; she endured the day and the night also; and when she came to herself, she thought she had acquired another nature.

She had not collected herself, she had not resigned herself, but, after so great a loss, she still existed, and had yet more to dread. Her immediate fear upon her return to consciousness was, that after the departure of the men, she herself might be removed, for she knew nothing of the contents of Edward's letter by which her residence with Charlotte was secured. Nevertheless she was in some measure calmed by the conduct of Charlotte, who endeavoured to occupy her, and did not readily allow her to quit her side; for although she well knew that words will not effect much against a decided passion, she also knew the power of deliberation and self-consciousness, and on this account discoursed on many subjects with Otilia.

Thus it was for Otilia a great consolation when Charlotte intentionally made this wise observation. "How lively is the gratitude of those whom we calmly help over the difficulties produced by passion. Let us joyfully and cheerfully set about the work which the men have left unfinished. Thus we shall most agreeably look forward to their return, while by our moderation we preserve and advance what their violent and impatient nature might destroy."

"Now you speak of moderation, my dear Aunt," said Otilia; "I cannot conceal from you how I am struck, by the want of that quality in men, especially with respect to wine. Often have I been pained to observe, that clear understanding, prudence, regard for others, gracefulness and amiability are lost, even for many hours, and that instead of all the good, which an excellent man is able to produce, mischief and confusion have threatened to break in. How often may this have occasioned the most violent resolutions."

Charlotte agreed with her, but did not continue the conversation, as she felt that even on this point Otilia was only thinking of Edward, who, not in general, but oftener than could be wished, was wont to increase his pleasures, his loquacity, his activity, by an occasional glass of wine.

If Charlotte's remark had recalled the men, and Edward especially, to the mind of Otilia, she was still more struck when Charlotte spoke of an approaching marriage of the Captain as of a thing perfectly certain and well known, for this gave matters a turn quite different from that which she had been led to expect by the former assurances of Edward. All this increased Otilia's attention to every expression, every sign, every action, every step of Charlotte. Otilia had become sharp and suspicious, without being aware of it.

In the meanwhile Charlotte, with her acute perception, penetrated into the detail of her whole affairs, working with her own clear aptness, and compelling Otilia constantly to join with her. Without uneasiness, she reduced her household expenses. Nay, when she looked closely into matters she considered an event produced by passion as a sort of fortunate dispensation. For, in the way they had hitherto gone, they might easily have strayed into the boundless, and for want of mature consideration might, by their over-urgency, have compromised, if not destroyed, the condition of their valuable property.

The works for the park already in progress she did not interrupt. She rather allowed that to proceed, which might form a foundation for future improvements, but even this was for a particular object, namely, that her husband, on his return, should find enough occupation to amuse him.

While engaged in these labours and plans, she could not sufficiently praise the conduct of the architect. The lake, in a short time, lay extended before her eyes, and the newly-made banks were planted and covered with turf in an elegant and various style. All the rough work of the new house was finished, all that was necessary for its preservation was provided, and a stop was made at that point where the work might be pleasantly recommenced. Thus occupied, she was calm and cheerful. Otilia only seemed so; for in the whole work she regarded nothing but the signs whether Edward would return or not. In this consideration she alone found interest.

On this account, an invitation to which the peasant-boys were invited, and the object of which was to keep in order the new spacious park, was particularly welcome. Edward had already entertained the notion. A gay-coloured uniform was made for the boys, which they put on in the evening, after giving themselves a thorough washing. The wardrobe was in the castle, the superintendence of it being entrusted to the most careful and intelligent of the boys. The architect conducted the whole, and before people were aware of it, all the boys had a certain destination. They were found to be well-trained, and went through their duties not without something of military manoeuvre. Certainly, when some marched along with their pruning-hooks, knife-blades, rakes, little spades, hatchets, and brooms—when others followed with baskets to remove weeds and stones, and others again drew the huge iron roller behind—they formed a very pretty agreeable procession, in which the architect observed an elegant series of attitudes and occupations for the frieze of the summer-house. To Ottilia, on the other hand, the whole appeared only a kind of parade, which was soon to greet the master on his return.

This prompted her to receive him with something of a similar kind. For some time attempts had been made to encourage the girls of the village in knitting, sewing, spinning, and other female occupations, and these virtues had increased since the adoption of the regulations to preserve order and cleanliness in the village. Ottilia always assisted, but more accidentally, according to opportunity and inclination. She now thought to make the matter more perfect and consequent; but it is impossible to get a chorus out of a number of girls, as one can out of a number of boys. She followed the dictates of her own good sense, and without explaining herself quite clearly, she only endeavoured to inspire every one of the girls with attachment to her home, her parents, and her brothers and sisters.

With many this succeeded—only against one little lively girl was the complaint constantly made that she was without talent, and at home would do nothing whatever. Ottilia could not be angry with the girl, who was particularly fond of her, coming to her, and walking or running with her whenever permission was granted. Then the child was active, cheerful, and unwearied, the attachment to so beautiful a mistress seeming an actual requisite. At first Ottilia only tolerated the child's society, then she became fond of her, until at last they were inseparable, and Nancy accompanied her mistress everywhere.

Ottilia often walked to the garden, and was delighted to see how all was thriving. The season for berries and cherries was drawing to a close, and Nancy particularly liked the fruits of the later growth. When occupied with the other fruits, which promised so rich a crop for the autumn, the gardener constantly thought of his master, and never without wishing him back. Ottilia liked to listen to the good old man. He perfectly understood his business, and never left off talking to her about Edward.

When Ottilia expressed her delight to see the grafts thriving so well, the gardener answered doubtfully, "I only wish that my master may live to take much pleasure in them. If he were here this autumn, he would see what valuable species have been in the castle-garden since the time of his father. The present cultivators of fruit are not so much to be relied on as the Carthusians were. In the catalogue we find nothing but fine names. One grafts and rears, and at last, when the fruit comes, it turns out that it was not worth while for such trees to stand in the garden."

Most frequently, nay, nearly as often as he saw Ottilia, this faithful servant asked when his master would return. And when Ottilia could not tell the old man, he let her see, with a melancholy air, that he thought she would not trust him, and most painful to her was the feeling of uncertainty, which in this manner was forced upon her. Nevertheless she could not separate herself from these plantations. What they had partly sown and entirely planted together, was now in full blossom, and scarcely required any other attendance than that of Nancy, with her watering-pot. With what sensations did Ottilia watch the later flowers, which now began first to display themselves, and the brilliancy and fulness of which would beam forth and show her affection and gratitude on Edward's birth-day, which she often hoped to celebrate.

Nevertheless, her hopes of seeing this day were not always equally vivid. Doubt and uneasiness were always whispering around this good girl's soul.

A real open agreement with Charlotte was now not to be restored. Indeed the positions of these two ladies were widely different. If all remained as it was, and they turned into the track of legitimate life, Charlotte was a gainer with respect to present felicity, and a joyful prospect with the future was opened to her. Ottilia on the contrary lost all—we may well say all,—for she had first found life and joy in Edward, and in the present situation she felt an infinite void of which, at an earlier period, she had hardly a conception. For a heart which seeks, feels that something is wanting; a heart that has lost has the sense of a privation. Desire is transformed into impatience and indignation, and a female mind, although accustomed to wait, may step out of its circle, become active and enterprising, and do something towards its happiness.

Ottilia had not given up Edward. Indeed, how could she, although Charlotte, against her own conviction, was cunning enough to assume as a decided possibility, that a friendly calm relation might be established between Edward and Ottilia. How often at night, when she had locked herself in her room, did she kneel down before the open chest, and look over the birth-day presents, of which she had used, cut out, and made nothing. How often, at sunrise, did the dear girl hasten out of the house in which she had once found all her happiness, into the open air, which once did not suit her. She did not even like to remain on dry land. Jumping into the boat, she rowed into the middle of the lake. Then she would draw out of her pocket a book of travels, allow herself to be rocked by the waves, read, and fancy herself in a foreign country, where she always found her friend. She had always remained near to his heart, and he to her's.

(To be continued.)

*. To prevent misunderstanding it may be stated, that the Copyright of this translation belongs solely to the translator.

SONNET.

NO. XIX.

ŒDIPUS.

THOU say'st that to each other we are nought;
But from thy heart that sentence never came.
That heart, which for his mildest, gentlest flame
Love as his purest, holiest altar sought.
No,—by a thousand signals I am taught,
Soft, furtive signs, too delicate for name,
That to each other we remain the same,
Bound by those links that long ago were wrought.
And what thou art to me, love, I will say:
The one soft beam that gilds a cloudy sky,
The one mild star that views a stormy sea,
The one regret, if life should ebb away,
The one bright dream that gives a hint of joy,
The one belov'd—And what am I to thee?

N. P.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

DEURY LANE.—Of the successful début of Mr. Travers, the new tenor, which occurred on Thursday night, we shall speak at length in our next number. For the present it must suffice that he chose the part of Ferdinand, in Donizetti's Favorite, for his début, one which though "bristling" with vocal difficulties (as the Post has it,) is not unsuited to the display of those qualifications for which his voice and method are remarkable. Mr. Travers exults in a tenor voice of great purity and delicious quality, which wants nothing but the refinement of cultivation. This will come in time. Mr. Travers is given somewhat to hyperbole, which is the fault of all our singers who have visited Italy, but he has so much of the right sort of feeling, and such an evidence of earnestness in all he does, that the exaggeration is forgotten in the contemplation of the better points of his style. But of all this we must defer speaking fully till our next. The English version of The Favorite, produced for Mr. Templeton some years ago, is the same which was revived on Thursday night. The other characters were sustained by Miss Romer, Miss Collett, Messrs. Borroni, Stretton, Morgan, and Horncastle. The scenery and appointments were striking and picturesque, and the opera is altogether got up with excellent intentions. Signor Schira's appointment as director of the orchestra is likely to be highly beneficial; the band is evidently improving. Nor must we omit to praise the manner in which the choruses were sung, an evidence of the excellent training of Mr. Tully, the chorus-master. Mr. Travers was encored in the ballad of the fourth act, and called on at the end of the third and fourth acts, on both of which occasions he brought on Miss Romer to share the honours. The success of the new tenor was unequivocal. The house was well filled. For further particulars, see our next week's number.

HAYMARKET.—On Thursday a juvenile night was given at this theatre, the performances comprising She Stoops to Conquer, and The Invisible Prince. The house was exceedingly crowded and the extravaganza seemed to give unqualified delight no less to the juvenile portion of the audience than to the more mature. The new comedy, by Dion Bourcault, is entitled The School for Scheming. The green-room gossip speaks of it in the highest terms of praise.

PRINCESS'S.—A new two-act drama, entitled The King of the Brigands, was produced at this theatre on Thursday evening with very equivocal success. The piece is not entirely devoid of interest, but the characters were altogether unsuited to the actors. Mr. Compton, who performed the chief personage, was never less happy than on this occasion. His humour was entirely lost, and he seemed to have but a vague notion of the part he represented. The drama is evidently a translation from the French, but seems to have suffered considerably in its transfer into English. We have seldom witnessed at this house a production of less merit. The curtain fell on The King of the Brigands with some slight manifestations of approval, which, however, were counteracted by symptoms of disapprobation. The majority of the audience took no part whatsoever with either side, and as far as we may judge, The King of the Brigands appeared to have died a natural death. We are sorry to record the ill-success of the drama. The management of the Princess's is seldom guilty of producing anything so indifferent. The piece received every benefit that could be conferred on it, from excellent scenery and appropriate dresses. The illness of Miss Bassano prevented her from appearing in Anna Bolena during the earlier part of the week. She again played last evening to a crowded audience. We are much gratified at finding the public take so much interest in our fair English vocalist. Miss Bassano's performances continue to be the great source of attraction at the Princess's.

LYCEUM.—A most excellent farce was produced at this house on Monday night and met with the most decided success. It is called The Wigwam, and the scene is laid in America among a tribe of the Indians. There is something irresistibly droll in the part played by Keeley. Let our readers only imagine the inimitable "Bob" in the character of a true cockney, taken prisoner by the wild woodsmen and made to become a hero of their tribe, under the name of the "Little Buffalo," and they will have some notion of the piece. The Wigwam was received with roars of laughter. Mr. Shirley Brooks is the author.

SURREY.—A new melodrama of the true fire-red school, was produced at this house during the week and was successful. It is called Ruby Rattler; or, the Scamp's Progress.

The Surrey folk received the drama with immense cheers. We thought, some time since, that Macready had driven out this class of productions from the theatre; we now find that what he effected was merely a temporary expulsion of these plays, and that they have returned back with redoubled force. Well, the people must be gratified, we suppose, and their inclination must be studied.

FRENCH PLAYS.—On Monday last we saw for the first time a delightful little vaudeville, entitled Louissette; or, la Chanteuse des Rues. In the midst of the heavy, melodramatic, murderous atmosphere we are now breathing at the St. James's, it is really quite refreshing to see something that comes within the bounds of possibility, to feel a sensation of calm affection and enjoy a little quiet, easy wit and honest excitement, without the chance of being laughed to scorn the next moment for our susceptibility. The first scene reminds us of the Champs Elysées of a summer's evening; we have the decorations of the front of a café, with the usual tables and chairs, all green, and specimens of Parisian beer, of which such enormous quantities are engulphed in this city during the summer months as would make a coal-heaver stare with astonishment. We here find César (M. Duméry), and Louissette (Mlle. Clarisse), standing on a bench singing "the loves of the great lady and the handsome hussar," to the air of Berat's "O toi, ma compagne fidèle," in alternate couplets. The effect is pleasing, Mademoiselle Clarisse doing her part excessively well, and M. Duméry, who is no singer, supplying his want of musical knowledge by a grotesque which pleased us more than a more artistical execution would have done. At the conclusion of the duet a collection is made and the receipt turns out to be a few pence, two five frank pieces and two billets-doux, demanding an interview and making offers of wholesale love, splendid furniture, the dream of all Parisian Grisettes, lands, country seats, &c. &c. But the young lady is not to be caught, she has a lurking attachment for César, who accompanies her on the double bass, which he returns a hundred fold by the most devoted affection and humble adoration. César having been despatched to order some dinner, the first interview takes place—it is with a young fashionable, as he is styled in the programme, a M. Jules de Lanzy; this young gentleman, who has already captivated the heart of Floreska, a quondam street-singer and for the present a figurante at the Opera, lays his fortune at the feet of Louissette, who, after a slight hesitation, accepts with the intention of substituting her former friend in her place. M. César, who has overheard the whole of the conversation, is horrified at the duplicity of his mistress, but is easily calmed by her explanation of the trick. The next lover now appears, but is received by César; he explains to him his plans on Louissette, talks of a villa, ten thousand ducats a month, Milan, in short César gets into a tremendous rage, and pummels and shakes the poor Italian most unmercifully; luckily Louissette arrives in time, and an explanation takes place; the Italian is no seducer, he is the manager of the Opera at Milan, and charmed with the accomplishments of the young street-singer, makes her an offer of an engagement at his theatre with a handsome salary. This is of course accepted, and in a quarter of an hour an appointment is made to start for Italy; the manager, who has no occasion for César's services, hurries off Louissette to the post-chaise, and César, who sees a carriage in the distance, starts with his luggage, double bass, and guitar, in pursuit, and is soon on the road to Orleans in company with M. Jules de Lanzy and Floreska, who has taken the place of Louissette. The second act passes at Milan; we are at the eve of Louissette's début, the theatre is crammed, the manager full of hope in the powers of the debutante, to whom he has given a sound musical education; the young lady is awaiting the summons to appear, when an organ is heard in the street playing the identical air which she used formerly to sing herself—she immediately recognises the minstrels, who are no other than our friend César and Floreska, who on being abandoned at Orleans by Jules de Langy on his discovering his mistake, have joined their fortunes and migrated into Italy in the hope of discovering their lost companions. The betrayed is also at Milan and piqued at the ill success of his endeavours, gets up a cabal and hisses Louissette on her debut. The talents of the young singer have, however, made a favourable impression on the Grand Duke, and the caballers have been arrested and thrown into prison. Louissette, who is however tired of Italy and of being the pseudo-wife of M. Saltarelli, the manager, accepts an engagement offered for Bordeaux, chooses César for her husband, and thus winds up as neat a piece as we have seen for many years. The parts were all well played, particularly those by Mlle. Clarisse and M. Duméry. The latter is a most useful actor and occasionally displays great humour and originality.

Le Barbier du roi d'Arragon was also played for the first time in England, the success of it was not doubtful, considering we had M. Frederick Lemâitre for the hero. It is written principally to show his wonderful tragic-comic powers, and on that account is well worth seeing; but the plot, if there be any, is so confused in our minds that we despair of being able to trace it. We shall, however, give a broad outline, in as few words as possible. The King of Arragon, Alphonse, has resolved to carry off Paghita, affianced to Perez, the king's barber, and beloved by Torreno, a muleteer. A conspiracy is at work to dethrone the king, odious to his subjects on account of his vices, which is joined by Perez, on his discovering that it is the king who has carried off his future bride. In a transport of jealousy and madness, the barber has undertaken to cut the monarch's throat, but his courage fails him at the critical moment, his hand trembles, and the king further disturbs his resolution by making him a marquess. The conspirators break into the palace, the king flies to repulse them, and in the confusion forgets Paghita, who escapes to the mountains through the instrumentality of Perez. The disturbance being quelled, the monarch returns; but finding the bird flown, his suspicions attach upon Perez. The king's confessor, who was one of the conspirators, fearful of detection, resolves to be beforehand with the others, and reveals the whole of the plot. Alphonse now resolves to have vengeance on his barber—and in an excellent scene, at least as far as M. Lemâitre's acting went, he resolves to shave him, to do him honour. The poor barber gives himself up for lost, when he is relieved by the arrival of the Princess of Castille, Isabella, to whom Alphonse is about to be married. In favour of the general rejoicing, the king grants a pardon to all concerned, marries Paghita to Torreno, but decrees that the monk and the barber shall ever after live together—the monk to impose any penance he may choose, but the barber to shave the monk every morning. M. Lemâitre as usual convulsed the house with laughter; his shaving-scene especially was excellent, from the finely expressed mixture of fear, respect, and hatred. The part of the King was well played by Mr. Langeval, and Mlle. Vallée looked exceedingly pretty and interesting in the part of Paghita, and acted with truth and earnestness and a fund of natural sentiment. On Wednesday we had the Ecole des Maris already noticed, and the L'Auberge des Adrets.

J. DE C.—E.

M. Lemâitre has twice appeared as Robert Macaire in the drama, L'Auberge des Adrets. This, if not one of the greatest, is decidedly one of the most extraordinary of the actor's parts. His performance is a miracle of ease, natural grace, and self-possession. The piece, as performed at the St. James's Theatre, is nearly worthless, and Lemâitre is the Atlas that supports the whole weight of the interest upon his shoulders. It is hardly possible to convey by words a notion of the whim, humour, and drollery, with which Lemâitre invests the character of Robert Macaire. From the moment he comes on the stage until he quits it the house is one continued roar of laughter. His dress in itself is enough to excite mirth in the most phlegmatic gravity. And then his important swagger in the beggar's attire, his manner of using the tattered pocket-handkerchief and the old creaking snuff-box, his caricaturing the Ethiopian singers when he uses a warming-pan for a banjo, his burlesque of the dance in Faust, his deportment to the Gens d'armes, in short every portion of his performance is a proof of that artistic power that meditation superinduced on genius alone effect. To one whose heart has been thrilled at the performance of Frederick Lemâitre in the Dame St. Tropez, his acting in Robert Macaire must convey the most vivid astonishment. To behold the great tragic artist stepping, as it were, from out the line of acting that nature seemed to have marked out for him, and assuming the very antipodes to that style with equal power and effect, is no small matter of wonder, even in this age, when versatility in the performer is by no means an unusual qualification. Of all the actors we have ever seen Frederick Lemâitre the best realizes our abstract notion of a great tragedian and a great comedian united into one person.

ADELAIDA.

[The following verses have been written to the music of the celebrated song by Beethoven, with a view to their vocal expression rather than their rhythmical precision.]

LOWELY—sadly I wander by the silent river
Where the whispering myrtles in the moonlight quiver,
Murmuring fondly o'er this dearest name for ever—
Adelaida!

On the trembling streamlet the stars are gleaming,
From its azure breast thy joylit eyes are seeming
On mine to be beaming—
I behold thee! Am I dreaming?
Adelaida!

On the stream is the violet-heaven reclining?
Or thine eyes, are they shining?
Adelaida!

Soft—low murmurs along the woods are creeping,
Ev'ry flower lifts up its head from sleeping,
Nearer floating—now coming—quickly fleeting—
'Tis the echo of Heav'n's far choir, repeating Adelaida!

Though this life will fleet—this voice be hushed for ever,
My heart the grave can silence never—
From this heart each night will spring a flower,
Throbbing with the passion of your lover,
Moonlight wooing by Love's power
On every leaf unfolding this word you will discover—
Adelaida!

London, Jan. 28, 1847.

DION BOURCICAULT.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

MADAME SCHWISO.

SIR,—Can you favour me with the address of Madame Schwiso, a pianist, whose Concert you noticed about three weeks ago as having taken place at the Princess's Concert Rooms. Yours, &c.,

A SUBSCRIBER.

P.S. Should you be unable to supply me with this information, perhaps you will do me the kindness to give it publicity in your columns, as it probably may meet the eyes of some one acquainted with the lady.

REVIEWS ON MUSIC.

"Album of Dance Music," for the Pianoforte, 1847.—R. Cocks & Co.

THE composers who have contributed towards the contents of this volume are, Labitzky, Camille Schubert, Strauss, Redler, Hilmar, and Gorla. Of these the three first are well known and highly popular; the next two we never heard of before; the sixth and last has some reputation in Paris as a pianist. Camille Schubert has contributed a set of "Five New Polkas." They are certainly five, though not indisputably new. But how can newness be expected when accent and rhythm, and measure and time, and character, and what not, are compelled to be invariably the same, cut out of a pattern which must serve for all eternity? Still M. Schubert's polkas are exceedingly pretty, and sparkling, and moreover essentially danceable. The three first are decidedly the best. The fourth, which is entitled La plus Coquette, is rather stiff and prudish; and the last, which is christened La plus Jolie, less pretty than any of its companions. M. Labitzky has wiped out the adage ex nihilo nihil fit from the book of truth, by making (op. 180) a very lively and rhythmical set of quadrilles from such scraps of tune as he could dig out of Verdi's opera of Attila. But M. Labitzky is a man of parts, and knows his trade, as he needs must, to make quadrilles out of the somniferous strains of Guiseppe Verdi, composer of that very extraordinary opera, Nabucco. The Ernestiner Polka of M. Hilmar is a well marked tune, easy to perform, and brilliant in effect. The celebrated Johann Strauss has contributed his op. 195. A set of waltzes called Die Unbedeutenden, in his most agreeable style. The fancy of this writer is positively inexhaustible. The Robert Bruce Quadrille, on favourite Scotch airs, is a favourable specimen of the talents of M. Redler. The tunes are judiciously selected, and the arrangement is simple and irreproachable. The Caroliner Polka is a much more acceptable present from the popular Labitzky, than the quadrille from Verdi's Attila. Here the tunes being his own, are really excellent. There could have been little doubt of Labitzky's being a better melodist than Verdi; but if there had been two opinions on the subject, a comparison between the quadrilles in question (where the tunes are by Verdi) and the polkas in question (where the tunes are by Labitzky), would have set the matter right, without room for hesitating. Camille Schubert has contributed a brilliant and animated set of waltzes called Les Triomphales (op. 100), which he has appropriately dedicated to "son ami M. Robert Cocks," the spirited publisher. The composition and dedication together suggest the notion of talent paying homage at the shrine of enterprise. In his quadrilles, "Lá Harpe D'Erin," M. Redler has set out by appropriating to himself an idea from the ballet-music in Auber's Gustave. This is in the first figure. The other figures consist of fricassees of old Irish melodies, more or less happy—less happy when deviating from the originals, and more happy when sticking to them notatim, but never quite happy altogether. M. Gorla's "Madiedjda" is entitled a third original mazurka; the originality may be traced to the nomenclature; elsewhere it is untraceable. The Vienna Railroad Polka of Labitzky is inimitable, and makes a dashing finale to one of the capitallest albums of dance music which we ever stumbled over during our ramblings among the lanes, alleys, fields, hills, and valleys of musical dedications to Terpsichore.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

DRESDEN, Jan. 15.—Madame Schroedet Devrient, who for some time has been residing quite secluded in the small town of Rochlitz, in the Saxon-Swiss, and had almost been forgotten, on the 10th instant made her re-appearance on our stage, in her favorite character of Romeo, in Bellini's opera of Romeo and Juliet, with immense success. The management has re-engaged her for several years, to the great satisfaction of the public. Although she may not be so great a singer as in those days when she was wont to carry the audience away by astonishment and enthusiasm, she is still the Schroedet, the Siddons of the German stage.

BERLIN.—(From the Berlin Figaro).—A talented young pianist, Mr. Ignatz Gibsone, has arrived here from London. The communications from London, Brussels, and the Rhenish towns on the concerts of Mr. Gibsone, drew the attention of seeing the excellent artist appear amongst us. England shows now with such talents as Litolf, Balfe, Wallace, Lord Westmoreland, Horsley, Bishop, Sloper, Macfarren, Parish Alvars, Bennett, Jewson, Holmes, Hatton, Flowers, Cohan, &c., that in music it is well qualified to rival with other nations.

(From the Vassische Gazette).—ERNST's second concert in the Königstädter Theatre was in some respects even more brilliant than the first, as the pieces chosen for performance disclosed more particularly the characteristic peculiarities of the great violinist. The first performance was a grand concerto by Bazzini, in which Ernst displayed an uncommon degree of brilliant mechanism. The author's last work, the "Paganini Rondo," contains very characteristic and elegant subjects, developed with tasteful orchestral accompaniment, on which the Papageno figure (Zauberflöte) vies with the principal and brilliant violin passages. The "Carnaval of Venice," by Ernst, although not new to us, gave us again the utmost pleasure. The concert was diversified by the appearance of a pianist from London, Mr. Ignatz Gibsone. He played an original Polka, which was varied extemporaneously. Although we did not discover any new ideas in its construction, with the exception of an interesting change, where the left hand takes the theme of the right hand, opposite a chromatic scale, still the young artist deserves every praise. His right hand disclosed much grace, which gave his playing a lively colouring. Altogether, however, he seems to require the energy of expression.

(From the Prussian Journal, December 14th, 1846).—A young English pianist, Ignatz Gibsone, performed between the acts (in Ernst's second concert) an original theme with variations of his own, and obtained by his neat, tasteful, and perfect execution of this equally brilliant and effective composition, deserved applause. A third concert is announced by Mr. Ernst, on which occasion he intends to perform his Grand Solo on the Pirata, (Op. 19) dedicated to the King of Hanover.

PROVINCIAL.

LIVERPOOL.—Miss Whitnall, the spirited and popular caterer for the lovers of song, provided on Monday, an excellent treat in the Theatre Royal, Williamson-square, on which occasion we were introduced, for the first time, to the celebrated vocalist, Madame Anna Bishop, of the grand theatres Rome and Palermo, and prima donna of the Theatre San Carlo, at Naples. The other singers were Miss Whitnall herself, (who, we regretted to observe, was indisposed, and, indeed, appeared contrary to the advice of her medical attendants,) Miss Kathleen Fitzwilliam, Mr. D. W. King, of the Theatre Royal, Drury-lane, and Mr. Corri, of the Nobility's Concert, Dublin. The first part comprised Wallace's trio, "Turn on Old Time," which was effectively sung by Miss Whitnall and Messrs. King and Corri, although it was evident that, in addition to Miss Whitnall's indisposition, Mr. King was labouring under a severe cold. Madame Anna Bishop appeared next, and gave a Recitative and Cavatina from Ugo, arranged by Donizetti, with thrilling effect. Her next piece, in this part, a Recitative and Cavatina from Meyerbeer, was however a more pleasing,—indeed a splendid effort, wonderful in execution and faultless in taste. The tones were throughout clear and bell-like; and in her subdued notes more sweet than those of any vocalist we remember to have heard. But for the compassion of the audience this piece would have been encored. Mr. D. W. King gave "Forth I wander," from Beethoven, with great judgment. We have already mentioned that he seemed to be suffering from cold, which evinced itself strongly in this piece. His voice—a tenor—is evidently a fine organ, well trained; and, when in better health, we expect to find in him a fine singer. Mr. Corri sang "As I view those scenes" very finely, and afterwards volunteered an Irish ballad, in the room of a duet in which Miss Whitnall was to have taken a part. In this he received an encore. Miss Kathleen Fitzwilliam was encored most heartily in "Barge of the Bonny Sea." This talented young lady is rapidly becoming a favourite. The gems of the evening consisted of "John Anderson my Jo," (sung by Madame Anna Bishop, and encored,) and "On the Banks of Guadalquivir," by the same lady. Both were delightfully and wonderfully sung, and encored of course. The latter songs of this part we could not stay to hear. The house was thinly attended. Amongst the visitors we noticed his worship the Mayor, John Shaw Leigh, Esq., and other influential parties.—Liverpool Standard.

LIVERPOOL.—The far-famed vocalist, Madame Anna Bishop, made her first appearance at the Theatre Royal, Liverpool, at Miss Whitnall's concert, on Monday evening. The Mayor having patronized the performance, was present with a party, as also were John Shaw Leigh, Esq., and several other families of distinction; but the house was thinly attended, and the reception given to Madame Bishop was not of the most enthusiastic description. She, however, greatly won upon the audience by the talents which she displayed in the course of the evening, and was encored in the ballad, "John Anderson my Jo," Lavenu's ballad, "On the banks of Guadalquivir," and in the Chansonette Française, "Je suis la Bayadere." Her voice has some notes of a richly-melodious character; her treatment of it is that of the perfect artist, study and discipline having enabled her to overcome the greatest difficulties, and her style is unexceptionable. Miss Whitnall had not recovered from her severe indisposition, and the indulgence of the house was requested for her by Mr. Roxby, but she got through what she had to do in a manner that was highly creditable to her tact and taste. "The Singing Lesson," and "The Meeting," in one of which she was to have sung with Mr. Corri, and in the other with Miss Kathleen Fitzwilliam, were withdrawn, but Mr. Corri, who acquitted himself well in Bellini's "As I view now those scenes," volunteered a duet solo, "Mother, he's going away," which took the fancy of his hearers so much that its repetition was demanded. Mr. D. W. King laboured under a severe cold, and consequently sang to great disadvantage. Miss Kathleen Fitzwilliam was very warmly and deservedly encored in the only two songs which she had to sing, "Barge of the sunny Sea," a pleasing gondolier by her brother, Mr. E. Fitzwilliam, and the Irish ditty, "Erin, my country." Mr. Joseph Robinson accompanied all the songs, except those of Madame Bishop, when Mr. Bochsa took his seat at the pianoforte. The two overtures, "Fra Diavolo" and "Eduardo e Christino" were cleverly led by Mr. Aldridge, and well played by the band.—Liverpool Express.

LIVERPOOL.—Last night Madame Anna Bishop performed at the Theatre Royal in Balfe's opera of The Maid of Artois, one of the earliest of that composer's efforts, and including in it the "The light of other days," with some additional songs, introduced on its revival at Drury Lane last season, and several alterations. She sang the music allotted to her with exquisite effect, and was very warmly applauded, carrying with her the entire sympathy of the audience, especially in the airs, "Oh, what a charm," "Oh, beautiful night," and in the finalé, a very brilliant and difficult piece of music.—Liverpool Express.

SHREWSBURY.—(From a Correspondent.)—On Wednesday, Jan. 20, Madame Bishop displayed her supreme artistic singing, and the capabilities of her magnificent voice, in the Music Hall of the town. She was received with the greatest applause, and gave unmixed pleasure to a highly respectable audience. She was assisted by Mr. Corri, from Birmingham, who sang several songs. M. Bochsa accompanied on the pianoforte, and exhibited his skill in a fantasia on the harp. Mr. Hiles opened the concert by playing the "Zauberflöte" overture on the organ, and afterwards introduced a slow movement from one of Haydn's symphonies at the commencement of the second part.

DUBLIN.—The oratorio of Sampson was, during the lifetime of its immortal composer, made the medium through which a public charity annually received those funds that fed the hungry and assisted the destitute; and selections from his oratorio of Joshua, brought forward with a similar object last evening at the Ancient Concerts, served to realise a large sum for the relief of the present existing distress, executed as his fine work was with all the varied resources of the society. The attendance on this occasion, when good offices to others became associated with great personal pleasure, proved both fashionable and crowded, and the whole of the arrangements were most effective. His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant and the Ladies Ponsonby arrived at half-past eight, and were attended by the stewards to the front of the gallery, where seats were set apart for their accommodation; and the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, the Lord Mayor, the Hon. and Ven. the Dean of St. Patrick's, had also places set apart for them in the gallery. The music of Joshua was given with a precision and just appreciation of the composer's meaning that would have reflected deserved reputation on any society, the orchestra being complete and admirably in hand, while the choruses—forcible but not crude, earnest but not coarse—poured forth a rich volume of sound. The opening chorus, "Ye sons of Israel," was an illustration of this remark, and more especially the exquisitely constructed one with solo, "To long Posterity," in which the hushed motion of the waters, as they stood for a time upraised before rolling back in trembling masses, at a word, was conveyed with excellent truth, to which the bold rush of harmony that succeeded told with increased beauty by reason of the contrast. The solos were sung by Miss Byrne, Miss Searle, and the Messrs. Robinson, Smith, Geary, and an amateur, Mr. Stanford. This gentleman gave the air "Shall I in Mamre's fertile plain" with such purity of style, and admirable richness of voice, that it at once called for an encore, in which the Lord Lieutenant and the Ladies Ponsonby joined. Miss Byrne, in the air of Pergolesi, had to repeat the second part, and her round contralto tones, aided by her careful and steady manner of executing the music, well justified the compliment. The whole concert gave the utmost satisfaction, from the unity and general effect evidenced in every department, and Mr. Joseph Robinson conducted with his wonted skill and tact.—Saunders' News Letters, Jan. 22.

DUBLIN.—We understand the following circular has been forwarded to the Members of the Anacreontic Society.—(Committee-room, 112, Grafton-Street, 4th January, 1847.)—Sir—The committee being of opinion that, in the present state of unprecedented distress which so universally prevails all over this country they would best consult the feelings and wishes of the members of the Anacreontic Society, by proposing that the Society should suspend its meetings for the present season, whereby the members would be at liberty to apply to the relief of their poor suffering fellow-countrymen the sums which they have been in the habit of contributing to the funds of this society, a great part of which would be withdrawn from this country by foreign artists, whom it would be necessary to bring over for the society's public concerts. These views of the committee have been communicated to many of the members residing in Dublin, who have expressed their entire approval of the proposition; and I am now instructed to acquaint you that it has been resolved that the meeting of the Anacreontic Society do stand adjourned to the usual time for commencing their concerts in November next; a decision in the propriety of which the committee hope for your concurrence—I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient humble servant, "S. J. Pigott, Sec."

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE MESSRS. DISTIN, assisted by Miss Amelia Hill, gave a second concert on Monday, at the Lecture Hall, Greenwich. The room was attended by nearly seven hundred people. There were several encores during the evening, among which we may name two glees by Messrs. H. W. and T. Distin, a trumpet solo on the Sax-horn, several morceaux by the Distin Family on the Sax-Tubas, and Miss Hill, in Benedict's pretty song, "I am thine." On Thursday the Messrs. Distins performed at the Town Hall, Birmingham. They appear to-day at Leamington; February 1st, at Coventry. On February 3rd they are engaged at Cambridge, and on the following day they will appear at Oxford with Madame Bishop. On the 5th they are engaged at Greenwich; on the 8th at Hanley; on the 9th at Burslem; 10th at Longton; 11th Newcastle-under-Tyne; 12th Stoke; 15th Hackney; 18th Stoke Newington; 19th Horns, Kennington, &c. &c.

MADAME ANNA BISHOP, according to her engagement with Mr. Simpson, sang last Monday, the 18th instant, at Lichfield; on Tuesday she repeated at Birmingham, before a crowded house, the Maid of Artois, assisted by Mr. W. D. King, of Drury Lane. On Wednesday she sung at Shrewsbury; and on Thursday she performed at Birmingham, for the first time, the whole opera of La Sonnambula. Madame Anna Bishop's success in the beautiful part of Amina, was, if possible, greater than in the Maid of Artois. After the first cavatina, "Dearest companions," the fair vocalist received three rounds of applause, and all through the opera the enthusiasm was general. The celebrated rondo finale was of course encored, and notwithstanding her immense exertions and fatigues of the week the prima donna of England warbled it in a delicious manner. On Friday she performed the Maid. Saturday, the 23rd, she made her first appearance before a Manchester audience since her return from abroad, at a grand concert in the Free Trade Hall. Madame Anna Bishop's reception baffles all description; the applause was so deafening, and so prolonged, that she remained several seconds without being able to sing, and it was easy to remark, from the emotion evinced by the great artist, that she felt much gratified by that hearty welcome. When silence was restored, she began her first song from Ajo, as arranged for her by poor Donizetti, who was so partial for the talent of our countrywoman, and the applause was incessant. It would be too long to detail the ovations, the vociferous cries for having all the songs repeated, the three cheers given to the songstress every time she came in the orchestra. Suffice it to say, that her triumph was complete, and that when she stepped into her carriage, after the concert, the members of the Manchester Choral Harmonic Institute, who had sung during the concert two glees very effectively, gave her a last tremendous cheer. Mr. Weston, the able conductor, acquitted himself of the task with great judgment and discernment. Messrs. W. D. King and Corrie were the other vocalists. Madame A. Bishop is to sing at Liverpool on Monday, the 25th.—Morning Post.

MR. FREDERICK WEBSTER, stage director of the Theatre Royal Haymarket, has been appointed Professor of Elocution to the Royal Academy of Music.

MADAME VESTRIS.—This popular actress has been fulfilling a farewell engagement for the last month at Liverpool, and on Friday evening she took leave of the people of that town in the following characteristic address:—"Ladies and Gentlemen—I appear before you to say farewell, and that in its most painful shape, a long and last farewell. My health, rather than my inclination, believe me, induces this apparent sudden step. Were I, indeed, as old as some good people have been pleased to fancy me, I ought to have retired years ago, not only from the mimic scene, but from the stage of life itself. The truth is that having been long before the public, and, owing to the kindness of that public, conspicuously so at an earlier age than is usual, not being, I believe I may venture to assert, quite superannuated. After this you will, perhaps, expect me to tell you what my age really is, but I claim the privilege of my sex, and leave that highly important question still open. It becomes one who has enjoyed, both as an actress and a manager, a share of public favour and applause, such as is accorded to few, to submit, without a murmur, to those afflictions which are the lot of many. Great as has been the favour I have obtained, it has been nowhere greater than in this flourishing, opulent, and liberal town; and I beg, therefore, to offer to its numerous representatives here present my humble and heartfelt thanks. How long I may yet perform in London is uncertain, but my health at present not permitting me to undergo the continual fatigues of travelling professionally, I have come to the determination of closing my country accounts altogether. Before I depart, however, allow me on retiring from business to recommend to your cordial support my junior partner. He has secured for himself my good will, and has, I trust, entitled himself to yours. It is he, therefore, who will in future undertake the travelling department. Let me, then, express my earnest hope that the liberal patronage you have for so many years extended to myself, will be steadily continued to my husband. Ladies and Gentlemen, I most respectfully and most gratefully bid you farewell." Madame Vestris was born March 1, 1796. She was married in 1813, when only sixteen years old, to Armand Vestris, the principal dancer at the King's Theatre, where she made her débüt as Proserpina, in Winter's opera "Il Ratto di Proserpina," July 20, 1815; so that she has been nearly thirty-two years on the stage. Charles Mathews was born in 1802.

EXETER HALL.—The Creation was performed on Tuesday evening by the members of the Sacred Harmonic Society, for the second time this season. The vocalists were, Miss Birch, Mr. H. Phillips, and Mr. Lockey. The performance on the whole was superior to that of the previous week. The singers acquitted themselves with great effect. Miss Birch sang very finely; her delivery of "O, thou, for whom I am," was exceedingly impressive, and was altogether the best specimen of vocalisation we have heard from this lady for some time. Mr. Lockey was no less happy in the portion of the oratorio allotted him. He was encored in "In native worth," which he rendered with great feeling and expression. Mr. H. Phillips's singing the music of Raphael in the Creation is too well known to demand any comment here. The choruses were well sung throughout, and the oratorio was ably conducted by Mr. Surman. The band did its duty most efficiently, and the numerous obligato passages for the various instruments were excellently played. In the popular song, "On mighty pens," we were much pleased with the flute accompaniment of Mr. Card, one of the oldest and most experienced of our orchestral performers, who has won years of honourable fame at the Philharmonic, the Opera, and the great provincial festivals in the capacity of primo flauto. Never did this excellent artist play with more point and judgment than in the Creation on Tuesday night, and the fact was remarked by many connoisseurs of the instrument who happened to be present.

MR. ALLCROFT has announced his Grand Annual Miscellaneous Concert for Tuesday next. This concert generally constitutes one of the best musical entertainments of the early London season.

MR. WILLIAM DAWSON, pupil of Mons. Tolbecque, gave an evening concert, at the Manor Rooms, Stoke Newington, on Monday last, the 18th inst. The vocalists engaged were, Miss Ellen Lyon, Miss Cubitt, and Madame F. Lablache, Mr. Hobbs and Signor F. Lablache. Instrumentalists, Messrs. Richardson, Dawson, and Dumon. The concert commenced with Paer's effective Terzetto, "Si dira," admirably rendered by the Misses Ellen Lyon and Cubitt, and Signor F. Lablache. Miss Ellen Lyon, who possesses a rich and pure soprano voice, gave Donizetti's cavatina, L'Amor Suo, with brilliancy, and gained the applause she justly merited. The encores were numerous, amongst which were Miss Cubitt in "Homage to Charlie;" Madame F. Lablache in a pretty ballad of Finley's; and Madame and Signor F. Lablache in "Singa tanti complimenti." Mr. Dawson interpreted a solo of Mayseder's with skill. Mons. Dumon accompanied the vocal pieces with tact and ability, and the concert appeared to give universal satisfaction to a highly select audience.

M. PANOFKA.—In our review of the Opera prospectus last week, we omitted to mention the engagement of this highly esteemed musician, whose services have been secured by Mr. Lumley, in the capacity of general superintendent of the artistic interests of Her Majesty's Theatre. M. Panofka unites to integrity and zeal the talents and general knowledge of the subject which eminently qualify him for the post—and we only echo the words of our esteemed friend, Stephen Heller, in applauding the discretion Mr. Lumley has evinced the engagement.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Handel's Dettingen Te Deum, which, since its performance has been discontinued at the festival for the benefit of the Sons of the Clergy at St. Paul's Cathedral, is rarely heard in London, will, with a selection, be performed at the next concert at Exeter Hall on the 18th February. Mendelssohn and Spohr are both expected during the present season, which promises to be unusually brilliant.

THE MADRIGAL SOCIETY.—The One Hundred and Sixth Anniversary of this Society was celebrated in the Freemasons' Hall, on the 21st instant. Lord Saltoun (who had travelled from Scotland expressly for the occasion) in the chair; supported by Lord Oxford, Lord H. Paget, Sir Andrew Barnard, and about a hundred amateurs and professors of music. The following compositions were sung after dinner, under the direction of Mr. Turle, organist of Westminster Abbey, by sixteen cantos, twelve altos, sixteen tenors, and twenty-eight basses; total, seventy-two.

"Non Nobis Domine,"
"Bow thine ear,"	W. BYRD, 1590.
"Sweetheart arise,"	T. WALKER, 1600.
"Sweet Philomel,"	J. WARD, 1613.
"Now tune the viol," (encored)	G. CAIMO, 1560.
"When Chloris heard," (encored)	J. WILBYE, 1598.
"Sweet honey-sucking bees," (encored)	T. WILBYE, 1598.
"Besti fin qui le pene,"	L. MARENZIO, 1670.
"April is in my mistress' face,"	T. MORLEY, 1594.
"Dainty white pearl,"	A. RICCI, 1570.
"Hard by a chrystal fountain,"	G. CROCK, 1580.
"Who prostrate lie,"	T. BATESON, 1600.
Finale—"The Waits,"	J. SAVILLE, 1660.

The honorary secretary of the society, Thomas Oliphant, Esq. was absent, owing to a domestic affliction, but the noble chairman did not forget him; his health was drank, and his zeal and exertions on behalf of the society, were duly acknowledged. The health of the former president, Sir John Rogers, Bart., was given and heartily responded to. We scarcely need add that the reception of the gallant Lord Saltoun was quite enthusiastic.

LORD SALTOUN has consented to preside at the One Hundred and Ninth Anniversary of the Royal Society of Musicians, which will be celebrated on the 19th of April, on the usual extensive scale.

THE LATE MR. KEARNS.—It is in contemplation to get up a concert for the benefit of the widow and numerous family of this lamented artist, who have been left in very indigent circumstances. Sir George Smart has consented to act as chairman of a committee of professors, and Signor Costa will conduct the performance.

CASINO DE VENISE.—The proprietor of the establishment in Holborn, where the promenade concerts and balls are held, has become the principal manager of the entertainments. Grattan Cooke the conductor, and Blagrove and Putsy leaders of the concerts.

MR. TRAVERS, the tenor singer, who has made his début at Drury Lane Theatre, is a cousin of Miss Romer, and, it is stated, that he is to be married to a daughter of the ci-devant Miss Chester.

THE MELODISTS.—The social meetings of the Melodist Club where resumed on Thursday, when about forty persons dined at the Freemason's Tavern, B. R. Colebell, Esq., M.P., in the chair. Several glees were sung by Messrs. King, Horn, Francis, Parry, H. Gear, Genge, Kench, E. Taylor, Machin, Atkins, &c. &c. Solos on the clarinet and concertina were excellently performed by Lazarus and R. Blagrove. A brilliant fantasia was played on the pianoforte by Mr. G. Kiallmark and the evening past off most harmoniously. The prize offered by W. Dixon, Esq. for a cheerful song, to be sung and accompanied by Mr. Hatton, will be awarded at the next meeting of the club on the 23rd of February.

VOCAL CONCERTS.—It is reported that these concerts will be resumed, but nothing has been finally settled yet. Miss Birch, it is said, will not continue as one of the directors.

CROSBY HALL.—The Fourth Concert of Sacred Music, under the direction of Miss Mounsey, took place on Wednesday evening. The principal singers engaged for the occasion were Messrs. Lockety and Machin, and the Misses Steele and Cubitt. Miss Mounsey, as usual, presided at the organ, and performed a solo between the parts. The programme comprised a selection from the works of Boyce, Preyer, Hasse, Galliard, Handel, Haydn, Kalliwoda, Pergolesi, Bach, Schicht, Vogla, Otto Nicolai, Mendelssohn, and Weber. The concert terminated at an early hour and the room was well filled. Press of matter hinders us from entering into further particulars.

MARIO.—This accomplished tenor is stated to be the son of General di Candia. Mario, who was born at Cagliari, in 1816, was educated amongst the king's pages, at the Royal Academy of Turin, and subsequently became an officer in the Piedmontese guard. From his early youth he was passionately fond of music. On his arrival in Paris, in 1836, the manager of the Academy Royale, whose curiosity was excited by the enconiums lavished in private circles on the young amateur, took an opportunity of hearing him sing, and immediately offered him an engagement, which Mario, after much hesitation, accepted. This greatly irritated his father, who spared neither entreaty nor commands to hinder his son from embracing the career of a public singer. Mario, however, persisted in his resolution, but so far yielded to the general's wish as to consent to let his Christian name alone appear in the bills.

MR. T. P. COOKE.—It is rumoured that this favorite actor, having recovered from a long and serious illness, is about to occupy the stage boards for a season before his final retirement. The respective managers of Drury Lane and the Princess's have made Mr. T. P. Cooke most liberal offers.

MADAME DULCKEN.—What does the musical critic of the Chronicle mean by the followings?—(Morning Chronicle, Jan 28)—"Pianists of every clime visit this country from season to season, but after a sojourn here of some years, Madame Dulcken is also heard with unalloyed gratification, a sure evidence of a poetical temperament and of unabated energies." [C. J. and "The Trunkmaker" might perhaps, by putting their heads together, explain the meaning.]

PRINCESS'S CONCERT ROOM.—An entertainment was given in the above room on Tuesday evening, by Mr. Wilson, in aid of the Scotch Poor in the Highlands. The room was exceedingly crowded, many of the Scotch in London having flocked to the concert room to support a favorite singer in his amiable endeavour to assist his countrymen. Mr. Wilson's reception was most flattering, and his vocal efforts throughout the evening obtained great applause. His "Allister M'Allister," was the most successful hit of the concert. Mr. Land presided at the piano as usual.

A CONCERT was given on Wednesday evening for the benefit of Mr. Le Jeune, at the Marylebone Institution, Edward's-street. Several songs and pieces were sung by the Misses Stuart, Friswell, and the Misses Eliza and Ellen Lyon. The latter mentioned young ladies pleased much by their duet singing. Miss Stuart has a good voice, and sung "Love and Language," from The Bondman, very effectively. A duet for pianoforte and violoncello was effectively performed by Mr. Charles Le Jeune and a gentleman with whom we were unacquainted.—(From a Correspondent.)

ANCIENT JERUSALEM.—This interesting model of the city on which profane and sacred history has accumulated more of interesting and serious association than on any spot of that ancient world which has bequeathed us so many a lesson of wisdom and of life, is now exhibiting in Piccadilly. As a wonderful work of patience and ingenuity it is well worthy the inspection of the curious; but its chief interest will, of course, depend upon the reverent feelings with which the Christian will naturally peruse, if we may be pardoned the expression, the localities of that blessed soil, hallowed by the footsteps of Him whose sufferings on the cross purchased Him redemption. Here we may follow step by step that touching drama, in which the pure and guiltless blood of the Man who was God sealed the inestimable gifts of man's salvation. Here is that temple in which, yet a child, His heavenly wisdom held grey-haired man in wonder. Here the streets in which He taught, and in which miracle after miracle appealed in vain to an unbelieving race. Here the Mount of Olives, where He wept over the coming fate of Jerusalem. Here the garden of the passion, and here the Via Dolorosa, and here Calvary. We know no public exhibition more fit to attract and more capable of meeting and fastening public attention. Its success is thoroughly deserved.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A PIANOFORTE PLAYER.—"Le jeu ne vaut pas la chandelle;" besides the article is a very clumsy translation from a French paper.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WARREN'S 20 GUINEA COTTAGE PIANO-FORTES

ARE NOW SELLING AT THE
Manufactory, 71, Leadenhall Street,

(Removed from 1 and 2, Liverpool Street, Bishopsgate Street.)

These Instruments are well manufactured of the best seasoned wood, FINE FULL TONE AND GOOD TOUCH. A two years warranty given with each instrument. ESTABLISHED TWENTY-ONE YEARS. The only house in London where a good sound instrument can be obtained at the above low price, (for cash only). SMALL PROFIT AND QUICK RETURNS!

JOHN WARREN, 71, Leadenhall St., opposite Aldgate Pump

Mr. and Madame G. A. MACFARREN

Beg to inform their friends and the Public, that they have

REMOVED TO

55, YORK TERRACE, REGENT'S PARK.

HISTORICAL CONCERTS. EXETER HALL.

THE SECOND CONCERT

(Of a Series of four) illustrative of the History of

English Vocal Music,

WILL BE HELD ON

MONDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 8,

At which will be presented specimens from the music of ROGERS, HUMPHREYS, WISE, LOCK, BLOW, CARRINGTON, READING, and PURCELL.

Principal Vocal Performers:

MISS RAINFORTH, MISS DOLBY,
MR. LOCKEY, MR. W. H. SEGUIN, AND MR. MACHIN.

THE CHORUS

Will consist of the MEMBERS of MR. HULLAH'S UPPER SINGING SCHOOLS, and the ORCHESTRA of MR. WILLY'S CONCERT BAND. A NEW ORGAN has been erected by MR. ROBSON expressly for these concerts.

Tickets:

Area..... 2s. 6d.—For the three concerts..... 5s. 0d.
Western Gallery..... 3 6—For the three concerts..... 8 0
Reserved Seats..... 7 0—For the three concerts..... 17 0

May be had of Mr. Parker, Publisher, 445, West Strand; and of the principal Music Sellers.

Just Published by R. MILLS, 140, New Bond Street,
No. 4 of GERMAN SONGS,

"HOFFNUNG;"

THE POETRY BY SCHILLER, THE ENGLISH WORDS BY DESU,
MUSIC BY HENRY WYLDE, Associate of the Royal Academy.

Also, by the same Author, (first Sonata dedicated to C. POTTER.)

"RHAPSODY,"

BOOK OF GERMAN SONGS.

In the Press—"Caprice," for the Piano-forte.

FOR COUGHS, COLDS, IRRITATION OF THE THROAT, HOARSENESS, &c. PECTORAL EMULSION,

Prepared strictly according to the formula of a distinguished Physician in Paris, This preparation having enjoyed great celebrity for many years on the Continent, as well as undergoing a trial for some time in private practice in this country, is now introduced to the public as the most agreeable, efficacious, and speedy cure for the above affections, relieving the most obstinate Coughs in a few hours. To Singers, Professors, and Public Speakers it will be found invaluable.

PREPARED ONLY BY

TURNER AND SPRATT

English and Foreign Chymists, 7, TICEBORNE STREET, Haymarket.
In Bottles at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 6d. each.—Importers of French Jujubes and Syrups.

MEDICAL GALVANISM.

HORNE, THORNTWHAITE, & WOOD, Successors to E. PALMER, 123, Newgate-street, in submitting their improved ELECTRO-GALVANIC MACHINES, beg to state, that they have availed themselves of the discoveries of De la Rive, Faraday, Smee, and others, by which they are enabled to construct a coil with all the required intensity and quantity of electricity for medical use, thereby effecting both a saving of expense and trouble to the invalid, and placing in his hands an effective, powerful, and simple instrument, that may be excited at a minute's notice, and without trouble.—Price, £3. 3s.; £3. 10s.; and £5. 5s.

PHILOSOPHICAL APPARATUS.—Every description of Apparatus connected with Chemistry, Hydraulics, Hydrostatics, Pneumatics, Frictional and Voltaic Electricity, Electro-Magnetism, Electro-Metallurgy, Optics, (including the Dissolving Views, Photography, &c.) manufactured and sold by Horne, Thornthwaite and Wood, successors to Edward Palmer, 123, Newgate Street, London.

Foreign orders, enclosing a remittance or order for payment in London, promptly attended to.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE

Is acknowledged as the best specific after three years' trial, for improving the voice and removing all affections of the throat, strongly recommended to clergymen, singers, actors, public speakers, and all persons subject to relaxed throats.

The Proprietors have just received the following Testimonial, amongst many others, from MADAME ANNA BISHOP:—

"DEAR SIR,—I am happy to say that all I have heard respecting the efficacy of DR. STOLBERG'S celebrated LOZENGE is perfectly true, as yesterday, feeling myself very fatigued (singing nightly at the Theatre), I took several of the Lozenges, and my voice was very clear, and my throat quite free from relaxation. I am, Dear Sir, Yours truly, ANNA BISHOP."

"18th November 1846—Jermyn Street."

Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Churchyard; W. Edwards and Newbery and Sons, St. Paul's Churchyard; Sanger, and Dietrichsen and Hannay, Oxford-street; and retail by all respectable Chymists in the Kingdom.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847,

A most beautiful Christmas Present, New Year's Gift,
and Etrennes.

M. JULLIEN

Has the honor to announce that his

MUSICAL ANNUAL FOR 1847

Is now Published, and is by far the best work of the kind that has ever appeared; contains no less than

THIRTY PIECES OF VOCAL AND FOURTEEN OF INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC,

The greater part of which have never before been published, the copyrights
having been purchased expressly for this work, at an immense cost, with the view of rendering it immeasurably superior to any of its predecessors.

The portion which has already appeared comprise those pieces only whose decided success has induced M. JULLIEN, at the request of numerous influential patrons, to include them in this Selection.

The Illustrations, in addition to the elaborately executed Covers, Title, and Dedication pages, include

TWO MAGNIFICENT VIEWS

OF THE

Interior of Covent-Garden Theatre,

The one taken during the brilliant scene exhibited in that splendid arena of
the occasion of M. JULLIEN'S GRAND BAL MASQUE; the other a VIEW OF THE THEATRE TAKEN DURING THE CONCERTS,
the grouping of the Figures in both Views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant. To those who have visited the Theatre on either occasion, the ALBUM will form a delightful SOUVENIR, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of
the gorgeous scene.

A SPLENDIDLY-COLOURED

PORTRAIT

Of the celebrated Danseuse,

MADAME FLORA FABRI,

In the admired Pas, LA CASTIGLIANA.

AN ORIGINAL SUBJECT,

"THE FORTUNE TELLER,"

Illustrating BAKER's beautiful Ballad of that name.

The whole of this department of the ALBUM has been under the active superintendence of J. BRANDARD, Esq., whose pencil only has been employed in its production.

Nothing more need be said in favour of this ALBUM, and in proof of its vast superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the Contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe: viz.

ROSSINI,	VERDI,	DONIZETTI,	RUBINI,
ROCH-ALBERT,	HELZELL,	GOLDBERG,	SCHIRA,
SCHULZ,	STOPEL,	DUPREZ,	JOSE GOMIS,
MASARNAU,	MARATZEK,	BALFE,	JULLIEN,
HATTON,	BARRET,	ALEXANDER LEE,	KÖNIG,
KNIGHT,	BAKER,	FARMER,	LINLEY,
LAKE,	FITZBALL,	MOULD,	HURREY,
FOREST,	ALBERT SMITH,	DÉSMOND RYAN,	&c.

It will thus be perceived that in addition to the latest compositions of the best English Composers, the ALBUM will contain some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany, France, Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting
the attention of the Continental dilettanti.

PRICE 18s. AND £1. 1s.

ROYAL CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC

214, REGENT-STREET, AND 45, KING-STREET.

SOVEREIGN Life Assurance Company,

No. 5, ST. JAMES'S STREET,
LONDON.

Sir A. Brydges Henniker, Bart.
B. Bond Cabbell, Esq., M.P.

Henry Pownall, Esq.
Claude Edward Scott, Esq.

Trustees.

Directors.

CHAIRMAN, Lieutenant Colonel Lord
Arthur Lennox.
DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN, T. C. Granger,
Esq., M.P.
John Ashburner, Esq., M.D.
T. M. B. Edvard, Esq.
Philip P. Blyth, Esq.

Henry Broadwood, Esq., M.P.
Sir James Carmichael, Bart.
Charles Jacobuscher, Esq., Alderman.
William Tulloch Fraser, Esq.
John Gardiner, Esq.
Aaron Asher Goldsmith, Esq.
Henry William Pownall, Esq.

Bankers, Sir Claude Scott, Bart., and Co.
Solicitors, Messrs. Davies, Son, and Campbell.

Assurances on the lives of persons in every station of life and every part of the world, granted on a plan which combines the utmost amount of benefit to the families of the assured, at death, with every attainable advantage during life, which the system of Life Assurance is capable of affording.

It affords perfect security in a subscribed Capital; which guarantees the prompt settlement of every claim, with participating and non-participating rates on the lowest scale, especially for terms of years.

The Assured can anticipate or obtain the advance of the full amount of the Policy, on giving approved available security for a certain number of annual payments, as explained by the Prospectus.

Every facility is afforded to persons assuring the lives of others, so as to render such Policies effectual securities.

A new plan of gradual or accumulative Assurance, particularly adapted for young lives, and for such as cannot, without inconvenience, undertake the payment of a fixed premium, securing at once provision in case of premature death, and an accumulating fund, available during life, should occasion require.

ANNUITIES, ENDOWMENTS, ADVANCES, and LOANS, on liberal terms.
Detailed Prospectuses, with forms of Proposal, and every information, may be had on application, either personally or by letter, at the Company's Offices.
The usual commission to Solicitors and Agents.

H. D. DAVENPORT, Secretary.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

The nobility, gentry, and public are respectfully informed, that the
NEW THEATRE

Will Open the first Week in April,

For the performance of the

LYRICAL DRAMA

On a scale of efficiency in every department never before attempted in this country.

THE BALLET

Will include the names of the most celebrated artists. The prospectus for the arrangement of the season will be issued in due course. Mr. Beale, Director.
January 9th, 1847.

THE MESSRS. ASHBY AND HARDING,

Tenor and Baritone,

(Formerly pupils of SIGNOR RUBBI—late of Her Majesty's Theatre), Beg to inform their Friends and Pupils, that they have returned from the Provinces for the season, and are now ready to resume their professional duties in town.

32, Alfred Street, Bedford Square.

NEW SONGS

PIANOFORTE MUSIC,

Particularly adapted for Teaching.

PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Gems of Balfe's opera, the Bondman, arranged by Charles W. Glover	1 2
"They say there is some distant land," from the Bondman, by W. C. Macfarren	2 6
Fantasia on "Sul campo della gloria," from Belisario, by F. Händel	3 0
"Melodie Allemande," op. 147, ditto	3 0
"Retour au Châlet," air national, op. 144, ditto	3 0
"La Sérénade," op. 146, ditto	3 0
The favourite air "Lucy Neale," arranged by Chailieu	2 0
Ditto "Va Pensiero," ditto	2 0
"Pestal," by Rimbault, (very easy)	1 0
"Lucy Neale," ditto, ditto	1 0
The celebrated "Bridal Polka," (4th edition,) Solo and Duet, each	5 0

SONGS.

"Dream on, young hearts," by Spörle; a gay melody, with a very easy accompaniment, and pleasing words, (third edition)	2 0
"The Irish Emigrant," words by Lady Dufferin, music by Barker	2 0
"In the Greenwood Tree," as sung by Miss Steele, music by B. Richards	2 6
Ditto, as a Duet	2 6
"Go, memory go," one of the favourite songs from the Bondman, Balfe	2 0
"They say there is some distant land," sung by Mr. Harrison	2 0
"Sweet Spring," song, G. A. Macfarren	2 0

CHAPELL, 50, NEW BOND STREET.

The following Outline of the Arrangements for the Season 1847, is respectfully submitted to the Nobility, Patrons of the Opera, and to the Public. It is presented with the confident hope, that the successful exertions made to secure, under circumstances of peculiar difficulty, a Company still more worthy of the first Theatre in Europe, and of its distinguished Patrons, will ensure the continuation of their support.

Engagements for the Opera.

MAD^{LE}. JENNY LIND,
MAD^{LE}. DEL CARMEN MONTENEGRO, MAD^{LE}. SANCHIOLI, Madlle. FAGIANI, AND Madlle. SOLARI, The Contralti, Madlle. VIETTI, AND Madlle. DARIA NASCIO,

MADAME CASTELLAN.
SIG. FRASCHINI, the great Tenor of Italy. And the favorite Tenor, SIG. GARDONI,
SIG. SUPERCHI, Sig. BORELLA, Sig. CORELLI, SIG. F. LABLACHE,
The celebrated Basso Cantante HERR STAUDIGL, AND SIG. LABLACHE.

In addition to the above, arrangements are pending with SIG. COLETTI, of the Italian Opera at Paris.
THAT GREAT COMPOSER, THE CHEVALIER MEYERBEER, has arranged to visit this Country to bring out the
CAMP DE SILESIE,

The principal Parts in the CAMP DE SILESIE, by MAD^{LE}. JENNY LIND AND SIG. FRASCHINI.
THE CELEBRATED DR. FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY
 Will likewise visit England, and produce an Opera expressly composed for Her Majesty's Theatre, the Libretto, founded on
THE TEMPEST

OF SHAKESPEARE: WRITTEN BY M. SCRIBE.
MIRANDA Madlle. JENNY LIND. FERDINAND Sig. GARDONI. PROSPERO Caliban Herr STAUDIGL. Sig. LABLACHE.
 It is likewise announced with great satisfaction, that Signor VERDI, having recovered from his severe illness, has expressly composed for this Theatre, a new Opera, of which the plot is founded on the ROBBERI of SCHILLER.
 Rossini's Opera of ROBERT BRUCE, lately produced at the Académie Royale, has also been secured.

Messrs. CASTELLAN, SANCHIOLI, & MONTENEGRO: Signori GARDONI, SUPERCHI, & FRASCHINI, will appear before Easter.
MAD^{LE}. JENNY LIND, whose engagement commences in March, and extends until the end of the Season, will appear immediately after Easter.

In addition to the above, SEVERAL OPERAS, now to this Country, will be produced, and the renowned will be selected from the Chef-d'œuvres of MOZART, CIMAROSA, ROSSINI, DONIZETTI, MERCADANTE, BELLINI, &c.
 The strictest attention has been paid to all the details, so that an ensemble may be presented perfect in all its parts.
A NUMEROUS ORCHESTRA, of the most distinguished talent and power, has been selected from some of the best orchestras of Europe, combined with former meritorious Artists of the Establishment.
THE CHORUS has been chosen with the greatest care from Italy, Germany, and England, and will comprise upwards of EIGHTY PERFORMERS.

Arrangements for the Ballet:

MAD^{LE}. CARLOTTA CRISI,
MAD^{LE}. LUCILE GRAHN, AND MAD^{LE}. CERITO.

In addition to which, an Engagement has been made with
MAD^{LE}. CAROLINE ROSATI,
 (Of La Scala, at Milan; and other great Theatres of Italy;) who will make her First Appearance on the First Night of the Season in a NEW BALLET, expressly composed and arranged for her by M. PAUL TAGLIONI.

MAD^{LE}. WAUTHIER, MADAME PETIT STEPHAN;
MAD^{LE}. HONORE. MAD^{LE}. ELISE MONTFORT,
Messdmes. THEVENOT, JULIEN, L'AMOUREUX, EMILE, FANNY PASCALES, and BERTIN,

MAD^{LE}. CAROLINE BAUCOURT.
 In consequence of the enthusiastic manner in which this eminent Artiste was received last season, hopes are entertained that
MAD^{LE}. TAGLIONI
 May be induced to appear for a limited number of performances.

M. ST. LEON, M. D'OR, M. GOSSELIN, M. DI NATIA, Sig. VENAPRA, M. COURIET;
M. PAUL TAGLIONI AND M. PERROT.
 Composer of the Ballet Music, SIG. PUGNI, Principal Artist, - MR. MARSHALL.
MATTHEW DE BALLET—M. PAUL TAGLIONI, M. CASATI, of La Scala; AND M. PERROT.
Sous Maître de Ballet, - M. GOSSELIN. Regisseur de la Danse, - M. PETIT.

AN ORIGINAL GRAND BALLET will be produced, written expressly for Her Majesty's Theatre, by the celebrated Poet HENRI HEINE, on a subject selected from the Old LEGENDS OF GERMANY; and also A Novel and Poetical Ballet, for the subject of which the Establishment is indebted to the kindness of a noble and distinguished Poetess, entitled EGERIA.
THE CELEBRATED PAS DE QUATRE AND PAS DES DÉSSES
 Will be revived; and an entirely new Divertissement, introducing another GRAND PAS;

By M. PERROT, which, uniting all the peculiar attractions of the Pas des Déeses, and Pas de Quatre, will present a novel feature of striking originality, and will combine the talent of all: to be entitled

LA CONSTELLATION.

THE SUBSCRIPTION WILL CONSIST OF THE SAME NUMBER OF NIGHTS AS LAST SEASON.

THE THEATRE WILL OPEN IN THE MIDDLE OF FEBRUARY.

When will be produced, for the first time at Her Majesty's Theatre, DONIZETTI's admired Opera of LA FAVORITA;
 In which SIG. GARDONI AND SIG. SUPERCHI will make their first appearance in this Country; and an entirely NEW BALLET, by M. PAUL TAGLIONI; in which MAD^{LE}. CAROLINE ROSATI will appear.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, at the "Nassau Steam Press," by WILLIAM SPENCER JOHNSON, 60, St. Martin's Lane, in the parish of St. Martin's in the Fields, in the County of Middlesex; where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed post paid. To be had of G. PARKES, Dean Street, Soho; Stranger, Paternoster Row; Wisbeart, Dublin; and all Booksellers.—Saturday, January 30th, 1847.

The Musical World.

(PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT NOON.)

A RECORD OF THE THEATRES, MUSIC, LITERATURE, FINE ARTS,
FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE, &c.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s. Stamped; 12s. Unstamped; to be forwarded by Money Order or Postage Stamps to the Publisher, W. S. Johnson, "Nassau Steam Press," 60, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross.

Each Subscriber is entitled to an Admission to an Annual Concert, and a Piece of Music, (regular Music size) Monthly.

No. 6.—VOL. XXII.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1847.

PRICE THREEPENCE
STAMPED, FOURPENCE

NOTICE.

 Our Subscribers are this week presented with four additional pages of matter gratis. Press of news will occasionally incline us to adopt this course, which we trust will be conformable to the pleasure of all our readers.

THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

THE management of this establishment has issued its prospectus, which just reached us in time to allow of our briefly commenting on its contents. We have already discussed the question of opposition involved in the origin of the Covent Garden speculation, often and lengthily enough to put our readers in possession of our views of the matter. The status quo of the two institutions understood, it remains for us to chronicle the promises of either for the coming season of rivalry. The programme of Her Majesty's Theatre was considered in No. 4 of The Musical World. Let us now see what the Royal Italian Opera has to offer as a counter-attraction to so magnificent a prospectus.

To begin, then, the epoch for opening the theatre is fixed for the first week in April—How this can be effected is as yet a riddle; but that it will be effected may be surmised from the fact that no less than one thousand workmen will be employed during the whole of next week. What has already been done is extraordinary enough, considering the short space of time that has elapsed since M. Jullien left the venerable edifice at the mercy of the wielders of saws and hammers. Even now the chaos of scaffolding and plastering is melting into an intelligible form, and the embryo amphitheatre is perceptible through the mist, like the phantom of a gigantic horse-shoe. So that we have little doubt that the overture will be played in the first week in April—let us hope not on April fool's-day.

Next to the period for commencing business, the prospectus announces the intention of the management to produce in the course of the season operas by Cimarosa, Mozart, Rossini, and Meyerbeer, varied by the lighter effusions of Bellini, Donizetti, Mercadante, and ——— no, his effusions are by no means light, the heavy abortions of Maestro Guiseppe Verdi, whose popularity is a severe satire on the musical taste of the day. The operas are to be produced "on a scale of the most per e't ensemble"—of course: what would be thought of a prospectus that said anything else?

And now for the artists engaged. To begin with the vocalists, in other words the chevaux de Bataille of the new establishment. Prima Donne:—Mad. Grisi, Mad. Persiani, Mad. Ronconi, Mdle. Steffanoni. Do our readers wish to know anything about the two first? We opine not; but if they do we can only say that the world has long acknowledged them as unrivalled in their special styles. Of Mdle. Steffanoni we have to state that she comes with a great reputation from La Scala, at Milan, and that it will be her first appearance in this country. Of Mad. Ronconi we cannot speak in terms egregiously encomiastic; du reste she has been here before, but produced no effect that has stood recorded upon the face of history. Besides these, Mad. Antonietta Molliodori (also from La Scala), Mdle. Amalia Linari, and Mdle. Luigina Bellini—about whom, knowing nothing, we can say nothing—complete the list of prime donne, against which we have only one demurrer, viz: the absence of a name as great as any and greater than most of those enumerated, that of Mdme. Pauline Viardot Garcia, whom Germany acknowledges as the rival of the celebrated and much-talked-about Jenny Lind herself. Here we think the Covent Garden directors committed an oversight, and permitted Mr. Lumley—who as our readers know has secured Jenny Lind—to out-general them. But to the contralti, of which the list is meagre in quantity and doubtful in quality. These are confined to two:—Signora Alboni, from the Scala at Milan, and the Imperial Theatre at Vienna, and Mdle. Corbari. The first (who is the only Signora in the catalogue) has a sort of floating reputation that cozes from time to time out of the adēposity of Italian carnivals, whether deserved or not, we cannot pretend to determine. The last, the pretty and gentle Corbari, though not to be cited as "a great gun," has been frequently apostrophised eulogistically in these pages; and as frequently have we thrown the mantle of our influence over her tender form, to protect her from the rough blast of the Chronicle Boreas, who will now have to blow hot instead of cold, the poor victim of his hurricanos having gone over to the other side. This for him, however, will not be a difficult task—experience has endowed him with the power of turning about glibly, four or five times during one moon.

The tenore are strong, and will press hard the contending phalanx at Her Majesty's theatre. The principal is Signor Mario, on whom has fallen the mantle of Rubini, and who wields the sceptre of Donzelli, and wear and wield them both he must until some one more worthy shall come to snatch them from him; a fact which we trust we may live to see, as we have a strong desire to arrive at a green old age before we are gathered to our fathers. The second principal is Signor Salvi, who was much and justly lauded during a season's visit to this country, some three years ago, and of whose progress the critics of St. Petersburg are loud in eulogy. Then there is a Signor Tulli (from the San Carlo, in Naples), and a Signor Emmanuele Slano (do. do.), as to the merits of whom, one and the other, we are wholly in the dark.

The bassi baritoni again are strong, in proof of which we have but to cite the famous Tamburini, who needs no further recommendation than his name brings with it, and who will restore Mozart's Don Juan once more to the London Opera boards; and to keep him company Giorgio Ronconi, who, though he did by no means render justice to himself when he performed at Her Majesty's Theatre, has, if we may credit the untied voice of Italy and France, won for himself since a fame that any artist might envy.

The bassi profondi are Signor Marini, (from the Scala, the San Carlo, and the Imperial Theatre at Vienna), Signor Angelo Alba (from Madrid), and Signor Polonini (from Vienna). All three are new to this country, and Marini is the only one of the three whose fame has reached us. He is reported to possess a magnificent voice, and extraordinary eulogiums have been lavished on his histrionic powers in the opera seria; but it is also incumbent on us to state that many who have heard him, complain of his occasionally uncertain intonation. Time will show, and then we shall be enabled to judge for ourselves of the truth or fallacy of what Rumour has been so busy in circulating.

But the bassi are not done yet; we have another department represented in the Covent-Garden list:—the bassi comici. The deputies for this arrondissement (to use the style of French parliamentary language) are Signor Pietro Ley (from the Theatre Royal in Madrid) of whom we never heard before, and Signor Agostino Rovere (from Naples, Milan, Vienna, and St. Petersburg), an artist of high celebrity in his genre. These, as well as the three bassi profondi, will make their first appearance in this country at the Royal Italian Opera.

The next personage of the dramatis personæ signalled in the prospectus is Signor Michael Costa, director of the music, composer, and conductor. The qualities of this gentleman for his post are incontestable. As a conductor of Italian operas he has not his superior, if indeed his equal, in Europe. Nature and education have marvellously fitted him for such a post; he has endowed them with quickness and facility, a sensitive temperament, and a wonderfully acute ear; with everything, in short, but that higher sort of intellectual capacity which the works of the great German masters demand of him at the concerts of the Philharmonic Society, and fail to find. An additional interest attaches to the name of Signor Costa in this particular prospectus, since he alone has been the cause of the opposition to Her Majesty's Theatre and the consequences thereof, which without him, it is hardly necessary to say, for those who have considered the subject, would have been morally and practically impossible.

The orchestra is another immense feature in the Royal Italian Opera prospectus. In the following list of eighty performers our readers will perceive the names of the great majority of the late orchestra of Her Majesty's Theatre, who have boldly preferred speculation under the standard of Signor Costa to certainty under that of Mr. Lumley. Whether they have acted rightly, justly, and wisely, or the opposites, our readers have had full time and opportunity to consider:—

THE ORCHESTRA.

First violins (fifteen):—Messrs. Sainton, H. Blagrove, Willy, A. Griesbach, Watkins, Case, Thirwall, E. Thomas, Mellon, Patey, Zerbini, Browne, Goffie, and Hill. Second violins (fourteen):—Messrs. Ellis, Newsham, W. Thomas, Payton, H. Westrop, H. Griesbach, J. Jay, Peny, Marshall, W. Blagrove, Betts, Kelly, Bout, and Wilking. Tenors (ten):—Messrs. Moralt, Hill, Alept, Lyon, Glanville, Thomson, Hann, Wealake, Trust, and R. Blagrove. Violoncellos (ten):—Messrs. Lindley, Lucas, Hatton, Lavenu, W. I. Phillips, Hancock, Hausmann, W. Loder, Goodban, and Guest. Double-Basses (nine):—Messrs. Anfossi, Howell, Casolani, Griffiths, Severn, Pratten, Campanile, Castell, and Wandrelan. Harp:—Mr. G. Perry. Flutes:—Messrs. Ribas and De Polly. Oboes:—Messrs. Barret and Nicholson. Clarinets:—Messrs. Lazarus and Boose. Bassoons:—Messrs. Baumann and Keating. Horns:—Messrs. Platt, Jarrett, C. Harper, and Rae. Trumpets:—Messrs. T. Harper and Handley. Trombones:—Messrs. Cioffi, Smithies, and Henley. Ophicleide:—M. Prospero. Drums:—Mr. Chipp. Triangle:—Mr. Leaman.

Base-Drum:—Mr. Horton. Military Band:—that of the Coldstream Guards under the direction of Mr. Godfrey.

To rival this orchestra will be a difficult task for Her Majesty's Theatre to effect. That Mr. Lumley will spare no exertion, however, we know to be the fact; how far he may succeed remains to be seen.

The chorus, the principal members of which are also seceders from Her Majesty's Theatre, the prospectus assures us will be "powerful and numerous." The chorus-master, Signor Bonconsiglio, (who will be able to offer good advice, if he belie not his name) and the prompter, Signor Monterasi, are both unknown to this country. We should have preferred seeing an English artist in the former department. It would have been sounder policy on the part of Signor Costa, and surely there are plenty of our musicians quite adequate to such a post. An organ has been constructed by Messrs. Flight and Son, especially for the theatre; and to the experienced hands Messrs. Grieve and Telbin will be entrusted the preparation of the scenery. In Mr. Marshall, however, Mr. Lumley has secured a formidable opponent in this particular department. Signor Maggioni is constituted poet and translator of the libretti, in contradistinction to whom Mr. Lumley has secured Signor Jannetti, whom we omitted to mention in our notice of the programme of Her Majesty's Theatre. Both are clever men and fully capable of the situation.

The ballet must be shortly dismissed. The announcement of the engagements is preceded by the following sentence, which should be printed in letters of gold:—"No divertissement will be suffered between the acts of an opera."

The engagements for the ballet consist of Mdle. Dumilatre, Mdle. Plunkett, Mdle. Fuoco, Mdle. Baderna, Mdle. Bertin (from Vienna), and Mdle. Neodot (from Madrid). The first three—Dumilatre, Plunkett, and Fuoco—are well known to our audiences, and are all but first-rate d'anciens; the fourth, Baderna, has just made a successful début at Drury Lane, elsewhere recorded in our pages; of the other two, Bertin and Neodot, we either know or can recollect nothing. The drawback to this list is the absence of any one name absolutely first-rate in ability. True, it is added, that engagements are pending with Mdle. Adrianopoli (of whom we never heard) and Mdle. Fanny Ellsler (one of the greatest dancers in the world); but these be but hopes, which may eventually die, and become despairs. The male dancers include the celebrated M. Petipa (from the Académie Royale), Mon. Gontie (from Madrid), of whom we know nothing; M. Ferdinando Croce (from Milan), who débuted successfully with Baderna; M. Delferrier (from the Académie), of whom we know nothing; and M. Auguste Mabilie (from do.), of whom we know no more. Besides these, a band of coryphees, whom we dismiss with the names:—Mdles. Auriol, De Melisse, Celeste Stephan, Delechaux, Duval, Levallois, Rita Pereda, Arnal, Anna Monroy, and the following favourite English ballerines:—Mdles. Genge, Hartley, Barnett, Kendall, Rose Cohen, Laura Maurice, Chester, Marsten, L. Paris, C. Paris, Maskell, Lee, Kirby, E. Clair, Brown, R. Wright, Clifford, Ward, &c. &c. ad infinitum. (N. B. We mention these young ladies individually; least by omitting one of their names we might offend an admirer.) The maitres de ballets, M. Albert (from Paris) and M. Blasius (from Milan), are both well known and deservedly reputed. The leader of the ballet, Mr. Alfred Mellon, is a meritorious English artist, who, for some years, was leader of band at the Adelphi theatre. Mr. O'Bryan, the regisseur de la danse, is an excellent artist, and what is as good, a first-rate man of business. Of the ballet-composer, M. Alessandro Curmi, we know nothing; but we suppose we must be satisfied that he comes (vide prospectus) from the San Carlo. Again, we should have preferred to see an Englishman in this place. It would have been better policy on the part of Signor Costa, and there are plenty capable of the task. The "première artiste costumière," is Mr. E. Bailey, whose celebrity has not yet reached us. But Le Verrier's planet, Neptune, only reached us lately—so we live in hopes.

That the Theatre is being reconstructed under the direction of, and from designs by, Signor B. Albano, our readers well know. Of this engagement we do not approve, having little faith in any Italian quality but that of taste. "The decorations are executed by Mr. Ponsonby, and the furniture is chiefly of British manufacture." This satisfies us well enough: we like anything native, even an oyster. The management states that it "has happily secured the artistic skill of Signori Ferri and Veradi, to embellish the ceiling and to prepare a new drop-scene." The management would, we think, have been still more happy in having secured the services of Mr. Stanfield or Mr. Roberts. At least that is our way of thinking; though we know nothing about Signori Ferri and Veradi, who, for aught we can cite to the contrary, may be remarkably clever personages.

No mention is made of Mr. Beale's office in the establishment; but we cannot refrain from saying that his engagement, as general manager, is one of the most judicious and lucky steps of the new company.

And now that the two operas have launched their programmes, let us watch, as impartial critics, which bears itself the most bravely. Both have our sincere good wishes.

SIVORI IN AMERICA.

(From the New York Evening Mirror, December 1, 1847.)

THE COURIER.—GAZETTE versus CAMILLO SIVORI.—The portentous brayings from the hide of the Courier have again been heard, and the quality of the voice is this time unmistakable. The lion's skin has become ridiculous; even its imposing appearance cannot give dignity or weight to the exquisite simpleton it covers. The malicious, we had almost said infamous, attacks upon Sivori in the Courier and Gazette—or rather in the Gazette, for the criticisms in the Courier are but second-hand spun out notices from the Gazette—these malicious articles, we say, bear abundant evidence of their having originated in the job printing room. That Sivori had his bills and tickets printed at the Herald printing office, is a sin never to be forgiven by the Courier, and the fair fame and honourable reputation of a stranger, is immolated to gratify a bitter spirit of revenge towards a third party. This course is ungenerous, unjust, and hardly consistent with the character of the gallant editor of the Courier. We will now examine this spun-out Gazette article, and show how utterly unworthy it is of credence or respect. We will show its malice, its errors, and its false quotations by inference. Its malice is evident in every way. First, it now blames Sivori for doing that which it imperatively demanded from him before, and by a curious sort of reasoning endeavours to prove that having a large number of excellent artists at one concert is worse than having none at all. 'This gathering together of all the artists in the city is very objectionable, and does not attain the end in view.' What was the end in view? The article in question says that the concert 'was got up with a lavishness of expense, which showed the earnest desire to please the public.' If the desire to please was the end to be attained, surely Sivori was successful, for more than fifteen hundred persons were present, and a more delighted and enthusiastic auditory we have rarely seen. Its malice is evident in the aside thrusts and covert insinuations against Signor Rapetti, and the needless and ungenerous insult to Madame Ablamowicz, with which the article closes; it is also shown in the unnecessary delay in publishing the article and reserving it for that time when it would be calculated to do Sivori the greatest injury. Speaking of Sivori's performance of Spohr's eighth concert, after giving it faint praise it says, "We know three or four violin players of no very great attainment as executants, who would have read this concert in a much better spirit than M. Sivori." We dare the writer to name these "three or four violin players" who, not playing much, could read such music in better spirit than Sivori. He cannot do it; the assertion was only made in order to depreciate Sivori, but who will believe such silly twaddling, unsupported assertions? He then says:—

"But as if to mar what good he had achieved in his performance of it, he introduced a cadenza of interminable length and so absurdly impertinent to the composition, that had it possessed any excellence, which it did not, it would have been insufferable in that connection. It was perfectly executed, but were Sivori a great artist he could not have been tempted to introduce it on any consideration. It is this harlequinism, or, as the Journal des Debats expressed it, 'musical Quixotism which impels him to go in quest of adventures on the handle of his violin'; this feeling—again we quote the Journal des Debats—which makes him 'not satisfied with astonishing and moving, but rather fond of buffoonery,' and which prompts him to the 'greatest excesses,' it is this which prevents him from being, in our opinion, a great artist."

Spohr has written in this concerto a cadenza extending over many lines, the greater part of which was played by Signor Sivori, and the trifling variation which he made, was founded upon the themes of the concerto, and could not therefore be impertinent to the subject. The quotation which immediately follows from the Journal des Debats, is not used in that paper in reference to Sivori's performance of classical music, as the writer of the Gazette would, with Jesuistical cunning, wish the public to believe. We will give the quotation entire, for the benefit of the Gazette critic, and the public will see how the authority he has invoked, and which he wishes the public implicitly to believe, overthrows every pretension the Gazette and Courier critic has, either to knowledge or acumen:

"If it had not been known that Sivori was Paganini's pupil, it would easily have been suspected by the incredible boldness of his play, by that species of musical Quixotism which impels him to go in quest of adventures on the handle of his violin, by the majestic expression of his play, the velocity of his passages, the perfection with which he executes the pizzicato mingled with bow-striking, the trillo and all the double note passages. Nevertheless, it is impossible to accept Paganini's violin on the strength of an inventory. If Sivori possesses the qualities of his master, he also has his eccentricities and defects. He is not satisfied with astonishing and moving, he is rather fond of buffoonery; so that after executing the Prayer of Moses with admirable feeling, he passes on to the little after-piece, and plays you an interlude in which he makes flute, hautboy and bassoon converse together, and during which it is difficult to preserve one's gravity. Let this be said without detracting one iota from the extraordinary merit of this violinist. I must even confess that in the midst of the greatest excesses, his play is always full of elegance and delicacy. And then, it is not given to every artist, not even to the greatest, to joke in such a manner. That charming piece of buffoonery, the Carnival of Venice, has always obtained the honors of an encore. I do not at all feel inclined to be severer than the public. To be fair, I need only add that Sivori made a point to prove in his three concerts, that he was familiar with the most splendid of the productions of the great masters, and he played the classical sonata, the duet and trio of Beethoven, and the capricious evolutions of Paganini with equal success."

Of what value now are the criticisms (?) of this gentleman of the Gazette and Courier, when the authority he cites praises Sivori upon every point that he condemns him? One word more, and we will leave the 'private gentleman' to whatever satisfaction he can glean from the ridiculous position in which he has placed himself. He says that 'if Signor Rapetti had had the magnificent instrument of the other, he would have claimed an equal admiration.' Signor Rapetti played upon a splendid Amati violin which Sivioli frequently uses in public himself! The remarks which follow, about three strings, low bridge and sounding post in a certain position, the private gentleman merely 'ventures,' he does not use them in the form of an accusation. How petty, malicious, and infamous, are such remarks, when they are only ventured in the hope of inflicting an injury.

MADAME BISHOP IN THE PROVINCES.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Liverpool, February 3.

MADAME BISHOP performed for the last time at the Theatre Royal, on Saturday, the 30th last, in the Sonnambula. Having previously heard Madame Bishop in London, both in Loretta and the Maid of Artois, I was led to expect great things from her in Bellini's delicious opera, as however fine her performances were in the above operas, I felt that they did not afford the artist full scope for her genius. I was by no means disappointed. Madame Bishop surpassed, rather than fulfilled my utmost expectations. Her Amina in the Sonnambula is a most exquisite representation, full of passion and pathos, and exhibiting to perfection the almost exhaustless resources of her superb vocalisation. Her first cavatina, "Dearest Companions," the "Come per me sereno" of the Italian version, was deliciously given. There was hardly a note which did not derive a meaning in her interpretation. She also gave the theme in E flat in the slow movement of the second finale, exquisitely. The theme comprises not more than eight bars, yet such was the effect she produced as to call forth immense applause. The rondo finale, you may well imagine, was the crowning rose of the evening's performance. Its effects may be simply told, by stating the fact that it was encored twice. It was the most finished specimen of vocalisation I have had the luck to hear for many a long day. Madame Bishop sang the finale in the Italian. I confess I did not perceive the propriety of this. Although the English words are difficult to pronounce, and sound harshly in the ears, the introduction of Italian words into a translated version was so discrepant as to excite an unfavourable surprise. The audience, however, seemed entirely to overlook the heterogeneity which fell somewhat sudden on our critical ears. Madame Bishop was recalled when the curtain descended, and was received with most deafening applauses. I was particularly struck with the grace and fascination of Madame Bishop's manner in Bellini's charming heroine. The part of Amina seems absolutely created for her, both in its vocal and histrionic requisitions; or it may be, that the artist, by her genius, so involves herself with the character as to make you feel both part and interpreter identical. This is the perfection of art; and it is this which all great singers aim at, but which so few attain.

There is one feature in Madame Bishop's performances, which, I think, is worthy of remark, and that is, she sings the music according to the original score. You must be aware that this is never the case with our English vocalists. These transpose the arias into all sorts of keys, in consequence of which too often the entire character of the music is sacrificed. Madame Bishop having a pure soprano voice, sings the music as Bellini wrote it. As we are on the subject of transposition, I must relate to you an extraordinary occurrence that took place on the night the Sonnambula was performed. Whilst Madame Bishop was singing the rondo finale in B flat, the original key, the chorus, who strange to say, had no rehearsal with her, and thinking they should sing it as they had been previously accustomed, absolutely sang their parts a third below, in F, and created the most discrepant noises you ever heard. Think of that, good master Editor! The manner in which the operas were produced for Madame Bishop was disgraceful in the extreme. If anything could have marred the success of the great artist, this flagrant direktion of the management would have done so. Think of a manager, in the present state of musical matters, engaging a first rate prima donna, without making the least preparation to perform the operas in which she was to appear! Imagine no artist of the slightest consequence engaged to support her; (until Mr. D. W. King was engaged in her last performances, a mere novice was given her to sustain the principal parts, and Mr. King from hoarseness failed to produce any effect); imagine a band numbering no more than from twelve to fourteen attempting to give effect to modern operas and to accompanying elaborate vocal displays! And think of the effect of operas performed at night after one solitary and inefficient rehearsal on the day of the performance! I am told, indeed, that although the scores had been transmitted weeks since, the parts were only given out to be copied forty-eight hours previous to the performance! The members of the Birmingham and Liverpool bands, it is true, are excellent musicians, but the mistakes and procrastination of the manager left them entirely at fault. What is the result of such misdirection? The public, after paying the due tribute of respect and admiration to the admirable prima donna, finding all the managerial arrangements miserably inefficient, lose all interest, after the first night or two in a performance that otherwise would have been continually attractive. And in this manner the greatest artist, the most transcendent talent may be easily sacrificed.

(Extract from a Letter.)

"SIR,—Madame Bishop commenced an engagement here for six nights on Monday last, and has been playing during the week in the "Maid of Artois" and "Sonnambula." Her execution of the part of Isolore was beautiful in the extreme, and received deserved and enthusiastic applause, particularly in the desert scene, the music of which she gave with intense pathos. On Friday evening she appeared as Amina in Sonnambula, assisted by Miss Fitzwilliam, as Lisa, Mr. King (Elvino), and Mr. Corri Rodolpho. It is almost impossible to describe the beauty with which she gave the opening recitative and air, "Dearest Companions," it was exquisite, as also the duet with Elvino, "Take now this Ring;" but in the finale to the second act, her lower notes were found wanting. Her crowning triumph, however, was the finale, "Do not mingle," which she gave in Italian: it created a complete furor, and received a double encore. Mr. King appeared to be labouring under a severe cold, which marred the effect of the air, "Still so gently;" but on the following evening he sang extremely well, and received much deserved applause. Miss Fitzwilliam gave an excellent version of her part as Lisa, and particularly distinguished herself in the cavatina, "Sounds so joyful." We don't remember ever seeing the part so ably sustained. Mr. Corri, as Rodolpho, sang the music allotted to him very neatly, particularly the air, "As I view these Scenes." His voice has rather a harsh tendency, but he always sings in tune. The choruses were extremely unsteady, so much so, that they called forth severe marks of disapprobation.

Yours obediently,

Liverpool, Jan. 30.

A SUBSCRIBER."

On Wednesday last, Madame Bishop sang at a concert at Cambridge, with brilliant success. The room was crowded to suffocation, and the charming vocalist was received and applauded with the utmost enthusiasm. Her ballad "The banks of Guadalquivir," and the pretty romance of "La Bayadere," were encored with acclamations. The concert was given by Mr. G. Nicholls, an excellent flautist, and one of the first performers in Cambridge. All the arrangements were very creditable to his taste and management. The Distin's family and John Parry, added to the attractions of the concert, and were received with the honors that they never fail to obtain. The Town-Hall has not for many years boasted so brilliant and fashionable an assemblage at a musical performance. Mad. Bishop turned out a trump-card for the enterprising concert giver.

ANECDOTE OF FANNY ELLSLER.

In les Mysteres du Grand-Opera, we read the following anecdote. One evening, Burat de Gurgy, author of le Diable Boiteux entered Fanny Ellsler's loge, which was guarded as usual on the outside by two tall footmen, and entirely devoid of ornament within, not being even carpeted.

"My dear M. Burat," said Fanny, "I am in a terrible rage. I have my pas to dance, and the corps de ballet have stolen my chalk."

"What, you think so?"

"No doubt of it. I have asked everybody for some, Nathalie Fitzjames, Noblet, and her sister, and they say they have none. It is a conspiracy, you see, to hinder me from dancing. So now, M. Burat, you will get me some chalk, will you not?"

"But my dear lady, I don't know where to go for it."

"Make haste," replied the danseuse. "I will pay whatever you like for it. You have a quarter of an hour before the curtain rises. I shall expect you."

"It was then eleven o'clock, and all the shops were shut: M. Burat de Gurgy was highly embarrassed what to do.

"However, at last he returned, bringing twenty little bits of chalk, but looking anything rather than cheerful.

"Ah!" cried Fanny Ellsler, "what do I owe for it?"

"Ten petits verres," was the answer. "I have been obliged to go to ten cafes, to steal the chalk from the billiard tables."

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE fourteenth annual meeting of the members of the Sacred Harmonic Society, for receiving a report from the committee on the proceedings of the past year, the election of officers, &c. took place at Exeter Hall, on Tuesday. There was not a very full attendance of members. The report showed an aggregate increase of forty-five members and subscribers over the number of last year; that the number of concerts given during the year 1846, was eighteen, being eight more than the average of the last seven years; that at such concerts several of the pieces performed were entirely new to the public, several oratorios by Handel, Beethoven, and Spohr, had not been heard since 1842, and that several of the principal singers had not previously appeared at the society's performances. On the concert account, there was a deficiency of above £500, the expenses being £3534 2s. 1d., and the receipts only £3025 9s. 0d., leaving a balance of £508 13s. 1d. chargeable on the general funds of the society. It appeared that the principal deficiencies arose from those concerts at which new works had been performed. The property of the society invested in stock, on interest, in the library, and in musical instruments, &c., was stated at £2,000. Some interesting statistical details were given, from which it appeared that the society since its existence, had afforded to the public the opportunity of hearing Handel's "Messiah" forty-one times;—"Israel in Egypt" seventeen times;—"Judas Maccabeus" twelve times;—"Samson" six times;—"Solomon" seven times;—"Joshua" five times;—"Saul" four times;—

"Jephthah" four times;—"Athaliah" once;—"Dettingen Te Deum" once;—"Jubilate" once;—"Zadoc the Priest" twice; Haydn's "Creation" twenty-four times;—"Masses" six times; Mozart's "Masses" three times; Beethoven's "Mount of Olives" three times;—"Mass in C" twice; Spohr's "Last Judgment" four times; Purcell's "Jubilate" once; Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" eight times;—"Lobgesang" eight times;—"As the Hart Pants" (psalm) once;—and "When Israel" (psalm) once. During the last ten years, the number of concerts have been one hundred and sixty. The number of persons who had attended them was 306,670. The receipts for such concerts were upwards of £37,000, of which sum, £20,000 had been distributed amongst the musical profession. The report, in conclusion, announced the intention of the committee to produce several novelties during the present season: viz., Handel's "Belshazzar;" Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and some of Spohr's late compositions; also, that the two last talented composers had been engaged to conduct some of the society's performances.

Mr. Reseigh, in proposing the adoption of the report, congratulated the society on their achievements in the cause of music during the last fourteen years. That congratulation, was a little allayed by their present financial position as regarded the last year's operations, there being a deficiency of above £500. He, however, could not suggest any remedy, but thought their best course would be, to leave the consideration of the subject, whether any reduction of expenditure could be made to the committee, who kindly devoted so much of their time to the society's affairs, and who, he was sure, would give it their anxious consideration. He therefore proposed, that the report and accounts should be adopted. The motion having been seconded, was unanimously carried, after some observations from Mr. James Taylor, who suggested that a larger number of members should be admitted, no increase having taken place since 1842; that several alterations were desirable in the orchestra, which would much improve the general character of the performances, especially as regarded the alto singers and second violins; and that the pecuniary assistance afforded by the society, to enable the musical studies of talented young persons to be prosecuted, in cases where they themselves were not able to do so, should be extended. Considerable discussion ensued on a motion made by Mr. Cohen, to the effect of urging the committee to take measures to improve the style of the performances. He pointed out to the meeting the severe criticisms which had been made on the glaring defects of execution which were observable in many of their most frequently performed oratorios, and was persuaded that but little progress had been made for several years, and that in many points there had been retrogression. He thought that the particular attention of the committee should be drawn to the causes alleged by many critical writers, with a view to their remedy, and was certain that by a proper weeding, and separation of the bad elements from the good, punctual attendance at rehearsal, and increased vigilance on the part of their conductor, leader, and organist, the society would yet achieve the proud position of the first association of the kind in the world. Several members urged the necessity of some particular regulations on the subject of rehearsals, and eventually the motion was withdrawn, and a resolution adopted approbatory of a regulation of the committee, circulated to the members at the beginning of the season of 1846, to secure that desirable object, and urging that it might be rigidly enforced.

The usual votes of thanks to the president, the officers, committee, assistants, stewards, and leaders of the chorus having been passed, the meeting broke up.

THE RIVAL OPERAS.

(From The Spectator.)

To judge from the bother made by some of the newspapers, one would suppose that London were shaken to its centre by the war of the rival Italian Operas. Mole-hills are magnified into mountains, and matters of green-room gossip are discussed with the pertinacity, if not the dignity, of national quarrels. The Morning Chronicle, especially, has been conspicuous in this fussy warfare, and has laboured as hard to make out its own views of the questions concerned in the engagements of Jenny Lind as it ever did in supporting the diplomacy of Lord Palmerston. The affair, though scarcely so important as that of the measures for the relief of the Irish, has yet an interest of its own; and therefore we shall endeavour to tell our readers in a few words how it stands. We mentioned last week the interim programme issued by Mr. Lumley, in which he announces the engagement of Mademoiselle Lind from Easter to the end of the season. The Chronicle withheld all belief from this announcement, as being contained in a manuscript, and therefore not an official document. It was then published in the newspapers: and still the Chronicle refused to believe it, simply because it was a falsehood. Mr. Bunn, it seems, has Jenny Lind under an engagement to him, from which he refuses to release her; and the Chronicle, last Monday, began an elaborate article by expressing its "great gratification that the great obstacle to the appearance of Jenny Lind in this country had been removed, there being now no reasonable doubt as to her débüt being made at Drury Lane Theatre in due course, the lessee having in the handsomest manner consented to her singing either in Italian or German, at her option." And the great gratification of the Whig journal is founded on a letter from Mr. Bunn to Mademoiselle Lind (which it quotes), dated two days before, and making this proposal. Now, in talking thus, our good friend is either stultifying himself or trying to stultify his readers. Could any rational being believe for a moment that Mr. Bunn was in earnest in making such a proposal, or had the least idea of its being accepted? The manager of an English theatre, with an English company, offering to engage a prima donna to sing either in Italian or German, at her option!—we should like to see Mr. Bunn's visage on opening a letter from the lady, intimating her acceptance of the option; her choice of Italian as her language, and of Norma for her débüt; and her intention of being in London, to begin the rehearsals, on some day in March or April! Does Mr. Bunn mean to have an Italian or German company ready for her arrival; or is he thinking of the infant days of our opera stage, when a Signor Valentini poured out his raptures in choice Italian, and Mrs. Tofts responded to them in downright English? Does he purpose that the passionate scenes between Norma and Pollio shall be thus enacted by Jenny Lind and Mr. Harrison? But the thing is too ridiculous—Mr. Bunn never dreams of such a dilemma. He knows that "the Swedish nightingale" is coming to Mr. Lumley; and that all he can do is to make the most of her breach of engagement with him, either by going to law or accepting a handsome douceur. The Chronicle has also thought fit to deny the truth of Mr. Lumley's announcement that Mendelssohn will visit England and produce an opera, the libretto written by Scribe, on the subject of the Tempest; and it quotes a letter from a Mr. Buxton (a music-publisher in the City), who volunteers a "flat contradiction" of the statement, coolly pronouncing it a "fabrication." This witness proves too much—more than he can possibly know. To his mere negative assertion we should venture to prefer the previous affirmative assertion of the lessee of the Italian Opera, even though this assertion were not (as it is) confirmed by letters in town from Mendelssohn himself.

BEETHOVEN QUARTETT SOCIETY.

THE management of this admirable musical institution has devolved on Mr. Scipion Rousselot in consequence of a late event with which our readers are sufficiently familiar. It was the wish of the late lamented director of these two concerts, that this gentleman should undertake the entire conduct of the Beethoven Quartett Society; and agreeable to that intent, Mr. Rousselot was appointed sole manager at the latter period of the past season. Mr. Rousselot has this year taken the whole responsibility of the arrangements on himself. He has issued his printed prospectus, in which we find, that eight performances, as usual, are to take place, and that the meetings will be held as heretofore, in Harley Street. Mr. Rousselot holds out to the subscribers of Beethoven Quartett Society every advantage which its means are capable of procuring. He engages himself to provide for each performance the best talent in Europe, as soon as he is secured against pecuniary loss by subscriptions, and pledges himself that he has not the remotest intention of making the society a source of pecuniary profits. We most cordially believe this. Mr. Rousselot is a real musician in heart as well as head, and would be the last man to degrade the nobility of fine arts, by turning it into a matter of speculation. We wish well to the society, and are delighted that so trustworthy a musician, and so indefatigable a labourer as Mr. Scipion Rousselot is placed at its head.

CONCERTS.

MR. DANDO'S QUARTET CONCERTS.—The first of these took place on Monday evening, January 25, in the Throne room, Crosby Hall. The following was the programme:—

PART I.—Quartet in F major, (No. 26) for two violins, viola, and violoncello, Haydn, Messrs. Dando, Gattie, W. Thomas, and Lucas. Aria, Miss Dolby, "Non credo instabile," (Flavio) Handel. Quartet in G minor, No. 3, (Op. 27) for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, Mozart, Messrs. Sterndale Bennett, Dando, W. Thomas, and Lucas.

PART II.—Quartet in C major, No. 1 of Op. 145, (dedicated to Mr. Charles Aders) for flute, violin, viola, and violoncello, F. Ries, Messrs. Clinton, Dando, W. Thomas, and Lucas, (first time of public performance in this country). Song, Miss Dolby, "Auf dem Wasser," (M.S.) Mendelssohn, and "The Shepherd's Winter Song," Czapek. Quintet in C minor, Op. 104. (Re-written from No. 3 of Op. 1,) for two violins, two violas, and violoncello, Beethoven, Messrs. Dando, Gattie, W. Thomas, Hill, and Lucas.—Conductor, Mr. Sterndale Bennett.

The concert began at seven o'clock, an hour before we anticipated, the consequence of which was our losing Haydn's quartet, Miss Dolby's first song, and the Allegro in Mozart's quartet. The two movements of the last mentioned which we did hear, however, compensated for the loss. Mr. Sterndale Bennett, who in this kind of music has but few rivals, played beautifully. It is a rare treat to listen to so conscientious and admirable a pianist interpreting the undying melody of Mozart—much in the same manner, by the way, if we may reckon from analogy, that the composer would have interpreted it himself. The quartet of Ries is less pretentious than many works of that over-estimated musician, and the more agreeable on that account. There is not an original idea in it from one end to the other, but it is well written, the subjects are flowing and simple, and the charm of facility characterizes it throughout. It was exceedingly well played. Mr. Clinton supported the flute part with great cleverness, and the tones of his instrument blended with those of its stringed co-operators more completely and effectively than we could have anticipated. In fact we never missed the presence of a first violin, so efficient was its tubed substitute in the hands of Mr. Clinton. Of Miss Dolby's two songs, that of Mendelssohn bore the bell, being encored warmly. True, Miss Dolby sang it charmingly, exquisitely indeed—and true it is a charming, nay an exquisite song—and, moreover, (as the Times informs us) it was written by the composer expressly for the singer, and by his own hand copied into her album—and to conclude, the accompaniment, which is lovely, was played by Mr. Sterndale Bennett—so that all these charms combined bore hard upon the song of Mr. Czapek (J. L. Hatton) which immediately followed, and which, notwithstanding, is exceedingly quaint, pretty, and musician-like. But “Auf dem wasser” made us feel as it were the influence of the warm summer sunshine, while “The Shepherd's Winter Song” brought with it associations of the bleak wintry wind, and Miss Dolby is incontestably more summery than wintry—at least if we may judge by her smile. The quintet of Beethoven, Op. 104, being an arrangement of his early trio, attributed to his own hand on grounds by no means satisfactory (on the bare authority of a music publisher), we did not wait to hear it, not caring greatly for re-arrangements and remodellings. Mr. Dando's playing, in such of the pieces as we heard, was eminently artist-like, finished and elegant; few indeed can excel him in the quartet-style. Messrs. Gattie, Hill, W. Thomas, and Lucas, were as they generally are, all that could be desired; all the most exacting connoisseurs of their special instruments could demand. On the whole this programme was not quite so interesting a one as we are used to expect from Mr. Dando—but, doubtless, the second concert will make up by more than usual excellence for the small deficiencies of its predecessor. The room was tolerably well filled by staunch amateurs of the right sort, who never fail to gather round Mr. Dando at his annual meetings.

MADAME DULCKEN'S SOIREES.—The first of these for the present season occurred on Wednesday evening, Jan. 27, at Madame Dulcken's residence, in Harley-street. The programme was as below:—

FIRST PART.—Quintet (A minor), Op. 34, two violins, tenor, violoncello, and contra-basso, Messrs. Willy, Goffrie, Hill, Lucas, and Howell, Ons ow. Aria, “Ah! si per voi,” Mr. Manvers (Otello), Rossini. Quatuor, pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, Madame Dulcken, Messrs. Willy, Hill, and Lucas Mendelssohn. Grand Aria, “Si lo sento,” Miss Rainforth (Faust), Spohr. Grand Sonata (in F), pianoforte and Violin, Madame Dulcken and Mons. Sainton, Beethoven.

SECOND PART.—Grand Concerto (Posthumous), pianoforte and orchestra, Madame Dulcken, Messrs. Willy, Goffrie, Jay, Hill, Westrop, Hill, Wealake, Lucas, Goodban, Howell, Severn, Wells, Grattan Cooke, Nicholson, Lazarus, Baddely, Keating, Hardy, Jarrett, T. Harper, Goodwin, &c., &c., Hummel. German Song, “Kommt herbey,” Miss Rainforth (first time of performance), Molique. Ballad, “’Tis sad thus to fall,” Mr. Manvers (Gipsy's Warning). Benedict. Gigue, for pianoforte (in F sharp minor), Madame Dulcken, Handel. Pièce pour le Clavecin (in A), Madame Dulcken, Scarlatti. Duet, “Torn'a mi a dir,” Miss Rainforth and Mr. Manvers (Don Pasquale) Donizetti.—Conductor, M. Benedict.

The fashionable amateurs and well-known professionals, who ordinarily flock to these elegant meetings, assembled in considerable numbers on the present occasion. The quintet of Onslow, a marvellously clever and a marvellously uninspired composition, was most correctly and spiritedly executed. We have seldom heard Mr. Willy play more ably, and Mr. Goffrie played up to him admirably. We need hardly say how well they were aided by Messrs. Hill, Lucas, and Howell. Suffice it, that Onslow's quintet interested us in spite of its monotony and dryness. The air from Otello is hardly suited to Mr. Manvers; and we have heard Miss Rainforth many times to more advantage in the fine aria of Spohr, ordinarily one of her happiest efforts. Mendelssohn's quartet—one of his earliest works—is full of beauties; but we feel the lengthiness which the papers have remarked in its notices of these concert, especially in the first movement, which was taken much too slow at the commencement. In other respects the whole quartet was capitally played; and in the scherzo and finale, the best parts of the quartet, Madame Dulcken's brilliant execution was heard to brilliant advantage. Beethoven's captivating sonata was the purest gem of the evening, both as to the merits of the music and the excellence of its interpretation. Mons. Sainton is always at home in Beethoven, and surpassed himself on this occasion: in Madame Dulcken he found a coadjutor nothing backward in joining with him zeal for zeal and grace for grace, at the shrine of the mighty master. The concerto of Hummel is an ingenious and spirituel work, and was excellently played, albeit an orchestra is scarcely at home in a drawing-room. Why did Madame Dulcken omit part of the first tutti? It put the composition out of joint, and saved how much time?—about a minute! Molique's elegant little song, Kommt herbey,* was delivered by Miss Rainforth with that expressive simplicity of style which best interprets its meaning. The melodious ballad, from Benedict's Gipsy's Warning, was also very unaffectedly rendered by Mr. Manvers. Of Handel's Gigue, in F sharp minor, we have spoken in our review of Messrs. Cramer's recently published edition of the Suites de Pièces. It is unnecessary to say that in Madame Dulcken's hands it lost none of its charm. But why did not the fair pianist accompany it by the superb fugue which belongs to the same suite, instead of the pièce of Scarlatti, which has little but its brilliancy to recommend it? We did not wait for the concluding duet. On the whole, the programme was too heavy and too long; but where are we to look for perfection? The second soirée is announced for Wednesday next.

MR. P. EZEKIEL'S CONCERT.—On Tuesday the large room in Crosby Hall was crowded to excess on the above occasion. Mr. Ezekiel is a pianist of ability, and the artists he had engaged to help out the attractions of his concert included some of our most popular and deserving. The vocalists were, Misses Dolby and Thornton, Messrs. G. Genge, Leffler, and John Parry. Mr. T. Reynolds, a young performer on the harp was the additional instrumentalist, and Mr. Maurice Davies the accompanist of the evening. Mr. Ezekiel performed the pianoforte part of Weber's Concert-stück, without any accompaniment, a feat of no ordinary courage, since in addition to the intrinsic difficulties of this brilliant composition, the performers had to contend with the recollections of those amateurs, who being acquainted with the score, were naturally on the constant look out for orchestral effects, which they constantly missed. Nevertheless, Mr. Ezekiel acquitted himself musically, cutting away such of the passages as were hostile to his progress, and by lopping and abbreviating, rendering the offspring of Weber's fiery genius more amenable to the appreciation of the major part of the audience. So much pleased were his hearers with Mr. Ezekiel's playing, that they encored him unanimously, and in retort he performed a pot pourri on one of the popular airs of Henry Russell's repertoire, which took mightily. Mr. Ezekiel's second solo had a similar effect on the assembly, naturally disposed in his favour, and he was applauded “to the echo.” Mr. T. Reynolds's, in two harp solos, the one whereof hight “Ar hyd y nos,” the other “Per Oslef, or Sweet Melody,” also brought together frequently and noisily, the Crosbyan palms of hands. Among the vocal pieces were several encores—one of Miss Dolby in "Ah quel Giorno," which she refused to take, another for the same charming vocalist in Linley's ballad "Constance," to which she responded by another ballad of the same prolific tunist, half a note lower, singing both quietly and expressively, and accompanying herself in both with rare taste. Another encore was awarded to Miss Thornton, a very unaffected singer, with a sweet and gentle soprano of moderate compass, in the elegant ballad, "It is not form it is not face," from The Bondman, of Maestro Balfe. The two encores which remain unrecorded were for the most composed and courteous of side-splitters, John Parry, who in the fairy romance yelect "The White Cat," embellished the humour of his strain with some marvellous exhibitions of grotesque pianism, and in "The London Season," seasoned the jibes, and jeers, and saws, and instances, of the never-to-be-sufficiently apostrophized Albert Smith, with quips and quirks and sparkling jollity teeming spontaneously from his own invention. To the first encore he responded by his "Matrimony," a lyric homily, in which much wisdom lurks under a motley covering, and to the second by something equally pungent and well-flavored. To hear John Parry play the piano makes one say, "If John Parry had not been John Parry he would have been Sigismund Thalberg, but being John Parry he does not want to be any other he that plays or sings." And this involves a positive and sober truth. An apology was made for Mr. Leffler, who, to the great disappointment of his many admirers, was afflicted with a severe hoarseness, and only sang one of the pieces set down for him, Edward Loder's quaint romount, "Philip the Falconer." Mr. Genge was greatly applauded in three songs, especially in the last, "Sally in our Alley," a ballad which has been popular for some time. Mr. Maurice Davies accomplished the duties of accompanist during the evening, and acquitted himself with zeal and indefatigability. In Barnett's "Song of the Ve-maid," which was sung by Miss Thornton in a style worthy of the music, and in Balfe's "It is not form, it is not face," his acquirements were satisfactorily tested; but in Miss Dolby's Italian song, Mr. Davies being too anxious, was less effective and correct than in anything else during the evening

THE AFFINITIES.

from the German of Göthe.

(Continued from page 67.)

PART I.—CHAPTER XVIII.

It will be easily imagined that Mittler, that strangely active man with whom we are already acquainted, had no sooner heard of the misfortune that had befallen the friends, than he felt inclined, without asking, to show his friendship and readiness to assist. However, he thought it advisable first to wait awhile; for he knew but too well, that in moral dilemmas it is more difficult to aid educated than uneducated persons, he therefore left them a long time to themselves; but at last he could hold out no longer and hastened to seek Edward, being already upon his traces.

His way took him into a pleasant valley, where the water of an ever-flowing brook, now meandered, now rushed through a green piece of meadow-land planted with trees. Along the gentle declivities extended fertile fields and well-conditioned orchards. The villages were not too close to each other; the whole had a peaceful character and if the separate parts were not fitted for painting, at any rate they seemed well suited for the purposes of living.

A well-ordered farm, with a clean, modest-looking house attached to it, at last met his view. He guessed that this was Edward's private abode, and he was not mistaken.

Of this solitary man we can say, that in his present state of quiet, he entirely gave himself up to his passion, imagining many plans, fostering many hopes. He would not deny that he wished to see Ottilia here—to bring her here—to allure her here,—nay what was there lawful or unlawful which he did not venture to think? Then his imagination wandered through all sorts of possibilities. If he could not possess her—legally possess her—he would give her possession of the property. Here should she live for herself quietly and independently; she should be happy; and if a self-tormenting imagination carried him still farther, happy with another.

Thus did his days float away in a ceaseless wavering between hope and fear, between tears and cheerfulness, between projects, preparations, and despair. The sight of Mittler did not astonish him; he had long expected his arrival, and even looked upon him as rather welcome. If he considered him sent by Charlotte, he had prepared himself with all sorts of excuses and delays, as well as with more decided proposals. But if he hoped again to hear something of Ottilia, Mittler was as dear to him as a messenger from heaven.

Edward was therefore feverish and out of humour when he learned that Mittler did not come from them, but of his own accord; his heart closed up, and at first it was impossible to open the conversation. But Mittler knew well enough that a heart occupied with love feels a pressing necessity to utter its feelings, to pour them out in presence of a friend; and hence on this occasion, after some desultory observations, he allowed himself to quit his usual part, and play the confidant instead of the mediator.

When, in a friendly manner, he had blamed Edward on account of his solitary life, the latter replied,—"O, I know not how I could pass my time more agreeably! I am always occupied with her—always in her presence. I have the inestimable advantage of being able to fancy how Ottilia is, whither she goes, where she stands, where she reposes. I see her before me doing as she was wont—making and undertaking, and always doing that which is most pleasant to me. But it cannot remain thus; how can I be happy when at a distance from her? My fancy labours to devise what Ottilia should do to approach me. I write to myself sweet confidential letters in her name; I answer her, and keep the papers together. I have promised not to advance a step farther, and I will keep my promise. But what restrains her that she does not turn to me? Has Charlotte been cruel enough to extort from her a promise, an oath, that she will not write to me, that she will give no account of herself? It is natural—it is probable—and yet I find it a thing unheard of, and not to be endured. If she loves me, as I believe, nay, as I know she does, why does she not venture to fly, and throw herself into my arms? She should—I often think she could do that. When anything is stirring in the ante-room, I look towards the door; I think—I hope that she will come. Aye, and as the possible is impossible, I fancy that the impossible must become possible. At night, when I wake up, and the lamp casts an uncertain light through the chamber, then should her form, her spirit, some indication of her, float before me, approach me, touch me, if only for a moment, to give me a sort of assurance that she was thinking of me—that she was mine.

"One single joy remains for me. When I was near her I dreamed of her; but now I am at a distance from her we are together in my dreams; and strange to say, it was not till I became acquainted with other amiable persons in the neighbourhood that her image appeared, as if to say: 'Look about you,—you will find none more beautiful, none more dear than I am.' And thus her form is blended with every one of my dreams. All that has passed between us is mingled together. Now we are signing a contract; and then her hand and mine, her name and mine extinguish each other, are entwined with each other. Nor are these delightful sports of fancy entirely free from pain. Often she does something which is contrary to the high idea I have of her, and then I first feel how much I love her, as my pain is beyond all description. Often she teases and torments me in a manner, which is anything but hers; but then her form changes; her beautiful, round, heavenly face, lengthens itself, and I find it is another. But still I am tormented—unsatisfied—distracted!

"Do not smile, dear Mittler; or, if you will, do smile! Oh, I am not ashamed of this attachment; of this—if you please to call it so—foolish, mad passion. No! I have never loved till now,—now I first learn what love means. All before in my life was a mere prelude—a pretence—a killing of time, till I know her—loved her—wholly and passionately loved her. It has been said of me, not just to my face, but often behind my back, that I am a bungler in most things. May be so; but I had not found that in which I could show myself as a master. I should like to see him who could excel me in the talent of loving. It is indeed a sad, painful, tearful art; but I find it so natural to me, so peculiarly my own, that I shall hardly ever be able to abandon it.”

In this warm, animated declaration, Edward found some relief; but every single feature of his strange position was brought plainly before his eyes; and overcome by the painful contest he burst into tears, which flowed more freely, because the confession had softened his heart.

Mittler, who could so much the less abandon his hasty temperament and his immovable understanding, since he saw how far he was driven from the purpose of his journey, by the painful outbreak of Edward's passion, openly and in unmeasured terms expressed his disapproval. Edward, he said, should display more fortitude, should reflect what he owed to manly dignity; should not forget that it was the highest honour for humanity, to exercise self-command in misfortune; to bear pain with dignity and indifference; and that this was the way to be prized, esteemed, and held up as a model.

To Edward, excited as he was, and penetrated with the most agonising feelings, these words necessarily appeared hollow and worthless.

“The happy man, who finds all things pleasant,” continued Edward “may talk as he pleases; but he would be ashamed if he saw how insupportable he was to the sufferer. This unyielding, comfortable person, requires an infinite patience, but will not admit an infinite pain. There are cases—yes there are—when consolation is despicable, and despair is a duty. A noble Greek, who knows how to delineate lovers, by no means scruples to let them weep, under the infliction of pain. He even says as a proverb: ‘Men abounding in tears are good.’ Let every one leave me whose heart is dry—whose eyes are dry. I curse the happy to whom the unhappy man is only to serve as a spectacle. In the most frightful state of mental and bodily anguish he is to demean himself nobly, that he may gain their approbation—like a gladiator die with dignity before their eyes that he may gain more applause at his departure. Dear Mittler, I thank you for your visit, but you would do me a great favour by taking a turn in the garden or about the spot. We shall meet again. I will endeavour to be more collected, and more like you.”

Mittler wished rather to resume than to break off the conversation, which he could not so easily renew. Edward also found it quite suitable to continue a dialogue which moreover tended to some point.

“It is true,” said Edward, “thinking this and that, and talking this and that does no good; but nevertheless our discourse has first made me decidedly feel what I should resolve, nay, what I have resolved already. I see before me my present and future life, and have only to choose between wretchedness and enjoyment. My good friend, do bring about a separation which is so necessary, nay which has actually taken place. Get me Charlotte's consent, which, for reasons which I will not explain, may, I think, be obtained. Go, my dear friend, remove all uneasiness, make us all happy.”

Mittler made no answer. Edward continued: “My fate and Otilia's are not to be separated, and we will not be destroyed. Look at this glass! Our initials are cut upon it. A man in the act of rejoicing flung it into the air, meaning that no one afterwards should drink from it, and that it should be dashed to pieces against the rocky soil. Nevertheless it was caught. I have bought it back at a high price, and now I daily drink from it, daily to convince myself, that all the relations decreed by Fate are indissoluble.”

“Alas! Alas!” cried Mittler, “what patience I must have with my friends! how I am met by superstition, which I detest as the worst thing that can enter the mind of a man. We play with predictions, forebodings and dreams, and thus give an importance to mere every-day life. But when life itself becomes important, and all is moving and roaring around us, then those spectres only render the storm more fearful.”

“In this uncertainty of life,” cried Edward, “when we are wavering between hope and uneasiness, do leave the heart, which wants some consolation, a polar-star to which it may look, if it cannot steer by it.”

“I would put up with it,” returned Mittler, “if any consistency were to be hoped, but I have always found that no one pays regard to the warning signs, but that the attention is exclusively directed to those which promise and flatter, and that for those exclusively there is a lively faith.”

As Mittler found he was now completely drawn into the dark regions, where the longer he remained the more uncomfortable he felt, he more readily yielded to the urgent desire of Edward, who begged him to go to Charlotte. For how could he answer Edward at the present moment? All that, in his own opinion, was left for him to do, was to gain time, and see how matters stood with the ladies.

He hastened to Charlotte, whom, as usual, he found cheerful and collected. She readily told him all that had occurred, since from Edward's discourse he had only learned the result. On his own side he began cautiously, but could not make up his mind even to touch on the word separation. How astonished, therefore, and according to his own views how pleased he was, when Charlotte, at the end of so much that was unpleasant, said: “I must believe, I must hope, that all will come right again, that Edward will return. How can it be otherwise, when I assure you, I am likely to become a mother?”

“Do I understand aright?” interrupted Mittler.

“Perfectly,” replied Charlotte.

“Blessed, a thousand times blessed be this news!” exclaimed he, clapping his hands, “I know the weight of this argument upon a man's mind. How many marriages have I known hastened, secured, restored by this! However, with respect to myself, I have every reason to be annoyed, for a case of this kind will afford no flattery to my self love. My activity can earn no gratitude from you. I seem like a friend of mine, a physician, who was very successful with all the cures he effected gratis for the poor, but who could seldom heal a rich man, who would have paid him handsomely. Fortunately here the matter helps itself, as all my endeavours and my persuasions would have been fruitless.”

Charlotte now desired him to take the news to Edward, and also a letter from her. He was at the same time to see what was to be done, and how things could be set right. He would not consent. “Everything is already done!” he exclaimed; “for yourself, any messenger is as good as I am. I must take my steps where I shall be more necessary. I shall only come back to congratulate you, I shall come to the christening.”

Charlotte on this occasion, as on many others, was displeased with Mittler. His hasty temperament produced much good, but his precipitancy also caused many failures. No one was more dependent on opinions formed in a moment than he.

Charlotte's messenger came to Edward, who was half-frightened to see him. The letter might be as decisive for “yes” as for “no.” He scarcely ventured to open it, and he was perfectly amazed when he had read it, being petrified by the following passage with which it concluded:—

“Remember that night in which you visited your wife like an adventurous lover, drew her irresistibly to yourself, and clasped her in your arms as a mistress—as a bride. Let us recognise in this strange event a dispensation of Heaven which has created for us a new tie in the very moment when the happiness of our life threatens to disappear.”

It would be hard to describe what took place in Edward's mind from this moment. Under the strong pressure, his old habits and tastes revived. Hunting and war are always a relief to a nobleman under such circumstances. Edward longed for external danger that he might have a counterbalance to the internal. He longed for destruction, because his existence threatened to become insupportable, nay it was to him a consolation to think that he should be no more, and that thus he would secure the happiness of his beloved friends. No one set any obstacle to his design, for he kept it a secret. He made his will with all the proper formalities, and it was for him a sweet sensation, that he could bequeath the estate to Otilia. Provision was also made for Charlotte, for the unborn infant, for the Captain, and for the servants. The war which had again broken out favoured his intention. A more military medi-crity had annoyed him in early youth, and had made him quit the service. Now he had the glorious sensation of serving under a general, of whom he could say: "under his command death is probable, and victory is certain."

Ottilia after she was made acquainted with Charlotte's secret, was as much struck as Edward—nay, more so—and retired completely into herself. She could not hope, and dare not wish. The diary from which we intend to make some extracts will afford us a glance into her mind.

END OF THE FIRST PART.

(To be continued.)

••• To prevent misunderstanding, it may be stated that the copyright of this translation belongs solely to the translator.

SONNET.

NO. XX.

THE SPARTAN.

'Tis sweet to know that still thou dost possess
That joyous soul which long ago was thine.
And that no deed, no madness, love of mine,
Has made thy little cup of pleasure less.
I love to hear thee laugh, that I may guess
Thou hast lost all occasion to repine:
Each laugh, thou dearest, is for me a sign
That nought from me has marr'd thy happiness.
But in thy joy forget not there is one
Who burns with mad consuming love for thee—
A love that tortures more, because unspoken,
One who, when all delight in love is gone,
Bears, worst of all, that Spartan agony:
The placid count'nance when the heart is broken.

N. D.

AMATEUR MUSICAL SOCIETY.

A new musical Society for the performance of classical compositions has just been established, under the highest patronage, including the names of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke of Leinster, the Earl of Westmoreland, the Earl of Falmouth, the Marquis of Kildare, the Earl of Lorton, the Earl of Liverpool, and other influential noblemen. The prospectus has been issued, and the list of the orchestra published, which principally comprises the names of amateurs. Mr. Balfe is appointed conductor. The chief object of the society, as stated in the prospectus, is the formation of a full orchestra, composed of the members, assisted by professors—to meet weekly during the months of February, March and April, for the performance of the great works of the masters. The performances will be confined strictly to the subscribers, with the exception of one grand concert to which the public will be admitted. We shall discuss this society more at length in our next number. The first meeting of the Amateur Musical Society took place last evening in Store Street, at the music-hall.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

DRURY LANE—On Thursday night a baller of action, an exportation from Milan, was produced, under the title of The Pretty Sicilian, for the début of Mdlle. Marietta Baderna, a young dancer from La Scala. The materials of the plot are very slight, involving the faithlessness of Rosalia, a young maiden, who forsakes a lover in humble life for the superior attractions of a wealthy count. The whole is represented in three tableaux:—The outside of the count's château, a pavilion in the same, and a terrace and gardens connected with the same. Though slender in incidental interest, this superstructure is made the medium of a very agreeable succession of choregraphic displays, in which the talents of Mdlles. Dubignon, Benart, Adele, Louise, and Mrs. W. H. Payne, Mr. Howell, Mons. Croce, Mons. Paul, and Mdlle. Marietta Baderna. The last-mentioned being the heroine of the evening, demands our first attention. In the first place let us apostrophise her person: Mdlle. Baderna is petite in stature; but then she is only seventeen and doubtless will grow taller. She is exceedingly pretty, her features are expressive, and her whole physiognomy beams with a quiet light like that of the moon, and her hair being arranged à la Chinoise, enhances the quaint beauty of her looks. Her figure is compact and tres prononcé for her years, her extreme youth permitting a decolleté guise that would otherwise be outré formes. A certain air of chaste voluptuousness breathes from her form like the warm air of the South. Next we must consider Mdlle. Baderna as an artist. As yet she is not perfect, but she has every promise of becoming eventually first-rate. She has sure and neat, if not astonishing, execution, she pirouettes well, though too often; points well, and not too often; uses her arms with classical grace, displays an abandon and degagé manner that is perfectly charming, and dances with invariable artistic feeling, avoiding clap-trap and false show, posing firmly and achieving her movements, even the most velocious, terre à terre, as the French have it, without tottering or hesitation. Mdlle. Baderna was loudly, constantly, and deservedly applauded in her introductory pas, which was quaint and original; in the grand pas seul, in which she evinced the most graceful characteristics of her style, and the pas de deux with M. Croce, which was full of excellent poses, and replete with well considered and perfectly executed mechanical feats. Her success was decided, and she was recalled at the end of her pas de deux with M. Croce, and after the fall of the curtain. The best of the incidental dances was a pas de quatre, in which M. Paul executed a variation with great agility and neatness, and Mdlle. Dubignon, a very pretty and spirituelle danseuse, scarcely enough estimated by our public, danced with exceeding grace and agreeable abandon. Mdlle. Dubignon, some time ago, debuted with success at the Académie Royale in Paris, and has since made rapid progress. Few danseuses have more strength of limb, and few are endowed with a more agreeable personal exterior. She is moreover a zealous artist, and is nightly becoming a greater favorite with the public. Eventually we have great hopes of Mdlle. Dubignon. The ballet of The Pretty Sicilian was composed by, and produced under the superintendence of M. Blasis, a maître d'école de danse at the Scala in Milan. M. Blasis was a popular dancer at Her Majesty's Theatre in the time of Brocard and D'Egville. The music of the ballet, which has little to recommend it, is from the pen of M. Blasis père. M. Senna and M. Bozetti; Messrs. Grieve and Telbin furnished the scenery. The ballet succeeded entirely, and will do very well until something more interesting, and on a larger scale, can be prepared for the pretty and intelligent Marietta Baderna. Mr. Travers continues to improve in public favor. He has performed twice in The Favorite since our last. Mr. Wallace's opera is in full rehearsal, and will be produced forthwith.

HAYMARKET.—The new comedy, which has for some time been announced in the bills, was produced at this theatre on Thursday evening. It is, as we have stated in a former number, from the pen of Dion Bourcicault. Mr. Bourcicault has, for some years, represented the head of a class of comic writers of a peculiar school. Without attaching much importance to the development of character or to the construction of plot, the school to which Mr. Bourcicault belongs has endeavoured to produce all its effects by satirizing, in brilliant sallies, the follies of the day—by exposing the vices of the times—by attempting to amalgamate the piquancy and point of the Congreve and Farquhar school with the sentimentality of the Holcrofts and Mortons of the succeeding age, and by effecting strong contrasts in character, which excite surprise from their novelty, rather than delight from their nature. The School for Scheming is a comedy written with great power, and is absolutely profuse in wit and sparkling sallies. It lashes the fashionable follies and reigning vices in language brilliant and caustic. It displays an intimate acquaintance with the frivolities of the higher classes. It is replete with pearls of poetry and imagination. It has, however, faults which deface all these beauties. Its exuberance of epigram is rather fatal than otherwise to its interest and its success. The mind has hardly time to repose on the pleasure derived from the surprise of some salient stroke before it feels called upon to receive some newer and more happy hit. The author appears to have husbanded the resources of his teeming mind with little tact. He has in most cases depended solely on his powers of composition, and has permitted his characters to make no progress towards the advancement of the plot. A still greater mistake Mr. Bourcicault has committed by introducing into his comedy serious characters which have neither vitality nor meaning. We can hardly conceive how a practical writer, like Dion Bourcicault, and one so conversant with all the necessary effects of dramatic representation, could err in this respect. The raciness of the dialogue frequently redeemed the comedy from flagging. The plot of the School for Scheming is by no means ill-constructed, and is, divested of its superfluities, sufficiently interesting. An old roué, the Hon. Claude Plantaganet. (Mr. W. Farren) broken down in fortunes, determines to retrieve his lost wealth by the marriage of his daughter. His daughter Helen, (Miss Fortescue), loves Craven Acton, (Mr. Howe), whose parentage is questionable, his father being formerly groom to Plantaganet, though his mother was a lady of rank. The serious portion of the comedy depends on Helen being forced by her father to refuse Acton in consequence of his humble birth, and she, through worldly views, inclining to accede to a more lordly connection, which involves both herself and lover in several interesting situations. The father of Acton, who appears throughout the comedy as a money lender, under the cognomen of X. Y., (Mr. Webster), being rejected by his wife a short period after their nuptials, and spurned by her family, has watched unknown over his son's career from infancy, and has contrived to deprive him of the maternal inheritance which devolved to him, by lending him large sums at exorbitant interest, in order to save him from the rapacity of the fashionable gamblers with whom he associates. Plantaganet, to escape from his pressing creditors, expedites a marriage with Mrs. Fox French, (Mrs. Glover), whom he understands has a fortune of ten thousand pounds, and the lady rushes into the connubial snare, believing the old lover to be a man of substance. The old proverb of the "biter bit" is here happily illustrated. Helen, who has accepted the offer of Lord Ripley's hand, is rejected by that nobleman for an earlier attachment, and is punished for her perfidy to Acton by being subsequently rejected by various wealthy suitors, whom her father endeavours to inveigle into a marriage with her. In the end, Acton, through the intervention of his father, who declares himself, is made happy by being reconciled to Helen, and the repentant lady acknowledges the injustice of her treatment, and the lovers are married. The best character in the Comedy is that of Mac Dunnum of Dunnum (Mr. Buckstone), a railway capitalist, who acquires a sudden fortune, and is as suddenly precipitated into poverty. This character is really inimitable, and his happy allusions and sly hits at speculations elicited immense applause. It is altogether the best part we have witnessed in a comedy for a long time, and displays Mr. Bourcicault's peculiar powers of characterising to excellent advantage. The School for Scheming was but unequally performed. Mr. W. Farren was nearly inaudible throughout the performance; nor did he seem fully to understand the nature of the old roué. Miss Fortescue had a varied and difficult part to perform. Mr. Buckstone, as the scheming capitalist, was more humorous than true, and Mrs. Glover made the most of a very small part. Mr. Webster played the old usurer with much power, and produced a great effect in his serious scenes. Of the rest of the performers we have nothing particular to say. In our next number we shall return to the School for Scheming, which we deem entirely worthy of a second notice, confident, that by a judicious use of the pruning knife, the comedy will become one of the most successful works ever produced at the Haymarket. Mr. Webster came forward after the performance, and announced the Comedy for repetition every night. Mr. Bourcicault also appeared, in obedience to a call all but unanimous.

The admired comedy of London Assurance was performed for the last time this season on Tuesday evening, before an unusually crowded audience. There was on the occasion a novelty in the cast, Mr. Lester, of whom we have had occasion to speak frequently in terms of praise, played the part of Dazzle in lieu of Mr. Hudson, the usual representative of that character. We are happy to find our good opinion of Mr. Lester's talent still further enhanced by his performance in London Assurance; his easy manners with his gentlemanly and handsome appearance are well suited to the part of Dazzle. We shall be glad to see this rising young actor more frequently before the public, by whom, we may remark, en passant, he is always received with favour. To numerous correspondents who wish to know whether Lester is an assumed name, we take this opportunity of answering in the affirmative. Mr. Lester's real name is Wallack; he is a grandson of the famous Jack Johnson (Irish Johnson), whose daughter married James Wallack, the well-known talented actor and public favourite.

FRENCH PLAYS.—"Mr. Mitchell," says a clever writer in the Morning Chronicle, "is the veritable champion of the entente cordiale. Whatever may be the relations of the Court of St. James's with our friends over the water, those of the Theatre of St. James's are always amicable. Foreign secretaries may scowl blackly at each other—diplomatic scolding matches may be carried on as vigorously as ever were domestic ones—yet amid all the rumpus—amid the shower of antagonistic "notes," angry leaders, mutual recriminations, and downright out-and-out abuse, it is pleasant to feel that there is at least the neutral ground of dramatic art, where Englishmen and Frenchmen may shake hands; that there is the foyer of the theatre still sacred from political jars—a pleasant-no-man's land and everybody's land, where we can all laugh, cry, and gossip together, without the smallest hindrance from the Montpensier marriage, and in utter oblivion of the pie-crust-like provisions of the treaty of Utrecht. Free trade is becoming the word all the world over. Time was, in London, when the patriotic nationality of John Bull displayed itself in chivalrously pelting from the stage a few unhappy French artists who dared to confront the glare of English footlights; and the probability is that at the epoch in question a batch of British performers would have fared little better before an audience of the bourgeoisie of Paris.

Matters are rather different now-a-days. Instead of looking on the French as our natural enemies of war, we are beginning to recognise in them our natural rivals in art. We have arrived at the comfortable assurance that each has much to learn from the other. We interchange models. We test and compare schools and styles of art. Shakspere's words are spoken in a Paris theatre—Molière is listened to by an English audience; we lend our Macreadys and our Faucits—we borrow our neighbours' Lemâitres and their Rachels; and we are each the gainers by the transaction. Not but that as yet, however, the dramatic exchange has been very considerably in our favour. The Parisians have had an opportunity of seeing merely our leading tragic performers. They have sent us a sample of every species of dramatic talent—from interpreters of the stately old tragedy, to the joyous exponents of the rollicking, jolite vaudeville. Tragedy, comedy, melodrama, farce—we have them all in their turns. The pretty playhouse in King-Street is now the Theatre Français, its boards paced by Perlet and Brohan. Anon it changes to the Porte St. Martin—Frederick and Clarisse its animating spirits. In regular and pleasing succession we shall sit in the Gaité, the Ambigu, the Variétés, the Palais Royale, that "delicious little den of wickedness"—and all without stirring from our English homes. Here is the pleasant result of this opening of our dramatic ports—an opening for which assuredly we have to thank Mr. Mitchell—our theatric Cobden."

We have had little novelty this week; the Dame de St. Tropes and Don Cesar de Bazan, have been the principal attractions on Monday and Wednesday. Of these we have already spoken largely, and have but to add, that their success, mainly dependant on M. Frederick Lemâitre's acting, still continues great and draws good houses. There is the same intensity of feeling, and the same volatile humour which distinguish him from all other living actors. Indeed, to the union of the two we must attribute his popularity, greater perhaps in France than in England, where the humour and allusions are not always well understood. Seeing the same piece over again, is no repetition with M. Frederick Lemâitre, his readings are always different, and his bye-play incidental to the impulse of the moment. Why have we not had Ruy Blas, by Victor Hugo? We have been promised it, but it has been withdrawn from the list. Has the censor anything to do with this? Does a play, which has met with such great and deserved success in Paris, in which the actor has full scope to display his wonderful powers, cause umbrage to the despot of theatricals? We have heard a rumour to this effect, but cannot bring ourselves to believe it; we cannot suppose that England is more fettered in this respect than France. We cannot imagine why, in this country where the press is so independent, the subject has not been taken up and grappled with already. We should also like to see the original Robert Macaire in full; the Tour de Nesle, and others of the repertoire of Mr. Lemâitre, which have been prohibited here.

Last night Le Docteur Noir, was produced with brilliant success, and Lemaitre and Clarisse achieved a new triumph.

REVIEWS ON LITERATURE.

The "Fine Arts' Journal"—No. 13, Vol. I.

THE speculators in this publication must have more money than wit, presuming they pay the piper. We gave our readers a taste of the first number, but now that we have read up to the twelfth, we begin to suspect that we have all along mistaken the object of the work. We at first regarded it as serious, and while smiling at the folly, commended the zeal of the contributors. But as number after number came, each duller than the last, conviction of our error gradually stole upon us. The Fine Arts' Journal is intended as a kind of art-Punch—in other words, a slow Punch. The contributors are W. C. M., the Trunkmaker, C. J., the Editor, K., and an anonymous gentleman. They are remarkably pleasant fellows, and much credit is due to them for the success with which they cultivate the esoteric style. Their irony is Socratic, inasmuch that it is not seen, and the points of their jokes are carefully hidden. The prime motive of exertion is a crusade against the daily press, which, says the Trunkmaker, is "seculent with fungii." These "fungii" he resolved to pull up by the roots, and calling together C. J. and the others, they proceeded at once to upset the Connoisseur, and set up the Fine Arts' Journal. Preliminaries arranged, it was proposed to adopt the esoteric manner of writing, "for," argued the Trunkmaker, "this will allow of an independent expression of opinion, without fear of giving offence, and, as the wooden horse was admitted into the gates of Troy, nobody suspecting that it was filled with armed soldiers, so shall we be admitted into the dwellings of Her Majesty's subjects, where once safely housed, we shall cast off our covering of imbecility, and brandishing the weapon of truth, exterminate the fungii." The sentiment of the Trunkmaker was unanimously approved, the esoteric manner of writing unanimously agreed upon, and the meeting unanimously dispersed. Hinc illæ lachrymæ—hence this apparent foolishness. We should never have discovered it, had not our youth been nourished in the mystical schools. The first glance at the first paper of the Trunkmaker was enough to put us on our guard. "This fellow," said we, "is a mystic, and writes after the manner of Jamblichus. Let us leave him alone, and time will show what is in him; his articles will be better understood unread." And the more we read the more we were convinced of this truth; which, though it applies more entirely to the Trunkmaker, applies more or less to all the contributors. We shall therefore read no more for the present of the Fine Arts' Journal, and doubt not that the world will come to the same determination. When the esoteric style shall have been dropped, perhaps we may take it up again.

"The Lady's Newspaper," Nos. 1, 2, 3.

WE notice this new journal simply on account of an article on music, which among other remarkable passages contains the following:—

"Mr. Balfe has composed no less than seventeen successful operas; and that too, in three different languages! What a glorious answer this is to the anti-English wise-heads, who, but a few years since, when the Irish agitation of the subject of founding a "Grand National Opera" was broached, sneeringly observed—"Well, but suppose you had a National Opera, where could you find a single English composer?" Since that day, no less than thirty-three operas have been produced by native composers—seventeen by Balfe, four by Barnett, three by Loder, two by Rooke, THREE by Rodwell, one by Lavenu, ONE by Macfarren, one by Forbes, and one by Vincent Wallace. It is pleasing to record that during the past year not one musical failure has occurred. We have now only to mention that on Saturday, the 19th of December, was brought out at the Princess's Theatre an original musical romance, which is still performing, called The Seven Maids of Munich; or, the Ghost's Tower. This romance, being written and composed by G. Herbert Rodwell, we will say nothing about it, for

"On their own merits Modest men are dumb."

Can our readers believe that the above was written by Mr. G. Herbert Rodwell? Can any one imagine that Mr. G. H. Rodwell was really in his senses, or was not fabricating a good joke when he sat down to pen such a statement as confounds all truth, all criticism, and all modesty? Mr. Rodwell rites himself down in the category of composers, as the author of three operas. Where are these operas? What are they called? Where were they performed? Does he mean to entitle Paul Clifford an opera, or Jack Sheppard an opera, or the Seven Maids of Munich an opera, or Teddy the Tiler an opera? Macfarren, he says, has written one opera. Which of Macfarren's two operas, Don Quixote, or The Devil's Opera, does Mr. Rodwell condescend to place in the same list with his operas, Paul Clifford, or Teddy Tiler? Poor Devil's Opera, or poor Don Quixote, one or other of you must make way for your superiors, Jack Sheppard or the Seven Maids of Munich! Macfarren has written one opera, and Mr. G. H. Rodwell has written three. The statement comes from Mr. Rodwell, and as far as he himself is concerned, we are bound to believe, that Mr. Rodwell believes he has written three operas. We cannot find fault with Mr. Rodwell for labouring under mental alienation, nor would we undertake to correct his opinions of his own compositions, unless we were liberally remunerated, but for the sake of art, we would attempt to show Mr. Rodwell, that Mr. Macfarren has absolutely written two operas, ay, real operas, with choruses, finales, concerted pieces, musical dialogue, trialogue, dances, ballet music, and overtures. We would strive to explain in what consists our notion of an opera. We would tell Mr. Rodwell that a drama with incidental ballads and stray sing-song choruses and hotch-potch finales no more constitutes an opera than mere blank verse and big words constitute a tragedy. We would tell him—no, we are convinced Mr. Rodwell's modesty (mark the close of his paragraph in our quotation) has already told him as much as the composer of three operas ought to listen to. Mr. Rodwell concludes his modest article with a modest puff, in which we learn the day and date of performance of "The Seven Maids of Munich." The world is benefitted by the information. It would confer a like boon on the public if Mr. Rodwell would, in his next musical essay, set forth the full particulars of the first appearance of the opera, Teddy the Tiler. Mr. Rodwell concluded his article with a modest quotation. We shall beg leave to follow his example:—

"O, wad the Pow'r some giftie gie us,
To see oursels as others see us,
It wad frae mony a blunder free us and so we take our leave of the modest critic of the Lady's Newspaper.
And foolish notion."

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE. MR. MANVERS.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—I find in the report of the last Manchester Choral Society, which took place on the 21st ult, a critique of Mr. Manvers' song, "Wait her angels." He is there recommended not to make use of the word shee-ies (very properly so, too, if he ever did so); but I think you will find that the word in question (in the singular number), although spelt shy, is pronounced shee, denoting that the vowels e and i, when properly uttered, are to be distinctly marked; and by so doing, a word of nominally one syllable is made virtually two, the stress being made upon the latter. Perhaps, however, your correspondent would advise Mr. Manvers to put the cart before the horse, thus—shee-ies, thereby pronouncing the word as it is literally spelt, shy's. If so, I would respectfully suggest that he had better keep his literary talents to himself, and not throw them away in lessons to well-informed and educated men. It happens that Mr. Manvers is as well instructed in the English language as perhaps any member of the profession to which he belongs, having for some years studied at one of the first classic schools in Oxford, viz.—New College, it being the intention of his friends to educate him for the Church; but, like many others, preferring the profession of music, he abandoned his former pursuits. We have had the pleasure of hearing Mr. Manvers often, but never heard him misrelate any word of the English language, or make a burlesque of a sacred song. With many apologies for troubling you with this letter, I beg to subscribe myself, your obedient servant,

Oxford, January 25, 1847. A CONSTANT READER.

THE EXETER HALL ORATORIO AND MR. H. PHILLIPS.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—On Tuesday last I attended the performance of the Creation, at Exeter Hall, and I respectfully entreat a small portion of your columns for a few remarks arising out of that performance. Every one I apprehend will allow that the Sacred Harmonic Society has done more to raise the taste of the public for sacred music than any Society which has existed in England; but it has done more than simply elevate the taste, it has also materially increased the knowledge of the public; it has caused the works of our great masters to be appreciated and enjoyed in many a family circle, which, but for the efforts of this Society, would scarcely have been aware of their existence. It is much to be regretted that the gentleman, whose name stands at the head of this letter, should forget this fact: it is a pity he will not recollect that persons who go to Exeter Hall when the Creation is performed, go with the hope and expectation of enjoying Haydn's music as it was written by Haydn, and that, as a natural consequence, the meretricious embellishments which, doubtless, Mr. Phillips thinks exceedingly ornamental, are anything but pleasing to the taste of the majority of his audience: he should remember that to many hundreds of those who congregate at Exeter Hall, the music of the Creation is as familiar as "household words;" that these persons sit with the score in their heads, not to criticise, but to enjoy a great intellectual treat from that chaste and classical rendering of the various well-known passages, which they have a right to expect from the eminent artistes engaged by the Society, among whom Mr. Phillips, from his acknowledged position as the first English singer of the day, stands pre-eminent. It would be well if he would take a lesson in this respect from Miss Birch; throughout the whole of her most exquisite and arduous performance, the most critical ear and the most carefully observant eye, could scarcely detect a single departure from the score, while, on the contrary, Mr. Phillips, from first to last (except in "Graceful Consort," which was given most truly, and, therefore, most beautifully,) indulged in a series of flourishes and alterations, which may do very well for a theatre, where not one person in fifty knows a note of the music, except from memory, but are altogether unsuited to Exeter Hall. And now, sir, mark the consequence! Not one song of Mr. Phillips was encored, while to Miss Birch and Mr. Lockett that compliment was enthusiastically accorded. I leave Mr. Phillips to draw the inference, if these remarks should meet his eye, begging him to believe that I write in no unfriendly spirit, but with a due appreciation of his abilities. Yours truly,—P. M.

LABLACHE.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

DEAR SIR,—Could you, or any of your readers, inform me the age of the great Lablache?—Yours truly, "A SUBSCRIBER."

THE RIVAL OPERAS.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—Permit a humble country professor to tender you his best thanks, for your very impartial and interesting account of the battle between the two rival houses; and pray, sir, continue to give your readers a "full, true, and particular" record of their doings, until both are open. For five hundred centuries hence it will be read with avidity by our ancestors, as Mr. Ramsbottom had it. We, in the provinces, cannot see all the London papers, therefore, what is published in them, pro and con, given, as you hitherto have done, will, I do assure you, be a most important favour conferred on all your country readers. And I may venture to say, that to have a succinct account of all the proceedings relative to the old house, as well as in the new, cannot fail of proving highly interesting to your London readers. The question respecting the Swedish Nightingale, becomes more and more inexplicable; and many are the wagers which are laid respecting the issue of the contest.

Yours, respectfully,

A FLOODING TEACHER.

Birmingham, Feb. 3rd, 1847.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

THE DIAPASON.

SIR,—I avail myself of the permission, under notice of Correspondents in your last number, to resume the question of the origin of the term Diapason, as understood or used by Organ builders. It is unnecessary to recapitulate the whole of my former letter, it was merely preliminary to an hypothesis of my own, as to the meaning of the term, and which I intended submitting to you in a future communication. Dom Bedos remarks that "the word Organ, so long equivocal, having signified all instruments of music, as also the joining together of many persons in singing. It is difficult to discover the meaning of many passages to be found in some authors respecting it. On the other hand, those who have written upon it appear to have known little or nothing of the subject, and have consequently put forth absurd errors. It is an art, upon which the least and truly the worst has been written." The work quoted contains more than 800 folio pages, and, as may be seen by reference to my letter in a former number of yours, he tells us no more about Diapason, than that Organ builders called an octave (or the scale of its pipes) Diapason. He has followed this up by describing the scales of the various stops under the head of Diapason thus, "Diapason des Jeux D'Anche," "Diapason des Jeux à Bâncle," &c. I have given "an Old Subscriber" the best book authority for the term; but I gather from his second letter that he will still say "I have not understood or not answered his question." The old monk does not appear to have troubled himself further in the definition of the term Diapason than I have recited; but in the preface of his work I find that the first Pneumatic organ had only one octave of pipes, and those only of the Diatonic scale, therefore the word Diapason would be the proper term for "that organ or Octave of Pipes." Now, if it be conceded (as I submit it should) that they were of the same pitch as the stop now called Diapason (8 foot) from which all extension of number and compass arose, I think the Organ builder has rightly named the 8-foot stop "Diapason," and, together with your Old Subscriber) needs no further search for its etymology. Bedos mentions an ancient organ which required seventy vigorous men to put its bellows in motion. Good times those for employment of the many. Now, alas! I am obliged to break a pole with a double motion, at as much risk of dislocating my shoulders, as if unemployed on a fire-engine. Steam, I suppose, will come in at last and annihilate the occupation of

AN OLD BELLOW-BLOWER.

January 29th, 1847.

From the German of F. Geibel.

Oh! how deep the wanderer's wonder—flying from more northern day,
Who to the long-craved for south, turns his joyous pilgrim way;
When from Gothard's mighty rock, all silent in eternal ice Descending, through the morning dawn, he sees Italian beauty rise.

Lightly separate the clouds, and so warm the air, and soft,
Like kisses, from the depths below, it heaves the scattering mist aloft.
Yet a step,—wide and blooming laughs the valley at his feet,
And garden groves and silver-waters, morning warmth and sunshine greet.

Roses blossom on each hill, round the elm-tree clings the vine,
And the carved and polished marble through the cypress shadows shine.
Here the laurel-wooded rock, and there the broad and purple sky,
Smiling on the crystal fountains like a mother's loving eye;

And there the many-clad and many-coloured folk, on dale and hill,
Swart youths and gorgeous women, as their roses beautiful.
On the rock the vineyard dance, in the cottage the guitar,
Gay song alike by shore and strand, joy and music, near and far.

Should we not deem a spendthrift God had emptied on so fair a land,
Joys most full and brimming beaker, with an almost drunken hand?
Is she not the richest branch on old Europe's mighty tree,
As with the green leaf with golden fruitage laden wealthily?

But how bitter the deceit. As an adder lurks below
The flower; underneath the smile, throbs and lurks the inner woe;
That woe which cannot calm its tears for the elder virtue dead,
For the ancient freedom perished, and the heroism fled.

Oh! Italy! Art's dearest mother! woman with the royal brow!
Princess and ruler of the past! sick and wretched art thou now!
The hectic beauty of thy cheek, so like a rose's purple bloom,
Heaves in thy pulse with feverish heat, and tells us of the tomb.

Bloom and flower seem only scattered o'er thy wan and suffering head,
Like the funeral garlands woven by the pious, for the dead.
And thine Ætna and Vesuvius vomit forth their mighty fire,
Like the ready torches placed by a World-Queen's funeral pyre.

But, No! Hope never dies, and Woe lasts not ever, although long.
Knowest thou not Penelope, her grief, and the Homeric song?
Beyond all, like thee, beautiful; beyond all, like thee in her grief,
Strangers riot in her palace in the absence of its chief.

Twenty years the purple wool span she weeping on the throne;
Twenty years with sighs and tears, reared the queen the princely son;
Twenty years she held her faith to sorrow and to husband fast,
Watching, hoping, sending, sighing, and Odysseus came at last.

Woe to wooer and to lover when the wrathful step drew near,
And the mighty bow twang smote sharp and swift upon the ear;
With the hot blood of the crime were the wall and pavement red,
When vengeance spread in Ithaca its banquet of the dead.

Listen Italy, and cheer thee, well thou knowest the ancient song,
So within thy palace gates do the stranger suitors throng,
So thy children grow to manhood, while the mother's bitter tear
Is falling. Hope—the hour will come—thy Odisseus too is near.

CHARLES ROSENBERG.

PROVINCIAL.

LIVERPOOL.—A grand vocal and instrumental concert at the Theatre Royal, Williamson-square, was given by Miss Whitnall, on Monday evening. Though under the patronage of the Mayor, who was present, the attendance was not as great as we expected to find it, especially as Madame Anna Bishop was to be one of the performers. Miss Whitnall was suffering from a cold, and appeared contrary to the advice of her medical attendant. She, however, received the unanimous applause of the audience. Madame Bishop was very favourably received, and sung in a style which proved worthy of the high encomiums passed upon her. Her voice is powerful, and of flute-like character, known by the term "sforzato." Her higher notes are beautifully intonated, but her lower tones are not equally good. Donizetti's recitative "Al tempio ei move," and the cavatina "Ah! quando in regio talamo," were given with effect, as were the recitative "Eccomi" and cavatina "Come rapida." (Meyerbeer). "On the banks of the Guadalquivir," was delightfully given.

Madame Bishop drew good houses at the Theatre Royal, in the character of Isolide, in the Maid of Artois, and proved herself one deserving of the lavish praise given to her by the metropolitan journals.

LIVERPOOL.—The Members of the Philharmonic Institution held their Annual Meeting on the evening of Tuesday week, in the board-room of the Collegiate Institution, for the purpose of hearing the state of affairs and electing officers for the year ensuing. The inspection of matters pecuniary was satisfactory. It was stated that the New Music Hall capable of containing more than 2000 persons, would be shortly completed.

LIVERPOOL.—Madame Vestris and Mr. Charles Mathews have been playing at the Theatre Royal, in several of their favourite pieces, and have given high satisfaction to all who have witnessed their personations. They have been very ably supported by Miss Emmeline Montague, a charming actress, whose return to the theatre we are glad to welcome.

LIVERPOOL.—At the Concert-Hall on Wednesday, Signor Sapio satisfied an attentive and discriminating audience with his first concert. In addition to Signor Sapio himself, the vocalist who appeared were Miss Anne Romer, Mr. Alfred Sapio, Mr. Sinclair, and Mr. Joseph Robinson. Miss Whitnall was announced in the programme, but owing to illness, was unable to attend. Messrs. E. Smith and H. V. Lewis lent their valuable services as conductors. The weather was unpropitious, but we were agreeably surprised to find the Concert-hall at least half filled. Signor Sapio was in excellent voice. Mr. Sinclair sang with an animation truly surprising, and carried captive the feelings of every listener. His merrier songs were rapturously encored. Mr. Alfred Sapio, as yet but a debutante, gained many admirers, but his voice appears wanting in power. He is, however, an artiste of skill, and must ultimately win the approbation of the musical world. The star of the evening was Miss Anne Romer, and the interest in her songs was heightened by the fact that the present would be, for a lapse of time, her last appearance in Liverpool. Nothing could be more enthusiastic than her reception; each song was followed by a hearty encore.—Liverpool Mail.

LIVERPOOL.—On Wednesday last a lecture on the nature and cultivation of the human voice, illustrated by original and select songs, with pianoforte accompaniments, was delivered at the Blackburn Mechanics' Institution, by Richard Crowe, Esq., of the Collegiate Institution, a numerous and respectable audience was present. The lecturer appeared to have fully answered the contemplated purpose, and to have gratified the listeners. Mr. Crowe gave a philosophical description of the construction of the organs of the human voice; and explained how musical and other sounds were produced thereby. He then pointed out the qualifications necessary to constitute a good singer; and how they should each be cultivated, observing that the first and most essential point to be attained was a good quality of voice. The necessity for a distinct articulation the lecturer exemplified by singing a song in the Italian manner, which obtained among amateurs some years since, and by which the vowels only been heard, not a word of the song could be understood. The points touched upon in the lecture, and the styles necessary to give effect to compositions, Mr. Crowe illustrated by singing, amongst other songs, &c.:—"The Fisherman," "The Pilot," "Old King Time" (an original composition) "Shall I wastye in Despair," "Mad Tom," "If I had a thousand a year" (Dibdin), "The Gipsy King" &c., all of which were loudly applauded, and some of them encored.—Blackburn Standard.

The Casino de Naples at the Liver Theatre, is running a career of success. The experiment of introducing in Liverpool a musical and terpsichorean entertainment, "a la Parisian Soirees Musicales et Dan-santes," appears likely to prove successful, from the spirited manner in which it is conducted.

LIVERPOOL.—The Misses Cushman have appeared lately at the Adelphi Theatre Royal, in "Romeo and Juliet," on Tuesday in the "Lady of Lyons."

on Wednesday in "Twelfth Night," and on Thursday in "Guy Mannerling," with great success. Miss Susan Cushman's representation of Christine, in the "Youthful Queen," is highly spoken of. In "Twelfth Night" the fair sisters performed the parts of Viola and Olivia with much spirit and accuracy.

MANCHESTER.—On Monday, January 25, Mr. R. Andrews gave a Juvenile Concert, comprising a selection of songs, duets, and solos, upon various instruments, by his young and gifted family. The room was well attended. The programme consisted of a selection from Mr. R. Andrews' new musical work, entitled "Songs of the Hearth." The accompaniment on the piano-forte was given by Mr. R. Andrews with nice effect. Master Edward Andrews, a youth not ten years of age, performed a solo on the violin in such a manner as to take the audience quite by surprise: an encore was the result, the same success attending his second solo, "The Carnival of Venice." Of Master R. Hoffman Andrews's playing we have frequently had much pleasure in speaking in its praise. His solo on the Concertina, accompanied by Mr. Henry Walker on the piano-forte, was a treat. Miss Elizabeth Andrews was warmly encored in "When the bee sucks," as also her sister, in Horn's "Fair Music," the obligato accompaniment of Master R. Hoffman Andrews being excellent. The concert terminated with "God save the Queen," and "Rule Britannia," with variations on the piano-forte, executed by the young artist.—Manchester Times.

MANCHESTER.—The First Meeting of the Salford Glee Club was held in the large room of the Queen's Arms, in Chapel Street. The concert was excellently varied, and the different pieces generally well executed.

BIRMINGHAM.—Mr. J. A. Baker's grand Concert for the relief of the Aged and Infirm Poor, took place at the Town Hall on Thursday evening. The Concert commenced with the favourite Overture from "Fra Diavolo," spiritedly played by the Military Band, under the direction of Mr. D. Rieks; the Band also performed other pieces during the evening. Miss Dolby contributed greatly to the pleasure of the evening by her artistic delivery of the song from Persiani's Inez de Castro, which was delightfully rendered, and loudly applauded; a manuscript ballad by Mr. J. A. Baker, entitled "The Widow's Lullaby," which was rapturously encored; Linley's pretty ballad, "Primrose's deck the banks;" Miss Mason's Scotch song, "Come, off to the Moors;" two of Mendelssohn's lovely duets, with Miss Lockey, given effectively; and a buff duet with Mr. J. L. Hatton, "La Polka," an amusing composition, rendered with humour and spirit. Miss Lockey made a successful début. Her voice is good, and her style pleasing. Mr. Lockey was in excellent voice, and sustained his deserved reputation as an accomplished artiste and an established favourite. He sang Weber's serenade, "When the orb of day," Nelson's ballad, "Merrily goes the mill," most effectively. The re-appearance of Mr. J. L. Hatton was a great feature. He sang several of his numerous buff songs, and was encored in each; one especially, "The little fat grey man," excited roars of laughter. The exquisite performances of those talented gentlemen, Mr. Distin and his four sons, were listened to with marked attention, and several of them encored. The introduction of their new instruments, the "Sax Tubas," was a great treat, and Mr. Distin's execution of the difficult solo, "The Soldier tired" was marvellous. Mr. H. Distin's solo, "All is lost," was perfection itself. Mr. J. A. Baker accompanied most of the vocal pieces and the instrumental solos upon the piano-forte.—Birmingham Gazette.

LINCOLN.—A concert was given by Mr. and Mrs. Turner, in the County Assembly-rooms; it was not numerously attended. Mr. and Mrs. Turner, were assisted by Masters Thomas and Travis, Mr. Knowles, Mr. Brooke, and Mr. Martin, all of the cathedral choir. Mrs. Turner has improved since we heard her last; and was much admired in her solo part in "Daughter of Error," and also in the trio "Zitti Zitti," from Rossini's Il Barbiere. Mr. Turner's song "Laugh my Girls," was encored. Mr. Knowles sang as well as ever. The citizens of Lincoln are indebted to Mr. and Mrs. Turner for favouring them with an opportunity of hearing some music.—Lincolnshire Chronicle.

SHREWSBURY.—The Shropshire Hunt Ball of the season took place at the Lion Rooms, and was attended by a most brilliant assemblage. The festivity commenced about half-past ten o'clock, by Sir Richard Jenkins and Lady Charlotte Montgomery opening the ball with a country dance. A succession of waltzes, quadrilles, gallopes, polkas, &c. followed to the strains of a splendid band, provided by Mr. Goodall, till about one o'clock, when supper was announced, and the company adjourned to the lower room, to enjoy an elegant treat, supplied by Mr. and Mrs. Lewis, under the superintendence of Mr. W. Griffiths. After the company had partaken of this entertainment, they returned to the ball room, and kept up the dance to an advanced hour. The visitors comprised all the nobility and gentry of the neighbourhood.

CANTERBURY.—(From our own Correspondent).—The concert of the Catch Club on Wednesday, the 27th, went off with great spirit; the performers seeming anxious that the audience (which was very numerous) should feel gratified with the contents of the programme, which was composed entirely of music from the pen of our valued countryman, Sir H. Bishop. The songs of "Bid me di-course" by Miss Goldsmith, and the "Echo" by Mrs. Dowton, were well received—the last receiving a deserving encore. The overtures, under the leadership of Mr. H. Palmer, were executed with decision, and the vocal pieces generally were well performed. Before the last overture a good speech was delivered by Mr. T. S. Dowton (manager of the theatre), in which he enlarged upon the writings of Sir H. Bishop, and concluded with proposing "Prosperity to Sir Henry," which was responded to with three times three.

CANTERBURY.—A concert of a very pleasing kind was given on Wednesday, 27th ult., at the Canterbury Catch Club. The entire selection of music was taken from Sir Henry Bishop's works; and the entertainment, in consequence, passed under his name, being called, "An Evening with Bishop." Overtures, Glees, songs, duets, even Quadrilles, à la Bishop, were commingled in the entertainments of the evening. The Concert was well attended.

CHILTERNHAM.—Mr. Wilson has been giving his entertainment here with his usual success. Jullien has also been reaping new laurels, and pocketing lots of "tin."

FOLKESTONE.—Upwards of seventy members and friends of the Catch Club met on Tuesday January 26, at the King's Arms, and were much entertained with the singing of Messrs. Godden, Hayward, Armstrong, May, Roberts, &c. &c. The songs, "Rosy Wine," and "Dear little Shamrock of Ireland," were pleasantly sung, as also the duet by Messrs. Hayward and Armstrong, and the glee of "Life's a Bumper," by Messrs. Godden, Bates, and Roberts. The instrumental music was good, and the overtures, gallopes, and quadrilles well selected and well performed. The chair was well sustained by Mr. Jenkins, and the most perfect order prevailed during the evening. We understand the members increase each week, and the continued exertions of the committee in providing at each meeting fresh talent, will prove it the most attractive resort of the admirers of good singing and music.—Maidstone Gazette.

MAIDSTONE.—Morning and evening concerts were given by the Sevenoaks Choral Society, under the kind patronage of the Marquis and Marchioness Camden, at Pawley's Royal Hotel, on Tuesday, January 26, the arrangements of which were excellent, Mr. Humphreys having the management. In addition to the company of the noble patron and patroness, the Right Hon. the Earl and Countess Amherst, Lord Viscount Holmesdale, C. R. C. Petley, Esq. and lady, Rev. Mr. Blackhall, &c. &c. were present. The selection in part I. was from the Messiah. Taken as a whole, this was, perhaps, one of the best concerts given by the society, and was well supported. The noble patron, in addition to the tickets he had taken, made the society a very handsome donation.—Ibid.

MAIDSTONE.—Mr. W. B. Tolpitt (Professor of Music), gave a vocal and instrumental concert at the Harleian Literary Institution, which was very numerously and respectfully attended. The principal vocal solo performers were Mrs. Sturges and Mr. Godden. The orchestra consisted chiefly of the Ashford Musical Society. The glees were excellent. A solo on the violin was played with taste by Mr. Morfill, and a solo on the corneopon by Mr. Browning, jun., much applauded. The musical department, led by Mr. Matson, gave great satisfaction. Upon the whole the concert was well got up, and reflected much credit in the taste of Mr. W. B. Tolpitt, who deserves the support of the inhabitants and the public.—Ibid.

LYMINGTON, JAN. 16.—We have great pleasure in recording the entire success of the first public concert given by the Lymington Harmonic society, at the Assembly Rooms, Angel Hotel, on Friday, the 8th inst. on which occasion nearly 400 persons were present. The Messrs. Klitz, whose reputation as musicians is too well known to need comment from us, in the kindest manner offered their services to the society on that occasion. Among the best performance were Auber's celebrated Overture to "Masaniello," arranged as a septett, which was executed in masterly style by Messrs. Klitz (the six brothers) assisted by Mr. Edwards, of Portsmouth, with the flute. Mr. Phillip Klitz played a fantasia, impromptu, on the piano-forte, on subjects suggested by the company, which was brilliantly executed. Mr. Charles Klitz sang "All is lost" (from "La Sonnambula") with great pathos. Mr. James Klitz (from Northampton) sang with great feeling "The Maniac," which produced an electric effect on the audience. He was equally successful in the "Ship on Fire," and in both cases was deservedly encored. Mr. Robert Klitz's "Last Man" was a master-piece. He subsequently sang "I'm Afloat," in excellent style, and was warmly applauded.—Hampshire Advertiser.

WOODBOND.—A Concert took place in the Rooms, George-lane, on the evening of Thursday week, which attracted a very crowded audience. The Misses Bassano and Messent, and Mr. Kitchner, were the vocalists; and Messrs. Carte, Lindley, and F. W. Bates, were the instrumental performers. Mr. Hobbs was also engaged, but could not appear, in consequence of indisposition. Miss Bassano gave a song of Verdi's with great effect, and sang "Kathleen Mavourneen" with expression and pathos. Miss Messent was no less happy in a song of Donizetti's, and a Scotch ballad. Miss Bassano and Miss Messent gave a duet of Bellini's, and obtained considerable applause. Other portions of the concert afforded high gratification. Mr. F. W. Bates performed a fantasia of his own composition in a most admirable manner, and received several bursts of applause. Mr. Carte was no less successful in his flute solo. He played on his new Boehm flute a favourite Northumbrian air, arranged with variations by himself, and absolutely astonished the Woodfordian folks. Mr. Carte is indeed a very splendid performer on his instrument. The entertainment afforded universal gratification. Mr. F. W. Bates proved himself a most excellent conductor.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

MILAN, JAN. 26. (Extract from a Letter.)—At the Scala we have had nothing very attractive in the way of opera. The only two operas yet given have been Attila, and the Prova d'un Opera Seria, neither of which has pleased very much. In the ballet we have had Fanny Elssler and the inimitable Perrot. The theatre is so crowded whenever they appear that it is with difficulty we can get a seat. At Genoa, Mr. Jones, the basso, whom I have before mentioned to you, has created a furor in Attila; which is the more flattering to him, as the music generally does not please: he is nightly called before the curtain many times; and, in consequence of the great success he has met with, has been offered many lucrative engagements: which of them he will accept is not at present decided, he intending to visit England in the spring for a few months, and then returning to Italy. We have been to Pavia, to witness the debut of Mr. Leati, an Englishman. He made his first appearance as Don Carlo in Ernani, with the greatest possible success. He has a magnificent baritone voice, and acquitted himself so well that the students, who attended the theatre en masse, rose from their seats and cheered him repeatedly. Is not this a great triumph for us "poor English," who, generally speaking, are not thought of too highly by the Italians as singers? I begin to think the time is not far off when we shall be estimated by them as we deserve.

CASSEL, DEC. 23.—The twenty-fifth anniversary of the nomination of Spohr, as music director of the Royal Theatre at Cassel, was celebrated with much solemnity. An extraordinary performance took place at the theatre, when selections from his operas Zemira e Azor, Jessonda, Faust, and Pietro von Abano, were given. At the conclusion Spohr was conducted, with great ceremony, by the performers, on to the stage, which represented a landscape consisting of the house at Seesen where the poet was born. Spohr being seated, the prima donna (Madame Brunbaun) placed a crown of laurels on his head. The same evening his highness the co-regent appointed Spohr director-general of the court-music, and also conferred the title of Aulic Councillor on him. The King of Prussia has since forwarded him the order of the Red Eagle, third class.

BOULOGNE-SUR-MER, JAN. 30. (From our own Correspondent.)—Dear Editor,—You must not expect anything particularly interesting in musical matters, at this season, from this agreeable place. In the theatres, dramas are represented, with occasionally an operetta by Auber, Dalleyrac, Gretry, &c., which do not require great strength of company. As a tolerable personale can only support itself during summer, there is no inducement at present to frequent the theatre. Occasionally we have, however, musical soirées, among which those of Mademoiselle Blahetka assume the first rank, as we are certain to listen to some works of the best German school. On Friday I had the gratification to hear a new composition by Spohr, a grand quintette, (the second in D) for piano, two violins, tenor, and violoncello. Mademoiselle Blahetka executed it in a style for which she is so eminently known. I think this quintette will become even a greater favourite than Spohr's first quintette, inasmuch as the melodies cannot fail to please generally. The first mouvement seems to me to have been written some years anterior to the scherzo, for we did not discover in it a leaning to the modern taste by which the next mouvement is distinguished. The scherzo was encored. The following adagio is one of the most charming specimens of writing I know of. The great master, "Germania's pride," has interwoven the piano with the other parts in such a delicious manner, as must ensure this quintette the most solid reputation. The sparkling finale winds up the whole in a most spirited manner. Mons. Perrot executed the difficult violin part throughout in a most masterly style. Mademoiselle Blahetka has promised us the second magnificent trio by Spohr, (piano, violin, and violoncello) at her next soirée. We had the pleasure to hear one of her own compositions on this occasion—the 2nd Quartette, Op. 44, (piano, violin, tenor, and violoncello, concertante) of which I gave you an account last year. Mademoiselle Blahetka, as a pupil of Beethoven, displays her deep studies of this musical Hercules, not disdaining, however, to interlard her works with dashes of brilliant passages, whilst her melodies are always characteristic and pleasing. The soirée wound up with Herz's First Concerto. A young lady, a pupil of Mademoiselle Blahetka played one of Chopin's delicious Notturnas. The impression was that the instructress well knows how to impart to others her interpretation of the works of the first masters of the age. I hope soon to be enabled to give you another account of some of the Terpsichorean Temple music, for we are in the midst of the carnival, and gaiety and dance are the order of the day.—Yours sincerely, A. Z.

MISCELLANEOUS.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—It is said that it is the intention of Mr. Lumley to devote an early night, after the opening of her Majesty's Theatre, for the benefit of the distressed Irish and Scotch. This will be a step politic and liberal at once.

MR. T. GERMAN REED, with the aid of some influential Scotch friends, intends giving a grand concert at the Hanover Square Rooms on the 25th inst., the proceeds to be appropriated to the relief of the starving Highlanders. Most of the leading vocalists of the day have liberally promised to give their gratuitous services.

ETHIOPIAN SERENADERS.—On Tuesday night we paid a visit to the St. James's Theatre, and were much pleased with the entertainments afforded. We have frequently wondered at the continual attraction of these entertainments, which lasted all last season and bid fair to go through this, yet we certainly were ourselves delighted with what we heard and saw, and shared in the general pleasure felt around us. We do not think that the novelty of the thing can have aught to do with its success, for that must have worn off by this time; we must therefore refer it to the excellent choice of airs, and the perfect, although simple, execution of them. There were several new songs, well selected from the most popular melodies and glees. Amongst the number we may mention "The Old Jaw Bone," and "I wish I was in Ole Varginny," in the comic line; and "Mary Blane," "My Skiff is on the shore," and "Chloe's to be my wife," in the sentimental. The Railroad Overture was also played with success; and Mr. Pell, on the bone, received great applause. There were several encores, and the whole performance gave evident satisfaction to a house crowded in every part. The Ethiopian Serenaders have certainly been a lucky hit for the enterprising lessee of the St James's Theatre.

M. G. STEVENIERS, a violinist of great repute in Belgium, has arrived in London to take a prominent station in the band of Her Majesty's Theatre, having been engaged by M. Panofka, Mr. Lumley's artistic agent. M. Pluys, another Belgian violinist of emience, has also arrived, having been secured, by M. Panofka for a similar position.

THEATRICALS AT HAMMERSMITH.—A performance, the most interesting of the kind, which we have for a long time witnessed, took place at the Hammersmith Theatre on Monday evening. By the kind permission of Mr. Maddox, of the Princess's, Mr. Loder's opera of Giselle was performed, the principal parts being undertaken by children under ten years of age. The entire cast is worthy of recording. The Duke, Master E. Joseph: Godfrey, Master E. Goldshede: Fridolin, Miss Goldshede: Albert, Miss Esther Van Millingen; Peter, Miss Fanny Millingen: Max, Master E. Millingen: Gretchen, Miss E. Joseph: Bertha, Miss M. Goldshede: Mary, Miss E. Joseph: Giselle, Miss Maria Van Millingen: Myrtha, Miss E. Joseph. The Giselle of Miss Maria Van Millingen was really excellent. She sang the whole of the original music, and received considerable applause throughout the performance. She obtained a rapturous encore in the duet "He loves me, loves me not," with her sister, Miss Esther Van Millingen. The Fridolin of Miss Goldshede was acted capitally, and the parts of Mary and Myrtha well represented by the Misses Joseph. The dresses and scenery were excellent, and the theatre presented a gay appearance, the elite of the neighbourhood being present. The performance was under the joint management of Miss Van Millingen, and Miss Elizabeth Van Millingen.

Mr. W. R. BEXFIELD, Batchelor of Music, and Organist of Lincoln Cathedral, has published Six Songs of very great merit, the particulars of which our readers will find by referring to our advertisement sheet. Mr. Bexfield is a practical Professor, has laboured hard in his calling, and has won laurels as a composer.

THE new comedy of The School for Scheming and The Invisible Prince will be performed this evening, by the express desire of the Conde de Montemolin, at the Haymarket Theatre, on which occasion, he will honour the Theatre with his presence.

Mr. LINDSAY SLOPER has announced three concerts of Classical Pianoforte Music, to take place shortly at the rooms in Harley Street.

Mr. ALLCROFT has issued the programme of his Annual Grand Concert for Tuesday evening, to be held at the Lyceum Theatre, in which he has announced an array of talent, vocal and instrumental, of great force. The orchestra, on an enlarged scale, is provided, and every attention is paid to set before the visitors a highly intellectual treat.

THE PURCELL CLUB celebrated its eleventh anniversary on Saturday, at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, Professor Taylor (the president) in the chair. A chorus, "With drooping Wings ye Muses come," was sung in tribute to the memory of Mr. Hawkins, the late treasurer. Mr. Turle, organist of Westminster Abbey, and the young gentlemen of the choir, were in attendance. The memory of Purcell was drunk with due honors. This famous musician was born in 1658, and died in 1695. The Post styles him "England's greatest musician."

GRESHAM LECTURES.—The first of these was given by Professor Taylor, on Friday, the 29th ult. The theme was the German school of music. Gluck's Italian operas, and his visit to England, were discussed.

Mr. G. BUDD, secretary of the Watson Madrigal Society, has been appointed honorary librarian to the Philharmonic Society, in the place of the late Mr. Calkin.

MADAME BISHOP has been drawing excellent houses at Liverpool, in Balfe's Maid of Artois.—From the M. Post.

SIGNOR ANELLI, a highly-talented and much-respected professor of music in Cheltenham, has announced two concerts to be held in the Assembly Rooms, in aid of the distressed Scotch and Irish. The Concerts will be conducted by Mr. Frederic Anelli, son of the professor, a very promising artist and pianist. The scheme of the two Concerts is already published. It exhibits an excellent selection of music, and presents an admirable array of executive forces. It is to be hoped that so benevolent a project will meet with all the encouragement it merits. Signor Anelli, in any case, deserves the best thanks of all classes for his amiable exertions, and his liberal offers. He has set a good example to musical artists.

CHORAL HARMONISTS.—This society intends giving Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Nacht at their next meeting on the 15th instant. Much credit is due to the society for their efforts to give our city friends such opportunities of hearing the finest classical music.

MR. H. IRELAND, violin player, and a member of the Royal Society of Musicians, died very suddenly last week, leaving a widow and family to lament his loss. In former years Mr. Ireland used to lead the band at Mr. Bolton's theatre, at Rochester and other places in that locality. The vocal concerts will commence on the 5th of April, and will be given on the alternate Mondays, with the Philharmonic concerts, until June.

HORNS TAVERN.—The first of a series of concerts of classical instrumental music, took place in Doctor's Commons, on Tuesday evening last, at which, in consequence of a prior engagement, we could not attend, and can therefore but offer our readers a mere statement of the performances and the names of the interpreters. The concert comprised a Quartett of Mozart, (No. 4, in E flat, major); Quintett of Onslow, (No. 11, in B flat, major); Quartett of Haydn, (No. 81 in G major); and Quartett of Beethoven, (No. 3, in D major). The instrumentalists were, Messrs. H. Blagrove, Webb, Weslake, C. Severn and Hancock. We shall notice at length the next performance of these concerts, as we deem them from their importance entitled to every consideration.

MR. PAUL BEDFORD, we are happy to state, is in a fair way of recovery.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Warren's 20 Guinea Cottage Piano-Fortes

ARE NOW SELLING AT THE
Manufactory, 71, Leadenhall Street,

(Removed from 1 and 2, Liverpool Street, Bishopsgate Street.)

These Instruments are well manufactured of the best seasoned wood, FINE FULL TONE AND GOOD TOUCH. A two years warranty given with each instrument. ESTABLISHED TWENTY-ONE YEARS. The only house in London where a good sound instrument can be obtained at the above low price, (for cash only). SMALL PROFIT AND QUICK RETURNS!
JOHN WARREN, 71, Leadenhall St., opposite Aldgate Pump.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

The nobility, gentry, and public are respectfully informed, that the
NEW THEATRE

Will Open the first Week in April,

For the performance of the LYRICAL DRAMA, on a scale of efficiency in every department never before attempted in this country.

THE BALLET

Will include the names of the most celebrated artists. The prospectus for the arrangement of the season will be issued in due course. Mr. Beale, Director.

NOW READY.

CORNER'S HISTORY OF ROME;

Compiled from accepted modern English and Foreign authorities; and printed uniformly with CORNER'S HISTORICAL WORKS, for School and Family Reading, forming a complete History of every Nation in Europe.

THE HISTORIES OF	Bound, with the Questions.	Without Questions.
England and Wales—five fine plates and map	4s.	2s. 6d.
Ireland—three fine plates and map	3s.	2s. 6d.
Scotland—three fine plates and map	3s.	2s. 6d.
France—three fine plates and maps	3s.	2s. 6d.
Spain and Portugal—three fine plates and map	3s.	2s. 6d.
Denmark, Sweden, and Norway—two fine plates and map	3s.	2s. 6d.
Germany, including Austria—three fine plates and map	3s.	2s. 6d.
Turkey and Ottoman Empire—three fine plates and map	3s.	2s. 6d.
Poland and Russia—three fine plates and map	3s.	2s. 6d.
Italy and Switzerland—three fine plates and map	3s.	2s. 6d.
Holland and Belgium—two fine plates and map	2s.	2s. 6d.

The object of these works—peculiarly suited to Schools and Families—is to furnish the reader with a faithful history of each nation, interspersed with an accurate account of the religion, customs, national characteristics, state of civilisation, and domestic habits of the people, in various periods of their history; to attract the attention of the rising generation by purity of language and clearness of detail, and thus render easy and pleasant the attainment of a knowledge of the leading events of history.

To show how these truthful histories are appreciated, it may be mentioned that 8,000 England, 5,000 Ireland, 5,000 Scotland, 6,000 France, and 4,000 Spain and Portugal, have been sold.

CHARLES BUTLER'S EASY GUIDE TO GEOGRAPHY AND USE OF THE GLOBES. With Seven Glypographic Maps, 2s. cloth.

THE GUIDE TO USEFUL KNOWLEDGE, by the same Author. Second edition, enlarged, 1s. 6d. cloth. Useful and Practical Works, now ready, and may be obtained, by order, of every Bookseller in the Kingdom. Price 1s. 6d. cloth, the Sixth edition, enlarged, with the proper method of using Guano as a Manure, in a dry or liquid state.

PRICE'S MODERN GARDENER: or, Instructions, the result of experience for forming, planting, and managing the kitchen, flower, pleasure, and fruit garden, hotbed, and green-house. With directions as to the proper soils, the times and method of manuring, sowing, planting, pruning, and grafting; observations on the nature and progress of vegetation in plants, &c. By T. Price, Market-gardener and Nurseryman.

Price 2s. cloth, or 2s. 6d. in leather.

THE COOKMAID'S COMPLETE GUIDE, and the Art of Cookery made easy: being the best and easiest methods of correctly performing all the business of the cookmaid in respectable families. With proper instructions for steaming, and the most exact directions for preparing to cook, and for properly cooking and serving up all sorts of provisions, from a single joint of meat, with vegetables, to the finest seasoned dishes of game, poultry, fish, soups, sauces, and made dishes; and also for making and baking pies, tarts, patties, custards, &c. The whole written from experience. By a Lady.

Also, price 6d. sewed,

THE COOKMAID'S GUIDE for the proper Performance of all the household work expected to be done by the Cookmaid; with a few general rules for cooking, abridged from the "Cookery Made Easy." By the same author.

Price 6d. sewed,

THE HOUSEMAID'S COMPLETE GUIDE to the best methods of performing all the various duties of the housemaid in respectable families where a cook is kept. By the author of "The Maid-of-all-Work's Complete Guide."

Price 6d. sewed,

THE MAID-OF-ALL-WORK'S COMPLETE GUIDE, containing plain instructions for the proper methods of arranging and doing all the business usually required from servants of all-work in good families. By the author of "The Housemaid's Complete Guide."

Price 6d. stitched,

CHEAP COOKERY FOR THE WORKING CLASSES, showing them how to cook a variety of warm, savoury, and nourishing meals at little expense; an excellent book for clergymen and ladies to make presents. By the author of "Cookery Made Easy."

Price 1s. 6d. in cloth lettered,

THE CONFECTIONER'S AND PASTRYCOOK'S GUIDE, as practised at the best establishments in London and Paris, for making all kinds of pastry, jellies, blanc-manger, creams, &c., and preserving fruits. With the art of sugar-boiling, making lozenges, drops, pipe barley-sugar, carraway comfits, &c. By George Read.

Price 2s. 6d. in cloth, lettered,

THE COMPLETE BISCUIT AND GINGERBREAD BAKER'S ASSISTANT: with practical directions for making plain and fancy biscuits, buns, cakes, drops, gingerbread, spice nuts, &c., adapted either for the use of the trade or private families, forming the second part of the Confectioner's and Pastry-Cook's Guide. By George Read.

Price 1s. sewed,

THE BISCUIT AND GINGERBREAD BAKER'S ASSISTANT, being upwards of one hundred receipts for making biscuits, pastry, &c., for balls, routs, tea, wine, suppers, &c. By T. Shoosmith.

Price 2s. 6d. cloth,

THE CABINET MAKER'S AND UPHOLSTERER'S GUIDE: with the art of drawing, as applied to cabinet-making and upholstery, the processes of veneering and inlaying, dyeing, staining, lacquering, japanning, varnishing, French polishing, &c. With descriptive engravings. By J. Stokes.

PRACTICAL DIRECTIONS TO GENTLEMEN & TRADESMEN for KEEPING and MENDING HORSES—with directions for their choice and purchase, and how to ascertain the good or bad qualities, and detect the faults of horses, illustrated by accurate engravings. By James Mills, M.V.C. Third Edition, enlarged and improved. 1s. 6d. cloth, lettered, LAND SURVEYOR'S READY RECKONER: or, Gentleman's and Farmer's Guide to Land-Measure; by which the contents of any piece of land, of whatever shape, may be readily found. By S. Thorow. 2s. bound.

LONDON:—DEAN & CO., THREADNEEDLE STREET; and may be obtained, by order, of all Booksellers.

GRAND SCOTTISH CONCERT,
FOR THE RELIEF OF
THE DISTRESSED HIGHLANDERS,
AT THE
Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover Square,
On the evening of THURSDAY, 25th of FEBRUARY, 1847.
TO COMMENCE AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

Under the immediate Patronage of

HIS GRACIOUS MAJESTY, THE QUEEN.

H. R. H. Prince Albert
H. R. H. the Duchess of Kent
H. R. H. the Duchess of Gloucester
The Duke of Hamilton
The Duke of Buccleuch
The Duke of Richmond
The Duke of Montrose
The Duke of Sutherland
The Earl of Eglinton and Winton
The Earl of Zetland
The Earl of March
The Lord and Lady Willoughby D'Eresby
The Lord and Lady Lovat
Lieut. General Lord Saltoun

Her Majesty the Queen Dowager
H. R. H. the Duke of Cambridge
H. R. H. the Duchess of Cambridge
The Duchess of Hamilton
The Duchess of Buccleuch
The Duchess of Richmond
The Dowager Duchess of Bedford
The Duchess of Montrose
The Duchess of Sutherland
The Countess of Eglinton and Winton
The Countess of Zetland
The Countess of March
The Lord and Lady John Russell
The Obolons

THE HIGHLAND SOCIETY OF LONDON.

The Programme will include the names of the most distinguished artists, many of whom have already volunteered their valuable services in aid of THIS CHARITY.

Tickets to be had at all the principal Music Sellers, and the Concert Rooms, Hanover Square, at the following prices:—Tickets, 10s. 6d.; Double Tickets, 15s.; Single Reserved Seats, 15s.

All communications made to the "Committee of the Grand Scottish Concert, for the Relief of the Distressed Highlanders," to be addressed to the Hanover Square Rooms.

LYCEUM THEATRE.MR. ALLCROFT'S*TENTH ANNUAL GRAND CONCERT

WILL TAKE PLACE

On TUESDAY NEXT, February 9th,

At which the following talent will appear:—Messdames Albertazzi, Bussano, Birch, Lablache, Steele, Williams, Reynell, Novello, Hill, and Miss Maria B. Hawes; Messrs. Harrison, Allen, H. Phillips, F. Lablache, Brizzi, Gubillei, Sinclair, Henry Russell, and Mr. John Parry; also the celebrated Lantani Ethiopian Serenaders. Solo Performers—Madame Dulcken; Messrs. Benedict, Grattan Cooke, Frederick Chatterton, Blagrove, Harper, and Master Thirwall. Conductors, M.M. Norri and Lavenau. Leader, Mr. Loder. Boxes and Stalls, 5s.; Pit, 2s.; Gallery, 2s. Private boxes, tickets, and places to be had at Mr. Allcroft's Music Warehouse, 15, New Bond Street, next to Long's Hotel.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY,
EXETER HALL.

On THURSDAY EVENING, February 18th, 1847,

WILL BE PERFORMED

Handel's Overture to Esther, Coronation Anthem, Dettingen Te Deum, Hymn "ALLA TRINITA," and MOZART'S SERVICE, NO. 18.

Principal Vocal Performers—Mrs. SUNDERLAND, Miss DOLBY, Mr. GENGE, Mr. MANVERS, and Mr. H. PHILLIPS.

The Band and Chorus will consist of above 500 Performers.

Tickets 3s. each; Reserved Seats, 5s.; may be obtained of the principal Music Sellers; of Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing Cross; Mr. Rice, 102, Strand; or of Mr. Mitchell, 39, Charing Cross. THOMAS BREWER, Hon. Sec.

HISTORICAL CONCERTS.EXETER HALL.*THE SECOND CONCERT

(Of a Series of four) illustrative of the History of

English Vocal Music,

WILL BE HELD ON

MONDAY EVENING NEXT, FEBRUARY 8,

At which will be presented specimens from the music of ROGERS, HUMPHREYS, WISS, LOCK, BLOW, CRIGHTON, READING, and PURCELL.

Principal Vocal Performers:

MISS RAINFORTH, MISS DOLBY,
MR. LOCKEY, MR. W. H. SEGUIN, AND MR. MACHIN.

THE CHORUS

Will consist of the MEMBERS of MR. HULLAN'S UPPER SINGING SCHOOL and the ORCHESTRA of MR. WILLY'S CONCERT BAND. A NEW ORGAN has been erected by MR. ROBSON expressly for these concerts.

Tickets:

Area 2s. 6d.—For the three concerts 8s. 6d.
Western Gallery 3 6—For the three concerts 8 0
Reserved Seats 7 0—For the three concerts 17 0

May be had of Mr. Parker, Publisher, 445, West Strand; and of the principal Music Sellers.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847,

A most beautiful Christmas Present, New Year's Gift,
and Etrennes.

M. JULLIEN

Has the honor to announce that his

MUSICAL ANNUAL FOR 1847

Is now Published, and is by far the best work of the kind that has ever appeared; contains no less than

THIRTY PIECES OF VOCAL AND FOURTEEN OF INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC,

The greater part of which have never before been published, the copyrights
having been purchased expressly for this work, at an immense cost, with the view of rendering it immeasurably superior to any of its predecessors.

The portion which has already appeared comprise those pieces only whose decided success has induced M. JULLIEN, at the request of numerous influential patrons, to include them in this Selection.

The Illustrations, in addition to the elaborately executed Covers, Title, and Dedication pages, include

TWO MAGNIFICENT VIEWS OF THE

Interior of Covent-Garden Theatre,

The one taken during the brilliant scene exhibited in that splendid arena of
the occasion of M. JULLIEN'S GRAND BAL MASQUE; the other a VIEW OF THE THEATRE TAKEN DURING THE CONCERTS,
the grouping of the Figures in both Views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant. To those who have visited the Theatre on either occasion, the ALBUM will form a delightful SOUVENIR, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of
the gorgeous scene.

A SPLENDIDLY-COLOURED PORTRAIT

Of the celebrated Danseuse,

MADLE. FLORA FABBRI,

In the admired Pas, LA CASTIGLIANA.

AN ORIGINAL SUBJECT,

"THE FORTUNE TELLER,"

Illustrating BAKER's beautiful Ballad of that name.

The whole of this department of the ALBUM has been under the active superintendence of J. BRANDARD, Esq., whose pencil only has been employed in its production.

Nothing more need be said in favour of this ALBUM, and in proof of its vast superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the Contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe: viz

ROSSINI,	VERDI,	DONIZETTI,	RUBINI,
ROCH-ALBERT,	HOELZELL,	GOLDBERG,	SCHIRA,
SCHULZ,	STÖPEL,	DUPREZ,	JOSE GOMIS,
MASARNAU,	MARATZEK,	BALFE,	JULLIEN,
HATTON,	BARRET,	ALEXANDER LEE,	KENIG,
KNIGHT,	BAKER,	FARMER,	LINLEY,
LAKE,	FITZBALL,	MOULD,	HUREY,
FOREST,	ALBERT SMITH,	DESMOND RYAN,	&c.

It will thus be perceived that in addition to the latest compositions of the best English Composers, the ALBUM will contain some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany, France, Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting the attention of the Continental dilettant.

PRICE 18s. AND £1. 1s.

ROYAL CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC
214, REGENT-STREET, AND 45, KING-STREET.

SOVEREIGN Life Assurance Company, No. 5, ST. JAMES'S STREET, LONDON.

Trustees.	Henry Pownall, Esq.
Sir A. Brydges Henniker, Bart.	Claude Edward Scott, Esq.
B. Bond Cabbell, Esq., M.P.
Directors.	Henry Broadwood, Esq., M.P.
CHAIRMAN, Lieutenant Colonel Lord	Sir James Carmichael, Bart.
Arthur Lennox.	Charles Farebrother, Esq., Alderman.
DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN, T. C. Granger,	William Tulloh Fraser, Esq.
Esq., M.P.	John Gardiner, Esq.
John Ashburner, Esq., M.D.	Aaron Asher Goldsmid, Esq.
T. M. B. Batard, Esq.	Henry William Pownall, Esq.
Philip P. Blyth, Esq.

Bankers, Sir Claude Scott, Bart., and Co.

Solicitors, Messrs. Davies, Son, and Campbell.

Assurances on the lives of persons in every station of life and every part of the world, granted on a plan which combines the utmost amount of benefit to the families of the assured at death, with every attainable advantage during life, which the system of Life Assurance is capable of affording.

It affords perfect security in a subscribed Capital, which guarantees the prompt settlement of every claim, with participating and non-participating rates on the lowest scale, especially for terms of years.

The Assured can anticipate or obtain the advance of the full amount of the Policy, on giving approved available security for a certain number of annual payments, as explained by the Prospectus.

Every facility is afforded to persons assuring the lives of others, so as to render such Policies effectual securities.

A new plan of gradual or accumulative Assurance, particularly adapted for young lives, and for such as cannot, without inconvenience, undertake the payment of a fixed premium, securing at once provision in case of premature death, and an accumulating fund, available during life, should occasion require.

ANNUITIES, ENDOWMENTS, ADVANCES, and LOANS, on liberal terms.

Detailed Prospectuses, with forms of Proposal, and every information, may be had on application, either personally or by letter, at the Company's Offices.

The usual commission to Solicitors and Agents.

H. D. DAVENPORT, Secretary.

Mr. LINDSAY SLOPER

Begs to announce that he will give

THREE SOIREEES

CLASSICAL PIANO-FORTE MUSIC,

At the BETHOVEN Rooms,

76, HARLEY STREET, Cavendish Square,

On the following evenings:—Thursday, February 18, Wednesday, March 3, and Wednesday, March 17, to commence at half past eight o'clock. Subscription Tickets One Guinea each, and tickets for a single Soiree Half-a-Guinea each, may be had of Messrs. Cramer, Beale, and Co.; Wessell and Co.; and Jullien; and of Mr. Lindsay Sloper, 7, Southwick Place, Hyde Park Square.

Mrs. A. NEWTON and Mr. G. CASE

Beg to announce to their Friends and the Public, that their ANNUAL CONCERT

WILL TAKE PLACE AT THE

LONDON TAVERN,

MONDAY EVENING, February 8th, 1847.

Vocal Performers—Miss Rainforth, Madame F. Lablache, Mrs. A. Newton;
Mr. W. Harrison, Signor F. Lablache, Mr. N. J. Sporio and Mr. John Farry.
Instrumental—Miss E. Ward; Messrs. F. Chatterton, E. Blagrove, J. Ward,
J. Case, and G. Case. Conductors, Mr. C. Severn and Mr. Howard Glover.
Tickets 2s.; Reserved Seats 6s.; to be had of Mrs. Newton, 45, Lower Belgrave
Place, Piccadilly; Mr. Case, 51, Great Coram Street, Russell Square; Mr. Case, 34, Blisbopgate Street; at the Music shops; and at the London Tavern.

To be Published—

SIX SONGS; IN ONE BOOK, PRICE SIX SHILLINGS, By W. R. BEXFIELD, B.M.

Persons requiring copies are requested to specify the same to Mr. J. A. Novello, or to the author, Boston, Lincolnshire.

Just Published by R. MILLS, 140, New Bond Street,

No. 4 OF GERMAN SONGS,

"HOFFNUNG;"

THE POETRY BY SCHILLER, THE ENGLISH WORDS BY DESU
MUSIC BY HENRY WYLDE, Associate of the Royal Academy.

Also, by the same Author, (first Sonata dedicated to C. POTTER,)

"RHAPSODY,"

BOOK OF GERMAN SONGS.

In the Press—"Caprice," for the Piano-forte.

The following Outline of the Arrangements for the Season 1847, is respectfully submitted to the Nobility, Patrons of the Opera, and to the Public. It is presented with the confident hope, that the successful exertions made to secure, under circumstances of peculiar difficulty, a Company still more worthy of the first Theatre in Europe, and of its distinguished Patrons, will ensure the continuation of their support.

Engagements for the Opera.

MAD^{LE}. JENNY LIND,

MAD^{LE}. DEL CARMEN MONTENEGRO,

MAD^{LE}. SANCHIOLI,

Madlle. FAGIANI AND Madame SOLARI,

The Contralti, Madlle. VIETTI AND Madlle. DARIA NASCIO,

AND

MADAME CASTELLAN.

SIG. FRASCHINI, (the great Tenor of Italy)

And the favorite Tenor, SIG. GARDONI,

SIG. SUPERCHI.

Sig. BORELLA, Sig. CORELLI, Sig. BOUCHE, (of La Scala,—his first appearance)

SIG. F. LABLACHE,

(The celebrated Basso Cantante)

HERR STAUDIGL, AND SIG. LABLACHE.

In addition to the above, arrangements are pending with Sig. COLETTI, of the Italian Opera at Paris.

THAT GREAT COMPOSER, THE CHEVALIER MEYERBEER, has arranged to visit this Country to bring out the

CAMP DE SILESIE,

The principal Parts in the CAMP DE SILESIE, by

MAD^{LE}. JENNY LIND

AND

SIG. FRASCHINI.

THE CELEBRATED DR. FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY

Will likewise visit England, and produce an Opera expressly composed for Her Majesty's Theatre, the Libretto, founded on

THE TEMPEST

OF SHAKESPEARE: WRITTEN BY M. SCRIBE.

Miranda, Ferdinand,

*Madlle. JENNY LIND.
Sig. GARDONI.*

Caliban, Prospero,

*Herr STAUDIGL.
Sig. LABLACHE.*

It is likewise announced with great satisfaction, that Signor VERDI, having recovered from his severe illness, has expressly composed for this Theatre, a new Opera, of which the plot is founded on the ROBBER'S OF SCHILLER.

Rossini's Opera of ROBERT BRUCE, lately produced at the Académie Royale, has also been secured.

Messrs. CASTELLAN, SANCHIOLI, & MONTENEGRO: Signori GARDONI, SUPERCHI, & FRASCHINI, will appear before Easter.

MAD^{LE}. JENNY LIND, whose engagement commences in March, and extends until the end of the Season, will appear immediately after Easter.

Director of the Music and Conductor, M. BALFE.

In addition to the above, SEVERAL OPERAS, new to this Country, will be produced, and the renowned will be selected from the Chef-d'œuvres of MOZART, Cimarosa, ROSSINI, DONIZETTI, MERCADANTE, BELLINI, &c.

The strictest attention has been paid to all the details, so that an ensemble may be presented perfect in all its parts.

A NUMEROUS ORCHESTRA, of the most distinguished talent and power, has been selected from some of the best orchestras of Europe, combined with former meritorious Artists of the Establishment.

THE CHORUS has been chosen with the greatest care from Italy, Germany, and England, and will comprise upwards of EIGHTY PERFORMERS.

Arrangements for the Ballet:

MAD^{LE}. CARLOTTA GRISI,

MAD^{LE}. LUCILE GRAHN,

AND

MAD^{LE}. CERITO.

In addition to which, an Engagement has been made with

MAD^{LE}. CAROLINE ROSATI,

(Of La Scala, at Milan; and other great Theatres of Italy;) who will make her First Appearance on the First Night of the Season in a NEW BALLET, expressly composed and arranged for her by M. PAUL TAGLIONI.

MAD^{LE}. WAUTHIER,

MADAME PETIT STEPHAN,

MAD^{LE}. HONORE.

MAD^{LE}. ELISE MONTFORT,

Messrs. THEVENOT,

JULIEN,

L'AMOUREUX,

EMILIE,

FANNY PASCALES,

AND BERTIN.

MAD^{LE}. CAROLINE BAUCOURT.

In consequence of the enthusiastic manner in which this eminent Artiste was received last season, hopes are entertained that

MAD^{LE}. TAGLIONI

May be induced to appear for a limited number of performances.

M. ST. LEON, M. D'OR, M. GOSSELIN,

M. DI MATTIA, Sig. VENAFRA, M. GOURIET.

M. PAUL TAGLIONI

AND M. PERROT.

Composer of the Ballet Music, - SIG. PUGNI,

Principal Artist, - MR. MARSHALL.

MAITRES DE BALLET,—M. PAUL TAGLIONI,

M. CASATI, (of La Scala)

AND M. PERROT.

SOUS MAITRE DE BALLET, M. GOSSELIN.

REGISSEUR DE LA DANSE, M. PETIT.

AN ORIGINAL GRAND BALLET will be produced, written expressly for Her Majesty's Theatre, by the celebrated Poet

HENRI HEINE, on a subject selected from the Old LEGENDS OF GERMANY: and also

A Novel and Poetical Ballet, for the subject of which the Establishment is indebted to the kindness of a noble and distinguished Poetess, entitled EGERIA.

THE CELEBRATED PAS DE QUATRE AND PAS DES DEESSES

Will be revived; and an entirely new Divertissement, introducing another GRAND PAS,

By M. PERROT, which, uniting all the peculiar attractions of the Pas des Déeses, and Pas de Quatre, will present a novel feature of striking originality, and will combine the talent of all: to be entitled

LA CONSTELLATION.

THE SUBSCRIPTION WILL CONSIST OF THE SAME NUMBER OF NIGHTS AS LAST SEASON.

For the first time will be produced at Her Majesty's Theatre, DONIZETTI's admired Opera of LA FAVORITA,

In which SIG. GARDONI AND SIG. SUPERCHI will make their first appearance in this Country; and an Entirely NEW BALLET, by M. PAUL TAGLIONI; in which MAD^{LE}. CAROLINE ROSATI will appear.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, at the "Nassau Steam Press," by WILLIAM SPENCER JOHNSON, 60, St. Martin's Lane, in the parish of St. Martin's in the Fields, in the County of Middlesex; where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed post paid. To be had of G. PARKES, Dean Street, Soho; Strange, Paternoster Row; Wiseheart, Dublin; and all Booksellers.—Saturday, February 6th, 1847.

The Musical World.

(PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT NOON.)

A RECORD OF THE THEATRES, MUSIC, LITERATURE, FINE ARTS,
FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE, &c.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 12s. Stamped; 12s. Unstamped; to be forwarded by Money Order or Postage Stamp to the Publisher, W. S. Johnson, "Nassau Steam Press," 60, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross.

Each Subscriber is entitled to an Admission to an Annual Concert, and a Piece of Music, (regular Music size) Monthly.

No. 7.—VOL. XXII.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1847.

PRICE THREEPENCE
STAMPED, FOURPENCE

A CHAT WITH RUMOUR.

THOUGH the recognised organs of the "Rival Operas" have been unusually silent since our last, Rumour has wagged its thousand tongues with vigour. Let us catch some of the reports which issue from its mouth, lest they fly out of date and be lost, as the arrow in the dark. Our good friends in the provinces will be obliged to us, though the men of London may smile at our credulity. We are as ancient gossips, implicitly confiding in the words of Rumour until fact drowns it in its thunder; and so must be forgiven for much that we shall set down. What we advance may be true in whole or in part, or false in whole or in part. But it cannot be both true and false, and must therefore be one or the other—since true is that which is not false, and false is that which is not true; each word having the negative and affirmative elements combined in its nature, and each having the prerogative of self-creation, co-existent with that of annihilation in its opposite. Forgive us, reader, for this trunk-makerian apostrophe, and there's an end on't.

The other day Rumour called upon us and found us in our study, endeavouring with much labour to make out the meaning of an article by C. J., who, in seeking to explain his theory of vocalism successfully exposed his ignorance of anatomy, and confounded the terms sfogato and sfocato with great ingenuity, guessing from a misprint in the Musical World that they must be neither more nor less than the same thing. The first thing Rumour told us almost took our breath away. It was this:—That Mr. Lumley, lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre, in the Haymarket, had brought an action against the Morning Chronicle newspaper for the articles published therein, which stated certain prominent points in his programme to be fabrications. Hereupon ensued the following conversation, which our secretary, without consulting us, took down in short-hand (brachygraphically), and as it is now Friday night, and the printer waits for copy, we seize it with avidity and make it serve in place of a leader.

Dialogue.

RUMOUR.—MR. D. R.—EDITOR.

MR. D. R. On what grounds can Mr. Lumley bring his action?

Editor. On the surest possible. In pronouncing his prospectus to be in part a fabrication, the Morning Chronicle clearly insinuates that Mr. Lumley is endeavouring to obtain money under false pretences. It is by the attractions offered in his programme that Mr. Lumley hopes to influence subscribers and to let his stalls and boxes to the booksellers and to the public for the season. If the promises held out therein are not kept Mr. Lumley is in no better position than that of a picture-dealer who sells a picture in a frame to a customer, and when he has got the money bargained for, sends home the frame without the picture. The subscribers who take boxes by persuasion of the prospectus, and are not supplied with their Jenny Lind, their Mendelssohn, and their Meyerbeer, &c., are precisely in the position of the cheated purchaser. The case is perfectly clear, and Mr. Lumley is quite justified in bringing his action. I have not the least doubt he will gain heavy damages, which will make the Morning Chronicle more careful for the future.

Rumour. It is said that the principal proprietor of the Morning Chronicle has signified his intention of defending the action, and his approval of the article that has appeared in his paper.

MR. D. R. What a triumph for the writer! Every one will subscribe to the piece of plate which the press is going to offer him as a testimonial.

Editor. What piece of plate, and what press?

MR. D. R. Why did you not read the paragraph which I copied from a country paper into the Musical World? It stated that sundry members of the press had set about getting up some kind of testimonial to the writer of the Chronicle, as an acknowledgment of the independent course he had pursued in respect to the Italian Opera!

Editor. O, yes, I remember now. I added a note signifying that this was a new reading of the word "independent," since the Chronicle's independence was all on one side.

MR. D. R. Well, but you have the Post to balance it!

Editor. That may be, but I don't believe one word about the testimonial. The only subscriber to it would be the critic of the Athenaeum.

Rumour. I hear that Fanny Ellsler has signed with Covent Garden.

Editor. That is true—I have it from the best authority—she will be here in May.

Rumour. And that the Queen has taken a box for the season.

MR. D. R. Equally true. I have it from the best authority. Moreover, there are already five omnibuses established. After all it is a splendid company, and Fanny Ellsler, with Fuoro, Dumilatre, Plunkett, Badema, and Petipa, will leave the ballet very little inferior to that of Her Majesty's Theatre.

Editor. Carlotta Grisi and Perrot are worth the whole of them together—to say nothing of Heine, the poet, who is to write a ballet expressly for Mr. Lumley.

MR. D. R. Credit Judeus!

Editor. Why you are as bad as the Chronicle. I suppose you will subscribe to the testimonial?

MR. D. R. I might do worse.

Rumour. I hear that Mr. Lumley's confidential adviser and intimate friend B— has gone to Vienna, to make sure of Jenny Lind.

MR. D. R. Yes, and Mr. Bunn is going, or gone, to Paris, to catch her on the way.

Rumour. That is true, and moreover, if he can persuade her to go to Covent Garden, he will be repaid for his trouble by an engagement as acting or stage-manager at the Royal Italian Opera.

Editor. You astonish me! I don't, I can't believe one word of all this.*

MR. D. R. Is Jenny Lind such a phoenix as our friend Rumour will have it?

Editor. When I was at Cologne last summer, I heard her in the opera of Norma, and if that be one of her great characters, I must confess I think she is vastly overrated. Eighteen months cannot have made so wonderful a difference as to have transmogrified her into the greatest dramatic singer of any age or country, which fame proclaims her now. Still Norma, on the other hand, may not be one of her grand characters; and indeed I have heard that her forte is not in the opera seria but in domestic opera, like La Sonnambula, or comic opera like Il Barbiere. That she must be very great in some parts can be scarcely questioned, or how otherwise can the admiration of such musicians as Mendelssohn and Meyerbeer be accounted for?

MR. D. R. Her youth and beauty have doubtless a large account in the adoration of young Germany.

* Mr. Bunn is not in Paris, but in London, actively engaged in superintending the rehearsals of Vincent Wallace's new opera.—E.D.

Editor. Her beauty is not striking. She is young and well-looking, but there is no extraordinary intelligence in her countenance. The young Germans, nevertheless, are mad about her. They worship her as the viierge—and indeed her spotless private character has no little to do with the sum-total of her attractions for the most thoughtful and romantic people on the globe.

Mr. D. R. At all events her advent to London is a topic of uncommon interest, and everybody is impatient for the dénouement of the controversy on her account, which the Post and Chronicle have taken upon themselves to carry on in the name of Mr. Lumley and his adversaries.

Editor. A topic of even greater interest is the promised opera of Mendelssohn, in which Jenny Lind is to play. It is rather singular, by the way, that the Chronicle, in alluding to Mendelssohn's engagement to conduct Elijah at Exeter Hall, in Thursday's paper, says nothing confirmatory of the article in which he states, (bringing forward a letter from Mr. Buxton to strengthen his argument,) that the promised opera of the great German composer was all a fabrication. It is the more singular, since he advertises the receipt, on Mr. Buxton's part, of another letter from Leipzig, dated the 3rd inst. Surely had the letter contained anything that established the statement that appeared in the Chronicle Mr. Buxton would have communicated it to the writer, whom he had already authorized to print the letter of the 25th ult., which contained matter of so grave and decided a nature.

Rumour. I hear that the zealous writer in the Chronicle is preparing, by permission of the authorities, a lengthy philippic, which will bring matters before the public that will more than disagreeably compromise many persons.

Mr. D. R. That will be a smasher for the Morning Post.

Editor. I shall believe it when I read it; not before.

Here the conversation dropped. Rumour took his leave; and Mr. D. R. continued his perusal of Bourcicault's new play, which the snarler in the Examiner has treated so scurvily, and for which we shall furnish him tit-for-tat.

The programme of the Royal Italian Opera, which we reviewed last week, has been handled in two of the daily papers only, the Chronicle and Herald. The former gives scarcely more than a transcript of the principal points in the programme; the latter is more warm, and inveighs considerably on its excellence and attractiveness. Very little has appeared of any interest in any of the papers. The only thing we can find worth quoting is the following from Galignani's Messenger, which was transferred to the columns of the Times:—

"JENNY LIND.—Jenny Lind is expected in Paris in about three weeks, and strong temptations are held out to induce her to sing a few nights before she proceeds to Her Majesty's Theatre. We learn, on indisputable authority from Germany, that the friends of Mlle. Jenny Lind, in consequence of the claim advanced by Mr. Bunn on the services of that lady, have required the opinion of the Attorney-General of England upon the engagement which she was led to sign with Mr. Bunn, to learn how far such an agreement, made for the summer of 1845, is binding in 1847. The opinion of the Attorney-General was, in consequence, taken, and has been forwarded. It is quite fatal to the claims of Mr. Bunn, as it lays down that the engagement could only be a question of damages, and that those damages in case of trial would be merely nominal; and, finally, that from the wording of the document, there is a strong doubt as to whether it is a contract at all or not. This legal opinion, given by the first law officer of the Crown, will doubtless bring the matter at once to a termination."

This account of our Attorney-General's opinion, coming from across the channel, is not entitled to much consideration; and the Times, in citing it, adds no comment of its own. Meanwhile Punch has hoisted the standard for Mr. Lumley, and has published some excellent doggerel under the title of "The Poet Bunn to Jenny Lind," and the indefatigable Albert Smith has been guilty of a similar misdemeanour in his "Everybody's Column," which is read by everybody who can manage to wade through a column of the Illustrated London News. To conclude, we shall continue on guard, and cry "Qui vive" to whatever passes between this number and the next. The future is big with events portentous and significative.

P.S. A letter has been received from Mendelssohn, which in all probability will be printed in to-day's Morning Post. The letter states that Mr. Buxton's letter to the Chronicle was written without authority from Mendelssohn!

CARLOTTA GRISI.

IF Mr. Lumley's prospectus contained nothing else than the promise of Carlotta's re-establishment as queen of her own domain on the boards of Her Majesty's Theatre, it would be entitled to our respect. To every lover of the beautiful, as exemplified in grace of movement, the name of Carlotta Grisi must be a talisman to conjure up a thousand delightful reminiscences. Our readers know that the charming artist has availed herself of a month's congé from the direction of the Académie Royale, to pay a visit to Rome, and transport the inhabitants of the ancient city with the evolutions of her twinkling feet, and the fascinations of her graceful pantomime. But cruel fate, jealous no doubt of a despotism more entire, and far more pleasant to endure than his own, determined to throw every obstacle in Carlotta's way, and so to spoil, if possible, her triumph among the Romans. First, he annoyed our lovely choregraph on her way to Marseilles, giving her a tedious journey, and causing her to arrive one hour too late, whereby she was bound to a week's sojourn among the Marseillaises. At length the steamboat made its appearance, but fate again interposed his envious hand. Instead of sailing direct for Civita Vecchia, the rebellious boat would stop at Genoa, and then at Leghorn on the way, and at each of these places Carlotta was compelled to make a sojourn. Ultimately she found herself in the city of the Cæsars. The impresario, one Jacovacci, was in an instant at her side. Wringing his hands, and weeping bitterly, he exclaimed to the captivating procrastinator, "Oh, Signora, you have ruined me! you are nine days after your time, and unless you give me 20,000 francs I am a lost man. I have a large family to provide for, and unless you give me 2000 francs I shall blow out my brains." In vain Carlotta remonstrated, in vain she stated the cause of her delay; the next day she was summoned to appear before the Cardinal-Governor. But a cardinal, or any other mortal (unless a father of a family on the brink of ruin), could no more resist the charms of Carlotta than ice the melting influence of the sun; and as ice before the sun melted the Cardinal-Governor before Carlotta. Spell-bound by her beauty—enchanted by the silvery tones of her voice—raptured by her graceful and unaffected deportment, he forgot the impresario, and decided in favour of Carlotta. The tears of the plaintiff were as nothing to the graces of so lovely a defendant. "The case is inevitable," said the Cardinal. "Mademoiselle Carlotta Grisi, were she thrice as agile, could not be expected to make a leap from Marseilles to Civita Vecchia. And in respect to damages, our fair visitor will accord us a few extra representations, and then the debt will be on our side." The verdict was enthusiastically received by all present, and the impresario and Carlotta were equally content. Rome was in a veritable commotion, and strangers had travelled from all parts to witness the performances of the delicious choregraph. Not a place was to be obtained at the theatre for love or money within a few days after her arrival; for at Rome, as elsewhere, all the world must see Carlotta dance.

EXETER HALL.

THE Second Historical Concert, in aid of the Hullah Testimonial Fund, was held on Monday. The object of these concerts is to obtain a sum of money sufficient to enable the projector to erect a music-hall of large dimensions, adequate to musical performances on the grandest scale, and worthy, in its architectural beauty, in its fitness and completeness, of the first metropolis in the world. The splendid music-hall at Birmingham most probably suggested the idea of the new building to Mr. Hullah, though, no doubt, the absence of a locale in the metropolis at all answerable to the great purposes of modern musical performances, urged him on in his projection. There is no greater actuality staring us in the face than the want of an adequate music-hall in London. The object of Mr. Hullah is therefore warranted by necessity. Mr. Hullah has been the first to introduce the Wilhem system of music into this country. For this alone he merits the gratitude of the whole of the musical world. The system of teaching vocalization in classes was never so much needed as at the present day, when oratorios, and such like compositions, requiring singing in masses, are becoming a principal portion of the popular musical creed. Mr. Hullah has proved, beyond a chance of disputation, that the Wilhem system of class teaching is of the most vital importance in educating singers for the very highest department of the vocal art, namely, the being able to render the choruses of the great masters in their meaning and integrity. The choruses of Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, Haydn, Spohr, and Mendelssohn, are at once the mightiest efforts of the composers, and the most difficult to interpret by the singers. When we remember the time, pains, and money that have been expended on the singers, to whom the solos in oratorios, &c., have to be entrusted, and then consider that until the present day the choruses were left to chance singers, upon whom perhaps neither time, pains, nor money were expended at all, or expended in such small measure as amounted to nothing, we shall not wonder at the deficiency of our great musical performances, nor be astonished at the public voice that called aloud for a reformation. Mr. Hullah has heard the public voice, and has responded thereto, and he is at this moment in the high way of popularity, as being about to render to the musical community one of the most important benefits it can receive. Mr. Hullah's classes have been established for some years, and the correctness and steadiness with which his pupils interpret the most intricate music upon all occasions, has been acknowledged by all who have heard them.

The programme of this concert, like that of the first was divided into two parts.—Part I. devoted to sacred compositions, and part II. to secular. The contents of part I. were, "Oh God of truth," hymn by Rogers—"Prepare ye the way," anthem by Michael Wise—"I was in the spirit," anthem by Dr. John Bow,—"The aspiration," song by Purcell—"I will arise," anthem by Robert Creighton.—and "Behold I bring you good tidings," verse-anthem by Purcell. With the exception of the last mentioned, this selection was most unfortunate. It was reasonable to expect that a selection of the compositions of English musicians, who flourished between the restoration and the close of the seventeenth century, would be more musically interesting than a selection from the composers of a century before. But either the selection was bad, or the writers of the epoch in question, are duller than those who preceded them—which latter, with the single exception of Purcell, we take to be the case. The anthem of this great reformer of the diatonic school, is one of the most remarkable of his sacred works, and exhibits some of the most extraordinary progressions in chromatic harmony that can be found in any writer of his time, or since. The expression of the word "Glory be to God on high," is magnificent, and a stunning proof of Purcell's genius. The second part of the programme placed the secular composers in as unfavourable a light as the first did the sacred. It consisted of "Dulce domum," a part song by John Reading, a piece of impertinent swaddle—"I pass all my hours in a shady old grove," a melancholy song by Pelham Humphreys, to some sentimental verses by Charles II.—"Ne'er trouble thyself about times or their turnings," a silly and vulgar glee by Matthew Lock—the first act of Purcell's early opera, Dido and Eneas, the weakest portion of one of his weakest compositions—"Thy genius, lo!" a song by Purcell to words by Nat Lee—"Hark my Damilear," a duet of small merit by the same composer,—"It is not that I love you less," a sweet and plaintive ballad by Dr. Blow—"At the close of the evening" a stupid catch by Purcell—and the well known song and chorus from King Arthur by the same, a trifle which is not without a certain boldness of character, but which has been magnified by rabid Purcellites into an importance, ridiculously out of character with its pretensions. Altogether this selection was tedious, dry, and uninteresting. You might as well go to our Wades, Rodwells, and what not, for a programme, and it would be nearly as dull, and quite as interesting.

We speak with more pleasure of the execution. The choruses, under Mr. May's direction were really admirable, and deserved the encores they obtained for more than one indifferent composition. Mr. Oliver May presided at the organ and pianoforte with his usual musician-like ability—and Mr. Willy, at the head of his compact and efficient little orchestra, did ample service in perfecting the ensemble. The principal vocalists were Misses Rainforth and Dolby, Messrs. Lockey, Machin, and W. Seguin. They all exerted themselves with zeal and ability, but Miss Dolby's exquisite interpretation of Dr. Blow's quaint ballad—"It is not that I love thee less," bore away the bell against all competition, and brought down an encore, which followed the delivery of the last note as a clap of thunder echoes the lightning's flash. We have seldom heard applause more vociferous, more unanimous, or better merited.

MEMOIR OF PALESTRINA.

(Concluded from No. V.)

DURING the time of Palestrina's stay in the service of the church of San. Giovanni di Lateran, he presented nothing to the public; but some of his works had largely circulated and expanded his reputation. In 1569 he dedicated the second book of his masses to Philip the Second, King of Spain, and in the following year the same prince received again the dedication of the third book. Palestrina attached himself likewise to the Cardinal Hippolyte D'Este, to whom he dedicated a book of motets. From this time the publication of his works followed each other with rapidity, and the editions were multiplied. The death of Animuccia, towards the end of the month of March, 1571, caused Palestrina to be appointed to the Chapel of St. Peter of the Vatican, in the early part of the ensuing month of April, although the advantages derived from this place were less than that of Chapel Master of San. Maria Maggiore, and the moderate income of the greatest musician of Italy was thus diminished in one half. The death of Animuccia left also vacant the directorship of the music of the oratorio. This was offered to Palestrina by St. Philip de Neris, founder of this congregation, his friend and confessor. Palestrina wrote for the service of the oratorio anthems, psalms, and spiritual canticles. Finally, he undertook the management of the school for counterpoint, established by Mario Nanini; and, in a short time after, Pope Gregory the Thirteenth charged him with the revision of all the songs in the graduel, and the book of Roman anthems—an immense labour, which he never had time to achieve, although assisted by his pupil Guidetti. After his death, they found but the graduel de Tempore completed. Hygin, Palestrina's son, finished this collection, and sold it as the work of his father; but the Tribunal of the Santa Rota dissolved the contract, and the manuscript was lost. On the 21st of July, 1580, Palestrina lost his wife, whom he tenderly loved: this afflicted him with the most lively sorrow, which was little assuaged by his nomination of master of the concerts to Prince Giacomo Buoncompagno, (not the nephew of Pope Gregory the Thirteenth) as M. Baini would assert, but a son, which that Pope had before he entered into holy orders. Destined to behold a great number of sovereign pontiffs succeed to the apostolic chair, Palestrina sought in each of them a protection against the necessities which continually besieged him. It is thus that he dedicated to Pope Sixtus the Fifth the first book of his Lamentations. In the epistle which he has placed at the head of the collection, he gives an afflicting picture of his situation. "Most Holy Father," he says, "study and care never coalesce; above all, when the latter proceeds from misery. With competence (to demand more is to fail in moderation and temperance) one can easily delude himself from other anxieties, and he who is not content, under like circumstances, can accuse nobody but himself. But he who hath experienced it alone can tell how difficult it is to labour to maintain honourably himself and his family, and how much this obligation distracts the mind from the study of the sciences and the liberal arts. I have always proved this sad experience, and now more than ever. Nevertheless I return thanks to the Divine goodness which hath permitted me, spite of my most grievous embarrassment, to prosecute unbroken the studies of my music (wherein I have also found a useful diversion), in the career I have outrun and whose term approaches. I have published a large number of my compositions; and I have many others whose printing is only retarded by my poverty: for it is a considerable expense, particularly on account of the characters of the notes, letters necessary for the use of the church, &c., &c., &c."

It is a sad spectacle this, of an old man, elevated so high in men's minds by his immortal works, and nevertheless betrayed at the last moment to the horrors of necessity; yet nothing could so well have made manifest his genius as this long struggle with adversity, which would not suffer him to be listless, but continually urged him onward to newer efforts. After so many labours, whose results had been so glorious, and so feebly recompensed, Giovanni Pierluigi di Palestrina perceived his end approaching. In his last moments he summoned his son Hygin to him,—his sole remaining son,—and delivered the following words, which so faithfully depict the veritable artist:—"My son, I leave you a considerable number of unpublished works; thanks to the Abbé de Baume, to Cardinal Aldobrandini, and to the Grand Duke of Tuscany. I leave you also a sum sufficient to have them printed; I recommend to you that be done as soon as possible, for the glory of the All-powerful, and for the celebration of His worship in the holy temples." The malady which afflicted him soon after assumed a graver character, and on the 2nd of February, 1594, he expired. All the musicians at that time in the Roman capital assisted at his funeral; he was buried in the church of the Vatican, and the following inscription was graven on his tomb:—

IOANNES—PETRUS—ALOYSCIUS—PRÆNESTINUS
MUSICÆ PRINCEPS.

The eulogium of this great artist may be comprised in a few words. He was the creator of the sole kind of church music conformable to its object. In this style he arrived at the last degree of perfection; and his works have remained for two centuries and a half the purest models for imitation. In the class of madrigals he has exhibited neither less grace, less genius, nor less perfection in its details, and no one has carried to greater length than he, the art of seizing the general character of the poetry in his productions. Like all men, endowed with superior abilities, he has modified his manner in the course of his long and glorious career; nevertheless one may dispute the exactitude of the divisions of the ten different styles which M. Baini has asserted at the end of his book; for some of the distinctions he establishes result, less from any alteration in the mode of thinking and conceiving in the artist himself, than in the propriety of the species of each work. Thus if it be true that Palestrina, after the publication of the first book of his masses, swept away the dust from the schools in which he himself had grounded his education, and if, as M. Baini says, the adversities of his life had thrown a melancholy shade over his conceptions, and inspired his thoughts with that noble and touching character of which his Improprieis was the precursor, it is equally certain that we cannot imagine in their particular styles a contexture more solemn than in his Magnificat, a method more soft and facile than in his Litanies, or an expression more elegant and spiritual than in his madrigals. In all his productions the man of genius displays itself in the originality of style, and discovers forms and accents the most analogous to this originality, but does not change for that of manner, as is shown when he passes suddenly from the system of the ancient school to that of the masses of his second book, and above all to that of Pope Marcellus's mass. We cannot agree with M. Baini, that this mass constitutes a particular style; it is only the most beautiful production of Palestrina in that style. The entire of Palestrina's works may be summed up as follows, first: fifteen books of Masses; secondly—seven books of Motets; thirdly—three books of the Lamentations of Jeremiah; fourthly—the Litanies; sixthly—the Spiritual Canticles; and lastly, three books of Madrigals. M. the Abbé Baini prepared a complete edition of his works in parts, which it would be most desirable to see published.

SOMETHING ABOUT NOTHING.

THE reigning topic of interest still continues to be the two Italian Operas. Nothing, however, has occurred since our last which warrants us in devoting an article apart to the subject. The Post and Chronicle have suspended for awhile the thunder of their artillery, contenting themselves with small side-shots dealt at intervals. Meanwhile, the Chronicle Boreas has given himself up entirely to the study of Lindlay Murray, and from time to time presents his readers with specimens of the progress he has made. To make our words good, we present the following paragraph from his article on Norma at the Princess's:—

"With the lovely voice nature has gifted her with, and by following up carefully her studies, Miss Anne Rover, as her strength increases with years, has the prospect of taking a high position."

This will be a consolation to the young singer, provided she can make it out. The following, from the same article, is also worthy of notice:—

"In the duos between Norma and Adalgisa, the two ladies might have advantageously changed their parts, for the voices did not blend;" which involves a curious discovery: viz. that a soprano and a mezzo soprano, whose voices will not harmonise, have only to sing each other's parts to produce the effect intended.

But the excellent Post is not idle the while. He also pursues his studies. His vein, however, is more æsthetic, as the following (from an article on Madame Dulcken) will show:—

"During these three apprenticeships of taste, our native talent has strode in seven-league-boots on the march of intellect. Messrs. Sterndale Bennett, W. H. Holmes, Lindsay Sloper, and others, have proved to the world that, when properly cultivated, and above all, when worthily encouraged, musical organisation is not only exotic but indigenous in this seagirt isle of fogs, and fashion, and foreigners."

First to be admired in the above extract is the metaphor of "native talent striding in seven-league-boots on a march." Second, the fact that "musical organisation when worthily encouraged can be exotic in an isle." Third, the three F's, and the problem of a "seagirt isle of foreigners," involved in the last dozen words of the paragraph. Lastly, the mysticism (worthy of Jacob Boehmer or the Trunkmaker) which envelopes the entire passage as in a haze. The passage, in short, is delicious; the man who sings "through his nose, and ears, and pupils," the "cursed" tenor of Rossini, (Fraschini), and the "egregious Pillet," are nothing to it. It is worthy of a place in one of C. J's windy effusions, that blow away public attention from The Fine Arts Journal. Can it be, that The Trunkmaker has got upon the Post and wields the pen of Jenkins? More unlikely things have happened, as the officer in the Strand, opposite Somerset House, and the clock which performs the double duty of telling the hour and the name of the paper to the passer-by, can testify. We shall have a peep into the Athenæum next week, and see what advance the testy Aristarchus of Wellington Street has been making in the study of Lindlémurrayism.

MUSICAL CRITICS AND CRITICISM.

From the "Liverpool Mail."

Appealing to feelings, and acting more or less upon all according to organization, the sway of music is allowed to be universal. Unfortunately few, if indeed any, are satisfied with the pleasurable emotions displayed in the science, even of the most artistic description. Music apparently possessing a peculiar power over its hearers, that of destroying any little diffidence the listeners may feel in the expression of opinions as to the excellence of compositions or executants—although ninety-nine are probably ignorant of the art, and the hundredth is incapable of analyzing that which he has heard—few would hesitate boldly to pass judgment upon effort in art far beyond their knowledge, and, as it frequently happens, the more stupid the ignorance, the more decided the fiat of the censor. Of the few at all competent to promulgate opinions upon musical effects, two-thirds, at least, are warped in judgement by the tendency of their studies to one particular point, or the bias of their taste inclining them to favour one style of music to the exclusion of all others. To the admirer of the graceful ballad a concerted piece is an infliction, and the critic who has been told the latter is the more difficult class of composition, sternly repudiates the enjoyment the trifle has really afforded him, and passes sentence on its innocent simplicity the higher to exalt his more favoured and weighty protégé. The devotee, enthusiastic in his attachment to instrumental music, votes vocalisation a bore and the champion of the song hurls back defiance and contempt upon all artificial organs of sound in use, forgotten, or to be invented. The amateur who has acquired a moderate command of the violin or violoncello, venerates the names of Spohr and Romberg, and, at the mention of a symphony by Beethoven, indulges in shakes of the seat of knowledge that would do honour to a Bursar. This is, at all events, an assumed veneration of recognised genius and high artistic excellence; but the lack of proper knowledge is in general, as lamentable as in the case of the knight of the ballad or the champion of the vocal concerted piece. These remarks upon the ignorance and prejudice of musical commentators are prefatory to a few observations on the knowledge requisite to form a competent musical critic. To judge minutely of excellence in any branch of art requires both study and experience; yet how few of our censors in affairs musical possess either of these qualifications! Instrumentalists, whose ideas are carried away in a vortex of execution, a whirlwind of demisemiquavers, frequently cannot appreciate true excellence in a vocalist. The singer, in his capacity a finished artist, is, in turn, by want of knowledge, unable properly to estimate the mechanical skill of the instrumental performer. The true critic should be able to estimate the clearness and flexibility of the voice, articulation of words, taste in embellishment, neatness in execution, and judicious expression; he should possess, moreover, a fine and cultivated ear to detect imperfection of intonation. The perfections of instrumental performance can be accurately appreciated only by such as are themselves performers either upon the instrument used, or one in some degree analogous to it. Difficulties insurmountable on one instrument, may upon another be executed with perfect facility. Brilliant execution, may indeed, be appreciated by the many, but the amount of difficulty mastered in the performance will be estimated by few. It follows, then, that few are really competent judges of instrumental excellence. A finished performer will aim at all the perfections of the vocalist, save, of course, the articulation of words. The absence of this all-powerful mean of expression renders the acquirement of a sentimental style of delivery one of tenfold difficulty. Tone, where its production depends upon the performer, must be regarded, when really good, as a chief excellence. It is now too frequently sacrificed to obtain facility of execution; but the impracticability of uniting the two by no means follows. If one qualification must be weakened, it is better to please the enlightened than to astonish the uninitiated. One of the principal excellencies in a vocalist, or instrumentalist, and one but little understood, is correct phrasing, which imparts a charm felt by all, but which few are able to define. To criticise composition a knowledge of the science is absolutely necessary; yet, how many send forth their opinions through the medium of the press on the writing of an opera, an oratorio, or a symphony, without the most remote idea of a solitary rule by which the art is governed, or of the manner in which instrumental effects, by skilful combinations, are produced. In no art would such a continuous display of consummate ignorance and assumption be tolerated. The rigorous precepts of counterpoint, occasionally infringed, when composing in a free style, might as well to such persons be the guides for the erection of the pyramids: movement of parts, parallel, contrary, or oblique, commands for the evolutions of militia field days. Harmony, modulation, ingenious contrivance, novel instrumentation, unity of design in connected composition, all are unappreciated, and the labour of months flippantly disposed of in a few remarks incorrect in their conclusions, and mystified, it may be, with a few technical expressions invariably misapplied. It is a bane of the science and its followers that it must labour against the freely expressed condemnation or (worse) the exaggerated praise of every ignoramus. In other arts the opinions of its professors are listened to with something approaching respect, but in music the gentleman who can perform Drouet's variations on "God save the Queen,"—an air of De Beriot on the violin, or give an embellished edition of the hundredth psalm on the organ—stands boldly forth, competent, in his own opinion, to overpower in argument a host. The low state of musical literature is greatly to be regretted; in fact, the art progresses, but exists without one. The increase of musical taste, however, demands a correspondent improvement in review, and it only requires exertion in proper quarters to render it respectable, instead of ridiculous, and serviceable, in place of being detrimental, to the progress of the art.

S. M. K.

M. STEVENIERS.

We extract from one or two journals remarks on the performance of M. Steveniers, a violinist, who, if we believe the accounts we read, promises to become one of the bright stars of the constellation, whose chief luminaries are already exhibited to us, in De Beriot, Ernst, Vieuxtemps, Sivori, Molique, &c. The Belgique Musicale, alluding to his performance at a concert in Antwerp, thus speaks of Mone. Steveniers:—"M. Steveniers is one of the most distinguished violinists of the age. At present he is not sufficiently known; but most assuredly he will, some future day, shine bright among the brightest of his compeers. Since the days of Paganini we have not heard singing on the violin so purely, so correctly, and so delicately rendered, as we heard from M. Steveniers at this concert. He performed a concertino of his own composition, upon notes from the Sirène, and the arpegges of Vieuxtemps. The first of these morceaux is a faithful translation of all that is lovely and gracious in this charming opera. The arpegges are morceaux of surpassing difficulty. M. Steveniers interpreted both the one and the other with an art, a taste, and an accuracy that could not be exceeded. The applauses and the bravos of the listeners testified their enthusiastic admiration for the violinist." In a Dutch newspaper we have the following notice:—"M. Steveniers is unwearied in his professional travels. On the 12th of December he performed in a concert at Felix Meritis, (no pun, we believe), and obtained well-merited applause for the elegance and brilliancy of his performance. A few days afterwards, he was playing at Rotterdam, at Dondrecht, where he was heard in a charming Fantaisie, entitled Le Souvenir, an elegie of his own composition, and a solo, La Sirène, also composed by him, which produced a great effect. At Haerlem his success was equally assured, and he obtained the admiration of the public, as well as the praises of all the artists who heard him. M. Steveniers performed shortly after at Amsterdam, in the Theatre Italien, where the favour he received was at least tantamount to any that was previously bestowed upon him." Another journal informs us that M. Steveniers is at Berlin, where he performed at a concert, in the presence of their Majesties the King and Queen, who thereupon were so delighted with the young violinist as to engage him for the first concert at Court. Verily, all these praises and compliments incline us much to hear M. Steveniers, that we ourselves may do homage to his talents. We have little doubt we shall ere long have to record his first performance before a British public.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(From our own Correspondent.)

THE grand festival for the relief of the poor of this city (the performance of which has created the most intense interest among professors and amateurs) took place on Friday evening, the 5th instant, in the round room of the Rotunda, before an audience densely crowded, and comprising the principal rank, beauty, and fashion of the metropolis. There could not have been less than sixteen hundred persons present, and hundreds were dismissed, who could not obtain admission, owing to the crowded state of the room. Israel in Egypt, the choral masterpiece of the immortal Handel, was the oratorio selected by the committee of management; and a more judicious choice could not have been made, inasmuch as they had at their command an orchestra consisting of upwards of 250 performers, composed exclusively of the principal professors and amateurs of this city. At half past eight o'clock precisely, (the hour named for commencing) his excellency the Earl of Beesborough, with the Ladies Ponsonby, and suite, entered the room, when, after having played "God save the Queen," the orchestra commenced the overture.

The following is condensed from an excellent critique of the performance, which appeared in Saunders' News Letter of the following day:—

"His Excellency, as the Patron, and the Rev. the Provost, as Vice-President, with the distinguished body of directors, occupied reserved seats most remote from, and opposite to, the orchestra. The President, the Duke of Leinster, was prevented from being present by the death of a noble relative; but his Grace, in a pecuniary way, largely patronised the charitable undertaking. Most of the vocal and instrumental professors gave their valuable assistance on this occasion gratuitously, and those who did accept of terms made a large reduction. Mr. Telford, of Stephen's-green, built the organ, and gave the use of it as his contribution to the cause. The performing members of the following eight societies united in the preparations for this concert:—

The Hibernian Catch Club.—President, The Right Hon. the Lord Chief Justice; vice-president, The Chief Remembrancer, A. Lyle, Esq.; secretary, Robert Jager, Esq.

The Anacreontic Society.—President, His Grace the Duke of Leinster; secretary, S. J. Figott, Esq. Modern lyre, in silver, on azure tablet.

The Philharmonic Society.—Secretary and conductor, Henry Russell, Esq. A lyre and wreath of shamrocks, in silver, on dark green velvet.

The University Choral Society.—Patron, His Grace the Lord Primate, vice-chancellor of the University; president, The Reverend the Provost; secretary, Lancelot Studdert, Esq.; conductor, Robert P. Stewart, Esq. The Arms of Trinity College, in gold on azure velvet.

The Orpheus Society.—Secretary, J. T. Willis, Esq.; conductor, Thomas Yeakley, Esq. An open lyre in silver, pendent from an azure ribbon.

The Amateur Harmonic Society.—Secretary, Charles Ball, Esq.; conductor, John W. Glover, Esq. A modern lyre in gold, on scarlet velvet.

The Amateur Melopoeic Society.—Secretary, John M'Curdy, Esq.; conductor, William Murphy, jun., Esq. A modern lyre and olive-branch wreath, surmounted by the rising sun in gold, on ruby velvet.

The Dublin Madrigal Society.—President, The Right Honourable the Lord Chancellor; secretary, C. W. Calfthurs, Esq.; conductor, Gustavus

L. Geary, Esq. An ancient lyre and wreath of laurel in silver, on azure velvet.

Several individual members and associates of the following societies kindly came forward to assist in the performance:—

The Society of Antient Concerts.—President, His Grace the Lord Primate; vice-president, The Right Hon. the Lord Chief Justice. A harp in gold, on dark green velvet.

The Ladies' Choral Society.—Conductor, Joseph Lidal, Esq. The Irish harp, with shamrocks in gold, geranium-coloured ribbon.

The Philharmonic Brass Band.—Secretary, William Shaw, Esq.; leader, Thomas W. Wilkinson, Esq. Two trumpets, saltier-wise, in silver, pendent from a white ribbon.

The stewards bore white wands, and wore rosettes of white ribbon. The festival opened with the overture from Handel's oratorio, 'Esther.' The execution, under the conductorship of Mr. Robert P. Stewart, and the leadership of Mr. Richard Levey, were admirable."

Israel in Egypt was performed entirely from Mr. Sarman's edition, but without Mr. Perry's additional accompaniments, whereby musical Dublin read musical London a lesson, which should be learned by rote at Exeter Hall. The vocalists, who exerted themselves most efficiently, were Mr. Gustavus L. Geary and Mr. Rooke, (tenors) Mr. James Hill, (alto) Messrs. William and Joseph Robinson, (basses) Mr. Thomas Blanchard, Misses Searle and De la Vega. The band and the chorus were in excellent training. Mr. Stewart conducted; Mr. Levey led the first part, and Mr. James Barton the second. The following is the sum up of Saunders' News Letter :—

"In conclusion, we may observe that for many years we have not seen a concert which was so well attended. A very great number of persons who were willing to pay for admission were unavoidably refused, as the number of tickets exceeded the accommodation that could be afforded to them. We know not whether most to praise the philanthropy which actuated so many distinguished personages to leave their homes in this inclement season, (if, indeed, such a musical banquet could be considered even by them a sacrifice or an inconvenience) or the benevolence which prompted so many holding high rank in private society, and as connected with amateur societies, to join in the business of the evening, which necessarily required many rehearsals and individual preparation. The stewards, who were, we believe, composed of members of the different societies, contributed in every possible way to the comfort and accommodation of the audience. The oratorio was concluded at a seasonable hour."

The audience paid the most undivided attention and maintained the strictest silence during the entire performance; and it is the unanimous opinion of critics here that it was the most successful performance in this city since the festival of 1831. In order to accommodate those persons who were disappointed in obtaining admission to the first performance, the committee have determined on having a second on Friday next. Indeed, the unprecedented success which attended their efforts induces me to cherish a hope that Dublin ere long will not be without its annual festival. May that day not be far distant.

C. B.

9th February, 1847.

P. S.—Madame Bishop has since appeared at the Theatre Royal, and at once established herself as an immense favourite with the good folks of our city who had the luck to hear her. Madame Bishop's voice is a soprano of the very purest quality. Her tones are flute-like and silvery and are so brilliant that one might fancy they sparkled. She made her first appearance in Balfe's Maid of Artois, on Tuesday evening, and her performance altogether justifies the highest encomiums of the London journals. The part of Isoline is a very arduous one, but Madame Bishop surmounted every difficulty, and seemed to court obstacles for no other reason than to show with what ease she could overleap them. She is really a magnificent artist and a most enchanting singer. Her embellishments are novel and exceedingly graceful, and executed with such celerity and certainty as no one can imagine who has not heard her. The Freeman's Journal, of Wednesday, gives a very good notice of Madame Bishop's performance, with most of which I cordially agree. The following remarks, especially, struck me as being just:—"Her notes come with thrilling power on the ear—her compass is very great—indeed she appeared to have some difficulty in restraining her powers within the limits of our theatre—she has a fine clear intonation, and this quality appeared to perfection in the recitative, where she particularly shone. We do not wonder that in Drury Lane, where her voice had its full range, she caused such furor." I agree fully with the observations. Next week I shall send you further news about Madame Bishop, trusting you will find room for my postscriptum, which was penned at the eleventh hour.

AMATEUR MUSICAL SOCIETY.

THE first performance of the above Society, took place on the evening of Friday, the 4th inst., at the Musical Hall, Store-street. The performances consisted of Rossini's overture to L. Italiana in Algieri; Beethoven's symphony in C., No. 1; a selection from the opera of Don Giovanni, arranged for the orchestra, by Signor Negri; a symphony of Haydn's in G; and Weber's overture to Preciosa. Nearly eighty performers, principally amateurs, were the interpreters. The Hon. George Cadogan undertook the part of one of the bassoons, and Lord Arundel played the trumpet. The Duke of Leinster, who was announced as one of the contra-bassi, was absent from indisposition. Among the professionals present we noticed H. Blagrove, W. Blagrove, H. Hill, and Kreutzer, violins; Hill, tenor; Hatton, violoncello; C. Severn, double-bass; Nicholson and Horton, bassoons; Boose and Baddely, clarionets; C. Harper and Rae, horns; T. Harper, trumpet; Healey, trombone; and Goodwin and Seymour, drums. It does not come within our province to criticise closely amateur performances even though there be a good sprinkling of professors among the executants. We may however state, that the concert reflected the greatest credit on the Society, and gave universal satisfaction to a numerous and fashionable assembly. It would have been impossible for any band to have gone through their performances indifferently, under the guidance of such a conductor as Mr. Balfe. A prospectus has been issued in which the following Friday evenings are set aside for rehearsals, when members of the orchestra only are admissible; viz., the 12th and 26th inst.; March 12th and 26th. The concerts in the subscription, will be held on the Fridays following; February the 19th; March 5th and 19th; April 9th, 16th, and 30th; May 7th, 14th, 21st and 28th.

CONCERTS.

MR. ALLCROFTS' MONSTER ANNUAL CONCERT took place on Tuesday evening in the Lyceum theatre, and was in every respect indeed a monster concert. There was a monster bill which contained a monster programme, in which no less than fifty (a monster number) morceaux were announced to be sung or played by artists of monster reputation. Then there was a monster orchestra, which performed monster overtures of monster composers, and to conclude, there was a monster audience, who enjoyed themselves with monster delight. In fact, every thing was monstrous, not monstrous. The vocal department consisted of the following:—Mesdames Albertazzi and F. Lablache; the Misses Bassano, E. Birch, A. Williams, M. Williams, Steele, Reynell, Hill, Sabilla Novello, and M. B. Hawes; the Messrs. Allen, Harrison, H. Phillips, Henry Russell, Guibilei, Sinclair, F. Lablache, Brizzi, and John Parry. The instrumentalists numbered, Madame Dulcken (piano), Mr. Benedict, (piano), Mr. Chatterton, (harp), Mr. R. Blagrove, (concertina), Master Thirlwall, (violin), Mr. Gratton Cooke, (oboe), and Mr. T. Harper, (cornet-a-piston). In addition to the above the Lantun Ethiopian Serenaders, were engaged and appeared between the parts. The concert was divided into three parts, each part containing sixteen morceaux, or thereabouts; so that it may be imagined that although the entertainments commenced at seven, they could not have been terminated before the night was far advanced. The concert was further elongated by the numerous encores, with which the enraptured auditors of the Lyceum witnessed the performance. Almost every thing was encored. Indeed in some instances the encores were persisted in before singer or performer had finished, and he, or she, had to commence the morceaux de novo. The house was crowded to suffocation. Signor Negri and Mr. Lavenu conducted by turns.

THE GREENWICH AND BLACKHEATH AMATEUR MUSICAL SOCIETY gave the second of their annual series of concerts, in the Railway Station Room, at Greenwich, which was exceedingly well attended. The vocalists were, the Misses Williams, and Mr. John Parry. Mr. Distin and his four Sons, performed several morceaux on the sax-tubas. Haydn's grand symphony in C, an overture by Romberg, and Winter's overture to Zaira, were well rendered by a small, but efficient band, under the direction of Mr. Dando. The following distinguished amateurs assisted in the orchestra:—the Hon. Major Legge (violoncello,) Mr. Brookelbank, (violin,) Mr. Wanoshockt, (contra-basso,) and the Messrs. Finch, (violas,) Mr. Edward Blackshaw, presiding at the (piano-forte.)

MRS. ALEXANDER NEWTON, AND MR. GEORGE CASE gave their annual concert at the London Tavern, on Monday evening last. We have much pleasure in recording the success which attended these clever artists. Mrs. A. Newton sung Meyerbeer's difficult cavatina, "Robert toi que j'aime;" a Scotch ballad, "Bonnie Prince Charlie;" and the Polacca, from Puritani. She was warmly applauded in the first piece, and encored in the Polacca, a compliment she well merited. Mr. George Case played a Fantasia, of his own composition, on the concertina; likewise performed a solo on the violin, by De Beriot, in which he displayed a beautiful tone, and brilliant execution. The vocal and instrumental artists who assisted on this occasion were, Madame F. Lablache, Miss E. Ware, Miss Rainforth, Signor F. Lablache, Mr. W. Harrison, Mr. N. T. Sporie, Mr. John Parry, Messrs. J. Ward, R. Blagrove, and J. Case. Mr. Howard Glover presided at the piano-forte. The room was crowded.

MR. DANDO'S Second Quartet Concert was held at Crosby-hall, in the Throne Room, on Monday evening. The room was tolerably well filled, in spite of the weather, the scheme of the concert presenting a fund of legitimate attraction. The following is the programme:—

PART I.—Quartet in G Minor, No. 2, (Op. 4.) for two violins, viola, and violoncello, Spohr. Messrs. Dando, Gattie, W. Thomas, and Lucas. Cantata, Miss Messent, "The Song of the Quail," Beethoven. Quartet in A Major (No. 5) for two violins, viola, and violoncello, Beethoven. Messrs. Dando, Gattie, W. Thomas, and Lucas.

PART II.—Trio in B Flat Major, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, Mozart. Messrs. Benedict, Dando, and Lucas. Song, Miss Messent, "Scenes of my youth," (The Gipsy's Warning) Benedict. Quartet in E Flat Major, (Op. 12) for two violins, viola, and violoncello, Mendelssohn. Messrs. Dando, Gattie, W. Thomas, and Lucas.—Conductor. Mr. Benedict.

The Quartet of Spohr is quiet and unpretending, unlike his late productions of that class, but indicating all that might be expected from his more mature age. It is very simple in construction, and comprises little more difficulties for the violin than some of Mozart's Quartets, although somewhat inclining to the "Solo." Spohr, when he wrote it, was evidently thinking of Mozart. The slow movement, a cantabile principally for violin and violoncello, was much fancied. The Quartet altogether went satisfactorily.* Miss Messent gave Beethoven's song with great sweetness. This young lady is much improved of late, both in voice and style. Her singing on this occasion was a finished performance. She was deliciously accompanied on the piano by Benedict. The Quartet of Beethoven, which followed, is one of the most attractive compositions of the great master, and was splendidly performed, Mr. Dando's violin playing being remarkable for the brilliancy and purity of its tone, and its thorough interpretation of the meaning of the composer. He was loudly applauded in one of the variations of the slow movement. Messrs. Gattie, W. Thomas, and Lucas, supported their classical reputation throughout the concert. An apology was made by Mr. Dando for Mr. Benedict, on the score of indisposition, nevertheless that excellent musician performed his part in Mozart's trio most delightfully, such as might be expected from the favorite pupil of Weber. The larghetto was played with great effect by the three executants. The graceful and plaintive song from The Gipsy's Warning, was rendered with exceeding taste by Miss Messent, and was much applauded. The Quartet of Mendelssohn was decidedly the great feature of the evening. The performers appeared to be summoned to their chiefest task, and laboured à merveille in its accomplishment. We have rarely heard more exquisite music more exquisitely executed. The whole Quartet (one of its composer's very early works) produced an immense effect. The canzonetta, as a matter of course, was encored with enthusiasm. Thus a brilliant concert terminated with brilliant effect, the entire audience remaining captivated to the last note. Mr. Dando deserves the highest credit for his taste and judgment in the selection of the programme. The next concert will be held on Monday, the 22nd inst.

* It has been published by Messrs. Duff and Hodgson as a pianoforte duet.

MADAME DULCKEN'S SECOND SOIREE.—The very inclement weather had little power in influencing the fashionable visitors who usually attend the classical meetings of Madame Dulcken, whose saloons, although not crowded, were brilliantly attended on Wednesday evening, to listen to the programme of vocal and instrumental music, which follows:—

FIRST PART.—Quintett, No. 11, in B flat major, two violins, viola, violoncello, and contra-basso, Messrs. Blagrove, Ruckner, Hill, Lucas, and Howell, Onslow. Aria, "Madamina, il catalogo è questo," Signor Fred. Lablache (Don Giovanni), Mozart. Quintuor, E flat minor, pianoforte, violin, viola, violoncello, and contra-basso. Madame Dulcken, Messrs. Blagrove, Hill, Lucas, and Howell, Hummel. Aria, "Adelaide," Signor Marras, Beethoven. Duet, the Misses Williams, Mendelssohn. Grand Sonata, pianoforte and violin, Madame Dulcken and Mons. Sainton, Beethoven.

SECOND PART.—Capriccio, pianoforte, with accompaniments, Madame Dulcken, Messrs. Blagrove, Ruckner, Jay, Webb, Hill, Lucas, Goodban, Howell, &c., Mendelssohn. Aria, "Notte tremenda," Madame F. Lablache, Morlacchi. Trio, "Night's lingering shades," the Misses Williams, (Zelmira), Spohr. Rondo Brillante, pianoforte, "La Gaieté," Weber. Tarantella, pianoforte, Chopin.—Madame Dulcken. Duet, Signori Marras and F. Lablache, (Guillaume Tell), Rossini.—Conductor, Mr. Charles Horsley.

Onslow's Quintett, a composition evincing much of the usual cleverness, and more of the usual dryness of the author, was nevertheless performed with spirit and accuracy, and apparently pleased the majority of the audience. Signor Lablache sang the "Madamina" in a style that more than once reminded us of his incomparable sire. Hummel's quintetto, albeit the first movement is a laboured treatment of an uninteresting theme, is on the whole one of his most capital works; the Scherzo is full of fancy, and the finale is splendidly written. Madame Dulcken rendered the pianoforte part in a style that must have satisfied the most fastidious Hummelite present, and was efficiently backed by the quartett of stringed instruments. Neither Signor Marras nor the Misses Williams made their appearance while we were present, in consequence of which Madame F. Lablache sung the air of "Morlacchi" immediately after the quintett. This intelligent vocalist did not render herself justice by the selection of so dull and tedious a composition, which no singer could make effective. It is unnecessary to say anything in favour of Beethoven's sonata "The Kreutzer," or its interpretation by such artists as Madame Dulcken and M. Sainton. The applause as usual was warm and unanimous. The Capriccio of Mendelssohn is incorrectly so styled; it is the well known Rondo brilliant in B minor, one of his most effective works. Madame Dulcken performed the pianoforte part very brilliantly, but the want of an orchestra was severely felt; a quartett of stringed instruments being a poor substitute for the original. Weber's sparkling rondo, and the popular tarantella in A flat of Chopin, were excellently suited to Madame Dulcken's style of playing. The rest of the concert we did not hear. Mr. Charles Horsley conducted the vocal morceaux in a musician-like manner.

HENRY PHILLIPS.—This popular singer sustained a concert, single-handed, at the Horns, Kennington, on Thursday evening, with great success. In spite of weather the attraction had filled the concert-room and never had artist less to complain of as regards coldness on the part of his audience. At least one half of the programme was encored, and when in answer to the rapturous demand for a repetition of his celebrated "Laughing song" he gave "Dandy Jem of Carolina," with an imitation of the banjo on the pianoforte, the applause was boundless. "Widow Machree" also came in for one of the prizes of the evening; it was re-demanded with an unanimity of which none but those who are acquainted with Kennington audiences can form any but a faint idea. It is with pleasure that we record the suburban triumph of this great and deservedly popular artist, and feel certain that it will be by no means the last we shall have to register as taking place at Kennington, for never was singer, single-handed, better received or more warmly shown by an audience with how much pleasure they filled his concert-room, than Henry Phillips, on this occasion.

THE AFFINITIES.

from the German of Goethe.

Continued from page 86.

PART II.—CHAPTER I.

In common life we often meet that, which, in an epic poem, we are accustomed to commend as an artifice of the poet's, namely, the circumstance, that when the principal figures are removed, concealed, or abandon themselves to inactivity, their place is supplied by a second or third person, hitherto scarcely observed, who while he puts forth his whole activity, appears to us worthy of attention, of sympathy, and even of praise and blame.

Thus immediately after the departure of the captain and Edward the importance of the architect daily increased. On him alone depended the arrangement and execution of the many undertakings, and he showed himself accurate, intelligent, and active, while he assisted the ladies in various ways, and entertained them in quiet wearisome moments. His outward appearance was such as to inspire confidence, and awaken regard; he was a youth, in the most thorough sense of the word, well-made, slender, perhaps a little too tall, modest without being embarrassed, confident without being obtrusive. He readily undertook any work requiring care and trouble, and as he could reckon with great facility, none of the affairs of the house were kept secret from him, and his beneficial influence was everywhere diffused. He generally had the office of receiving strangers and he would either ward off an unexpected visit, or at any rate so prepare the ladies, as to prevent them from suffering any inconvenience.

Among other matters, much trouble was given him by a young lawyer, who, being sent by a nobleman in the neighbourhood, brought under discussion a matter, which though of no special importance, intimately concerned Charlotte. It is necessary to note this circumstance, because it gave an impulse to several things, which would otherwise have remained perfectly quiet.

We remember the alteration in the church-yard undertaken by Charlotte. All the monuments were removed from their sites, and had been placed in the wall, by the sole of the church. The space left was made even, with the exception of a broad path which led to the church, and farther on, to a gate on the opposite side; all the ground was sown with different sorts of clover, the verdure and blossom of which had a most beautiful effect. The new graves were to be arranged in a certain order, beginning from the end of the ground, but the place was again to be levelled, and to be sown in a similar manner. No one could deny that, when the people went to the church on Sundays and holidays, this arrangement produced a cheerful and imposing appearance. Even the clergyman, who, being advanced in years and inured to old customs, had not been particularly satisfied with the plan, now felt great delight, when sitting at his back-door, under the old linden trees, like Philemon with his Baucis, he saw before him a beautiful variegated carpet of verdure, instead of a number of uneven graves.

Besides this same carpet was serviceable to his household establishment, as Charlotte had secured the use of the piece of ground to the parsonage.

Nevertheless, many members of the congregation had already complained that the indication of the spot where their forefathers reposed had been removed, and that thus their memory had, as it were, been obliterated. The monuments now so well preserved showed, indeed, who was buried, but not where the body lay, and, as many maintained, the "where" was the important point.

This was the opinion of a neighbouring family, who had many years before reserved for themselves and theirs a certain spot in the general place of burial, and in consideration thereof, had made a little bequest to the church. Now, the young lawyer had been sent to recal this bequest, and to show that no more payments would be made, the conditions having been broken for the interest of one party, and without any regard to representations or remonstrances. Charlotte, who had caused the alterations, wished herself to speak with the young man, who warmly, though not inconsiderately laid down the arguments of himself and his client, and thus gave the party at the castle plenty to think about.

"You see," he said after a short introduction, in which he contrived to justify his intrusiveness, "you see that the highest and the lowest are alike concerned in marking the spot where their relatives are buried. The poorest peasant who buries a child, finds a sort of consolation in placing a slight wooden cross upon the grave, and decorating it with a garland, that the memorial may at least last as long as the pain, even if such a monument, as well as the grief itself, is finally destroyed by time. Persons in easy circumstances substitute iron for wood, and adopt many modes of securing and protecting the crosses, thus obtaining a durability for many years. But as even these iron crosses finally sink and become invisible, people of property have no more expedient method than that of setting up a stone, which promises to last for many generations, and which can be renovated and repaired by posterity. Nevertheless it is not the stone which is the attraction, but that which is laid beneath it—which is confided to the earth. The question is not so much concerning the memorial, as concerning the person himself—is not so much a question of memory as of something present. I feel that I can much more heartily embrace a dead person who is dear to me in the grave-mound than in the mere monument. The thing in itself is but little, but around it, as around a boundary-stone, should be gathered husbands, wives, relations, friends, even after their own decease, and the living should have the right of removing strangers and enemies from the side of the beloved one who is at rest.

"Hence I contend that my client is fully justified in recalling the gift; nay, he even acts handsomely in confining himself to this, for the members of the family are injured in a manner for which nothing can compensate. They must give up the sweet though painful feeling of bringing an offering to the dead whom they love—as well as the consoling hope that they may one day repose with them."

"The affair is not important enough," replied Charlotte, "to incur the trouble of a lawsuit. I so little repent of what I have done, that I will make good the loss which the church has incurred. And I must honestly confess that your arguments have not convinced me. The pure feeling of a final universal equality, at least after death, seems to me more consoling than this obstinate, rigid continuance of our personalities, contingencies, and worldly relations. What is your opinion?" she said to the architect.

"I would," he answered, "rather not engage in such a controversy, nor give the casting vote. Let me modestly confine myself to that which more immediately concerns my art and my own way of thinking. Since we are no longer so happy as to press to our bosom the remains of a beloved person inclosed in an urn—since we are no longer rich or cheerful enough to preserve them entire in large decorated sarcophagi—nay, since we do not now even find a place in the churches for ourselves and those who belong to us, but are taken into the open air, we have all just cause, my lady, to approve the mode which you have introduced. If the members of a congregation are placed together in rows, they certainly repose by and among those who belong to them; and as the earth must, after all, receive us, I find nothing more natural or more orderly than that the mounds which have only risen accidentally, and which are gradually sinking, should be levelled without delay, and thus the covering, being borne by all, should be made lighter for every one."

"Then is all to pass away without any memorial, without anything that appeals to the memory?" objected Ottilia.

"By no means" continued the architect. "It is not the memorial, but only the particular spot that is to be abandoned. The architect and the sculptor find it greatly to their interest, that man should look for a duration of existence from their art and from their hand, and for this very reason, I wish that well devised and well-executed monuments may be not scattered about singly and at random, but set up in a place that will ensure durability. Since even the pious and persons of rank have resigned the privilege of reposing personally within the church, let us at least have there, or in elegant halls about the cemeteries, monumental signs and inscriptions. A thousand forms might be devised for them, and they might be decorated according to a thousand fashions."

"If artists are so rich" observed Charlotte. "answer me this: How is it that we never get out of the shape of a small obelisk, a truncated column, or a funeral urn? Instead of the thousand inventions of which you vaunt, I have only seen a thousand repetitions."

"That is the case I admit," returned the architect, "but not always. Besides a special affair may be made of the feeling and suitable application. In this case, it is particularly difficult to give a cheerful aspect to a solemn place, so as not to be gloomy, even when the matter itself is joyless. I have made a large collection of sketches for all descriptions of monuments, and will show them when occasions serve, but the finest monument is, after all, the likeness of the man himself. This, more than anything else, gives a notion of what he is; it is the best text for a few or many notes, only it ought to be made in the person's best time, which is usually missed. No one thinks of preserving living forms, and even if this is done, it is done in an insufficient manner. A cast is quickly taken from a dead body. The mask is set upon a block, and this, forsooth, is called a bust. How seldom is it in the power of the artist to give it complete animation!"

"Without knowing it or intending it," remarked Charlotte, "you have given the conversation a turn quite in my favour. The likeness of a man is perfectly independent; wherever it stands, it stands on its own account, and we do not require that it should mark the actual place of interment. But shall I make to you a strange confession? I have a certain aversion from likenesses themselves, for they always seem to be making me a silent reproach; they point to something remote, something that has departed, and remind me how difficult it is to pay due honour to the present. If we bear in mind how many persons we have seen and known, and then acknowledge how little we have been to them, and they to us, what are our feelings! We meet the witty without being amused, the learned without increasing our learning, the traveller without acquiring information, and the affectionate without giving them pleasure. And, alas! this is not merely the case with passing acquaintance. Societies and families behave in the same manner to their dearest members, cities to their most worthy citizens, subjects to their most excellent princes, and nations to their most estimable men. I once heard the question asked, why we so unscrupulously speak well of the dead, but only speak well of the living with a certain degree of caution? The answer was, because we have nothing to fear from the former, while the latter may somewhere cross our path. So impure is our regard for the memory of others. It is generally a more selfish sport, even if it should be a matter of sacred earnest to preserve in full operation all relations with the survivors."

(To be continued.)

. To avoid misunderstanding, it may be stated that the copyright of this translation belongs solely to the translator.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

HAYMARKET.—The new comedy, The School for Scheming, has undergone a considerable cutting since the first night of its performance, and is much improved in consequence. The second act, which, greatly to the weariness of the spectator, occupied nearly fifty minutes, is now all the better for the pruning it has received, and compasses little more than half that time. Throughout the entire comedy we have noticed with pleasure this judicious lopping. Portions of the dialogue that hung heavy on the first night have been removed, and modifications have been resorted to, which tend to make the play more dramatic and interesting. The points, and sparkles, and epigrams, and repartees, appear now in a better light; and from the concision the comedy has undergone, tread quicker on each others heels, and heighten the mirth of the audience. We have not the least doubt that The School for Scheming will have a long run and continue to draw large houses. The opinion we formed of the drama on its first representation has not been altered by seeing it a second time in an improved state. If any thing we are rather inclined to think more favourably of The School for Scheming, than on our first witnessing it. The theatre is crowded every night, and the comedy is received with roars of laughter. We shall give an accurate analysis of The School for Scheming when the book is sent us for review. In the meanwhile we offer Mr. Webster our heartiest thanks for producing this season a second English comedy, and for his perseverance in upholding the legitimate drama. We trust the public will not be backward in supporting so spirited and enterprising a manager. Mr. Webster has effected more in the cause of the British stage, and has done more for our native writers than any single manager within our recollection. Such a theatrical administration demands the gratitude and support of the public at large. The Invisible Prince is performed every night, and has not lost an iota of its attractions.

PRINCESS'S.—On Tuesday evening Bellini's opera seria, Norma, was produced at this theatre for the double purpose of exhibiting Miss Bassano in a new character, and introducing a young debutante to a London theatrical audience, in the person of Miss Anne Romer. The latter young lady has acquired no small degree of popularity in the provinces by her concert singing. At Manchester, Liverpool, and other places, she has made herself a great favourite with the public; and all the journals, without an exception, have spoken highly in her praise. Miss Anne Romer, who, by the way is a sister of Mr. Travers, made her first appearance on the stage on Tuesday evening in Adalgisa. She is evidently new to the boards, and her inexperience as an actress, of necessity, considerably marred her debut. Her face is exceedingly expressive, and full of intelligence; her form slight, and, to our thinking, as yet too juvenile for principal parts in opera; her voice, a soprano, fresh and of a charming quality, while her intonation appears to us very correct. Miss Anne Romer's debut, on the whole, may be pronounced highly successful. She was received with immense applause, and was cheered repeatedly throughout her performance. Miss Bassano's Norma is vastly superior to her Anna Bolena. Whether it be that the music of Bellini is more submissive to her voice, than that of Donizetti, or that she has made rapid strides in her art lately, we cannot say, but Miss Bassano's performance on Tuesday evening was really admirable, and of a higher order than we were led to expect from what we had seen of her previously. The latter part of her Norma, especially, exhibited fine artistic powers combined with great energy. Her energy also was better regulated than when we first noticed her in Anna Bolena and did not, except on rare occasions, deviate into exaggeration. Miss Bassano has undoubtedly felt and considered the good advice that was proffered her by the journals, and she profited largely thereby. We are much pleased at this. It shows the lady is open to advice, when conscientiously given, and that she receives the notification of her faults, with no other feeling than a strong desire to amend them. With such talents, and such determination, Miss Bassano will assuredly become one of the greatest ornaments of our operatic stage. The opera of Norma was well got up, considering the available means of the establishment, and was excellently sung throughout. Mr. Leffler was impressive as the high priest, Oroveso, and sung the music allotted to him with effect. Mr. Allen's Pollio was an excellent performance, though the music did not seem to befit the capabilities of his voice, as well as the music of Percy. He gave the first cavatina, "O Adalgisa joyfully," very beautifully. The opera was listened to throughout with great delight. Mr. Maddox has done a great deal to bring about a taste for music, among certain sections of the public, by producing operas, which would never be produced elsewhere, by providing the best singers he could obtain to interpret that music, and by engaging at the head of his operatic establishment one of England's best musicians. Thus far Mr. Maddox has earned the gratitude of all musical classes, but he still has left undone much that ought to be done. It is impossible to give the requisite effect to operas without an efficient orchestra, and this certainly the Princess's theatre cannot boast of. We have not much fault to find with the band individually, but it lacks numerical force, and in such operas as Giselle, Anna Bolena, and Norma, appears lamentably deficient. We assure the enterprising manager of this theatre that we speak to him with a view solely to his advancement, convinced that if he were to step a little beyond his present line of operations, he would soon find the benefit that would accrue therefrom. There is another point upon which we would venture to offer counsel to the management of the Princess's, and that is, to eschew altogether the production of foreign operas, which are in every respect unsuited to our native singers, and bring them into invidious comparisons with other artists. The artists themselves may be led away with a notion that they are intended to fill up the place of a Malibran, or rival a Crispien; but even if they had well-grounded hopes to do one or the other, they had better make their greatness evident by original endeavours, than dream to do so by the hopeless attempt to supersede old and established favourites. The production of Loder's opera, Giselle, convinces us that our native singers should confine themselves to native music, and not wander into the mazes of the Italian school, alike unsuited to their style, their taste, and their physical means. We trust that ere long we shall have to congratulate Mr. Maddox on the production of such another opera as the Giselle of Edward Loder. We hear of good things likely to take place at the Princess's. Macready is engaged for a limited number of nights. Mademoiselle Nau will appear soon after Easter; and a new opera, by an established native composer, is in progress.

FRENCH PLAYS.—Since our last we have had the Docteur Noir, a melodrama of interminable length (seven acts)—a sufficiency of dullness, and an occasional good scene, giving full scope to the great powers of M. Frederick Lemaitre, and showing Mademoiselle Clarisse in a much more favourable light than any part she has hitherto undertaken. Plays in France are in general the production of a joint stock company, and to this we must attribute the feebleness of some of the parts as compared to the vigour displayed in others. We frankly confess our distaste for the so-called French drama. If we have occasionally to quarrel with the tameness of the pure classical school—and we must not be supposed to include Racine, Corneille, and Voltaire in our condemnation; we are merely alluding to the modern authors, their imitators at an immense distance, such as, for instance, the authors of Jeanne d'Arc, of five or six Virginies to our certain know-edge, and others—we are horror-struck with the monstrous creations of the modern school, followers of M. Victor Hugo, but whom they in no wise imitate, except in their exaggeration of his beauties, which they manage to transform into monstrous absurdities. With this frank confession we may be excused for having at times been led into a severity on the actor not merited to a certain degree, and which should more properly have fallen on the work of which he is merely the interpreter. The task of the critic, under these circumstances, is unusually arduous; for however well a passion may be rendered by the actor, he dare not give him his full meed of praise, if it be expressed in language which shocks his judgment and understanding. We are not prepared to affirm that the Docteur Noir deserves the condemnation we have just passed on the generality of pieces of this class; it is infinitely superior to the Dame de Saint Tropez. Its principal fault is its great length, but we are inclined to applaud it, inasmuch as it displays great honesty of purpose; it is a manly appeal against the prejudice of races, it is a fervent intercession for a much injured and unjustly proscribed portion of our fellow creatures, it is a severe and just castigation on colonial manners and customs. There is also some tact in the conception of the characters; the old marchioness is a good specimen of the old school who considered the blacks as people of a different espèce, the Chevalier de Sainte-Luce represents the young courtier of the reign of Louis XVIth to the life, and Barbantine is a fair specimen of the rich colonist before the revolution—proud and ignorant, conceited and arrogant, ostentatious and avaricious. A full detail of the plot would lead us to a review of each individual character, and indeed to a mere translation of the piece; we shall endeavour to give our readers an insight into it without annoying them with too minute particulars. The first act takes place at the Island of Bourbon, the period a few years before the first French revolution, at the house of Madame la Marquise de la Reynerie (Madame Grassau), widow of the late governor, who has living with her an only daughter Pauline (Mademoiselle Clarisse), and a niece Aurélie (Mademoiselle Khin); there is a grand fête at the government house, to which the principal personages of the island have been invited, men of colour rigorously excepted of course, but Aurélie, who does not share her aunt's prejudices, has taken upon herself to invite Fabien, Le docteur noir, whom she esteems without ever having seen him, but who is the subject of universal admiration from his skill in treating an epidemical disease which has exercised violent ravages in the island. On being informed of this invitation, the Marquise is violently wroth, and desires Barbantine (M. Cartigny) to expel him from the house without ceremony, should he dare to make his appearance. He does come, but is kindly received by Pauline and Aurélie, who furnish him with an excuse for withdrawing without insult. Barbantine indeed attempts to execute the office he has undertaken, but his arrogance falls before the doctor's coolness, and the latter departs in peace. The ball now takes place, and Pauline is invited to dance, by her cousin, the Chevalier de Sainte-Luce, banished from France for having killed a husband who had the audacity to discourage his attentions to his wife; but the disease has already extended its ravages to the highest parts of the island, and Pauline is the first attacked by it. She is immediately abandoned by all, except her mother and cousin, who implore the assistance of the flying attendants and slaves. When hope seems lost, Fabien appears led in by Lia (Mademoiselle Vallée) a young Mulatto-girl in Pauline's service. At first his services are haughtily refused by the Marquise; but the doctor disarms her prejudices by exclaiming: "Madame, let me cure her first, you can then expel me if you will." This was admirably given by Mr. Lemaitre, and drew down a burst of applause as the curtain slowly descended on the first act. The second act opens on the doctor's habitation, he is absent; and we learn from an old negro whom he has saved from the effects of the plague, and to whom he has given his liberty, that Fabien is quite an altered man; he has allowed a passion for Pauline to take possession of his heart; he is unfortunate, and passes his days wandering among the mountains, except when exercising the duties of his profession, especially to the poor, whom he attends in preference to all others. Barbantine, the Chevalier de Sainte-Luce, and Aurélie come to pay the doctor a visit, but not finding him at home, leave the house and are succeeded by Pauline, who has also come to thank him for his attention during her illness; the doctor arrives and she explains the motive of her visit, his heart is touched at her kindness and condescension, but is overwhelmed with bitterness when she offers him a purse.—"I thought you had been generous," he exclaims, in the fulness of his grief; but his joy returns when she explains that she merely considers the money as a charity deposited in his hands to relieve the wants of his poor clients. Pauline's visit has another object, it is to consult the doctor on the health of Lia, her faithful attendant. Lia is brought forward and in an eloquent scene, in which Mademoiselle Vallée displayed much feeling, he declares her malady incurable, for the poor girl loves a white man (Roger) the intendant of the Marquise. Pauline, however, resolves to effect the cure, and, in the course of the ensuing conversation, leads the doctor to suppose that she has perceived his passion, and returns it; she then departs on her mission of love and charity. Pauline is scarcely gone, when the old negro enters exclaiming that a man is attacked by a serpent; Fabien seizes a hatchet and rushes out; he returns leading the Chevalier, from whom he learns that he is about to be married to Pauline. The Chevalier leaves with a guide, and Fabien seizes his gun to fire on him, but a cross which he always wears, the last gift of his mother, inspires him with more generous sentiments. The third act takes place by the sea-side; the doctor and Pauline are together; Fabien has resolved to die, but not alone, and has allured Pauline to this place, from which escape is impossible when the tide is coming in. He now confesses his love, reproaches her with her pride and perfidy, and tells her the fate which awaits her; in vain she supplicates him to have mercy, to spare her life—he is inflexible; the sea ascends higher and higher—escape is now impossible. At this supreme moment Pauline confesses her love for the negro, and falls senseless into his arms. There was much good acting in this scene, rather exaggerated, perhaps, at times, by Mademoiselle Clarisse, but very affecting on the whole. In the fourth act, Pauline, miraculously saved by smugglers, resolves to marry Fabien; she communicates to him her determination; he refuses at first, but is eventually brought over to her purpose. They are united; but the union has scarcely been blessed by the priest, when she learns from her cousin that her mother has been saved from shipwreck, and wishes her to join her in France. Her anguish is extreme, but she obeys; and starts, accompanied by Fabien, whom she cannot muster courage to acknowledge as her husband, Lia, (her cousin) and the Chevalier de Sainte-Luce. The fifth act is the best of the piece; at a grand assembly of her friends and relations, the Marquise announces the marriage of Pauline with the Chevalier. The latter has some suspicion of her attachment for Fabien; and, in order to test it, resolves to accumulate every outrage upon him. At his request, the doctor, who inhabits the same house, is sent for and expelled. The Chevalier treats him with the utmost indignity, tramples him under foot, and, through his suggestion, the Marquise resolves to send him back to Bourbon. The Doctor breaks his sword in his rage; but Pauline cannot bear the ignominious treatment of her husband any longer—she breaks through all restraint, and declares her marriage to her mother. In this scene Mademoiselle Clarisse was truly great; her acting was natural, and told wonderfully—it was sublime. The old Marquise is horrified at the very idea of such degradation, and receives with transport the doctor's declaration that the secret shall remain buried between them, and that he will leave Paris for ever. Both Mademoiselle Clarisse and M. Lemaitre were called at the fall of the curtain to receive the congratulations of the audience, an honour which they certainly well deserved. The sixth act rises on the Bastille:—the chevalier is immured within its walls, for having insulted Barnave, a member of the States-General; but, underground, in the damp, gloomy vaults, we find Fabien, who has been confined there by a lettre de cachet at the request of the Marquise. Years had passed away and no tidings had reached him from without, when one day he recognized André at work on the ramparts, he raised his voice and was luckily heard. The young André, whose mother he had formerly saved, manages to throw a stone into his cell, to which a paper is attached; from this he learns that efforts will be made for his deliverance, and that a death has taken place at the Hotel de la Reynerie, but just as he is about to read the name the jailer enters and takes away his lamp by the governor's order. Fabien's despair is now greater than before; he fancies it is Pauline who is dead. But the revolution advances with rapid strides, the Bastille is taken and he is free, and learns that it is the Marquise and not Pauline who is dead. This sudden revulsion entirely overwhelms his feeble reason, weakened by solitary confinement, and he becomes mad. The seventh act passes in Brittany during the reign of Terror. Pauline has just escaped from prison, but her hiding-place has been denounced by André, who believes her the instrument of Fabien's captivity. Fabien is still mad; he recognises no one; not even his wife, who has confided her secret to the Chevalier and her cousin. By degrees, however, his reason returns, when the infuriated mob threatens to tear his wife to pieces, and finally he recovers it entirely, after having received a bullet fired at his wife by some one in the crowd. He, however, still has strength enough to declare the truth, and then dies. This act was also well managed, and created much enthusiasm. The two principal actors again bowed their thanks to the audience at the end of the piece. We must not omit to mention that the mise en scène was excellent, and the decorations in excellent keeping. Le Docteur Noir has been played thrice. Lemaitre will next appear in Les Mystères de Paris. J. DE C—E.

SONNET.

NO. XXI.

Look not as though some sorrow fill'd thy heart,
 Checking those smiles that once were wont to play
 Round thy sweet lips, so innocently gay,
 That thy pure soul was in a glance confess'd.
 Each look of sadness seems to me address'd,
 And in its quiet mournfulness to say
 'Twas I who chas'd thy happiness away,
 'Twas I who caus'd thee sorrow and unrest.
 Reproach me not, I suffer more than thou;
 Grief comes not o'er me as a gentle sadness,
 Killing each joy with soft but chilly breath;
 It fiercely rends my heart, it burns my brow,
 That I could shout aloud for very madness,
 Or rush for refuge to the arms of death.

N. D.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

MILAN.—The popular pianist, Emile Prudent, has been playing at the Philharmonic Society at Milan.

VIENNA.—Monsieur Lavigne, the celebrated oboist, has given a concert, at which he was well patronised—Madame Schuman late (Clara Weick,) has given several concerts at Vienna with great success. She intends giving concerts at Brun, Prague, Dresden, Leipzig, and Berlin. It is reported she intends visiting London during the approaching season. Jenny Lind has not yet sung in Meyerbeer's opera, The Camp of Silesia, the rehearsals of which are numerous, and the stage appointments, they say are being prepared with great splendour—Dohler, the pianist, is at Moscow, we understand he will visit Paris during the present season. M. Blaas, the celebrated clarionet player, has given concerts with success, and has departed en route for Cracow and Warsaw, with his wife—Balfé's popular opera, the Bohemian Girl, has met with great success, and will be immediately produced in Munich, Brunswick, Limberg, Hamburg, and several German Towns.

REVIEWS ON MUSIC.

"The Wild Free Wind," the Indian Maiden's Song; sung by Miss MARY KEELEY; the words by SHIRLEY BROOKS; and the music by ALEXANDER LEE. LEONI LEE AND CORHEAD.

Mr. Alexander Lee's ballad has already received its meed of popularity, by being frequently encored at the Lyceum, as it was warbled, very neatly, by Miss Mary Keeley, in Shirley Brooks' favourite burletta, The Wigwam. The song is written in the composer's best style, and is deserving the popularity it has already received. The poetry is neat and pointed. The frontispiece is accompanied by a lithograph, purporting to be a likeness of Miss Mary Keeley, as she appeared singing Mr. Alexander Lee's song in Coro, in The Wigwam. Were the song no better than the likeness, we could hardly have awarded it so much praise as we have done.

"Constancy; or, they say that other eyes are bright." Ballad; the poetry by DELTA; the music, dedicated to Miss WILSON, by T. M. MUDIE.—CHAMBER, BEALE, and Co., LONDON. WOOD and Co., EDINBURGH.

This is a model of what a ballad should be. Nothing could be more perfect. The melody is simple and vocal, and at the same time highly expressive. The accompaniment displays the art of a thorough musician while it never outrages propriety by affected and unnecessary elaboration. The words are good and develop without effort a sentiment which is agreeably natural and poetical. The key of the song is A flat; the melody comes within the range of ordinary voices, and the accompaniment, with all its elegance and completeness, is compassable by pianists of the most moderate capabilities. Musicians will admire this ballad as the leisure-thought of an accomplished musician, and the laity will find an irresistible charm in its fluent melody and genuine feeling. We recommend it strongly to Miss Dolby, in whose healthy and unaffected style we trace precisely the means of interpreting it with entire effect.

"The Polka Waltzes;" by G. H. LAKE. J. SCATES, Frith-street.

The Polka Waltzes of Mr. Lake should have been termed the "Polka Waltz," as the subject is merely varied, and runs to the end without interruption. The theme is taken from the most popular of all Strauss's Polkas, and is transferred into 3-4 time, without any violation of the primitive tune.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

EXETER HALL—HAYDNS ORATORIO—MR. H. PHILLIPS.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

35, Hart Street, Bloomsbury, 8th February, 1847.

SIR,—In your journal of last Saturday, I read an article with some surprise, and I must say with much regret, on the subject of my singing the second night of the Creation at Exeter Hall. I say with regret, because in a journal like yours, it is a pity to see a letter inserted which is one string of falsehoods from the commencement to the end; written either in extreme ignorance or malice. It is well known, perhaps almost proverbial, that I do, and have ever used less ornament, in any style of singing than other English vocalists; this fact more particularly attaches to my share of Sacred Music. Indeed, sir, when you remember, that from the age of seven to the present time I have never once ceased toiling to gain a knowledge of all the sacred writers, from Henry Purcell to Spohr; and, further, that my early education was received in the then most rigid school of the concerts of ancient music, and under the constant correction of such men as Knyvelt, Vaughan, Bellamy, Greatorex, &c., &c., &c., is it likely that I, of all others; and in fact, the only one now in exercise of his profession who has been so educated as to forget himself in one of Haydn's finest works, and thus offend the two susceptible ears of my learned friend who has so exposed himself. I think it scarcely requires comment, for the fact is this, and had my cowardly assailant possessed a score, and been able to read it, he would have discovered that, instead of my using unnecessary ornaments, I did not even sing the embellishments invariably printed in the scores of the Creation; again, the fellow tells a falsehood, when he says Miss Birch was encored, for on the night to which he alludes, she was not. Now, had this learned doit taken an early dinner that day? I suspect so—from the effects of which he could not have recovered; at all events, it evidently emanates from a fool or a knave, and as the act of a man who would scarcely hesitate to do, or write anything; and if the fellow has the courage of a Hen Partridge, let him show his thick head from behind his fictitious initials, and at once boldly announce himself, as I declare. I am, your most obedient servant,

HENRY PHILLIPS.

REISSIGER'S NEW OPERA.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—Will you be so kind as to inform me, if the music of, "Der Schiffbruch der Medusa"—"The Shipwreck of the Medusa," a new opera from Reissiger, Kapellemeister at Dresden, is to be obtained in London, and where.—Yours obediently,

"A SUBSCRIBER."

MADAME SCHWIESO.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—In perusing your interesting work, I observed a communication from a subscriber in search of my address. Have the goodness to inform him or her, that any communications will find me at No. 14, Little Portland Street, Oxford Street.—Your most obedient servant,

HARRIET SCHWIESO.

MISCELLANEOUS.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE will open for the season on Tuesday next, with Donizetti's opera, La Favorita, in which Signori Gardoni and Superchi will make their first appearance in this country; and a new ballet by M. Paul Taglioni, entitled, Coralia; or, The Inconstant Knight; the music by Signor Pugnani, in which Madlle. Carolina Rosati will make her debut.

THE CATCH CLUB, established in 1762, will commence its harmonious meetings, at the Thatched House Tavern, March 5th.

THE MEMBERS OF THE WESTERN MADRIGAL SOCIETY meet every other Saturday, to practise, under the direction of Mr. Turle.—Secretary and Treasurer, Mr. George Budd.

MISS SUSAN CUSHMAN.—It is stated that this fair lady, the sister of the Miss Cushman, was married a few days ago, to Mr. Muspratt, one of the sons of Mr. James Muspratt, of Seaforth Hall. She is, with her sister, fulfilling some country engagements, previous to her retirement from the stage.—Liverpool Albion.—[The Times has contradicted this authority.—Ed.]

LABLACHE THE GREAT was born at Naples, December 6th 1794. His mother was a native of the Emerald Isle—at least she was of an Irish family; and his father was a merchant at Marseilles, which city he left in 1791, and settled at Naples.

HERB BUDDEUS, the pianist, who was here about three seasons ago, is at St. Petersburg, where he has had the honour of playing at Court several times. He intends to pay London a visit in the spring.

MR. JOHN PARRY is engaged to sing at Liverpool, Manchester, Preston, Halifax, &c., &c., which will occupy about a fortnight.

MISS HELEN FAUCIT and Mr. Paumier have been performing a round of characters with signal success at Glasgow. The journals of the city are extravagantly eulogistic of the charming actress, but not more than jumps with our own opinions. Mr. Panmier has also been spoken of for his excellent performance of the leading characters he has represented with Miss Helen Faucit. His Claude Melnotte, according to all accounts, was a most admirable piece of acting. In tenderness and pathetic passages this gentleman appears to have few equals. He is a tremendous favorite with the Glasgow folk. When shall we again behold Miss Helen Faucit on the London boards? Shame on all metropolitan managers who would leave their theatres deprived of so much grace and elegance!

MR. J. L. HATTON gave his vocal entertainment at Manchester, on Saturday last, with great success; and he performed at Streatham, on Monday, to a numerous audience.

MISS ANNE ROMER, who made a successful debut on Tuesday evening at the Princess's Theatre, is a sister of Mr. Travers, of Drury Lane, and cousin to Miss Romer.

MELODISTS.—The prize offered by W. Dixon, Esq., for a cheerful song, to be sung and accompanied by Mr. J. L. Hatton, will be awarded at the meeting of the Melodists' Club, on Tuesday, the 23rd instant.

THE GLEE CLUB, which was established in 1787, will hold its third meeting, this day, at the Crown and Anchor tavern, Sir Felix Booth, Bart., president.

MR. HORTON.—This clever oboist is engaged by Mr. Lumley as principal oboe in the band of Her Majesty's Theatre, we understand, at very liberal terms. Hence we presume that M. Lavigne, the Belgian oboist, is not coming after all. Mr. Horton's engagement will be beneficial to the establishment; he is a talented and improving artist, and one of the best professors of the oboe in this country.

MR. KEARNS.—The benefit for the widow and orphans of this lamented musician is appointed to be held on the 17th of March. The principal members of the Philharmonic Society, of which Mr. Kearns was an associate for many years, have volunteered their services. The following gentlemen and musical professors have consented to act as a committee of management: viz., Messrs. J. L. Hatton, Harper, J. F. Loder, R. Ollivier, W. L. Phillips, with Sir George Smart, as chairman; Mr. Thomas Chappell as treasurer; and G. A. Macfarren as secretary. Signor Costa has proffered his services as conductor, and Mr. Martin has given the gratuitous use of his rooms. The concert will be on a very grand scale. The orchestra will be full and complete, and the first vocalists in the metropolis have consented to devote their energies to this charitable endeavour to procure the mite of pity and sympathy for the widow and the orphan. We trust that there will be no lack of patronage on the present occasion. Every musician and every amateur in London should present or send his donation. The public will assuredly be doubly enticed to attend, first by their own charitable feelings, and again by the splendid treat, which, we have no doubt, will be held out to them in the programme.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Handel's Dettingen Te Deum, his anthem, "The king shall rejoice," Mozart's Twelfth Service, the Ancient Hymn, "Alla Trinita Beata," and other pieces, are to be performed on Thursday evening next.

MR. PERCEVAL is, we are told, engaged as second contrabasso by Mr. Lumley; M. L'Anglois is to be the first. Mr. Perceval has been for sometime first contrabasso in the Drury Lane band, and is an excellent player. His father was an eminent violoncellist.

MENDELSSOHN.—"We are enabled," says the Morning Chronicle, to "confirm the announcement respecting Mendelssohn. Mr. Buxton, his publisher, having received a letter from that distinguished composer, dated Leipzig, the 2nd inst., promising to send the rest of Elijah, which, up to that date, was not completed, and naturally engrossed all his attention. Mendelssohn expresses his satisfaction at the arrangements made by Mr. Buxton for Exeter-hall."

MR. HENRY PHILLIPS'S ENTERTAINMENT.—The Athenæum comments very severely upon the monological concerts given by our favourite English vocalist. "We cannot," remarks our cotemporary, alluding to Mr. H. Phillips's vocal entertainment, at Sussex Hall, "look temperately on, and see music thus degraded by those who should know better. The consciousness that a great public for the best works is rapidly encroaching, (Query—the consciousness, the public, or the works?) makes it disgraceful when the artist who might lead chooses to mislead it,—places himself behind the Harlequin, the street ballad-singer, the anybody who would "go any lengths rather than go home with his tin-tray empty." Of a verity there is more truth and plausibility than grammar in the writer's remarks; but, natthless, we cannot attach the same quantum of blame to Mr. H. Phillips for pursuing a career that, harmless in itself, brings him popularity and wealth. The system of giving these monologue concerts originated with the depression of English opera, and was only prosecuted when singers were driven from the stage, and were compelled to display their abilities on another arena. It is certain that Mr. H. Phillips was at the head of our native vocalists on the stage, but he did not always receive parts adapted to his means and abilities; his services were frequently set aside for those of inferior artists, and he did not always obtain remuneration tantamount to the talent that gained him so high a reputation with the public. When an artist, by giving concerts, which solely depend upon his own efforts, can gain quadruple the amount he would receive from his weekly salary at the theatre, there is surely some apology for his following this worldly wisdom. If there be any blame attachable, it is to be applied to the public who supports such entertainments, not to the artist who gives them. For our parts we can see nothing reprehensible in the course Mr. H. Phillips is pursuing. We regret exceedingly that, in the present dearth of singers, so superior an artist as Mr. H. Phillips should be absent from the stage.

THE ROUND, CATCH, AND CANON CLUB, founded by the late Mr. Hawkins, will shortly resume its very pleasant meetings.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ASSEMBLY ROOMS, LONG'S ROYAL HOTEL, CLIFTON, NEAR BRISTOL.

Mrs. LONG begs respectfully to inform the Public, that the above Rooms are let for Concerts, Lectures, &c., on the following terms, viz.—

The Large Room, for a Morning	£	s.	d.
Do. Do. for an Evening	2	2	0
The Smaller Room for a Morning	8	3	0
Do. Do. for an Evening	1	11	6
	2	12	6

Clifton, Bristol, Dec. 18, 1846.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847.

In consequence of the extraordinary sale of this splendid work (which has been pronounced by the unanimous voice of the public press of the United Kingdom "the best and most perfect work of the kind that has ever appeared"), and the great number of persons who have been unable to procure copies, M. JULLIEN has the honour to announce that he has been induced to Publish

A SIXTH EDITION,

WITH EXTENSIVE ADDITIONS AND CORRECTIONS.

This edition contains nearly fifty pieces of the newest and most fashionable vocal and instrumental music, including all the novelties to be introduced in the forthcoming season. N.B. The price of JULLIEN'S ALBUM is 18s. and £1. 1s. The contents if purchased separately would cost nearly £6.

ROYAL MUSICAL CONSERVATORY, 214, REGENT ST.

To be had of all respectable Music and Booksellers in the Kingdom.

Warren's 20 Guinea Cottage Piano-Fortes

ARE NOW SELLING AT THE
Manufactory, 71, Leadenhall Street

(Removed from 1 and 2, Liverpool Street, Bishopsgate Street.)
These Instruments are well manufactured of the best seasoned wood, FINE FULL TONE AND GOOD TOUCH. A two years warranty given with each instrument ESTABLISHED TWENTY-ONE YEARS. The only house in London where a good sound instrument can be obtained at the above low price, (for cash only). SMALL PROFIT AND QUICK RETURNS!
JOHN WARREN, 71, Leadenhall St., opposite Aldgate Pump.

Mr. GEO. MARSHALL

Respectfully announces that he will give his
FIRST PRACTICAL LECTURE
On the Art of Singing,

With Anecdotes, and numerous Illustrations from the most admired ancient and modern composers, at the

MUSIC HALL, STORE STREET, BEDFORD SQUARE,

On MONDAY EVENING, February 15th.

To commence at Eight o'clock precisely, and terminate at half-past Ten.

Tickets, 2s., and reserved seats 3s. each, may be had of all the principal Music Warehouses and Librarians, and of Mr. George Marshall, 27, Welbeck-street, Cavendish-square.

Just Published by R. MILLS, 140, New Bond Street,

No. 4 OF GERMAN SONGS,

"HOFFNUNG;"

THE POETRY BY SCHILLER, THE ENGLISH WORDS BY DEBUT
MUSIC BY HENRY WYLDE, Associate of the Royal Academy.

Also, by the same Author, (first Sonata dedicated to C. POTTER.)

"RHAPSODY;"

BOOK OF GERMAN SONGS.

In the Press—"Caprice," for the Piano-forte.

MEDICAL GALVANISM.

HORNE, THORNTWHAITE, & WOOD, Successors to E. PALMER, 123, Newgate-street, in submitting their improved ELECTRO-GALVANIC MACHINES, beg to state, that they have availed themselves of the discoveries of De la Rive, Faraday, Smee, and others, by which they are enabled to construct a coil with all the required intensity and quantity of electricity for medical use, thereby effecting both a saving of expense and trouble to the invalid, and placing in his hands an effective, powerful, and simple instrument, that may be excited at a minute's notice, and without trouble.—Price, £3. 3s.; £3. 10s.; and £3. 5s.

PHILOSOPHICAL APPARATUS.—Every description of Apparatus connected with Chemistry, Hydraulics, Hydrostatics, Pneumatics, Frictional and Voltaic Electricity, Electro-Magnetism, Electro-Metallurgy, Optics, (including the Dissolving Views, Photography, &c.) manufactured and sold by Horne, Thornthwaite and Wood, successors to Edward Palmer, 123, Newgate Street, London.

Foreign orders, enclosing a remittance or order for payment in London, promptly attended to.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE

Is acknowledged as the best specific after three years' trial, for improving the voice and removing all affections of the throat, strongly recommended to clergymen, singers, actors, public speakers, and all persons subject to relaxed throats.

The Proprietors have just received the following Testimonial, amongst many others, from MADAME ANNA BISHOP:—

"DEAR SIR,—I am happy to say that all I have heard respecting the efficacy of DR. STOLBERG'S celebrated LOZENGE is perfectly true, as yesterday, feeling myself very fatigued (singing nightly at the Theatre), I took several of the Lozenges, and my voice was very clear, and my throat quite free from relaxation. I am, Dear Sir, Yours truly, ANNA BISHOP."

"18th November 1846.—Jermyn Street."

Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Churchyard; W. Edwards and Newbery and Sons, St. Paul's Churchyard; Sanger, and Dietrichsen and Hannay, Oxford-street; and retail by all respectable Chymists in the Kingdom.

TO AMATEURS AND PROFESSORS OF THE VIOLIN
AND TENOR.

J. STEWART'S
REGISTERED VIOLIN AND TENOR HOLDER.
J. HART

Respectfully informs Amateurs and Professors of the Violin and Tenor, that he is now prepared to supply them with the above INSTRUMENT, which, for ease of application and efficiency, surpasses anything of the kind that has yet been offered to the public. J. H. is borne out in this assertion by the opinion of some of the first violinists of the country, who have acknowledged its superiority by adopting the same, conceiving it to be the grand desideratum to the above instruments.

JUST IMPORTED, A CASE OF FINE ROMAN STRINGS,
Of which a fresh supply will be received every three months.

J. HART'S

Musical Instrument Warehouse, 14, Princes-street, Soho,
Where may be seen a fine collection of Cremona and other Instruments, comprising Stradivarius, Guarnerius, Amati, and other celebrated makers.

NEW SONGS
AND PIANOFORTE MUSIC,
Particularly adapted for Teaching.

PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Gems of Balfe's opera, the Bondman, arranged by Charles W. Glover	5	0
"They say there is some distant land," from the Bondman, by W. C. Macfarren	2	6
Fantasia on "Sul campo della gloria," from Bellisario, by F. Hünter	3	0
"Melodie Allemande," op. 147, ditto	3	0
"Retour au Chalet," air national, op. 144, ditto	3	0
"La Serenade," op. 146, ditto	3	0
The favourite air "Lucy Neale," arranged by Chanlieu	2	0
Ditto "Va Pensiero," ditto	3	0
"Fetral" by Rimbaud, (very easy)	1	0
"Lucy Neale," ditto, ditto	1	0
The celebrated "Bridal Polka," (4th edition,) Solo and Duet, each	3	0

SONGS.

"Dream on, young hearts," by Spörle; a gay melody, with a very easy accompaniment, and pleasing words: (third edition)	2	0
"The Irish Emigrant," words by Lady Dufferin, music by Barker	2	0
"In the Greenwood Tree," as sung by Miss Steele, music by B. Richards	2	6
Ditto, as a Duet	2	6
"Go, memory go," one of the favourite songs from the Bondman, Balfe	2	0
"They say there is some distant land," sung by Mr. Harrison	2	0
"Sweet Spring," song, G. A. Macfarren	2	0

CHAPPELL, 50, NEW BOND STREET.

HENRY RUSSELL AT THE STRAND THEATRE.

HENRY RUSSELL, composer of Woodman Spare that Tree—The Ivy Green—The Old Arm Chair—The Maniac—I'm Afloat—The Ship on Fire—Some Love to Room—The Gambler's Wife, &c., will have the honour to give his VOCAL ENTERTAINMENTS, interspersed with Anecdotes of Negro Life and Character, on MONDAY, February 22, and following evenings. MR. RUSSELL will introduce a selection of his latest Compositions, including the delineations of Lord Byron's celebrated Poems, Mazeppa, and the Prisoner of Chillon—The Wife's Dream—The Felon's Last Night—The Wants of the People—The True Men of Old—Hood's Inimitable Song of the Shirt, which has excited the most intense interest—The Slave Ship—The Newfoundland Dog—The Life Boat—There's a Good Time Coming, Boys—I'm Afloat—The Dream of the Reveller—The Pauper's Drive; together with his celebrated Scenes:—The Ship on Fire—The Maniac—The Gambler's Wife—The Idiot Boy. MR. RUSSELL will accompany himself on Kirkman and Sons' newly-invented Grand Fonda Piano. Dress Boxes, 3s.; Stalls, 2s.; Pit, 1s.; Gallery, 6d. Box-office open from 1 till 4. Doors open at half-past 7; concert to commence at 8 o'clock precisely. Books of the words, 6d. each. The entertainments will be varied each evening.

GENUINE BUSINESS FOR SALE.

Messrs. PUTTICK & SIMPSON,
Auctioneers of Music and Literary Property,
ARE INSTRUCTED TO OFFER FOR PRIVATE SALE

A genuine old established and highly respectable Business, devoted to the manufacture of a fashionable Musical Instrument, in extent of patronage second only to the Pianoforte. The stock, consisting of finished Instruments in the ware rooms, and on hire, materials and all requisites for carrying on the business, with the remainder of the lease of the premises, and the good-will, would be included in the purchase. The death of the late Proprietor (who enjoyed the highest reputation and distinguished patronage for the last forty years) is the sole reason for the disposal of the concern. This Business would be a valuable adjunct to that of a manufacture of Pianofortes, or other Musical Instruments. Principals only, who can command not less than £2000, may apply by letter to PUTTICK and SIMPSON, 191, Piccadilly.

NOW READY.

CORNER'S HISTORY OF ROME;

Compiled from accepted modern English and Foreign authorities; and printed uniformly with CORNER'S HISTORICAL QUARTER, for School and Family Reading, forming a complete History of every Nation in Europe.

THE HISTORIES OF	Bound, with the Questions.	Without Questions.
England and Wales—five fine plates and map	4s.	3s. 6d.
Ireland—three fine plates and map	3s.	2s. 6d.
Scotland—three fine plates and map	3s.	2s. 6d.
France—three fine plates and maps	3s.	2s. 6d.
Spain and Portugal—three fine plates and map	3s.	2s. 6d.
Denmark, Sweden, and Norway—two fine plates and map	3s.	2s. 6d.
Germany, including Austria—three fine plates and map	3s.	2s. 6d.
Turkey and Ottoman Empire—three fine plates and map	3s.	2s. 6d.
Poland and Russia—three fine plates and map	3s.	2s. 6d.
Italy and Switzerland—three fine plates and map	3s.	2s. 6d.
Holland and Belgium—two fine plates and map	3s.	2s. 6d.

The object of these works—peculiarly suited to Schools and Families—is to furnish the reader with a faithful history of each nation, interspersed with an accurate account of the religion, customs, national characteristics, state of civilisation, and domestic habits of the people, in various periods of their history; to attract the attention of the rising generation by purity of language and clearness of detail, and thus render easy and pleasant the attainment of a knowledge of the leading events of history.

To show how these truthful histories are appreciated, it may be mentioned that 5,000 England, 5,000 Ireland, 5,000 Scotland, 6,000 France, and 4,000 Spain and Portugal, have been sold.

CHARLES BUTLER'S EASY GUIDE TO GEOGRAPHY AND USE OF THE GLOBES. With Seven Glypographic Maps, 2s. cloth.

THE GUIDE TO USEFUL KNOWLEDGE, by the same Author. Second edition, enlarged, 1s. 6d. cloth. Useful and Practical Works, now ready, and may be obtained, by order, of every Bookseller in the Kingdom. Price 1s. 6d. cloth, the Sixth edition, enlarged, with the proper method of using Guano as a Manure, in a dry or liquid state.

PRICE'S MODERN GARDENER: or, Instructions, the result of experience for forming, planting, and managing the kitchen, flower, pleasure, and fruit garden, hotbed, and green-house. With directions as to the proper soil, the times and method of manuring, sowing, planting, pruning, and grafting; observations on the nature and progress of vegetation in plants, &c. By T. Price, Market-gardener and Nurseryman.

Price 2s. cloth, or 3s. 6d. in leather.

THE COOKMAID'S COMPLETE GUIDE, and the Art of Cookery made easy; being the best and easiest methods of correctly performing all the business of the cookmaid in respectable families. With proper instructions for steaming, and the most exact directions for preparing to cook, and for properly cooking and serving up all sorts of provisions, from a single joint of meat, with vegetables, to the finest seasoned dishes of game, poultry, fish, soups, mince, and made dishes; and also for making and baking pies, tarts, patties, custards, &c. The whole written from experience. By a Lady.

Also, price 6d. sewed,

THE COOKMAID'S GUIDE for the proper Performance of all the household work expected to be done by the Cookmaid; with a few general rules for cooking, abridged from the "Cookery Made Easy." By the same author.

Price 6d. sewed,

THE HOUSEMAID'S COMPLETE GUIDE to the best methods of performing all the various duties of the housemaid in respectable families where a cook is kept. By the author of "The Maid-of-all-Work's Complete Guide."

Price 6d. sewed,

THE MAID-OF-ALL-WORK'S COMPLETE GUIDE, containing plain instructions for the proper methods of arranging and doing all the business usually required from servants of all-work in good families. By the author of "The Housemaid's Complete Guide."

Price 6d. stitched,

CHEAP COOKERY FOR THE WORKING CLASSES, showing them how to cook a variety of warm, savoury, and nourishing meals at little expense; an excellent book for clergymen and ladies to make presents. By the author of "Cookery Made Easy."

Price 1s. 6d. in cloth lettered,

THE CONFECTIONER'S AND PASTRYCOOK'S GUIDE, as practised at the best establishments in London and Paris, for making all kinds of pastry, jellies, blanc-manger, creams, &c., and preserving fruits. With the art of sugar-boiling, making lozenges, drops, pipe barley-sugar, carraway comfits, &c. By George Read.

Price 2s. 6d. in cloth, lettered,

THE COMPLETE BISCUIT AND GINGERBREAD BAKER'S ASSISTANT: with practical directions for making plain and fancy biscuits, buns, cakes, drops, gingerbread, spice nuts, &c., adapted either for the use of the trade or private families, forming the second part of the Confectioner's and Pastry-Cook's Guide. By George Read.

Price 1s. sewed,

THE BISCUIT AND GINGERBREAD BAKER'S ASSISTANT, being a series of one hundred receipts for making biscuits, pastry, &c., for balls, roasts, tea, wine, supper, &c. By T. Roesmith.

Price 3s. 6d. cloth,

THE CABINET MAKER'S AND UPHOLSTERER'S GUIDE: with the art of drawing, as applied to cabinet-making and upholstery, the processes of staining and inlaying, dyeing, staining, lacquering, japanning, varnishing, French polishing, &c. With descriptive engravings, by J. Stoker.

PRACTICAL DIRECTIONS TO GENTLEMEN & TRADESMEN for KEEPING and MAKING HUSBANDRY: with directions for their choice and purchase, and how to ascertain the good or bad qualities, and detect the faults of horses, illustrated by accurate engravings. By James Mills, M.V.C. Third Edition, enlarged and improved, 1s. 6d. cloth, lettered.

LAND SURVEYOR'S READY RECKONER: or, Gentleman's and Farmer's Guide to LAND MEASUREMENT: by which the contents of any piece of land, of whatever shape, may be readily found. By S. Thurlow. 2s. bound.

LONDON:—DEAN & CO., THREADNEEDLE STREET;

And may be obtained, by order, of all Booksellers.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847,

A most beautiful Christmas Present, New Year's Gift,
and Etrennes.

M. JULLIEN

Has the honor to announce that his

MUSICAL ANNUAL FOR 1847

Is now Published, and is by far the best work of the kind that has ever appeared; contains no less than

THIRTY PIECES OF VOCAL AND FOURTEEN OF INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC,

The greater part of which have never before been published, the copyrights
having been purchased expressly for this work, at an immense cost, with the view of rendering it immeasurably superior to any of its predecessors.

The portion which has already appeared comprise those pieces only whose decided success has induced M. JULLIEN, at the request of numerous influential patrons, to include them in this Selection.

The Illustrations, in addition to the elaborately executed Covers, Title, and Dedication pages, include

TWO MAGNIFICENT VIEWS

OF THE

Interior of Covent-Garden Theatre,

The one taken during the brilliant scene exhibited in that splendid arena of
the occasion of M. JULLIEN'S GRAND BAL MASQUE; the other a VIEW OF THE THEATRE TAKEN DURING THE CONCERTS,
the grouping of the Figures in both Views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant. To those who have visited the Theatre on either occasion, the ALBUM will form a delightful SOUVENIR, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of
the gorgeous scene.

A SPLENDIDLY-COLOURED

PORTRAIT

Of the celebrated Danseuse,

MADAME FLORA FABRI,

In the admired Pas, LA CASTIGLIANA.

AN ORIGINAL SUBJECT,

"THE FORTUNE TELLER,"

Illustrating BAKER'S beautiful Ballad of that name.

The whole of this department of the ALBUM has been under the active superintendence of J. BRANDARD, Esq., whose pencil only has been employed in its production.

Nothing more need be said in favour of this ALBUM, and in proof of its vast superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the Contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe: viz.

BONINI,	VERDI,	DONIZETTI,	RUBINI,
ROCH-ALBERT,	HÖLZELL,	GOLDBERG,	SCHIRA,
SCHULZ,	STEFEL,	DUPREZ,	JOSE GOMIS,
MASARNAU,	MARATZEK,	BALFE,	JULLIEN,
HATTON,	BARRET,	ALEXANDER LEE,	KENIG,
KNIGHT,	BAKER,	FARMER,	LINLEY,
LAKE,	FITZBALL,	MOULD,	HURLEY,
FOREST,	ALBERT SMITH,	DESMOND RYAN,	&c.

It will thus be perceived that in addition to the latest compositions of the best English Composers, the ALBUM will contain some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany, France, Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting
the attention of the Continental dilettanti.

PRICE 18s. AND £1. 1s.

ROYAL CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC

214, REGENT-STREET, AND 45, KING-STREET.

SOVEREIGN Life Assurance Company,

No. 5, ST. JAMES'S STREET,
LONDON.

Sir A. Brydges Henniker, Bart. B. Bond Cabbell, Esq., M.P.	Trustees. Henry Pownall, Esq. Claude Edward Scott, Esq.
CHAIRMAN, Lieutenant-Colonel Lord Arthur Lennox. DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN, T. C. Granger, Esq., M.P.	Directors. Henry Broadwood, Esq., M.P. Sir James Carmichael, Bart. Charles Farebrother, Esq., Alderman. William Tulloh Fraser, Esq. John Gardner, Esq. Aaron Asher Goldsmid, Esq. Henry William Pownall, Esq.
John Ashburner, Esq., M.D. T. M. B. Batard, Esq. Philip P. Blyth, Esq.	Bankers, Sir Claude Scott, Bart., and Co. Solicitors, Messrs. Davies, Son, and Campbell.

Assurances on the lives of persons in every station of life and every part of the world, granted on a plan which combines the utmost amount of benefit to the families of the assured at death, with every attainable advantage during life, which the system of Life Assurance is capable of affording.

It affords perfect security in a subscribed Capital, which guarantees the prompt settlement of every claim, with participating and non-participating rates on the lowest scale, especially for terms of years.

The Assured can anticipate or obtain the advance of the full amount of the Policy, on giving approved available security for a certain number of annual payments, as explained by the Prospectus.

Every facility is afforded to persons assuring the lives of others, so as to render such Policies effectual securities.

A new plan of gradual or accumulative Assurance, particularly adapted for young lives, and for such as cannot, without inconvenience, undertake the payment of a fixed premium, securing at once provision in case of premature death, and an accumulating fund, available during life, should occasion require.

ANNUITIES, ENDOWMENTS, ADVANCES, and LOANS, on liberal terms.
Detailed Prospectuses, with forms of Proposal, and every information, may be had on application, either personally or by letter, at the Company's Offices.

The usual commission to Solicitors and Agents.
H. D. DAVENPORT, Secretary.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

The nobility, gentry, and public are respectfully informed, that the
NEW THEATRE

Will Open the first Week in April,

For the performance of the LYRICAL DRAMA, on a scale of efficiency in every department never before attempted in this country.

THE BALLET

Will include the names of the most celebrated artists. The prospectus for the arrangement of the season is issued. Mr. Beale, Director.

GRAND SCOTTISH CONCERT,

FOR THE RELIEF OF

THE DISTRESSED HIGHLANDERS,

AT THE

Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover Square,

On the evening of THURSDAY, 25th of FEBRUARY, 1847,
TO COMMENCE AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

Under the immediate Patronage of

HER GRACIOUS MAJESTY, THE QUEEN.

H. R. H. Prince Albert
H. R. H. the Duchess of Kent
H. R. H. the Duchess of Gloucester
The Duke of Hamilton
The Duke of Buccleuch
The Duke of Richmond
The Duke of Montrose
The Duke of Sutherland
The Earl of Eglington and Winton
The Earl of Zetland
The Earl of March
The Lord and Lady Willoughby D'Eresby
The Lord and Lady Lovat
Lieutenant-General Lord Saltoun

Her Majesty the Queen Dowager
H. R. H. the Duke of Cambridge
H. R. H. the Duchess of Cambridge
The Duchess of Hamilton
The Duchess of Devonshire
The Duchess of Richmond
The Dowager Duchess of Bedford
The Duchess of Montrose
The Duchess of Sutherland
The Countess of Eglington and Winton
The Countess of Selkirk
The Countess of March
The Lord and Lady John Russell
The Chesham

THE HIGHLAND SOCIETY OF LONDON.

The Programme will include the names of the most distinguished artists, many of whom have already volunteered their valuable services in aid of
THIS CHARITY.

Tickets to be had at all the principal Music Sellers, and the Concert Rooms, Hanover Square, at the following prices:—Tickets, 10s. 6d.; Double Tickets, 15s.; Single Reserved Seats, 15s.

All communications made to the "Committee of the Grand Scottish Concert, for the Relief of the Distressed Highlanders," to be addressed to the Hanover Square Rooms.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, at the "Nathan Stearn Press," by WILLIAM SPENCER JOHNSON, 69, St. Martin's Lane, in the parish of St.
Martin's in the Fields, in the County of Middlesex; where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed post paid. To be had of G. Purkiss, Dean Street, Soho; Strange, Paternoster Row; Wisheart, Dublin; and all Booksellers.—Saturday, February 13th, 1847.

The Musical World.

(PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT NOON.)

A RECORD OF THE THEATRES, MUSIC, LITERATURE, FINE ARTS,
FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE, &c.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s. Stamped; 12s. Unstamped; to be forwarded by Money Order or Postage Stamps to the Publisher, W. S. Johnson, "Nassau Steam Press," 60, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross.

Each Subscriber is entitled to an Admission to an Annual Concert, and a Piece of Music, (regular Music size) Monthly.

No. 8.—VOL. XXII.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1847.

PRICE THREEPENCE
STAMPED, FOURPENCE

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

MR. LUMLEY commenced his campaign for 1847, on Tuesday evening, somewhat earlier in the field than has recently been his wont. The reason is very obvious:—Her Majesty's Theatre gets nearly two months start of its formidable opponent, the Royal Italian Opera; ample time to establish itself firmly upon the soil, and to acquire a large amount of public prestige in its favour. In our remembrance of Opera no season has opened more worthily; and when the difficulties under which Mr. Lumley has been placed are taken into consideration, the result is highly creditable to his sagacity as a manager and to his spirit as a speculator. It is evident that no money has been spared, and that the director's determination to provide sumptuously for his patrons has been carried out by efficient, zealous, and active officers. Before we enter upon a detailed account of the chances of Tuesday evening let us consider those new in the general appearance of things which call for notice. We must begin, then, with rendering homage to it is so supereminently due, that to overlook it, or even to underrate it, or still further to speak of it without enthusiasm, would be nothing less than monstrous injustice. Mr. Balfé, our countryman, whose engagement as director of the orchestra has been so testily rated in certain quarters, has taken up, as we shall endeavour to show, a trump card for the establishment—aye, the ace of trumps. It was only last autumn that Mr. Lumley was made thoroughly aware of the difficulties under which he was placed by the secession of more than five-sixths of his band and chorus. The importance of these adjuncts of the Opera establishment, the perfection to which they had been drilled by long experience of Signor Costa's most able surveillance, and the seeming impossibility of replacing them by anything approaching to a worthy substitute, scarcely admitted of a question. Singers and dancers could be obtained for more or less money, but an orchestra composed of the flower of the instrumental talent of the resident profession, and furthermore quintupled in value by many years' training in the establishment, under a conductor of remarkable talent, as much respected for the independence and liberality of his private character, as for the knowledge and ability which in his peculiar walk enabled him to set competition at defiance—an orchestra, in most respects admirable, and in many respects incomparable, it was not unreasonable to suppose could hardly be replaced without years of toil and the most singular good luck. It is all very well to blink the question, but it is not the less a solemn truth, that Signor Costa and his orchestra were the soul of Her Majesty's Theatre. We say this with the less hesitation, since we cannot be accused of overrating the worth of the late conductor. With all these facts before us, we cannot but own the surprise and gratification with which we heard the overture to La

Favorita, and the majority of the choral pieces, executed on Tuesday night by the artists whom Mr. Balfé's judgment and activity had enabled him to get together on so short a notice and so trying an occasion. Two months ago not one engagement had been made; so that in two months Mr. Balfé not only contrived to hear and pronounce a verdict on every individual of the collective force, but to practice them in concert so as to produce an effective and striking ensemble. Taking chorus and band together it is easy to calculate, from our experience of such matters, that Mr. Balfé must have given audience to at least five hundred persons. Besides which, to our knowledge, many of the foreigners who came to him with great names, he was compelled, conscientiously, either to dismiss or displace, and to find substitutes and leaders from English artists. Thus M. Elie, who was to have been the first flute, though, we believe, acknowledged a good soloist, was found quite out of his element in an orchestra, and an English professor, Mr. Clinton, was engaged for that post. M. Elie came also with the reputation of a first-rate piccolo player; nevertheless the piccolo, on Tuesday night, was snatched, at the last moment, from one of the Casino bands of the metropolis. A certain M. Bahr was engaged as first horn, and arrived with an enormous continental repute; but what was the result? In trying the capabilities of the orchestra, the conductor found it necessary to remove M. Bahr, by degrees, from the seat of coro primo to that of coro ultimo, and on Tuesday Mr. Catchpole, an English artist from one of our theatre-orchestras, played the first horn, and M. Bahr the fourth. The Morning Chronicle, in noticing the absence of M. Elie from the ranks, also signals that of M. Lavigne the oboist. In answer to which it is only necessary to state, that M. Lavigne, for reasons of his own with which we have nothing to do, has not made his appearance yet in London. In his absence, Mr. Horton, an English artist, and nearly, if not quite, as good an orchestral performer, occupied the post of first oboe on Tuesday night, and accomplished its duties most ably. The first bassoon, M. Templini, is equal to any bassoon in the world. The ease with which he takes the high notes is astonishing, and he only wants an increased volume of tone (which he cannot, with his talent, fail of acquiring) to become another Baumann. M. L'Anglois, the primo contrabasso, and Signor Piatti, the primo violoncello, stand in no need of our praise; they are acknowledged first-rates. Then, among the violins, we have such excellent players as M. Pluys, from Brussels, Mr. Collins, Mr. Sidney Smith, Mr. Day, and many other established English players. The trombones and trumpets are highly efficient, though perhaps a little too loud. The tenors are good, but there are scarcely enough of them. The violoncellos and basses are excellent, but exhibit the same deficiency. The strength of the band is thus divided:—violins 28, tenors 8, violoncellos 8, double basses 8, and the usual complement of wind instruments and "kitchen furniture." (We speak from our own survey on Tuesday night, not from any printed authority.) In La Favorita, Donizetti has written four trumpet parts, and four trumpets were there for the occasion; besides a harp, absolutely essential in French operas. Altogether the band numbers about 80, more or less. Its general effect is striking, but of course it wants the refinement which will come with constant practice. At all events, if we except that of the Royal Italian Opera, no such band exists in this country, and its present comparative inferiority to its rival is rather the consequence of inexperience than of inefficient materials for ultimate perfection. The choral forces are thus divided:—soprani, 33; tenori, 27; bassi, 20; in all 80. The soprani and tenori are very good—but the bassi are superb. In regard to this department of his company, we strongly suspect Mr. Lumley will have the advantage of his opponents. Now, we put it to any reasonable person, whether what Mr. Balfe, alone and unaided, has contrived to bring forward, in such a remarkable condition of excellence, in these most important departments, does not entitle him to unlimited credit. Mr. Lumley has, indeed, been most fortunate in securing the co-operation of a director at once so able, so zealous, and so untiring.

The house was filled to overflowing on Tuesday night, an event that was pretty nearly certain to occur, the circumstances of the moment considered. Mr. Balfe made his appearance in the orchestra a few minutes after eight, and his presence was acknowledged by a rapturous burst of applause. The execution of the overture to La Favorita, a brilliant, if not a profound composition, at once demonstrated the quality of the orchestra. The crescendos were admirably managed, the fortissimos terrific, and the general performance splendid and effective. The overture was loudly encored, the Allegro Mosso, in C minor, repeated, and the question of the orchestra at once thoroughly established. Mr. Lumley had vanquished one great difficulty, and the audience were eager in acknowledging it. La Favorita is, perhaps, the masterpiece of Donizetti, and is certainly one of the most elaborate and difficult of his operas. It is one among many proofs which the composer has given to the world of a magnificent talent that in too many of his works has been unworthily compromised. This opera was first produced at the Academie Royale in Paris, on the 2nd December, 1840. It was written for the Renaissance, but that theatre being closed it was transferred to the other. The story of the drama may be best told in the words of a paper which was distributed in the boxes of Her Majesty's Theatre, on Tuesday night, a useful and elegant pamphlet, serving the double purpose of a bill of the evening's entertainments and a compendium of appropriate chit-chat on musical matters in general:—

"The scene passes in the kingdom of Castile, in 1340. Leonora de Guzman, celebrated for her wit and beauty, is loved by Alfonso XI., King of Castile, of whom she becomes the favourite. The ascendancy which she acquires over the monarch becomes so great, that he resolves, in order to espouse her, to repudiate the Queen, his wife. The Pope interferes, and menaces the King with excommunication if he persist in his project. In the meantime the Moors threaten the kingdom of Castile. Alfonso XI. hastens to meet and give them battle; the result is a decisive victory, owing chiefly to Fernando, a youthful captain of his army. Fernando, formerly a novice in the convent of Santiago de Compostella, has seen and loved Leonora, of whose name and rank he is ignorant. Carried away by his passion, he has quitted the convent, obtained, by the favour of Leonora, a brevet of captain, and by his valour the triumph of the King's arms. Overwhelmed already by the favours of his sovereign, he asks of him the hand of the noble object of his affection; and the King, who has discovered the love of Leonora for Fernando, determines on the sacrifice of his own sentiments, and gives his consent to the marriage. The favourite informs her lover, by letter, of her relation with Alfonso. Unfortunately her confidant, Inez, is unable to take her confidence, being imprisoned by order of the King, and the marriage is accomplished. After the ceremony, Fernando perceives that the eyes of all are turned away from him, or exhibit marks of evident contempt. He imperiously demands the cause; and is informed that he has wedded the mistress of the King. Fernando, indignant, utters imprecations on his bride, throws his knightly sword at Alfonso's feet, abdicates his recently-acquired titles, and, heart-broken, returns to the convent to take his vows. Leonora, in despair at the irremediable misfortune she has brought upon her lover, determines, before she dies, to see him once more and obtain his pardon. Habited as a novice, she penetrates the convent, is recognised by Fernando, whose love returns at her sight, and who proposes that they fly together far from Castile. It is too late: Leonora expires at her lover's feet—but pardoned and happy."

A finer subject for an opera seria would be difficult to name, and Donizetti, in his musical treatment of it, raises himself so far above his former self, that musicians fail to recognise the elegant Neapolitan trifler save in the pretty fluency of certain of the cabalettas, and the occasional sacrifices of strict taste at the shrine of vocal display. We have neither time nor space to analyse the music as it merits. A brief abstract of the different pieces must suffice, until a better occasion serves our turn.

The opera is in four acts, and at the Academie Royale occupies the whole night in performance, an example which it would have been advisable for Her Majesty's Theatre to follow, since the second act comprises an entire ballet, which renders another ballet during the evening superfluous. As it happened, Donizetti's music was mutilated, and the audience kept in the theatre till nearly two o'clock, a consummation devoutly to be undesired. The overture to La Favorita chiefly deserves noting as one of the very few complete orchestral pieces with which Donizetti has favoured us. In other respects it is an ordinary French prelude, noisy and brilliant, but somewhat vapid. It served, however, to show off Mr. Balfe's orchestra to good advantage, on Tuesday night. The first act begins with a choral movement for men's voices, in C, well written, and in dramatic keeping with the ecclesiastical character; it is sung by the monks of the monastery of St. James, proceeding to their orisons in the chapel. The sequences and suspensions in this chorus are natural and easy, and indicate Donizetti's knowledge of harmony to be greater than the world has given him credit for. After some recitatives, Fernando, the young novice, reveals his love for a lady whom he has seen while at his devotions, to Balthazar, his friend and Superior of the Monastery. This lady is Leonora, the Favourite. The tenor air which Donizetti has written here, in A major, "Une ange, une femme," is equally simple and expressive. The first couplet is plainly accompanied, the second is set off by new phrases for the wind instruments. Then follows a duet for tenor and bass, in which Balthazar reproaches Fernando, while the young novice endeavours to excuse his passion for the fair unknown. This duet is an exceedingly fine composition, expressive and dramatic—the instrumentation is superb—the bassoons and violoncellos are employed with great skill and characteristic effect. A cantabile phrase for the tenor, in D flat, is in itself beautiful, and contrasts well with the grave tone of what precedes it. This cantabile occurs twice and the second time gives way to a brilliant coda. An air and chorus for female voices in F, "Rayons dorés," for Inez, the favorite's waiting-maid, and the attendants, is deliciously fresh and soothing, charming as much by its unpretension as by its grace. Another air and chorus, for the same persons, in D, "Doux zephyrs," is equally pleasing, though of an opposite character, the style being sparkling and joyous instead of melancholy. Some recitative for Inez and Fernando gives way to a duet for Leonora and the latter, in C, which involves two agreeable motifs, one in A minor, passionate and tender, the other in the original key of the duet. A martial air, in A, for Fernando, is bold and animated, demanding a large degree of energy on the part of the singer; with this ends the first Act. The air was omitted by Signor Gardoni on Tuesday night, which was to be regretted, since it is one of the most effective pieces in the opera, and displays Donizetti's knowledge of the orchestra to great advantage; moreover, without it, the curtain drops on an anti-climax.

Act II opens with a noisy instrumental fragment, introductory to the appearance on the scene of Alphonso XI, King of Castile. Some accompanied recitative leads to a larghetto in A minor for the King, followed by a moderato in F. The first is beautiful, the second spirited but not strikingly new. The instrumentation throughout is admirable, and the whole is an effective display for a bass voice. A duet for Leonora and the King, beginning in E, and ending in A, contains a pleasing larghetto in six-eight, for the latter, and concludes with a slow cabaletta, in thirds and sixths, which has no other characteristic than triviality. Next comes a ballet, consisting of four pieces:—an introduction, Vivace in B flat—a pas de trois, in various movements and keys—a pas de six of equal variety—and a pas d'ensemble in D, minor or major, throughout. This dance-music cannot be compared to that in Guillaume Tell, or La Muette, or even Robert, for fancy and melody; but it is good enough in its way, sparkling and natural, brilliantly arranged for the orchestra, and absolutely necessary to the design and completeness of the opera. It was therefore to be lamented that the authorities of Her Majesty's Theatre should consent to so great a liberty being taken with Donizetti's score as was involved in its omission on Tuesday night. The Chronicle is right in complaining of the loss of the décorations, though we have sought in vain throughout the score (for the loan of which we are indebted to our kind friend, Mr. C. R. Wessel) for the dances in the first act, equally regretted by the Chronicle. The finale to the 2nd act is long and fragmentary; but it is highly dramatic, full of contrast, and abounds in masterly points of musicianship, developing with great felicity one of the most striking situations of the drama—the refusal of the King to abandon Leonora, and the anathema of the Pope pronounced by the monk Balthazar.

The third act is a master-piece in its peculiar school. It contains a trio in D, for Leonora, Fernando, and Alphonso, in which the plaintive and exquisite melody for the bass "Pour tant amour," that has captivated the ear of all France, and will doubtless produce the same effect in England, plays the most important part—a song for Leonora, beginning with a passionate and beautiful recitative in A minor, leading to a cantabile in C, "O mon Fernand," which is almost as popular as the melody to which we have just alluded; and a cabaletta in E major, which albeit it has much energy, and flows easily, is the least interesting portion of the song, which sins more on the score of irregular tonality than on any other—a pretty and effective chorus of nobles, in A, ingeniously mingled with recitatives and solos—and the magnificent finale, the grand point of the opera, which contains among other fine things, the unison chorus in F, for male voices, which brought out Mr. Balfe's chorus on Tuesday, with astounding effect. The situations comprised in this finale are wonderfully dramatic and exciting—the heroism of Fernando, and the disgrace of the favorite, intermingled with the various incidents arising from the passions and observations of the spectators, all artfully combined by the dramatists M. M. Scribe, Royer, and Vaez. A peculiarity in this finale, wherein it appears that Donizetti has either not studied or has disregarded the models left by Mozart and other great masters, is the utter contempt he displays for relative tonality. The finale begins in D minor, passes through a great variety of keys, and finally settles in C major, in which key it concludes. Among the modern Italians, Rossini is the only one, we believe, who adheres upon principle to the natural laws of tonality. Donizetti sins like the rest of them.

"Those death-like children of the hidden cloud,"

In the fourth act Donizetti has embodied the gravity of the ecclesiastical style in his music without overloading it with extra-elaboration. The chorus of monks in E, Balthazar's solo in G, and another short choral movement in C which follows, are solemn and impressive, though studiously simple. Fernando's well known cavatina, "Ange si pur," in C, is a melody that appeals at once to universal appreciation, and once heard can never be forgotten; nothing can be more simple and unpretending, while nothing can be more tender, and although it is perfectly original, it is so natural that it comes upon the ear like the recollection of a melody heard in childhood. The recitatives and choral fragments which follow are scarcely less unaffected and beautiful. The effect of the monks' hymn, in A flat, sung from behind the scenes, with the accompaniment of an organ, is grave and in good keeping with the situation. The recitative for Leonora and Fernando, which opens with a passionate instrumental introduction in C minor, is very fine. The duet for Leonora and Fernando is also a beautiful composition, though its tonal construction is singularly incoherent. For example, the opening Allegro for Fernando begins in A minor; it has an episode in C, which leads to an accompanied recitative in E flat; a larghetto for Leonora in A flat minor then occurs, which gives way to a cabaletta in A flat; some more recitative in C minor brings us back once more to A minor, and leads to a second cabaletta in C, which, as the duet attains the climax, is interrupted by a cadence into A flat, the renewal of the monks' chorus already alluded to. In spite of this apparent rambling, however, the duet is full of musical beauties, and abounds in fine dramatic points. The opera concludes with an Allegro Agitato in B flat minor, a short movement of great energy and intensity, illustrating very beautifully the sad catastrophe of the drama—the death of Leonora, after Fernando has forgiven her, and avowed the unchanged love he bears her.

This hurried sketch (intended exclusively for our musical readers) can give but a faint notion of the merits of La Favorita, which, if not absolutely a work of genius, approaches as nearly the mark as high talent and consummate experience can accomplish. That Donizetti has both these can hardly be questioned, and the splendid manner in which he has here exhibited them declares him beyond a doubt one of the first musicians of the present epoch, and the Italian who nearest approaches in excellence the gifted "Swan of Pesaro."

But it is time to speak of the style in which the opera was given at Her Majesty's Theatre on Tuesday night, and of the debutantes, about whom so much expectation had been raised. We have said enough of the band and chorus to make our opinion of their capabilities known. We may add that the chorus in F, for male voices, in the finale to the second act, was so finely sung that the audience unanimously called for its repetition. The debutantes were all successful. Signor Gardoni (Fernando), the tenor from the French Académie, achieved a complete triumph. His voice is a legitimate tenor of rare quality, round and beautiful in the middle tones, clear and "silvery" in the high ones. Over this voice the singer has acquired a complete control, which ensures that invariable correctness of intonation that yields to no other charm in vocalism. His execution is chaste and unerring, and his style, though full of energy and passionate expression, is wholly divested of affectation and exuberance. In short, Signor Gardoni is an artist, in the best sense of the word, and a vocalist of the very highest pretensions. His reception was enthusiastic. His air in the first act, "Une femme, une ange," at once proclaimed his excellence to the audience, and won their unanimous suffrages—it was boisterously encored. A similar compliment was paid to the cavatina of the fourth act, "Ange si pur," and the energy and dramatic force displayed in the finale to the third (for he not only sings, but acts admirably) gained unbounded applause for the young singer. Signor Gardoni's success is indisputable, and he is likely to prove a most valuable acquisition to Mr. Lumley, whose discretion and judgment were never better exercised than in his engagement. Mr. Lumley will not, we suspect, have reason to repent his moiety of the dédit of 50,000 francs incurred by the engagement of this new tenor, the signal for whose popularity in this country was given on Tuesday night in a manner that could not be mistaken.

Signor Superchi (Alphonso XI.), the new barytone, for whom Verdi did (according to the Post), and did not (according to the Chronicle) compose his opera of Ernani (a matter of mighty import truly!) is also an acquisition for Mr. Lumley. With the slight tendency to flat intonation which would seem to be inseparable from barytones, he has an agreeable and capable voice, a chaste and uninflated style, and an easy deportment, which gives an air of natural propriety to all he does. Signor Superchi was encored in his duet (with Leonora) in the second act, and much applauded in the romance, "Pourtant amour," of the trio in the third act. Signor Superchi is not a Tamburini, but he is worth a dozen Fornasaris. Again we must be eulogistic in favour of Signor Bouché (Balthazar) the third debutante, who has a bass voice that charms alike by flexibility and sympathetic quality of tone. Without being great, Signor Bouché is a right good singer, and though not a striking, a sensible actor, and one who makes his presence in the concerted music invaluable. He was well received and frequently applauded through the opera, losing no point where his powers as a vocalist could be manifested without undue obtrusion. Thus far for three of the debutants. Madlle. Nascio, the fourth, who undertook the subordinate part of Inez, lacked power to give expression to the pretty and natural music that Donizetti has written for the character. The part of Leonora (the favorite) was supported by Madlle. Sanchioli, one of those new importations who, last season, were made unduly prominent by the management of Her Majesty's Theatre. We own that our recollections of Madlle. Sanchioli left us little disposed in her favor, but we were agreeably disappointed. It is one thing to scream through a ridiculously unvocal partition of Verdi, and quite another to sing through a thoroughly vocal part like that of the Favorite. Verdi is ruining all the voices in Italy, and it is a fact to which we can bear testimony, that Miss Hayes, one of the most popular and gifted dramatic singers that the Italian stage possesses, makes a clause in all her engagements, that she shall not be asked to sing in any of Verdi's operas. Donizetti on the other hand is a thorough master of the capabilities of voices, and even in his most elaborate bravuras consults them with effect, and writes vocally. Moreover the part of Leonora was written for a mezzo-soprano, Mad. Stoltz, and the voice of Madlle. Sanchioli is an indisputable mezzo-soprano. The consequence is that she sings the music with ease, and those who heard her on Tuesday night could scarcely believe they were listening to the prima donna whom they recollected last season labouring with evident agony through an incoherent rhapsody of passages, totally unsuited to her voice, or indeed to that of any earthly singer. The hyena-tribe of vocalists might perhaps do justice to Signor Verdi's effusions, but they are suited to nothing human. It must be mentioned also that Madame Sanchioli has greatly improved in style. Her acting no less than her singing, is thrice more natural and easy than it was. On the whole, indeed, she sustained the part of Leonora, if not greatly, at least sensibly effectively, and artistically. The audience was not slow in recognizing Madame Sanchioli's great improvement, and applauded her liberally and frequently. If she thus continue to progress, there is no knowing to what a height she may ultimately attain in her art. On the whole, we have seldom heard an opera more satisfactorily represented in all its parts, than La Favorita on Tuesday night. If this be the result of competition, Mr. Lumley's best friends will not be sorry that the existence of a rival establishment should have been the cause of weakening his energies. After the third and fourth acts of the opera, Signor Gardoni and the other principal singers were recalled; and at the conclusion, the young tenor reappeared, accompanied by Madlle. Sanchioli, at the unanimous desire of the audience. Mr. Lumley was then called for, and, subsequently, Mr. Balfe, both walking successively across the stage amidst loud and general applause. The Italian version of La Favorita, by Signor Jannetti, Mr. Lumley's Poet-Laureat, is excellent; but the English version of that version is filled with glaring errors and mistranslations, from one end to the other.

The Ballet must be dismissed in as few words as possible. Mr. Lumley, ever active in this department, for which his theatre has long been famous, has provided us several new dancers, and a new entertainment to exhibit their attractions. The title is, Coralia, or the inconstant Knight. The story is founded on the beautiful and popular German romance of Undine, by La Motte Fouque; and condensing the opera version, may be thus narrated:—

"Sir Hildebrand of Ringolletten the devoted admirer of the Duke's daughter, Bertha, is required by her to dare the adventures of the Enchanted Forest, and is for this purpose presented by the lady with an enchanted scarf, whose magic powers are to serve him in his enterprise. In the hut of a fisherman he sees Coralia, the niece of Fraisondin, the spirit of the waters. He saves the girl, by means of the magic scarf, from death, risked by her heedlessness and after avowing his love for her espouses her forgetful of his faith to Bertha. His return to the coast is followed by the appearance of the fisherman and his wife to claim the daughter of the duke as their own, lost at the time they first found the infant niece of the water spirit. Indignant at the want of feeling with which Bertha treats her parents, the duke determines on abandoning her, and Coralia in pity offers her a residence in the castle of Sir Hildebrand, which Bertha accepts, but here the ancient love revives and Sir Hildebrand forgets his passion for Coralia. Fraisondin, who visits the castle from the bubbling waters of a fountain in its precincts, inspires Coralia with jealousy and confirmed in this idea by the sight of the magic scarf, with which she maintains the passion of the knight, she tears off her wedding-ring and plunges in the fountain, while the avenging Fraisondin drags Sir Hildebrand to destruction."

Madlle. Carolina Rosati arrived with a preliminary flourish of trumpets from the Morning Post and other papers. Contrary to custom she justified most that had been predicated in her favour. She has an expressive face, and a slight and graceful figure. Her execution is extremely natural, and easy, and perhaps, for this reason, seldom or never surprises. Her action and miming, however, are not original, the charming and incomparable Carlotta Grisi being her evident type—and who that attempts to soar in her element can hope to triumph?—"who can imitate that which is inimitable?" (as Byron said of Scott in a foot-note—thinking quite the opposite all the while.) Nevertheless, Mdle. Rosati has great and incontestible merits, and was often and deservedly visited by marks of undeniable approval from the audience. But the triumph of the evening was the Pas de Rosières, danced by a very young debutante (who exhibited no signs whatever of debutantish nervousness), Mdle. Marie Taglioni, daughter, we are told, of M. Paul Taglioni, the inventor of the present ballet, and by consequence niece to the great Taglioni herself. Whether Marie Taglioni will ever be Marie Taglioni—i. e. worthy of her name—remains to be seen. She is as pretty and quaint in personal appearance as can well be, and her Chinese coiffure adds to the piquant originality of her countenance. Then her figure, tres prononcé for her years (some seventeen, they say) is exquisitely moulded, after a model that Titian would have exulted over. Her feet, like little mice, run here and there, with a quickness almost imperceptible, as the deceptive twinkling of those far-off suns, which astronomers have dubbed "fixed stars." Then her legs (dare we name them!) are, as it were, chiselled from the sloping limbs of one of Raphael's (not Canova's) "Graces." Altogether there is something so young, so singular, so fresh, so pretty, and so generally attractive about little Marie Taglioni that no wonder everything she did was applauded to the very echo. Still, prejudice apart, she already exhibits unusual talent, and moves about with grace; her limbs are as pliant as they are well moulded, and there is an originality of coulour in much that she effects. There is, so to speak, a sinuousness in her motions that makes it appear as though she were not an osseous biped. In some of her attitudes we remarked a tendency to voluptuousness that in one so young excites admiration and delight, but would hardly be so graceful and so innocent in adult woman-hood. The other dancers—M. Louis D'Or (a novelty from Paris), Madame Petit Stephan (whom all of us know and admire), Mdle. Honoré (an excellent coryphée), Mdle. Carolina Baucourt (another handsome and flexible importation of whom more anon), and MM. Gosselin, Venafré, and Gouret (veterans highly esteemed in their walk, or rather "step"), exerted themselves efficiently, and gained their full meed of approval. The ballet is magnificently got up in all its appointments, and the scenery is highly creditable to the talented Mr. Marshall and his assistants. Some of the scenic contrivances are astonishing, when the resources of the theatre in this particular are taken into consideration. The performances concluded about a quarter to two o'clock.

So much for the opening of Her Majesty's Theatre on Tuesday, Feb. 16th, 1847. That Mr. Lumley has fought manfully against adverse circumstances cannot be denied. The wonder is, after what has happened, that he has gathered confidence and force enough to fight at all. Now that he is in the field, however, in advance of his powerful adversary, he must stand to it like a hero. There are many who would rejoice at the downfall of his establishment; but we are none of these, whatever he may think, and whatever they may tell him, who are not our well-wishers, nor his most prudent, however they may be his most zealous adherents. Mr. Lumley has begun the season nobly, and has bravely defied adversity. Let him proceed in this fashion, and he will find among his warmest backers, all those who respect truth and detest puffing.

PROVINCIAL INFORMATION.

Our contemporaries in the provinces are eager to give their readers as much musical news as possible, and, sooner than not be prepared with a budget, they coin it from their own brains. Take the following example from The Liverpool Chronicle, the writer of which would appear to know more than all the London papers put together, and what is stranger, more of some people's affairs than they know themselves:—Observe what is stated of Mr. Bunn, in relation to the Jenny Lind business, and of Mr. Balfe, quoad the dispute between the Drury Lane lessee and himself, on the first night of The Bondman.

"There is still some reason for supposing that Mrs. Butler and Macready, by their united efforts in one establishment, before the season is over, will rejoice the hearts of the lovers of the "legitimate," by presenting our standing plays in the metropolis. Whether at Drury Lane, or not, it might be premature at present to state; one thing I can vouch for, the opera and ballet at that gigantic theatre have for some nights past ceased to draw, and that though Mr. Bunn, the lessee's name, does not appear in the newly issued programme of the Royal Italian Opera at Covent Garden, he is assuredly engaged at that establishment, and steps across to assume the direction sometime before the commencement of the season, protracted till after Easter. This engagement will oblige Mr. Bunn, active as he is, to withdraw either in part or altogether from Old Drury; nearly all the chief dancers and coryphées at Drury Lane have been engaged at the two rival Italian houses; this puts an end to the ballet at the Lane, instead of which spectacle is to be introduced should the theatre continue open, if not, why then we may have Butler and Macready. Bunn, I have it from good authority, is most anxious to keep his promise with the public in respect of Jenny Lind, the Swedish nightingale; he has refused, within the last few days, no less a sum than £3,000, offered by the lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre, to give up all claim to Jenny. Bunn still refuses, but I have reason to believe, were he allowed to present the fair and accomplished Swede on the boards of Drury Lane for but one night—and that the first, he would accept the above sum; then she might warble where she liked. Balfe and Bunn have sometime since made up their differences, the former, I believe, acknowledging that he was in the wrong; he found fault with Harrison's dress in his new opera of the Bondman, imagining that it had come from the pegs of the Rue de Fripperie, which it certainly did not, whatever might be said of some of the others. However, the parties have come to an understanding. Monday night was a melancholy one; the theatre was devoted to a benefit for the Irish and Scotch, the weather was inclement, and the company scant."

The Mrs. Butler and Macready speculation is, as the Chronicle would say, mere moonshine, and the rest of the information is about as authentic. But our contemporary will observe, "A newspaper must have news or it unfulfils its mission;" and this, we presume must serve for an apology, in the absence of a better.

MADAME BISHOP IN THE PROVINCES.

(From our own Correspondent.)

DUBLIN, MONDAY, FEB. 15.

I INTENDED to have written before this, but the last week has been a very busy one indeed with us. Only imagine a levée, drawing-room, and ball at the castle; a concert monstré for the benefit of the poor; amateur theatricals; and last, though not least, Madame Bishop at the Theatre Royal—all in one week. But do not believe, because I have paid my devoirs at the vice-regal court, danced a quadrille or polka at the ball, or undertook to exhibit my histrionic powers at the performance of the amateur actors, that I have therefore neglected musical affairs, or have forgotten my promise to you concerning Madame Bishop, about whom, I am well convinced, the great mass of your readers are particularly interested. Well, then, passing over the concert monstré on Friday, the 12th (which was nothing else than a repetition of the one given the previous week, and was as thinly attended as the first was crowded), I will introduce you at once to Madame Bishop's performances at the Theatre Royal, Hawkins-street. I have already told you in general terms of the immense success she obtained in the Maid of Artois on her debut; but I think it will be agreeable to the spirit of criticism, and but doing justice to the charming artist, to name a few particulars of the performance. The reception the audience gave to Madame Bishop was most enthusiastic. After the opening recitative—one of the very highest efforts of vocalisation I ever heard—the singer was compelled to pause for several seconds in acknowledgement of the acclamations from all parts of the house. Throughout the whole opera she was listened to with the most breathless attention.

Every motion of the artist was watched, every note was felt, and the audience from the first scene were bound in the spell of the enchantress. You yourself, who have been frequently in our fair city, and have witnessed the impulsiveness of our theatrical assemblies, can understand the furor of an Irish auditory when swayed by genius. The desert scene is by far the best portion of the opera both as a vehicle for the singer and actor; and in this grand scene Madame Bishop shone truly pre-eminent. Nothing could be more exquisitely expressive than her pathos, and nothing more unpretending. It was the deepest passion seemingly evolved without an effort. The rondo finale, one of the most difficult morceaux we have heard, was splendidly given, and rapturously encored. It was an amazing display of vocal facility and brilliancy. Madame Bishop was tumultuously called for at the end, and I do not think, that even with the recollection of continental applause ringing in her ears, she will soon forget the warm greeting she obtained from poor Paddy. It is really the opinion of those conversant with theatrical matters, that Madame Bishop has been the most tremendous hit at the theatre for many years. On Thursday and Friday La Sonnambula was played. Madame Bishop's Amina, on the whole, is a better performance than her Isolide. It is more complete, more touching, if less grand; and the music of Bellini is better fitted to her voice than that of Balfe, which was written for a powerful contralto, not for a brilliant soprano. I need not acquaint you that poor Malibran's voice, notwithstanding its enormous compass, was in reality a contralto. To specify Madame Bishop's best morceaux in the opera of Sonnambula would be to name every portion she sang. From the opening recitative, and aria "Dearest Companion," to the brilliant finale, all was perfect. On Saturday The Maid of Artois was repeated by particular desire of His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant. The house was crowded with all the fashionable residents in the metropolis, and presented an unusually splendid appearance; the whole of the vice-regal party seemed highly delighted with Madame Bishop's performances. Next week, Madame Bishop is announced to appear in an English version of Donizetti's celebrated opera, L'Elisir d'Amore, and also in Anna Bolena. His Royal Highness, Prince George of Cambridge, patronizes the Theatre on Saturday next, and has commanded the performance of the Maid of Artois. Monday the 29th inst., is fixed for the prima donna's benefit. Two circumstances in the engagement of Madame Bishop at our Theatre, are sufficiently to be regretted. The first is, that so great an artist should come amongst us at such a deplorable time—deplorable both as regards the state of the country and the inclemency of the season. The second circumstance which is a cause of regret, is, that this great artist should be so inefficiently supported. Surely some blame, as regards want of foresight, must attach to Madame Bishop in this instance. Could she not find in all London some deserving artist who could take part with her in opera, and support her as she ought to be supported; or was she so ill-judging as to fancy second, or third-rate tenors, and basses were to be found belonging to theatres out of the metropolis; or that the managers of provincial Theatres could supply them? Whosoever the fault lies, the evil consequence has fallen on Madame Bishop; for great as her success has been, and splendid the triumphs that awaited her, her performances have lost much of their importance by the incomplete manner in which they were represented. When Grisi, or Castellan, comes to Dublin, does one or the other come unattended by an efficient support? Will the one perform without Mario, or the other without Lablache? No, they are too good judges, and are well aware that the greatest talent, single-handed, has up-hill work of it. It is a matter of the utmost surprise to me that Madame Bishop has not brought her own party with her. It is astonishing how, with little or nothing to assist her performance, she can produce the immense effect she does; and by her sole powers, histrionic and lyric, keep the audience interested for three or four hours. Next Tuesday, the first philharmonic concert takes place. The charming duet singers the Misses Williams, are engaged, as is also your celebrated London pianist, Mad. Dulcken. I was not little amazed at a puff positive—I can call it nothing less—which has appeared here in all our papers, respecting a new Cadenza received direct from Dr. Mendelssohn, expressly written for Madame Dulcken, and which is to be introduced by her in his second concerto on Tuesday next. I have heard of a steam-boat going to a certain place direct, and of hampers of wine sent direct; but a travelling, or transmitted Cadenza I have never had the luck to hear of before. I forgot to mention in my theatrical notice that our spirited manager, Mr. Calcraft, brought out the operas, as regards the mise en scene, scenery, dresses, &c., with exceeding care. The procession was splendidly managed. You shall have more news next week. Yours ever,

C. R.

[Our correspondent seems not to understand entirely the meaning of the word Cadenza, as applied in the announcement of Madame Dulcken's forthcoming performance at the Dublin Philharmonic; nor does he seem to read aright the paragraph in the journal which gave the statement. The part of the paragraph alluded to is as follows:—

"We understand Mad. Dulcken has just received, direct from Germany, a new Cadenza, full of new and beautiful passages, for Dr. Mendelssohn's second concert, written expressly for her by the author, and which will be performed for the first time in public at the concert of this society on Tuesday next."

A cadenza in a concerto is a very different thing from a cadenza in a vocal morceau. It is a brilliant development of some motive of the concerto, and is written so as to employ the executive power of the pianist to the greatest advantage. From the intimacy existing between Madame Dulcken and Dr. Mendelssohn, we have no doubt that the cadenza was written expressly by the great composer for the fair pianist.—Ed. M. W.]

THE AFFINITY.

from the German of Gothe.

Continued from page 104.

PART II.—CHAPTER II.

Moved by this occurrence, and by the conversation to which it had given rise, they went the next day to the place of burial, for the decoration and enlivening of which the architect had already made many a felicitous proposal. He was also to extend his cares to the church, a building which had attracted his attention from the first.

This church had stood for many centuries. It was a specimen of the German art and manner, built in due proportion, and decorated in a becoming style. One could easily discern that the builder of a neighbouring convent had, with judgment and love of the work, displayed his talent in this little building also, which always had a pleasing and solemn effect on the beholder, although the new disposition of the interior, in accordance with the Protestant form of worship, had deprived the edifice of somewhat of its majesty and repose.

The architect found no difficulty in obtaining from Charlotte a moderate sum, with which he intended to improve both the outside and inside of the church, and bring it more into harmony with the cemetery. He was himself an adept in manual labour, and some of the workmen, who had been employed on the summer-house, were readily retained until this pious work was finished also.

While they were occupied in examining the building with all its appurtenances, there appeared, to the great astonishment and delight of the architect, a little inner-chapel, which had almost passed unnoticed, and the style of which was still more ingenious and light than that of the church, while the ornaments were more pleasing and elaborate. It contained, moreover, several carved and painted relics of that older form of worship, which knew so well how to mark the different festivals with curious pictures and utensils, every one of them in a manner peculiar to itself.

The architect was obliged to include this chapel in his plan, with the special purpose of making this limited space a monument of former times, and the taste which prevailed in them. He had already thought of adorning the empty spaces in the vaults according to his own fancy, pleased with the opportunity of showing his talent as a painter; but, for the present, he kept his intention a secret from the other inmates of the house.

In the first place, according to his promise, he showed the ladies his different copies and sketches of ancient monuments, vessels, and other things of a similar kind, and the conversation being directed to the simple grave-hillocks of the northern people, he brought forward his collection of the various weapons and implements which had been found in them. He had all these things very cleanly and portably arranged in drawers and compartments, upon boards covered with cloth, so that old and solemn as they were, they derived something of smartness from his method of keeping them, and might be looked on just as pleasantly as the box of a dealer in fashions. Now he had once begun the work of exhibiting them, as the solitude needed some diversion, he made a practice of bringing out a portion of his treasures every evening. They were chiefly of German origin, consisting of bracteates, solid arms, seals, and other things of the sort. All of them directed the imagination to an earlier period, and as the architect illustrated his entertainment with the earliest attempts at printing and wood-cutting, and the oldest copper-plates, while the church every day, in accordance with his design, approached both in colour and ornament to the character of antiquity, the whole party had frequently to ask themselves whether they really were living in modern times—whether it was not a dream that they were thus tarrying among other manners, habits, and modes of life and conviction.

In this respect, a large portfolio, which the architect at last produced, had an excellent effect. It contained, for the most part, mere sketches, but as these had been actually traced upon the originals, they perfectly retained their antique character, which gave the greatest delight to the spectators. From all the different forms peered forth the purest state of existence, and they were forced to acknowledge that all were good, if not in the noblest style. A cheerful disposition, a willing acknowledgment of something to be revered above us, a quiet resignation in love and hope were expressed in every face and gesture. The old man with his bald head, the boy with his flowing locks, the cheerful youth, the earnest man, the transfigured saint, the soaring angel, all seemed happy in innocent contentment and pious expectation. The commonest event had in it a touch of heavenly life, and an act of worship seemed suitable to their very nature.

To such a region most of them looked as to a golden age that had passed—a lost paradise. Perhaps Ottilia alone felt herself among congenial beings.

Who could have resisted, when the architect offered to paint the spaces between the arches of the chapel, after these figures, and thus to leave a memorial in a place where he had spent so happy a time. He stated his views on this subject with some degree of melancholy, for he could see from the very nature of affairs, that his sojourn in so perfect a society could not last for ever; nay, that perhaps it would be brought to a speedy termination.

Altogether these days were not rich in events, but they afforded abundant occasions for serious conversation. We, therefore take the opportunity of communicating some of the remarks which Ottilia noted down in her diary, to which we can find no better introduction than a simile which was forced upon us, as we contemplated her charming leaves.

We have heard of a peculiar arrangement in the English navy. All the ropes of the royal fleet, from the strongest to the slightest, are so spun, that a red thread goes through the whole, which cannot be taken out without undoing the entire rope, and which allows it to be seen, even in the smallest pieces, that they belong to the crown.

Thus through Ottilia's diary, there is a thread of inclination and attachment which at once unites and marks the whole. Hence these remarks, reflections, extracted aphorisms, and whatever there is of the sort, have quite a peculiar importance, when considered with respect to the writer. Every single passage selected and communicated by us will sufficiently testify this fact.

EXTRACTS FROM OTTILIA'S DIARY.

To rest hereafter by those whom we love is the pleasantest anticipation which man can form, if he looks beyond the present life. "To be collected to one's own"—that is such a feeling expression!

There are several kinds of monuments and testimonials to bring nearer to us that which is remote or has departed; but none are so important as the portrait. The portrait of a beloved person, even when unlike, has a charm about it, just as it is oftentimes pleasing to dispute with a friend. We feel in a pleasant manner that we are two, and yet cannot be severed.

We often behave to an individual actually present as if he were a portrait. He need not speak to us, look at us, or trouble himself about us. We see him, we feel our relation to him, a relation which, perhaps, may grow closer, without anything being done by him,—without his ever feeling that he is to us no more than a portrait.

We are never satisfied with the portraits of those we know. On this account I have always pitied portrait-painters. We very seldom exact from people an impossibility, and yet we do it in this very case. They have to include in their picture the person's relation to others, his inclination and disinclination. They are not only to show their own conception of a man, but the way in which every one else may conceive him. I am not surprised that artists of this class gradually become obdurate, indifferent, and obstinate. This would be of little importance, if we were not in consequence deprived of the likenesses of many persons who are dear to us.

The architect's collection of weapons and old implements, which, together with the body, were covered with lofty mounds of earth and pieces of rock, show how useless are all the precautions of man, to preserve his personality after death. Such contradictory beings are we! The architect confesses that he himself opened such graves of our forefathers, and then proceeds to busy himself with monuments for posterity.

But after all, why should we be so now? Is everything that we do, done for nothing? Do we not put on in the morning, what we again take off in the evening? Do we not travel, for the sake of returning? And why should we not wish to slumber by our own, even if only for a century?

If we see the many sunken tomb-stones, trodden down by the church-goers, as well as the churches themselves that have themselves fallen down on the graves, the life after death appears to us as a sort of second life, which begins with the portrait, or super-scription, and which lasts longer than the proper living life. But even this second life becomes, sooner or later, extinct. Time will not be deprived of its rights with either monuments or men.

(To be continued.)

. To prevent misunderstanding, it may be stated that the copyright of this translation belongs solely to the translator.

SONNET.

NO. XXII.

I HAVE read many tales of deepest woe,
Of agonies that snapp'd the heart in twain—
Of griefs that gnaw'd away the madden'd brain,—
And I, perchance, have heav'd a sigh or so.
I've read too of a hell where wretches go,
Through halls, with glitt'ring treasures heap'd in vain,
Because their heart is writhing with the pain
Of flames infernal, in the breast that glow.
But little dream'd I that on me would fall
This with'ring curse, that plainly shows to me
How sadly true those wondrous legends are.
Now I know all—the scorching heart—all—all
The grasp that will not let its victim go—
The darkness—leave me not, my only star.

N. D.

CONCERTS.

MR. GEORGE MARSHALL.—This professor gave his first practical lecture on the art of singing to an attentive audience, on Monday, at the Music-Hall, Store-street. The syllabus of the lecture was divided into the following heads:—

1. The Human Voice superior to every instrument of mechanical invention—2. The necessity of cultivation, to produce both tone and expression—3. Nationality of Instruction, and its good effects in Germany—4. Elementary observations—5. Disadvantages under which the English singing-master has to labour—6. Importance of studying where the breath should be taken in singing, and a singular mistake illustrated by the neglect of it.

The lecture, which was sensible and instructive, was rendered musically interesting by a diversity of apt illustrations. In speaking of respiration, Mr. Marshall gave an instance of its proper use in Knapton's ballad "There be none of Beauty's daughters." This is an insipid and worthless composition,* but it served the lecturer's purpose exceedingly well. A much more agreeable illustration was that of expression, most fitly illustrated by Sterndale Bennett's exquisitely pathetic canonet "To Chloe in sickness," (from his "Six Songs," published by Coventry and Hollier.) The points of ornament (its abuse) and of pronunciation (its importance) were illustrated by two very poor compositions, J. P. Knight's "Go, forget me," and Miss Davis's "Ruth." Poor as they are, however, they served Mr. Marshall's turn, and helped to render his meaning clear. Much more pleasing were some illustrations from the compositions of Haydn, Mendelssohn, and Macfarren. Altogether the lecture was both interesting and instructive, and its design and execution were highly creditable to Mr. Marshall. The audience were evidently pleased, and the entertainment concluded at an early hour.

* The same words have been beautifully set by two composers, a German and an Englishman—Mendelssohn and T. M. Mudie.

BEAUMONT INSTITUTION.—The Sixth Concert of the season was given at this place on Tuesday the 9th instant. The vocal performers were Madame Albertazzi, Mrs. A. Newton, Miss Lockey, and the Messrs. H. Phillips and Lockey. The instrumentalists comprised Mr. Thirlwall, (violin), Mr. Chitty, (organ), and Mr. Maurice Davies, (piano). Madame Albertazzi gave a scena of Verdi's, the finale to Cenerentola, took part in a duet of Mozart's with Mr. H. Phillips, and sang the favourite Irish ballad, "Terence's Farewell." The fair vocalist was more at home in the Italian than the Irish music. We have heard the ballad, "Terence's Farewell," so exquisitely rendered by another fair singer* on many occasions, that we could not but feel a sensible difference, as it was given by Madame Albertazzi. Ballad singing is a far greater art than many are led to imagine, and requires a delicate appreciation and great vocal capabilities, while the bravura, the cavatina, and such like morceaux of the Italian school, demand, for the most part, brilliancy of execution and vigour of expression. Madame Albertazzi was far more successful in the cavatina from Cenerentola than in the Irish ballad, and sang it with great effect. Mrs. A. Newton added considerably to the attraction of the evening. She gave Bishop's "Lo! here the gentle lark" in a manner that exhibited the facility and power of her voice, and sang two ballads which elicited great applause. This lady appears in high favour with the audience of Beaumont Square. Miss Lockey introduced a song of Miss Cowell's, another of Benedict's and one of Moore's Melodies, all excellently rendered. Mr. Lockey and Mr. H. Phillips varied the entertainments with vocal performances of different characters. The former gentleman gave a very pretty serenade of Hatton's, "The Silver Moon is keeping Watch," deliciously. We hope to see Mr. Lockey ere long transferred from the concert-room to the stage. He would become, we are assured, with a little practice, an inestimable addition to our present operatic corps. Mr. H. Phillips's descriptive transatlantic scena, "The Prairie on Fire," was loudly applauded. In addition to the pieces we have named, there were sundry songs, duets, &c., which call for no particular notice. Mr. Thirlwall's violin performance received its due meed of approval at the hands of the auditors. A "Grand Duo Brillante," of Benedict and De Beriot, for violin and piano, was executed with spirit by him and Mr. Maurice Davies, the latter-named gentleman really surprising us by his improvement in style and execution. The performances concluded with the overture to Tancredi on the organ, very well executed by Mr. Chitty, though little adapted for that instrument. Mr. Maurice Davies conducted all the vocal pieces and performed his task most effectively. The hall was very well filled.

MR. LINDSAY SLOPER'S First Classical Soirée took place at the Beethoven Rooms, Harley Street, on Thursday evening, and was fully and fashionably attended. This concert deserves the most especial notice from us, both as regards the materials of the programme and the mode in which the entertainment was conducted. There is nothing more absurd than the manner in which concert-givers spin out their schemes, fancying that those who pay cannot have too much for their money, and that they convey pleasure to their audiences in the direct ratio of the length of the programme. There is no greater fallacy existing. A brief entertainment which consists of the best selection of music, will invariably afford more gratification than a long, drawling concert, however it may be diversified with excellencies. This more particularly applies to the class of entertainments to which the Soirée, given at the Beethoven Rooms on Thursday night, belongs. Mr. Lindsay Sloper has set an example to all who provide entertainments for the public, which we have no doubt will be speedily followed. His Concert commenced at half-past eight, and was over at a quarter-past ten. There was no division of the entertainment into parts, but all progressed to the end without a break. The consequence was that every individual remained to the end, and no one felt the least fatigue or ennui, the invariable results of those Alexandrine music evenings which are as much in vogue, and every bit as tedious, as long Thursdays at the Opera. With respect to the programme of Mr. Sloper's concert, which we annex, our readers will perceive that a more admirable selection it was impossible to make:—

Fantasia for two performers on one pianoforte, Messrs. Benedict and Lindsay Sloper; W. A. Mozart. Selection from the Suites de Pièces, Handel, pianoforte, Mr. Lindsay Sloper. Sicilienne, "Ogni pena," Pergolesi, Miss Dolby. Sonata, (Op. 29, No. 2), L. van Beethoven, pianoforte, Mr. Lindsay Sloper. Song, "The Fairy's Reproach," Lindsay Sloper, Miss Dolby, (words by Sir Bulwer Lytton). Prelude in A flat major, from Op. 25, and Study in F minor, Mendelssohn, pianoforte, Mr. Lindsay Sloper. Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, (Op. 70, No. 2), L. van Beethoven, Messrs. Willy, Rousselot, and Lindsay Sloper.

The fantasia of Mozart was very finely performed, the fugued allegro of the first and last movements affording each artist an admirable vehicle for the exhibition of his powers. The selection from the Suites des Pièces was very happy, especially the allemande, and adagio and fugue, the execution of which, by Mr. Lindsay Sloper, was received with earnest applause. Indeed we have rarely heard a more brilliant performance than the very difficult, and, at the same time, very exquisite fugue of the great master, interpreted by this gentleman. The "Sicilienne" of old Pergolesi is very quaint and beautiful. It was charmingly sung by Miss Dolby. The sonata of Beethoven, it is needless to say, is one of the grandest efforts of the master. It was the great feature of the entertainment, whether we look to the composition or the performance. Mr. Lindsay Sloper seemed to feel every note of the great author in its intense meaning, and produced a great effect by his very fine interpretation of this sublime work. Mr. Sloper's song, an expressive and spirited composition, was so well given by Miss Dolby, as to be entitled to a unanimous encore. Mendelssohn's fine prelude (from his Six Preludes and Fugues, published by Addison and Hodson) and his Study (from the "Etudes de Perfectionnement," published by Chappell) exhibited in another mode the excellence of Mr. Sloper's playing. The magnificent trio of Beethoven, extremely well played, concluded one of the very best entertainments of the kind which we ever attended.

CHORAL HARMONISTS.—We attended the fourth meeting of the present season of the Choral Harmonists, at the London Tavern, on Monday night. In the first part we heard a composition which we seldom have an opportunity of hearing performed anywhere complete, namely, the Litany in B flat, by Mozart. The chorus, "Pignus Futuræ," which occurs in it, is well known by all amateurs, but the remaining portion of the composition, equally grand and effective, is seldom, we might be justified in saying, never produced by our choral societies. Besides this, we had the "Dixit Dominus," of Romberg. The performance of these two works is sufficient to justify us in pronouncing this society one of the foremost in the good cause; but in undertaking to present to our city friends the "Walpurgis Nacht" of Mendelssohn, we are willing to accord them the highest amount of praise. As if not satisfied with giving us these we had, further, Mozart's delicious buffo song from the Seraglio, so well sung by Mr. Machin, as to command an encore—Mendelssohn's song, "Auf dem Wasser," sung charmingly by Miss Dolby, for whom it was written by the composer—the "Song of the Savoyard," by the same, equally well sung, by Miss Dolby; and a Benedictus for a tenor voice, composed by Miss Masson, sung by a young lady from the Academy. With the addition of Boyce's old-fashioned air from his Solomon, "Softly rise," remarkable only for the chaste manner in which it was sung by Mr. Lockey, and Wilbye's madrigal, "Sweet honey sucking bees," we have named every piece in the programme. Were we disposed to be critical on this occasion we should like to have heard about twenty more violins in Mendelssohn's overture, and a little more light and shade observable throughout the composition. It is, however, but doing Mr. Westrop justice to add that endeavours were manifest in the singing of the chorus to produce such effects as were intended by the composer, and interpreted by the talented conductor. The band, led by Mr. Dando, performed its task on the whole well. Miss Lockey, Miss Dolby, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. Machin, were the principal singers. Miss Lockey sang the portion allotted to her with her usual good taste. Miss Dolby, a favourite everywhere, seems to be entirely among her own friends at these concerts, and whether feeling so she exerts herself with her usual kind disposition to enhance their pleasure we know not, but we certainly think that we never hear her sing better than when at the London Tavern. In conclusion, we say "Go on and prosper." A few such societies as the Choral Harmonists scattered throughout the length and breadth of the land would do much towards the development of the "materiel," which we have always advocated exists in England, but which from various causes lies hidden.—From a Correspondent.

* Miss Dolby.

EXETER HALL.—The performance of the Sacred Harmonic Society on Thursday was miscellaneous. In the first part there was Handel's overture to Esther; his Coronation Anthem, "The king shall rejoice," composed for the coronation of George the Second, in 1727; Mozart's celebrated Service, No. 12; and the Hymn, "Alia Trinita Beata." The second part consisted of Handel's "Dettingen Te Deum." Mrs. Sunderland, Miss Dolby, Mr. Manvers, and Mr. Phillips elicited an encore by the chaste manner in which they sang the hymn, "Alia Trinita Beata," one of the "Laudi Spirituali," a collection of ancient Italian melodies, dating as far back as the twelfth century. Dr. Burney considers these hymns to be the most ancient melodies extant. Mozart's splendid Service was the most complete and excellent performance of the evening. The soloists and choir were equally to be commended, and the band did its duty efficiently. The horn parts in the "Benedictus," were beautifully played. The "Dettingen Te Deum" occupied the whole of the second part, but its performance was less satisfactory than that of Mozart's Service. Mr. Genge, who sung the alto part throughout, acquitted himself with much talent. The other vocalists were excellent. Mr. Phillips sang his air capably, and the trumpet obbligato of Mr. T. Harper was deserving of the applause it elicited. The Hall was well attended. The next concert is announced for the 4th of March, when will be performed a selection of anthems and cathedral music, including compositions by Gibbons, Purcell, Wise, Blow, Creighton, Croft, Weldon, Greene, Robinson, Boyce, Kent, &c., ranging from 1610 to 1795, concluding with Mendelssohn's "Te Deum," composed last year. Handel's Oratorio, "Belshazzar," will be performed, or the first time, by the Society, on Friday, March 19.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

DRURY LANE.—A very crowded audience assembled at this theatre on Monday, to hear Mr. W. V. Wallace's new opera, Matilda of Hungary, which had been announced for that night several days previously in the bills. The greatest excitement prevailed respecting the second operatic composition of the talented author of the successful Maritana, and the theatre in consequence was filled long before the time fixed for the commencement of the performance, which was stated to be a quarter to seven. The hour arrived, and the band were in the orchestra, and the audience were on the tenter, or tender-hooks of expectation, and the entrée of the conductor, in the person of the composer, was breathlessly awaited, and the whole house was mute with suspense. But five minutes elapsed, and five minutes more, and it was eight, and still no appearance of the opera being about to commence. The foot-lights were still down. Eight o'clock passed, and five minutes past eight, and ten minutes past eight, and then the multitude seemed to be all at the same time moved as with one fear.

"At length one whispered his companion, who whispered another."

And so the fear was sent round from ear to ear, and out they spoke at last for Bunn and Wallace. After some minutes of general groans, hisses, yells, oh's, and mingled applauses, Mr. Bunn stalked dolefully on the stage, followed by Mr. Wallace, who crawled lugubriously behind, both evidently in a moral fix. They were received with great applause, sprinkled with a small drizzling shower of sibillations. Mr. Bunn having waited some time till there was a lull in the storm, thus addressed the audience—"Ladies and gentlemen, in the whole course of my professional administration, I never stood before you on so distressing an occasion as I do at the present moment. Seven minutes before the usual time for the raising of the curtain this paper was put into my hand, the certificate of a medical gentleman, intimating the utter impossibility of Miss Romer appearing before you this evening from sudden indisposition. (Great sensation.) In such an afflicting state of things what can I do? I throw myself completely on your kindness. I cannot think for one moment of sacrificing the magnificent work of my highly talented friend (pointing to Mr. Wallace) by mutilation; and I can assure you, ladies and gentlemen, that more care and expense have been lavished upon the production of this opera, than were ever before laid out on any entertainment at Drury Lane. In such a state of things what am I to do? Ladies and gentlemen, I appeal to you, trusting to the liberality you have always shown me, and confiding in my own humble endeavours, exerted on all occasions to merit your best favours, I demand of you what I am to do?" The audience having uttered no response to the manager's interrogatory, he continued. "All that we can do, shall be done. To such as are not willing to remain for the performance we shall provide, their money shall be returned, or tickets given them for the next representation of Mr. Wallace's opera. Ladies and gentlemen, I will be just, if you will be generous." This pithy sentence was received with great cheers, and Mr. Bunn again demanded of the audience what they would require? An immediate call was made for the overture, to which Mr. Bunn replied, that the overture would be given with pleasure; and allowing Mr. Wallace to jump from the stage into the orchestra, Mr. Bunn made his bow and disappeared. The overture was listened to with the greatest attention, and was tremendously applauded, barely escaping an encore, and Mr. Wallace left his post. What was to come next was the natural question that arose to every lip. After some delay, the uproar was about to recommence, when Mr. Harley made his appearance, amid a tempest of conflicting displays of feeling. It was long ere he could be heard. At last he said, "Ladies and gentlemen, I am requested by Mr. Bunn to express his sincere gratitude for the kind manner in which you have received"—the rest of the sentence was drowned in shouts of laughter, groans, and inarticulate murmurs of disapprobation. Mr. Harley stood for several minutes exposed to the hail-storm, confronting it like a sturdy oak. At last he found an opportunity to acquaint the audience that the Bondman would be given, and that Miss Messent would undertake Miss Romer's part, adding, that any lady or gentleman who was dissatisfied with the proposed entertainment, by leaving an address at the door, would receive a ticket for the first performance of the new opera. Mr. Harley then withdrew, whereupon ensued such an uproar as we have not witnessed since the great Tamburini row at the Opera. The first act and part of the second act of the Bondman were performed without a note being heard. Meanwhile, the house began to thin, and the malcontents having expended a vast deal of breath to no purpose, quietly gave in, and the remainder of the Bondman was listened to with great attention. Of the performance we can only notice the very efficient substitute Miss Messent made for Miss Romer. In some respects she sang capitally, and had she been as well up in the third act, as she seemed to be in the other two, we should have felt no loss from the absence of the prima donna assoluta. Miss Messent received great applause, and the audience displayed the best possible taste in extending its indulgence to her in the latter portion of the opera, in which she was evidently not prepared. She was called for at the end, and obtained the unanimous approbation of the house. The opera was followed by the new ballet, The Pretty Sicilian, in which the fascinating danseuse, Mademoiselle Baderna, exhibited her very superior artistic powers, and won the greatest applause. This charming artiste bids fair before long to win the highest laurels in her profession. She is yet very young, but nature has done every thing for her, and she requires time only to perfect her in the highest branches of her art. We fervently hope that no accident will prevent the production of Mr. Wallace's opera on Monday next, for which evening it is announced in the bills and advertisements.

FRENCH PLAYS.—On Monday, we saw Mademoiselle Clarisse in a part to which she does so much justice, which she renders so interesting, and in which her talent is seen to such advantage, that we were quite taken by surprise, and now frankly acknowledge that we had much underrated her talents. We had conceded to her great praise for the energy, tenderness, and feeling, which she has thrown into the parts allotted her; but a light broke upon us on seeing her outburst, in the fifth act of the Docteur Noir, in favour of her injured husband, that she was a great tragic actress at the same time; and we were further confirmed in this opinion on Monday night. Not that Mademoiselle Clarisse could embody the grand conceptions of Racine or Corneille, where the heroine represents a type of the highest poetical order: her emotions are those of a somewhat inferior rank, of those that appeal to the heart, but not the less sublime on that account. We would not have her struggling against the immutable decrees of fate like Antigone or Herulone, or divided between two of the deepest emotions which the soul is susceptible of conceiving, a brother's and a lover's love, like Camille in Les Horaces; but the sacred feelings of maternal attachment are rendered by her in a manner, if not ideal, at least so natural in their unrefined simplicity, the unity of character is so well preserved throughout, the maternal love of the uneducated simple woman is so energetically portrayed, that we feel the conviction forced home upon us that she is the greatest actress of the present day in this branch of the drama. The piece by Messieurs. Dennery and Mallan is well imagined and carefully written, the sentiments conveyed are strictly moral, and the language is not redundant of that magniloquent bombast which distinguishes most of the productions of the Porte St. Martin. All the feelings called into action are natural and true, and these are made subservient to the proposed end without infringing on the most prudent delicacy. A mother's love for her child—this is the whole of the story; her marriage, her struggles against poverty, her devotion to her offspring, her toils by day and by night, her indignation against her husband's bad conduct, not on her own account, no! she could suffer neglect and hunger and privations of all sorts, but her child! her every idea, every thought is concentrated in him, her child must not suffer, he must be nurtured and cared for, he must live; she is patient and enduring for herself, but when her child is in jeopardy she boldly stands forth and dares her husband face to face, she rises against the richest and most powerful of the land; she is not to be put down by the most fiendish villain or bought over by the most alluring promises of wealth, no, no, her child is herself, a thousand times more than herself; how much she has suffered for it, alas! none can tell; how every torture, every anguish undergone on account of her child has increased her love for it; she knows, but does not stay to enumerate or describe how each successive torment, as it in succession falls upon her, lacerates her soul, increases her maternal sorrows, and proves to demonstration that she cannot be more miserable, and how happy she was or should have been before the last stroke fell upon her devoted head. How grateful she ought to have been in the midst of all her misery! she had him near her, was not that sufficient? How poignant her grief on parting with him to deposit him at the asylum of the Rue d'Enfer, the hospital for enfants trouvés. Yet how consoling to know he was alive and properly cared for! How violent her anguish when she finds he has been stolen! yet she hopes to find him again; but when she does find him and is accused of madness, then her soul can bear no further torture, for she is led to doubt that her child ever existed, the paroxysm is at its height. These are the details. Such is Marie Jeanne, la femme du peuple. If this be not a grand conception we frankly own we are at a loss to conceive what is. If this be not written according to the best models in dramatic literature, we never saw a play that was; and Mademoiselle Clarisse has done her part ample justice in its most minute details; she has created a type, a character, and this is the peculiar attribute of genius. We shall now enter upon what may be called the machinery of the piece. Two marriages have taken place—the one between Sophie and the Count de Bussières, a marriage arranged by the friends and parents where money and rank play the principal part, where the real cement which alone can make such unions desirable and binding—love—is totally wanting, in short, it is a marriage de convenance as the French term it, a sort of absolute axiom, a rule of inverse proportion where the parties are united because they have none of the ingredients to render each other happy. The other marriage is one of inclination, the stock of trade of both being nothing to begin with and no hope of anything in perspective. Marie Jeanne loves her husband and the latter respects and loves his wife; but he is of that easy nature alike applicable to good or evil at the will of the agent. He is unfortunately swayed by a friend, a bon enfant, as he is commonly termed, who practices him away from his work, and makes a spendthrift and a drunkard of him. The consequence is ruin to his wife and the most hopeless poverty at home, whilst all his earnings are spent with his joyous companions at the public-house. Poor Marie Jeanne toils to support her child, night and day, and has hoarded up a sum of thirty francs to pay the nurse, the doctor having expressed his decided opinion that the life of her child is dependant on its being properly nourished. In an unlucky hour the husband finds her treasure and appropriates it to himself. The despair is great on discovering the robber, and she is obliged, as a last resource, to carry her child to the Foundling Hospital. The Countess de Bussières in the meanwhile, now a widow, has also a child out to nurse, but it dies; and Appiani, her doctor, is endeavouring to supply its place by another child, in order to win the mother's affection, and thus make her believe he has saved it from the very jaws of death. By chance he overhears the reproaches of Marie Jeanne to her husband before the Foundling Hospital, and having noted down the description of the signs which she gives him by which he may recognise his son, he enters the hospital and obtains possession of the infant, which he substitutes as the young Count de Bussières. Marie Jeanne has been recommended to the Countess as a good needle-woman, and after the discovery of the loss of her child whom she had gone to reclaim under promise of the Countess's protection, returns to the hotel, and having succeeded, in spite of the doctor, in seeing the infant count, she discovers it is her own son. She immediately claims him, and then it is the doctor pronounces her mad. She is instantly conveyed to a private mad-house by the directions of Appiani, who endeavours to corrupt the doctor; but the latter is too clear-sighted to be imposed upon, and after an effective interview between Marie Jeanne and her husband, in which she becomes convinced that she is not mad, the doctor of the mad-house sets her free. The next act takes place at the country house of the Countess, at Antrail, where she is about to marry Appiani out of gratitude to him for having saved the life of her infant son; but the dénouement of course is marred by his rival, Théobald de Bussières, who is an old lover of the Countess's, even before her marriage; and an hour before the ceremony takes place, when he is congratulating himself on the success of his plans, Marie Jeanne arrives, and is surprised by him in the nursery contemplating her lost child. He threatens to murder her if she does not retire, but she is firm; and just as he is about to execute his purpose, Bertrand her husband arrives, accompanied by Théobald and Rény, the old companion of Bertrand, and who had been commissioned by Appiani to procure him a child, and whose secrecy he had bought by a promise of six thousand francs on the day of his marriage, but who had betrayed him on a promise of ten thousand from the other party. All the personages are now assembled, and justice is meted out to all. Marie Jeanne obtains her infant, the husband and wife are fully reconciled, the Countess weeps for her son, and Théobald has hope that his suit will at last be successful; Appiani is handed over to the tender mercies of the gens-d'armes. We may here mention the principal scenes in which Madlle Clarisse was so eminently successful. When she discovers the loss of the money she had saved for her infant son, and when she deposits him on the turning machine of the enfants trouvés, her grief was heart-rending, full of wailing lamentations and anguish; she faints away when the infant disappears, and her husband awakened from his intoxicating sleep, stumbles over her; he raises her from the ground; but when she discovers that it is he, the author of all her misfortunes, she carries him in the bitterness of her grief; here the acting was at times sublimely pathetic and grand; in vain he pleads for mercy, she is obdurate, for she has lost her child. Then again her gratitude, speechless but deep-felt, when the Countess orders her to reclaim her infant, was most affecting; her ravings at his loss, her joy at finding him again, her horror at being accused of madness, were well conceived, and produced a deep sensation. Her reconciliation with her husband was a good, natural piece of acting as well as her last scene where she says to the Countess, "Je vous eusse donné ma vie, Madame; mais mon fils, c'était impossible." In short we have rarely seen a better piece, and certainly no living actress could have played the principal part so well. Messrs. Langeval and Duméry also played the parts of Bertrand and Remy in the most satisfactory manner. The evening's entertainments terminated by L'Auberge des Adrets, in which Mr. Frederick Lemaitre was as unctuous as ever. We must not forget to mention that Mlle. Clarisse was called for and most enthusiastically applauded and cheered at the end of the fourth act and also after the piece. The house was crowded in every part, and was the best we have seen this year. On Thursday the Mysteres de Paris was given, but we must defer our notice until next week.

J. DE C.—E.

REVIEWS ON MUSIC.

"The Uxbridge Polka," composed by G. H. LAKE. ADDISON AND HODSON.

This is a nice Polka, and though not particularly original, is well written, and the tune is well preserved in the changes. It is in the key of F, and presents no difficulties whatsoever to the pianist. The Uxbridge Polka will find many admirers among the danceuses of the saloons, fashionable and semi-fashionable, &c., &c.

PROVINCIAL.

MANCHESTER.—The sixth meeting for the season of the Gentleman's Glee Club was held in the Club-room of the Albion Hotel on the evening of Thursday week. The vocalists were, Mrs. Sunderland (soprano), Mrs. Winterbottom (contralto), and the Messrs. Wainwright, Bellhouse (chairman of the society), Barlow, Isherwood, J. Isherwood, and J. J. Jones. The glees sung on this occasion were, Bishop's "Blow, gentle gales," and "When winds breathe soft," and Callcott's "With sighs, sweet rose." The solo and chorus from Galatea, "Heart, the seat of soft delight," and "Galatea, dry thy tears," were also given. The finale from Balfe's Enchantress concluded a concert that gave universal satisfaction.

PORTSMOUTH.—Mr. H. A. Lambeth gave a concert on Thursday evening, which was patronised by the Hon. Lady Pakenham. Mr. Lambeth is a pianist of great talent; he succeeds equally well in the compositions of the great masters as in the light effusions of the present day. The Misses Williams and Mr. John Parry sang a variety of songs, and were repeatedly encored. Solos, &c., were performed by Messrs. Lucas and Case on the violoncello, violin, and concertina. The concert afforded the highest gratification.

DORCHESTER.—The Philharmonic Society gave their third concert of the present season on Wednesday evening, the 13th inst. A sinfonia of Haydn's, overtures by Rossini and Auber, and a grand fantasia by Mrs. Bonifas and Mr. Smith, comprised the instrumental portion. Songs, glees, &c., were sung by Messrs. Harper, Smith, Patch, Keats, Dawe, Warren, and Miss Patton. The room was crowded, and the concert gave the highest satisfaction.

LEICESTER.—Mr. H. Russell gave one of a series of concerts last week, which, we are happy to say, was well attended. The audience was delighted with his admirable nigger anecdotes and imitations.—The celebrated Scotch vocalist, Mr. Wilson, gave "a night w' Burns," at our theatre, on Tuesday evening. The programme embraced some of the finest productions of the celebrated poet. We are happy to say the concert was well attended.

CHELSEA.—(From a Correspondent.)—Miss LE GRICE, pupil of M. Cianchettini, gave a concert on Friday evening last, at the Assembly Rooms, which was very fashionably attended. This young lady made a very successful début last December, at M. Cianchettini's concert, in Thalberg's Dei due Stellati Saglio fantasia. Since that she has been in London, and performed once at the Royal Academy of Music, where she was honoured with the approbation of Sir Henry Bishop, Mr. Cipriani Potter, and some other distinguished professors, whose opinions may be trusted. The fair bénéficiaire was assisted on the present occasion by Mrs. Croft and Miss Taylor, as vocalists; the celebrated young harpist, Mr. T. G. Taylor, who performed two of his best compositions; and her master, M. Cianchettini, who officiated as conductor. Miss Le Grice was uncommonly well received in all her performances, which were—List's famous Hexameron, J. B. Cramer's elegant Andante and Bravura variations in c. (op. 61), Beethoven's celebrated Op. 53, and Cianchettini's Op. 48—but especially in Beethoven's. Her execution is remarkably brilliant, and her expression very refined and truly classical. If she has any glaring fault, it is that of too much excitement at times—a noble fault, it must be admitted, and of which she will get the better sooner or later. She is only seventeen; therefore she has plenty of time before her, if she will make the best use of it. Mr. and Mrs. Croft were as successful as ever, and so was Miss Taylor in Rossini's Elena, oh! to and Beethoven's matchless Adelaide, which will always be a standing favourite. Indeed this concert gave universal satisfaction.

DUBLIN.—Thursday and Friday last Madame Anna Bishop performed at the Theatre Royal, with immense effect, the part of Amina, in La Sonnambula; and if we were delighted in listening to her admirable singing in the Maid of Artois, we were astonished at the impressive manner and purity of style with which she interpreted Bellini's beautiful opera. She is, in truth, a great artist, and nothing could be more perfect than her wonderful vocalisation in her first cavatina, "Dearest Companions." Her last scene was also very fine, and Madame Anna Bishop surpassed herself in the favorite rondo finale, which was demanded by the enraptured audience three times. After the fall of the curtain cries for "La Bishop" being loud and long, the fair vocalist made her appearance, and with winning and lady-like demeanour, evinced her appreciation of the good taste and kindness of the audience. Saturday, by the wish of his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant and family, the opera of The Maid of Artois was repeated with great effect; on that occasion the house was crowded, and besides the noble party above mentioned there was a great number of our nobility. On to night will be produced the comic opera of the Love Spell; the English version of Donizetti's L'Elisir D'Amore, the part of Adina by Madame Bishop.—The Pilot.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PHILADELPHIA.—(From the Daily Sun, Jan. 1.)—Sivori gave his Farewell Concert on Wednesday evening last, to one of the most discriminating, tasteful, crowded, and fashionable audiences, that have yet greeted with enthusiastic applause the magic of his lyre; and the rapture they evinced was but a just response to the power of the performer, to draw from the violin those melting, touching and wonderful melodies, for which he is so deservedly celebrated. Strains of music such as issue from this gifted artist—the rich gush of melody, that warbles like a bird, or sighs like the moaning winds through groves of citron—at one time sweeping with the power of the full orchestra—and at another, swelling into the clouds, there to mingle with gentler tones that die away into distant echoes, mellowed by the delicious modulations of sentiment and fancy—must be heard to be appreciated, and once heard, must always be enjoyed—for the memory of their sweetness lives in the soul, with the burning brightness of the light of happier days. It was in this spirit, that Sivori executed 'The Grand Concerto'—and that transcendently sweet 'Adagio and Rondo,' composed by Paganini. The duet with Noronha, was admirably executed by that artist, who only requires to be more known, to take a high rank in his divine profession. But the masterpiece 'the Carnival of Venice'—bore off the palm—at once so difficult of execution—so full of contrast and character—portraying every passion—every humour—every motion of joy—every burst of merriment—gay and lugubrious—now laughing with Punch—now joking with Judy—so droll—yet so sentimental and finished—this piece was performed by Sivori in a style only to be excelled by his great master Paganini; and he alone of all the masters of the violin, could take precedence of Sivori, for the masterly command of his bow—and the perfect lightning-like velocity of his fingering, at once so delicate, scientific, and touching, are only exceeded by those flashes of fancy, which he dashes off as impromptu variations, exciting equal surprise and delight, amidst repeated showers of applause. Never did an audience appear more transported with pleasure. Miss Northall executed her songs with her usual skill and science—full of feeling and sweetness. Her 'Ave Maria,' was a delicious banquet of melody in the hands of the Priestess of Song. Even now, we hear its mellifluous melody. Signor De Begnis was not the least of the admired performers, who made this Concert one of the most sumptuous musical banquets of the season. He extorted rapturous applause by his masterly execution of the 'Mad Musician.' His rich vein of humour, and his highly cultivated taste, throw a lustre over his performances that flash vivacity into every bosom. He is, in fact, the life and soul of a classical concert; and always tends to produce that great result of such pleasing exhibitions, the diffusion of a musical taste, and the increase of the votaries who imbibe enjoyment at this innocent fountain.—[We have given the above without altering or omitting a word. It is a capital specimen of Yankee criticism. Were the writer to come and settle in England, the Morning Post would engage him incontinent, at anything per line he pleased.—Ed.]

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of "Douglas Jerrold's Journal."

"THE MUSINGS OF A MUSICIAN."

SIR,—You do me the honour to appeal to me as to whether the opinions you entertain on certain points of my Essay, on "the construction of Fugue" agree with my own. In answer to the call, permit me, first to observe, that I believe you wrote your review of my work in the spirit of sincerity; although, unfortunately, the main truth, or intention of the essay has escaped you, notwithstanding that it was stated at the very commencement of my preface in these terms:—"Fugues may be written in almost any school, style, and species of composition, and if anything truly original remains to be done in this intricate branch of music, it must be effected by the construction, and the figures employed in the counter-point of the figures." For this reason I constructed fugues in styles and methods that have never been contemplated: for example, open fugue; fugues without modulation, (i. e. without change of key), in the major and minor modes; fugues, Al Recitativo; Tempo di Marcia; and strict double counterpoint. Myes say, then is written expressly to show what may be done in counterpoint and fugue—not what has been done. You observe "Mr. Flowers is evidently a fugue writer at heart, and would prefer a subject that will work, to a melody that will please." The subject I selected for my illustrations is a bad one to work: this a good contrapuntist would instantly have remarked. Again, unless melodies be worthy of a fugue writer, he could not be "a fugue writer at heart," except a fugue writer at heart, means a fugue writer without a heart. I perceive you agree with me that our chords are unsatisfactorily named; but you do not admire those I have adopted. Being anxious to avoid unnecessary censure in the bringing out of a system of harmony unknown in this country, I simply translated from the German, the names Abbé Vogler, (the originator of this system), gave to the chords; and I believe, better or more definite ones could not be invented, because, as I observe in my essay, they "describe the real nature of the intervals of which the chords are composed." As an instance, I will take the double diminished triad, so called because it consists of a diminished third, and a diminished fifth. All the chords (as I could easily show), are equally, logically, and systematically named by A. Vogler. In referring to the "fixed rules of dissonances," you complain of this "simple matter," being hidden under a mass of confused terms. Simple as this matter appears to you, no theorist has made it plain to others; and the best musicians (as I proved in my essay) have been confused for want of a system and efficient terminology to explain all the different treatments to which a dissonance may be subjected. Would this have been made a "simple matter" if the terms I gave were nothing better than "confusion"? May not the fact of your having found it simple matter (which before was confused matter), show that the terms themselves brought this matter conspicuously before you? Lastly, you question the utility of knowing under a system, all the inversions of a given melody: had you quoted from my essay, none of your readers, I think, could have coincided with you. I will, therefore, quote from it: "*Inverting melodies is a new and excellent study, and one which teaches how to invent and invert melodies.*" If you hold, Mr. Critic, that melodies cannot be taught on any principles, (and yet there are works written expressly on the subject of melody), then your opposition to my views may, at least, be considered sincere; but I should regret to know that "Douglas Jerrold's Journal" is capable of maintaining and diffusing such a confused and injurious notion upon a matter so simple. Hoping you will excuse the length which your appeal has occasioned, I beg to subscribe myself, Sir, your obedient servant, FRENCH FLOWERS.

N.B.—I forward this to the Editor of the "Musical World," not because I am discontented with the article in "Douglas Jerrold's Journal," but to explain what I considered unnecessary in my essay, thinking such matters were too self-evident and too well understood to require explanation. It is true that I observed the highest praise awarded to Mr. Hamilton's little catechism on music just above the article on my essay; but for the musings of a musician, I could not do better than recommend him to read extracts from Godfrey Weber's preface to his theory of musical composition, which is just published in London; these extracts would enlarge his views, and teach him that high praise is bestowed on minor works by those who most patronise them.

MISCELLANEOUS.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—This evening La Favorita and the ballet of Coralie will be repeated, and on Thursday evening next, a grand performance will be given, the proceeds of which are to be devoted to the Irish and Scotch Charities.

MR. T. SEVERN.—We understand that this talented musician is busily engaged in the composition of a new Serenata, on the same construction as his Spirit of the Shell, which has lately engaged so much attention. The subject is taken from the German Legend of Fridolin, and report speaks highly of the work so far as it has progressed.

A KENTISH BULL.—A Kentish print, in apostrophising the vocal excellences of a Miss Gordon, says:—"Miss Gordon, although a mere child, possesses a musical taste and vocal capacity which are well worth going to hear." We appeal to C. J. and the Trunkmaker for an explanation; in putting their noddles together they may contrive to sift the meaning from the verbose chaff in which it is embedded.

MENDELSSOHN'S ITALIAN OPERA.—(Morning Post, Feb. 19.)—We have seen a private letter from Mendelssohn, which abundantly displays the bungling officiousness volunteered so groundlessly on the subject of his composition of the new opera, of which Scribe transmitted to him the scenario on the 1st of Jan. The great Maestro expresses the highest admiration of the subject, and of the manner in which Scribe has adapted Shakspeare's immortal poem for the lyrical stage. [This is something less than saying nothing at all. Oh, Post! Post! you are in a fix.—Ed.]

PIATTI.—We should have noticed the arrival of this eminent violoncellist, who has been earning new laurels in Italy, of which we have received an account, which we shall print in our next number.

AMATEUR SOCIETY.—The second performance took place last night: we must notice it in our next.

MR. GENGÉ will give his fifth annual Concert at Crosby Hall, on Tuesday evening, March 2.

MACREADY AS A MANAGER.—Mr. Macready's management practically solved the long and hotly discussed question whether a theatre can be conducted without offence to decorum or stimuli to licentiousness? The Puritan divines and their successors, by whom the stage has been denounced, have always assumed the negative, and made it the foundation of their fiercest invectives. They have often grossly exaggerated, and sometimes, in their censures, only betrayed the pruriency of their own imaginations. Still, to a certain extent, there was truth in what they urged. A saloon, with all that had become associated with the name, was deemed essential to the prosperity of a large theatre. Privileges were bestowed to secure the presence of those whose absence was required by all friends of decorum. The most reputable as well as the most disreputable of managers had believed themselves under the necessity of making this gross addition to the attraction of a theatre. The attraction, as it doubtless was to some classes, had become a strong repulsion to better classes. The evil was at once corrected by the Covent Garden management; and afterwards, though under much vexatious oppression, at Drury Lane. The record of the example remains to deprive of every fragment of excuse the managers who, now or hereafter, may sustain or restore the former and most vicious system.—W. J. Fox, in the People's Journal.

MADAME BISHOP will return to London in the second week of April, and remain for the season, having by that time completed all her provincial engagements.

MR. KEARNS.—Several influential members of the musical profession are earnestly interesting themselves to get up a concert for the benefit of the widow and nine orphans of the late Mr. Kearns. This lamented professor, though held in high esteem by his brother musicians, and standing in the very first rank of that department of the art of which his talents were an ornament, was, from the nature of those talents, and from the particular direction of his professional and private pursuits, little known to the general public. His excellence consisted in a peculiar knowledge of the orchestra, and an almost singular capacity for, and success in, the difficult art of instrumentation. Mr. Kearns first distinguished himself in this respect by the additional accompaniments he wrote to Purcell's King Arthur, which was revived about twenty years ago, under the management of Mr. Arnold, at the old English Opera House. At the Westminster Festival, in 1834, he added wind instrument parts to several of Handel's and Purcell's choruses, which were played with great effect; and since that time he has always been employed by the Philharmonic directors to arrange for the orchestra any pieces that have been given at their concerts of which the original scores were not to be obtained. Mr. Kearns, besides his many important engagements as a writer, filled for many years an important post in the Philharmonic and other orchestras. His death has left his large family in circumstances of great distress, and the efforts that are now making to relieve them are highly honorable to the feelings of those engaged in them. A committee has been formed, comprising most of the heads of the profession, for carrying out the business of the concert, which will take in about a month from the present time. Many offers of assistance have been received from the most eminent artists now in London, and we hope in the course of a few days to see an announcement of such names as will constitute a worthy tribute of respect to their brother musician, and an irresistible attraction to the public.—Morning Post.

HAMMERSMITH.—On Monday evening a second representation of Loder's opera, Giselle, by the juvenile portion of the family of Mr. Van Millingen, took place at that gentleman's residence in St. Peter's-square. We gave a notice of the first performance of the opera at the theatre, which pleased us considerably, but the representation on Monday was an improvement in every respect. The parts of Giselle and Albert were capitally undertaken by the young demoiselles, Maria and Hester Van Millingen; but the Fridolin of the petite Fanny Van Millingen was positively extraordinary. This charming and talented child is only four years and a half old, and surprises all who hear and see her. Let our readers fancy a baby like this giving effect to Leffler's part in Loder's opera, ay, and singing his two songs, "Sure such a Beadle," and "My pretty sprites," in such a manner as to make the house ring with acclamations. Such precocity of talent is really wonderful. The audience, during the performance, seemed to be divided between shouts of applause and shouts of laughter. The opera was, on the whole, creditably done, and Mr. Van Millingen deserves the highest praise for the assiduity and patience he has expended in the education of his young family. The whole of the performers, with two exceptions, were under eight years of age. After the opera, little Fanny sang "Why don't the men propose, mamma?" with such spirit and naïveté, as to call for repeated rounds of applause, and the entertainment concluded to the delight and gratification of all assembled.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MISS E. WARD.—In a notice of the concert of Messrs. A. Newton and G. Case, our reporter wrote the name of this promising artist as Miss E. Warde. It should be as above, without the final e. We have been requested to note this erratum, which we do with pleasure.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Warren's 20 Guinea Cottage Piano-Fortes

ARE NOW SELLING AT THE

Manufactory, 71, Leadenhall Street

(Removed from 1 and 2, Liverpool Street, Bishopsgate Street.)
These Instruments are well manufactured of the best seasoned wood, FINE FULL TONE AND GOOD TOUCH. A two years warranty given with each instrument ESTABLISHED TWENTY-ONE YEARS. The only house in London where a good sound instrument can be obtained at the above low price, (for cash only). SMALL PROFIT AND QUICK RETURNS!
JOHN WARREN, 71, Leadenhall St., opposite Aldgate Pump.

Just Published by R. MILLS, 140, New Bond Street,
No. 4 OF GERMAN SONGS,

"HOFFNUNG;"

THE POETRY BY SCHILLER, THE ENGLISH WORDS BY DESU
MUSIC BY HENRY WYLDE, Associate of the Royal Academy.

Also, by the same Author, (first Sonata dedicated to C. POTTER,)

"RHAPSODY;"

BOOK OF GERMAN SONGS.

In the Press—"Caprice," for the Piano-forte.

MEDICAL GALVANISM.

HORNE, THORNTON, & WOOD, Successors to E. PALMER, 123, Newgate-street, in submitting their improved ELECTRO-GALVANIC MACHINES, beg to state, that they have availed themselves of the discoveries of De la Rive, Faraday, Seebeck, and others, by which they are enabled to construct a coil with all the required intensity and quantity of electricity for medical use, thereby effecting both a saving of expense and trouble to the invalid, and placing in his hands an effective, powerful, and simple instrument, that may be excited at a minute's notice, and without trouble.—Price, £3. 3s.; £3. 10s.; and £5. 5s.

PHILOSOPHICAL APPARATUS.—Every description of Apparatus connected with Chemistry, Hydraulics, Hydrostatics, Pneumatics, Frictional and Voltaic Electricity, Electro-Magnetism, Electro-Metallurgy, Optics, (including the Dissolving Views, Photography, &c.) manufactured and sold by Horne, Thornton & Wood, successors to Edward Palmer, 123, Newgate Street, London.

Foreign orders, enclosing a remittance or order for payment in London, promptly attended to.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE

Is acknowledged as the best specific after three years' trial, for improving the voice and removing all affections of the throat, strongly recommended to clergymen, singers, actors, public speakers, and all persons subject to relaxed throats.

The Proprietors have just received the following Testimonial, amongst many others, from MADAME ANNA BISHOP:—

"DEAR SIR,—I am happy to say that all I have heard respecting the efficacy of DR. STOLBERG'S celebrated LOZENGE is perfectly true, as yesterday, feeling myself very fatigued (singing nightly at the Theatre), I took several of the Lozenges, and my voice was very clear, and my throat quite free from relaxation. I am, Dear Sir, Yours truly, ANNA BISHOP."

"18th November 1846.—Jermyn Street."

Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Churchyard; W. Edwards and Newbery and Sons, St. Paul's Churchyard; Sanger, and Dietrichsen and Hannay, Oxford-street; and retail by all respectable Chemists in the Kingdom.

CROSBY HALL, BISHOPSGATE STREET.

Mr. GENGE

Respectfully announces that his

FIFTH ANNUAL CONCERT

Will take place in the above Hall,

ON TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 2nd,

To commence at Eight o'clock precisely.

Principal Vocalists:—Miss A. F. Smith, Miss Cubitt, Miss Thornton, Mrs. A. Newton—Mr. Shonbridge, Mr. N. J. Sporie, Mr. Turner, Mr. T. Williams, Mr. Genge, Mr. Kenny, Mr. J. B. Smith, Mr. H. Smith (from America), Mr. Edney, Mr. Simmons, Mr. Julian Kench and Mr. Blewitt. Violin, Master Thirlwall—Concertina, Mr. G. Case—Conductor, Mr. Parquharson Smith. Tickets, Three Shillings each—a limited number of Reserved Seats, Five Shillings each—may be had of Mr. Genge, 19, Peckham Grove, and at the Hall.

UNDER THE IMMEDIATE PATRONAGE OF HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUCHESS OF KENT.

Mr. MANGOLD

Bids to announce that his CONCERT of

CLASSICAL INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC

Will take place on MONDAY EVENING, March 1,
At the HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS.

To commence at eight o'clock. Instrumentalists:—Messrs. Safnton, Rousselot, Hill, Howell, Clifton, Nicholson, Boose, Jarrett, Keating, Harper and Mangold. Vocalists:—Mad. Morier de Fontaine, Misses Lincoln and Sara Flower. Tickets 7s.; Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d.; may be had of Messrs. Cramer, Beale and Co., Regent-street; Chappell, 90, Bond-street; and of Mr. Mangold, 37, Hunter-street, Brunswick-square.

CHOICE MUSICAL LIBRARY;

ALSO,

VALUABLE VIOLINS,

Being the final portion of
THE COLLECTION OF MR. FRANÇOIS CRAMER.

PUTTICK AND SIMPSON,

(Successors to Mr. Fletcher) Auctioneers of Music and Literary Property, WILL SELL BY AUCTION AT THEIR GREAT ROOM,

101, PICCADILLY,

On MONDAY, March 1st, and following day, at One most punctually,

THE VALUABLE MUSICAL LIBRARY; comprising choice Works in every class of Musical Practice, Church Music, Operas, and Works of the great Masters of all periods; also, a variety of MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, particularly VIOLINS by Cremona and other celebrated Makers, VIOLONCELLOS, PIANOFORTES, &c.—Catalogues will be sent on application.

PIANOFORTES FOR SALE.

A very superior and powerful toned 6½ Octave Rosewood COTTAGE, by Zeither and Co., with metallic string plate, check action, &c., cost 60 guineas a short time since, and will now be sold for half that sum; an elegant Rosewood Semi-CABINET, 6½ octaves, with all the latest improvements, only 35 guineas; a COTTAGE, 14 guineas; a 6-OCTAVE SQUARE, by Broadwood, with metallic spring plate, only £18, cost 52 guineas; a 5½ DITTO, £4. Also, a variety of new and improved CABINET, COTTAGE, and PICCOLO PIANOFORTES, from 25 guineas each. Packed free of expense.

C. SCOTCHER,

(from Colard and Collard's), 60, Mortimer-street, Cavendish-square.

PIANOFORTES TAKEN IN EXCHANGE.

PIANOFORTES.

Parties in want of a really good PIANOFORTE, at a moderate price, will do well to call at

J. C. JONES AND CO.'s,

2, Hanway-street, Oxford-street, a few doors on the right from Tottenham-court-road, who, from their intimate acquaintance with every kind of instrument made, have endeavoured to combine the separate good qualities of each with all the latest improvements, therefore for tone, touch, durability, and appearance these instruments are not to be surpassed at the price.

Instruments tuned, repaired, exchanged, and lent on hire.

Tuning by the year, one guinea. Second-hand Pianos, from 3 to 30 guineas.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY,
EXETER HALL.

On Thursday Evening, March 4, 1847, will be performed

A SELECTION OF ANTHEMS AND CATHEDRAL MUSIC.

Principal Vocal Performers:—The Misses Williams, Mr. Genge, Mr. Hill Mr. Lockey, Mr. Howe, Mr. H. Phillips, and Mr. W. Kench. Organist, Mr. Tarte The Chorus will consist of above 800 Performers.

Tickets, 2s. each; reserved seats, 5s., may be had of the principal Musicians; of Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing-cross; Mr. Mitchell, 39, Charing-cross; and of Mr. Rice, 103, Strand, opposite Exeter-Hall.

THOMAS BREWER, Hon. Sec.

MESSRS.

R. COCKS'S NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC,

BY

W. VINCENT WALLACE.

"The Last Rose of Summer," "The Blue Bell's of Scotland," "Nocturne," each 2s. Pretty Merry Waltz, Anna Waltz, and L'Hirondelle Waltz, each 2s. At the urgent request of the most eminent professors of music, residing in all parts of the united kingdom, Messrs. R. Cocks and Co. have been so fortunate as to obtain from that gifted composer, W. Vincent Wallace, the above-named six pieces, which are written in his happiest style. To meet the amateur's constant demand, they have been written expressly to suit the drawing-room, as they may be acquired by memory.—Now ready, the 26th edition of Hamilton's Dictionary, of 2,500 terms, by John Bishop, price 1s. Pianos for sale and hire.

TO TEACHERS OF MUSIC.

HAMILTON'S PIANOFORTE TUTOR, with Exercises and 36 Airs fingered by Czerny, price only 4s. "This work is clearly written, and intelligible to the most ordinary capacity, and the book is worthy the attention of teachers."—Vide No. 44, Musical World. Also, by Hamilton, his Miniature Course of Harmony and Composition, five vols., each 2s. and 3s. Dictionary of 2,500 Musical Terms, 1s. Catechism of Singing, 3s.; ditto Organ, 2s.; ditto Violin and Violoncello, each 1s. "What Mrs. Barbauld in her day did for the infant reader, Mr. Hamilton in his has done for the musical beginner."—Musical World. "Mr. Hamilton has done for musical students what Mr. Finnoch has achieved for general education."—Bent's Literary Advertiser. And to be had, on order, of all musicsellers and booksellers. Pianos and harps for sale or hire.

SCHOOL MUSIC FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

CHAULIEU'S First Six Months at the Pianoforte, six books, each 3s.; or the six in one volume, 15s. "So excellent is the plan of this truly admirable work, and so novel and ingenious its execution, that it is in the highest degree masterly. Indeed I have no hesitation in saying that for the tuition of children on the pianoforte, no work of equal merit and utility has ever come before the public; and for class or school teaching, it will be found absolutely invaluable. Country teachers and persons who have not had long experience, in tuition will by its aid be enabled to guide their pupils into a short and pleasant path, along which their progress towards excellence will be rapid and certain, and which will assuredly redound equally to their profit and their reputation."—J. Hamilton, author of The Musical Catechisms.

CATHEDRAL MUSIC.

Nearly ready for delivery, DR. BOYCE'S COLLECTION OF CATHEDRAL MUSIC (under the immediate patronage of His Royal Highness Prince Albert),—newly edited by JOSEPH WARREN. In score with an accompaniment for the organ, in three large folio volumes (upwards of 1,000 pages), containing Tallis's full Cathedral Service, and numerous Services and Anthems by Farrant, Byrd, Morley, Orlando Gibbons, Child, H. Purcell, Dr. Blow, and other celebrated church composers, with an appendix to each volume, containing additional Services and Anthems, a Life and Portrait of Dr. Boyce, and new biographical particulars of the composers. Price to subscribers, £4. 14s. 6d.; to non-subscribers, £8 8s. London, Messrs. R. Cocks and Co. Ladies and gentlemen who intend to honour this new edition with their names, will please to forward them as early as possible to the publishers, where may be had John Bishop's edition of Tallis's Order of the Daily Service, in one elegant volume, gilt edges, 6s.; and separate parts of the Morning, Evening, and Communion Services, for treble, tenor, alto, and bass, 2s. each; and organ ditto, 3s.

ROYAL PIANOFORTE SALOON.

SUPERIOR PICCOLO and COTTAGE PIANOFORTES, Nos. 1 to 7, manufactured by R. Cocks and Co., No. 6, Burlington-street, London, Musicsellers to the Queen.—"These pianofortes are remarkable for the beauty and equality of their tone, the facility of their touch, and their extremely elegant exterior. They have the advantage of being firmly and compactly made, of the best-seasoned materials, and of keeping well in tune for an unusual length of time."—Musical World, Dec. 11, 1845. "It is our candid opinion that for workmanship and quality throughout, together with the extreme reasonableness of the prices, these pianofortes cannot be surpassed."—Dramatic and Musical Review, Jan. 24, 1846. N.B. A list of prices and other particulars, to be had gratis, postage free. Seven of Beard's Harps, and One Hundred Pianos for sale or hire, on very moderate terms, including several Grand Squares by Messrs. Collard and Collard, and Broadwood.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847,

A most beautiful Christmas Present, New Year's Gift,
and Etrennes.

M. JULLIEN

Has the honor to announce that his

MUSICAL ANNUAL FOR 1847

Is Published, and is by far the best work of the kind that has ever appeared; contains no less than

THIRTY PIECES OF VOCAL AND FOURTEEN OF INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC,

The greater part of which have never before been published, the copyrights
having been purchased expressly for this work, at an immense cost, with the view of rendering it immeasurably superior to any of its predecessors.

The portion which has already appeared comprises those pieces only whose decided success has induced M. JULLIEN, at the request of numerous influential patrons, to include them in this Selection.

The Illustrations, in addition to the elaborately executed Covers, Title, and Dedication pages, include

TWO MAGNIFICENT VIEWS

OF THE

Interior of Covent-Garden Theatre,

The one taken during the brilliant scene exhibited in that splendid arena of
the occasion of M. JULLIEN'S GRAND BAL MASQUE; the other a VIEW OF THE THEATRE TAKEN DURING THE CONCERTS,
the grouping of the Figures in both Views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant. To those who have visited the Theatre on either occasion, the ALBUM will form a delightful SOUVENIR, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of
the gorgeous scene.

A SPLENDIDLY-COLOURED

PORTRAIT

Of the celebrated Danseuse,

MADLE. FLORA FABRI,

In the admired Pas, LA CASTIGLIANA.

AN ORIGINAL SUBJECT,

"THE FORTUNE TELLER,"

Illustrating BAKER's beautiful Ballad of that name.

The whole of this department of the ALBUM has been under the active superintendence of J. BRANDARD, Esq., whose pencil only has been employed in its production.

Nothing more need be said in favour of this ALBUM, and in proof of its vast superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the Contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe: viz.

ROSSINI,	VERDI,	DONIZETTI,	RUBINI,
ROCH-ALBERT,	HÖELZELL,	GOLDBERG,	SCHIRA,
SCHULZ,	STÖPEL,	DUPREZ,	JOSE GOMIS,
MASARNAU,	MARATZEK,	BALFE,	JULLIEN,
HATTON,	BARRET,	ALEXANDER LEE,	KENIG,
KNIGHT,	BAKER,	FARMER,	LINLEY,
LAKE,	FITZBALL,	MOULD,	HURREY,
FOREST,	ALBERT SMITH,	DESMOND RYAN,	&c.

It will thus be perceived that in addition to the latest compositions of the best English Composers, the ALBUM will contain some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany, France, Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting
the attention of the Continental dilettanti.

PRICE 18s. AND £1. 1s.

ROYAL CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC

214, REGENT-STREET, AND 45, KING-STREET.

SOVEREIGN Life Assurance Company, No. 5, ST. JAMES'S STREET, LONDON.

Trustees.
Sir A. Brydges Henniker, Bart.	Henry Pownall, Esq.
B. Bond Cabbell, Esq., M.P.	Claude Edward Scott, Esq.
Directors.
CHAIRMAN, Lieutenant-Colonel Lord	Henry Broadwood, Esq., M.P.
Arthur Lennox.	Sir James Carmichael, Bart.
DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN, T. C. Granger,	Charles Farebrother, Esq., Alderman.
Esq., M.P.	William Tulloh Fraser, Esq.
John Ashburner, Esq., M.D.	John Gardiner, Esq.
T. M. B. Batard, Esq.	Aaron Asher Goldsmid, Esq.
Philip P. Blyth, Esq.	Henry William Pownall, Esq.

Bankers, Sir Claude Scott, Bart., and Co.
Solicitors, Messrs. Davies, Son, and Campbell.
Assurances on the lives of persons in every station of life and every part of the world, granted on a plan which combines the utmost amount of benefit to the families of the assured at death, with every attainable advantage during life, which the system of Life Assurance is capable of affording.

It affords perfect security in a subscribed Capital, which guarantees the prompt settlement of every claim, with participating and non-participating rates on the lowest scale, especially for terms of years.

The Assured can anticipate or obtain the advance of the full amount of the Policy, on giving approved available security for a certain number of annual payments, as explained by the Prospectus.

Every facility is afforded to persons assuring the lives of others, so as to render such Policies effectual securities.

A new plan of gradual or accumulative Assurance, particularly adapted for young lives, and for such as cannot, without inconvenience, undertake the payment of a fixed premium, securing at once provision in case of premature death, and an accumulating fund, available during life, should occasion require.

ANNUITIES, ENDOWMENTS, ADVANCES, and LOANS, on liberal terms.

Detailed Prospectuses, with forms of Proposal, and every information, may be had on application, either personally or by letter, at the Company's Offices.

The usual commission to Solicitors and Agents.
H. D. DAVENPORT, Secretary.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847.

In consequence of the extraordinary sale of this splendid work (which has been pronounced by the unanimous voice of the public press of the United Kingdom "the best and most perfect work of the kind that has ever appeared"), and the great number of persons who have been unable to procure copies, M. JULLIEN has the honour to announce that he has been induced to Publish

A SIXTH EDITION,

WITH EXTENSIVE ADDITIONS AND CORRECTIONS.

This edition contains nearly fifty pieces of the newest and most fashionable vocal and instrumental music, including all the novelties to be introduced in the forthcoming season. N.B. The price of JULLIEN'S ALBUM is 18s. and £1. 1s. The contents if purchased separately would cost nearly £8.

ROYAL MUSICAL CONSERVATORY, 214, REGENT ST.

To be had of all respectable Music and Booksellers in the Kingdom.

MEDICAL GALVANISM.

HORNE, THORNTHWAITE, & WOOD, Successors to E. PALMER, 123, Newgate-street, in submitting their improved ELECTRO-GALVANIC MACHINES,
beg to state, that they have availed themselves of the discoveries of De la Rive, Faraday, Smee, and others, by which they are enabled to construct a coil with all the required intensity and quantity of electricity for medical use, thereby effecting both a saving of expense and trouble to the invalid, and placing in his hands
an effective, powerful, and simple instrument, that may be excited at a minute's notice, and without trouble.—Price, £3. 3s.; £3. 10s.; and £5. 5s.

PHILOSOPHICAL APPARATUS.—Every description of Apparatus connected with Chemistry, Hydraulics, Hydrostatics, Pneumatics, Frictional and Voltaic
Electricity, Electro-Magnetism, Electro-Metallurgy, Optics, (including the Dissolving Views, Photography, &c.) manufactured and sold by Horne, Thornthwaite and Wood, successors to Edward Palmer, 123, Newgate Street, London.

Foreign orders, enclosing a remittance or order for payment in London,
promptly attended to.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE

Is acknowledged as the best specific after three years' trial, for improving the voice and removing all affections of the throat, strongly recommended to clergymen, singers, actors, public speakers, and all persons subject to relaxed throats.

The Proprietors have just received the following Testimonial, amongst many others, from MADAME ANNA BISHOP:—

"DEAR SIR,—I am happy to say that all I have heard respecting the efficacy of DR. STOLBERG'S celebrated LOZENGE is perfectly true, as yesterday, feeling myself very fatigued (singing nightly at the Theatre), I took several of the Lozenges, and my voice was very clear, and my throat quite free from relaxation. I am, Dear Sir, Yours truly, ANNA BISHOP."

"18th November 1846.—Jermyn Street."

Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Churchyard; W. Edwards and Newbery and Sons, St. Paul's Churchyard; Sanger, and Dietrichsen and Hannay, Oxford-street; and retail by all respectable Chymists in the Kingdom.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA,

COVENT GARDEN.

Established for the purpose of rendering a more perfect performance of the Lyric Drama than has hitherto been attained in this country.

Under the Direction and Management of Mr. BEALE.

The Nobility, Gentry, and Patrons of Music, are respectfully informed that the ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA

WILL OPEN THE FIRST WEEK IN APRIL.

It is proposed to produce, in the course of the season, some of the established works of Cimarosa, Mozart, Rossini, Meyerbeer, and others of the more modern Italian school, including operas by Bellini, Donizetti, Mercadante, and Verdi, on a scale of the utmost perfection in every department; to which intent the management has assembled a company embracing the greatest and most varied talent in Europe.

MADAME GRISI

MADAME RONCONI

SIGNORA ALBONI

(of the Theatre La Scala, and of the Imperial Theatre in Vienna, her first appearance in this country).

SIGNOR SALVATOR LAVIA

(of the Imperial Theatre of St. Petersburg, his first appearance in this country),

(Of the Theatre La Scala, in Milan, and of the Imperial Theatres in Vienna and St. Petersburg, his first appearance on the Italian stage in England).

SIGNOR TAMBURINI

SIGNOR MARIO,

SIGNOR SALVI

PRIMI BASSI BARITONI:—

AND

SIGNOR MARINI

(Of the Theatres San Carlo, Naples, La Scala, Milan, and the Imperial Theatre, Vienna, his first appearance in this country).

SIGNOR ANGELO ALBA

(Of the Theatre Royal, Madrid, his first appearance in this country),

SIGNOR PIETRO LEY

(Of the Theatre Royal, Madrid, his first appearance in this country),

MADAME ANTONIETTA MOLLIDORI

Mlle. AMALIA LINARI

SECONDO TENORE:—

SIGNOR EMMANUELE SLANO

(Of the Theatre San Carlo, in Naples).

MADAME PERSIANI

(her first appearance in London for three years).

Mlle. STEFFANONI

(of the Theatre La Scala, Milan, her first appearance in this country.)

Mlle. CORBARI.

PRIMI SOPRANI:—
AND

CONTRALTI:—
AND

TENORI:—

PRIMI BASSI BARITONI:—

AND

PRIMI BASSI PROFONDI:—

PRIMI BASSI COMICI:—

SECONDE DONNE:—

SECONDO TENORE:—

SIGNOR AGOSTINO ROVERE

(Of the Theatres Royal, Naples, Milan, Vienna, &c. first appearance in this country).

Mlle. LUIGINA BELLINI.

Director of the Music, Composer, and Conductor,

MR. COSTA.

A powerful and numerous chorus of chosen and experienced singers will complete the vocal department.

CHORUS MASTER—Signor BONCONSIGLIO.

PROMPTER—Signor MONTERASI.

THE ORCHESTRA, formed of artists possessing the highest executive powers, will comprise among its members the following distinguished professors, viz.—
First Violins—Messrs. SAINTON, H. BLAGROVE, DANDO, WILLY, GRIE-BACH, WATKINS, CASE, THIRLWALL, THOMAS, MELLON, PATEY, ZERBINI, BROWNE, GOFFREY, HILL, JAY, WILKINS, Second Violins—Messrs. ELLA, NEWSHAM, W. THOMAS, PAYTON, H. WESTROP, H. GRIESBACH, BORT, TRUST, R. BLAGROVE, FERRY, MARSHALL, W. BLAGROVE, BATES, KELLY, BORT, TRUST, R. BLAGROVE, Tenors—Messrs. MORALI, HILL, ALSKEPT, LYON, GLANVILLE, THOMSON, HANN, WESTLAKE, TRUST, R. BLAGROVE, Violoncellos—Messrs. LINDLEY, LUCAS, HATTON, LAVENU, PHILIPS, HANCOCK, HAUSMANN, W. LUDER, GOUBAN, GUEST,
Double Basses—Messrs. ANFOSSI, HOWELL, CASOLANI, GRIFFITHS, C. SEVERN, PRATTEN, CAMPANILE, CASTELL, VAUDERBAN, Harp—Mr. E. PERRY. Flutes—Messrs. RIBAS and DE FOLLY. Oboes—Messrs. BARRETT and NICHOLSON.
Clarionets—Messrs. LAZARUS and BOOKE. Bassoons—Messrs. BAUMANN and KEATING. Horns—Messrs. PLATT, JARRETT, HARPER and RAE.
Ophicleide—M. PROSPERE. Trumpets—Messrs. T. HARPER and HANDLEY. Trombones—Messrs. CIOFFI, SMITHIES and HEALEY.
Drums—Mr. CHIPP. Triangle—Mr. SEYMOUR. Bass Drum—Mr. HORTON.

THE MILITARY BAND OF THE COLDSTREAM GUARDS WILL BE UNDER THE DIRECTION OF MR. GODFREY.

AN ORGAN of extensive compass has been expressly erected in the Theatre by Messrs. FLIGHT and SON.

The Scenery by Messrs. GRIEVE and TELBIN.

Post and Translator of the Libretti, Signor MAGGIORI.

The Ballet,

Of a brilliant and costly character, will close the performance of the evening, and no divertissement will be suffered between the acts of operas.

The director has the pleasure to announce that he has concluded an engagement with

Mlle. FANNY ESSLER;

And, during the season, the following eminent danseuses will appear—PREMIERE DANSEUSES:—

Mlle. DUMILATRE

(of the Grand Opera, Paris).

Mlle. BERTIN

(of the Imperial Theatre, Vienna, her first appearance in this country),

Mlle. MARIETTA BADERNA

(of the Theatre La Scala, Milan),

AND

Mlle. PLUNKETT

(of the Grand Opera, Paris),

Mlle. NEODOT

(of the Theatre Royal, Madrid),

Mlle. FUOCO

(of the Academie Royale de Paris)

Mons. GONTIE (of the Theatre Royal, Madrid),

Mons. PETIPA (of the Grand Opera, Paris),

Mons. FERDINANDO CROCE,

Mons. DELFEMIER (of the Grand Opera, Paris),

Mlle. AURIOL

Mlle. DEMELISSE

Mlle. CELUSTE STEPHAN

Mlle. DELECHAUX

Mlle. LEVALLOIS

Mlle. DAVAL

Mlle. RITA PEREDA

Mlle. ARNAL

Mlle. ANNE MONROY

Mlle. GENGE

Mlle. HARTLEY

Mlle. BARNETT

Miss KENDALL

Miss ROSE COHEN

Miss LAURA MAURICE

Miss CHESTER

Miss MARSTEN

Miss L. PARIS

Miss C. PARIS

Miss MASKELL

Miss LEE

Miss KIRBY

Miss E. CLAIR

Miss BROWN

Miss E. WRIGHT

Miss CLIFFORD

Miss WARD,

With a numerous body of Coryphees and Figurantes.

MAITRES DE BALLET—Mons. ALBERT (of the Grand Opera, Paris), and Mons. ELIAS (of the Theatre La Scala, Milan.)

LEADER OF THE BALLET—Mr. ALFRED MELLON.

REGISSEUR DE LA DANSE—Mr. O'BRYAN.

COMPOSER—Signor ALESSANDRO CURMI (of the San Carlo Theatre, Naples).

THE THEATRE.

To render the interior at once commodious, elegant, and comfortable, it has been entirely re-constructed and decorated under the immediate direction and after designs of B. ALBANO, Esq., C.E., with every attention paid to its proper ventilation. The decorations have been executed by Mr. PONSONBY. The management has happily secured the artistic skill of Signori FERRI and VERARDI (of the Theatre Italien, in Paris), to embellish the ceiling and to prepare a new drop scene. The approaches to the theatre will be found improved by a carriage-way being formed immediately under the portico in Bow-street, whereby parties can leave or enter their carriages without exposure to the weather, and by increased facilities for ingress and egress. The Refreshment Room will be under the superintendence of Mr. J. G. WATSON. Tickets, Stalls, and Boxes, for the night or season, to be obtained at the Box-office, Bow-street; and at Messrs. Cramer, Beale, and Co.'s, 301, Regent-street; also at Messrs. Andrews', Chappell's, Ebers', Hookham's, Leader's, Mitchell's, and Ollivier's, Bond-street; Bailey's, Regent-street; and at Mr. Sams's, St. James's-street.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, at the "Nassau Steam Press," by WILLIAM SPENCER JOHNSON, 60, St. Martin's Lane, in the parish of St. Martin's in the Fields, in the County of Middlesex; where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed post paid. To be had of G. Parkes, Dean Street, Soho; Strange, Paternoster Row; Wiseheart, Dublin; and all Booksellers.—Saturday, February 27th, 1847.

The Musical World.

(PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT NOON.)

A RECORD OF THE THEATRES, MUSIC, LITERATURE, FINE ARTS,
FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE, &c.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s. Stamped; 12s. Unstamped; to be forwarded by Money Order or Postage Stamps to the Publisher, W. S. Johnson, "Nassau Steam Press," 60, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross.

Each Subscriber is entitled to an Admission to an Annual Concert, and a Piece of Music, (regular Music size) Monthly.

No. 9.—VOL. XXII.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1847.

{PRICE THREEPENCE
{STAMPED, FOURPENCE

NOTICE.

Our Subscribers are presented this week with FOUR ADDITIONAL PAGES, and a ROMANCE, composed expressly for this Journal, by H. F. FITZWILLIAM.

MATILDA OF HUNGARY.

EIGHTEEN months ago the name of William Vincent Wallace was unknown to England. After many years wandering in strange and remote regions, he returned to his native country, about two years ago. For some months after his return he remained in comparative obscurity, being only recognised by a small knot of amateurs and artists, as a clever pianist and an elegant composer for the pianoforte. Chance, however, threw in his way the libretto of an opera, founded on the French melo-drama, Don Cesar de Bazan. He composed the music, which by a good piece of luck he had the opportunity of playing to Mr. Beale. That active and intelligent representative of the great firm of Cramer and Co., with his usual quick appreciation, immediately found out the stuff that was in Wallace, and purchased the score of his MS. opera without a moment's hesitation. Shortly after it was laid before Mr. Bunn. Mr. Bunn was not a likely manager to allow so good a thing to slip through his hands, and the new work was accepted.

In November, 1845, (if we be wrong we shall be obliged to any reader who will correct us) Maritana was produced, and the next day, or rather, the next day but one, (the epoch of representation being a Saturday) Wallace's name was spread far and wide. The success of Maritana was immense, and had it been produced in that style of splendour and completeness for which Old Drury was celebrated under Mr. Bunn's lessanship, it would assuredly have made the fortune of the establishment. Brought out as it was, however, (somewhat shabbily, we must own) and allied to a book filled with the most monstrous absurdities, it ran upwards of fifty nights, and drew many a hundred to the treasury. In a short space the melodies became so popular that you could not go up a street without hearing them on an orgue de Barbarie, or round a square without hearing them on a trombone, or down a court without hearing them on a hurdy-gurdy, or into a theatre without hearing them intercallés in the overture to the pantomime, or into a drawing-room without hearing them fall from the lips of some silken syren, as water from the rock which Moses smote of old. Thus did Wallace share the honors of Weber, Rossini, Auber, Bellini, Donizetti, Balfe, et hoc genus omne, whose tunes are the solace of the multitude that whistles them "for want of thought" (Dryden).

It was no easy task to sustain a popularity so brilliant and so rapidly acquired. The announcement of a new opera from Wallace's pen was the signal for a world of fire-side conjectures. Saith one, "I am sure it wont be so good as Maritana." Saith another, "It will perhaps be more German, but there won't be so much melody." Saith a third, "There were so many beautiful airs in Maritana that he must have written himself out." Saith the last, "Rather is he as a spider that spinneth, and again spinneth, when the hand of the passer-by hath destroyed his web." The last was right—for of Wallace, in respect of melody, it cannot be said, as was not said, but might have been said, of Aquinas's Corpus (instead of the book of Livius, of which it was unjustly said) by a wag in an epigram:—

"Quem mea vix totum bibliotheca capit."

The tune does not fill the whole of Wallace's score, as the volume the library of the epigrammatist, leaving room for nothing else. On the contrary, abundantly as it is manifested, there is, to back it, a garniture of musicianship, exemplified in the tastefulness of its harmonies, the construction of the concerted pieces, and the disposition and variety of the orchestral effects. Wallace produces tunes with ease; but he not the less knows how to treat them. We stood, therefore, in no fear of his having tendered us his whole wealth in one handful, and Matilda of Hungary has justified the faith that was in us. And now that we have finished our poem let us to the argument.

Mr. Bunn has dived for his new poem into the depths of Bohemian history, and has brought up in his mouth George Podiebrad. George Podiebrad is very like Ladislaus I. in the face, figure, voice, manner, and so forth. But Ladislaus I. has been lost in a battle against the Paynims; and so as he has been lost nobody has been able to find him. The likeness is therefore no inconvenience either to the king or the serf—for George Podiebrad is a serf. But it is, on the other hand, exceedingly convenient to one Magnus, styled Count Magnus, prime-minister of the kingdom, and keeper of the conscience and the diadem of Matilda of Hungary (why of Hungary we are not sufficiently learned in history to say), widow of the lost King Ladislaus, who has never been found. It is convenient in thus much:—that he (Magnus) covets the vacant place on the throne of Bohemia, by the side of the surviving Queen, without whose good will he cannot have his desire; whereupon he pretends love to her person, so to cover his ambition, and makes an offer of his hand, so to encompass his designs upon the throne; but the Queen will none of him, and repulses him with contumely; whereupon he (Magnus) is much abashed; but, as luck will have it, he has bestowed upon Mathias, an innkeeper on the point of committing suicide, one hundred pieces of gold, whereby he buys him up body and soul, to do his bidding at any time or place, no matter what it may involve. Now it happens that George Podiebrad is on terms of intimacy with Mathias, the innkeeper who got a hundred pieces of gold to by the multiplicity of its polytypographic puffs positive. There was never a more daring piece of humbug practised upon the credulity of confiding publics than the hot-house celebrity of "young Verdi," who has been swallowed by the mouth of Europe as a spice of exquisite flavour, though he is nothing more than a tasteless compound of the leavings of tenth-rate Italian composers. But Europe has swallowed him long enough to find him indigestible, and it is now the moment to take an emetic and vomit him up again. That Mendelssohn's Tempest may be the emetic which shall restore health to the body, and taste to the palate, of musical Europe, we devoutly pray. Mr. Lumley, as a wise physician, has prescribed the dose for his patients (become impatient by the long duration of their malady), and they will take his medicine with joy, trusting unconditionally in the cure to come.

But once more let us resume the thread of our discourse, which a consideration of "young Verdi's" qualities had well nigh snapped in twain; once more let us return to the debut of Signor Coletti, the baritone. Well, then, Signor Coletti, the baritone, is, in his way, first-rate; and his reception by the public on Saturday night has added another laurel to Mr. Lumley's brow, and has given the public increased confidence in all the promises set forth in his so fiercely-catechised prospectus. Never was an opera season so auspiciously commenced. Two great novelties, in the persons of two great artistes—Gardoni, the tenor, and Coletti, the baritone; two very admirable second-rates—Superchi, the baritone, and Bouché, the bass; two new dansesuses, both perfect in their way—the graceful Carolina Rosati, and the youthful and fascinating Marie Taglioni; a grand orchestra, and a grand chorus, fished up from the depths of nowhere by the magical net of Balfe; a grand opera, in four acts, represented in all its departments as never before was an opera represented in this country; and to conclude, a new and splendid ballet, placed upon the stage with every possible effect of scenery and machinery, and supported by the talents of the first-rate dancers already named, and a magnificent array of supernumeraries, the females as light as air and as pretty as houris, the males as active and nimble as squirrels; and all this presented to the public during the first fortnight of the season, an epoch usually so dreary and destitute of interest! Of a verity, Mr. Lumley is a Charles XII. in his metier, for never did the besetted and besotted Swedish hero, even when in his small tower amongst the Turks, fight more stoutly against a powerful adversary, or hold up his head more gallantly in the fray. Bravissimo, Mr. Lumley! Go on as you have begun, and you will not be in want of the sycophantic agency of the Post, the Curtain, and the Opera-glass. You have zealous, impartial, independent, and unbiassed supporters in the Times, the Herald, the Observer, and the Musical World. What! can the Chronicle and Athenæum measure arms with these? We suppose nay—they will scarcely be so venturesome. No, they war only against servile and parasitical foes—they will not stain their swords in the blood of honest men, stanch truth-speakers, and unbought critics, whose sole order of merit is the ribbon of integrity worn in their button-holes.

But once more to return to Coletti, who would seem to stand in danger of being swamped in the bog of controversy. We are in the habit of telling Mr. Lumley what we think without flinching, leaving him to draw his own conclusions and it is therefore the more pleasurable for us to be able to say to him, "May thy shadow never be less; thou hast done well and nobly!" And this we can now say—not for the first time during the long-to-be-remembered season of 1847—season of triumph in adversity!

The cast of Nino, on Saturday night, was in one respect an improvement, and in another the opposite to an improvement, on that of last year. Coletti, instead of Fornasari, the Ninus to whom the English public have been accustomed, is as gold-dust to the offals dropped by the saw in the exertion of its vocation. Coletti has, perhaps, the most splendid barytone voice we ever listened to. He does not sing "through his eyes, nose, and pupils," which would seem to be required for the satisfaction of our sagacious friend, the Post, but he sings just from that precise aperture of his person which is expected of a vocalist not gifted with supernatural characteristics—viz: his mouth. Moreover, he is not a "cursed barytone," since the cutting irony of Rossini has not vented itself at his expense, as at that of poor Fraschini, the "tenore della maledizione," whom the "egregious Pillet" proposed, and the illustrious Meyerbeer declined, as the primo tenore in the Prophete, at the Academie Royale de Musique, in Paris. Coletti's style is energetic and manly, and the tones of his powerful and magnificent voice fill the entire area of Her Majesty's Theatre. His voice is musical in a degree equal to its power. The faults we have to lay to his charge—for which of us is without them?—are a want of colour in his expression, a monotony in the form of his cadences, and a method of reaching the high notes, which belongs to a bad school of singing. For example, instead of attacking them with decision, he frequently slides up to them, which produces a drawling and inharmonious effect. Eradicate these vices, and Coletti would have no superior as a barytone. His unusual faultlessness of intonation gives him a great advantage over Ronconi, one of the rivals whom the Chronicle needlessly throws at his head, and the power of his lungs would enable him to drown the mellow barytone of Tamburini. But on the other hand Ronconi, in the midst of his vacillating intonation, possesses a variety of style, and a passionate intensity of expression, which leave Coletti far behind him in the higher requisites of dramatic song; while Tamburini, as a flexible vocalist, and an actor of various powers, is equally his superior. Whoever has witnessed the Ninus of Ronconi, will side with us in the opinion we have expressed; it is twenty times more faulty, but it has evidences of absolute inspiration which declare the supremacy that a vocalist of genius exercises over one of no matter how perfect a talent. Ronconi's effects are as multiple as they are wonderful; and the blemishes of his method are forgotten in the grandeur of his conceptions. Yet with all this we must not underrate the artistic qualities which constitute so great a charm in Coletti's singing, and atone, in a great measure, for the occasional tameness and want of truth in his acting. He was enthusiastically welcomed on Saturday night, and zealously applauded throughout his performance. He was also encored and recalled by the audience several times.

The other change in the cast of Nino was sadly for the worse. In place of Mdle Corbari, who made such legitimate effort last year in the part of Fenena, we had a Mdle Fagiani, who both in voice and style is vastly her inferior. Moreover, her extreme nervousness on Saturday night, made her inferiority doubly painful. The air in the third act, though encored by the claqueurs, in opposition to everything like justice and common sense, was a most infantine performance, quite justifying the observation of the Morning Chronicle, to the effect that Her Majesty's Theatre is not a boarding-school for young singers to acquire the rudiments of their art.

Mdlle. Sanchioli's Abigail was another evidence of the pro-grass she has made since last season. Her intonation was less uncertain, her execution less faulty, and her acting less extravagant, and more effective and natural in consequence. She was greatly applauded in the duet with Coletti, in the second act, and was recalled with him immediately after, and at the fall of the curtain.

M. Bouché's Orotaspe was excellent, and justified the opinions we have already advanced in his favour. He is a most useful and competent artist.

A Signor Borella was announced in the bills for the tenor part of Idaspe; but it appears that Mr. Balfe not approving of him at rehearsal, Signor Corelli took his place. On this gentleman's performance we have no particular remark to offer, nor on the Abdallah of Signor Dai Fiori. They were quite good enough for the music they had to execute; which says not much, but says all we can say in conscience.

The band must again be eulogised. Balfe, we repeat, has done wonders; and every night's performance manifests an increased command over the forces he has collected from all parts of the world—like the armies of the Goths and Visigoths of old. Attila, king of the Huns never managed a motley multitude with more rigid discipline and perfect order than Balfe his newly-gathered orchestra. The contemptible overture to Nabuco, a composition for which an academy boy would have got and deserved a sound reproof from his harmony-master, was so capitally played that we caught ourselves unconsciously applauding it, with a vehemence which, considering its abundant demerits, was preposterous. But our applause and that of the house was for Balfe and his followers, not for the rubbishing fragment, impertinently styled an overture by Signor Verdi. The chorus again won golden opinions, and the pretty ballad-tune in the third act, which the Post mistakes for a chorus, was so deliciously sung as to elicit a loud and general encore. We must not omit to notify the arrival of M. Lavigne, the first oboe, who assumed his part in the orchestra on Thursday week. His tardy arrival was the cause of much conjecture; but he is better late than never. M. Lavigne is an exquisite oboist, distinguished no less for the lovely quality of his tone than the wonderful perfection of his mechanism. He will be a great acquisition to the orchestra. Would only that Mr. Lumley could boast of a primo clarinetto of equal excellence.

Apropos of the Post, we may as well cite an "egregious" piece of criticism which appeared in its columns on Monday. The subject is the merits of "young Verdi:"—

"Whatever be the opinions published by CERTAIN CRITICS on the merits of Verdi as a composer, the fact is indisputable that his operas produce great enthusiasm, and have achieved an immense popularity in all the principal theatres of Europe. Indeed, if an opinion may be formed from the manner with which the Nino was last night received, no doubt can be entertained that a similar result will follow here. Unlike the modern composers of Italy, the operas of Verdi depend not so much upon individual effort, as upon collective force—the chorus forms an integral portion, and mainly administers to the dramatic and musical development. Hence, though the isolated morceaux may lack the champagne spirit of Rossini, the tenderness of Donizetti, and the passionate melody of Bellini, still is there ever boldness of design, continuity of thought, dramatic consistency, breadth of colour, and a massiveness in the concerted pieces, that stamp Verdi as a man of earnest mind and intensity of purpose; and the purpose is wrought out vigorously and effectively."

This is worth the frame we have put it in. The "certain critics," meaning ourselves, we are excused for clenching the expression in small Roman capitals. Would any one in his senses believe, without having read it, that a sane critic could so commit himself and the reputation of his paper, as to talk of "young Verdi" and Rossini in the same sentence? It is unjust enough towards poor Bellini and Donizetti, but towards a genius like Rossini it is nothing short of impious.

And now, in concluding for the present, a word for the ballet, which goes on and prospers. Mr. Lumley is justified in retaining Coralia in the bills, for its success is legitimate and well-merited. Carolina Rosati improves every night on acquaintance, and has warmed the audience into an enthusiasm which was unjustly denied her on the first night. She is an exquisite dancer and a consummate artist, in respect both of choregraphic and mimic requisites. Marie Taglioni has grown from a distant star, whose light had scarcely reached our world, into a luminary of the first magnitude, destined to shine unabashed in presence of Terpsichore's high priestesses. There are so many beautiful points in her single pas (de la Rosière?) that we could fill a page with recording them. Is she most fascinating when she twists her supple form as though it were fashioned of whalebone, graceful as the bended bow, armed with the arrows that her eyes shoot forth?—or when as a playful squirrel she turns on either side incontinent, as though in her gambolling uncertain which to take, leaning to the earth, meanwhile, that thirsts for the pressure of her youthful form?—or when she revolves, as a top, in uncountable gyrations, compassing the stage's length in her progress?—or when, elate with zeal, she bounds like an antelope across the scene, delighting the eyes of her spectators, that vainly essay to dwell upon her form? In all she does there is such a world of innocence, such a charming modesty, such a natural grace and ease, that her very appearance on the stage makes the eye ache with pleasure. She flies about as an unbodied joy, rapturous with the sense of being; she is and she is happy—her mission is to dance and to delight—and how thoroughly she fulfils it the pen fails to tell. We are greatly mistaken if, in time, Marie Taglioni do not carve out for her pretty self a niche in the temple of Terpsichore, by the side—not to speak it profanely—of the divine Carlotta Grisi! There is a future for her! There a thing to dream about!

To drop from the sky to the earth, we should ere this have paid a word of homage to the active talent of M. Paul Taglioni, and to the fancy and elegance he has displayed in the composition of his ballet of Coralia. Let this make amends for what was not intended as a slight. M. Louis D'Or, as yet, has made no great sensation, and "the beautiful Mdlle. Wauthier," still hides her light under a bushel.

Nino and Coralia were repeated on Tuesday. On Thursday there was no performance. To-night we are to have Nino and Coralia once more, and next Thursday a "long Thursday," the nature of which we have explained to our readers in an article last year. Madame Castellan has arrived, and Frascini is daily expected. We may, therefore, count speedily upon an important change in the operatic feature of the entertainments. The houses have been hitherto very crowded, and what is more, as far as we could judge, they have been paying-houses—the ultima thule of ambitious and successful management.

A SECOND CHAT WITH RUMOUR.

We present our readers with a fragment from another confabulation, which took place recently at the headquarters of the Music World. Rumour had brought with him a bundle of chit-chat, which occasioned a vast number of conjectures and a whole library of comments, whereof the following involves the points of most importance:—

Titologue No. 2.

RUMOUR.—MR. D. R.—EDITOR.

Editor. Well, Mr. Rumour, you see that your surmises about Jenny Lind have turned out incorrect. Have you seen the Times of Monday? Hear this paragraph. (Reads.) "Jenny Lind is expected in Paris before the end of March, where she will, however, only remain a day or two, on her way to London. There is no truth in the report of her supposed intention to accept the engagement offered her in the French capital. The opera of her début at Her Majesty's Theatre will be either Rosina, in the Barbiere; or Alice, in Robert le Diable; which, in that case, will be produced under the eye of Meyerbeer himself."

Mr. D. R. That's all very well; but here is the Chronicle of Tuesday, with quite another story. After quoting the paragraph from the Times, the writer remarks (reads):—"We are in possession of a letter from Vienna, dated the 19th instant, being the latest news in town from that capital up to yesterday, and in the letter, which is from a person who knows Jenny Lind well, and is in every respect entitled to confidence, there is the following passage:—"Jenny Lind is determined not to go this season to London; she will stay here six weeks longer."

Editor. All this is very fine; but the Morning Post of to-day writes of Jenny Lind as follows, in spite of it:—(Reads.) "This charming nightingale of the north, who has just created such a sensation at Vienna in Meyerbeer's Camp of Silesia, is expected in three weeks at Paris, en route to London, where she will immediately make her début at her Majesty's Theatre." Knowing how matters stand, is it not very singular that Jenny Lind herself does not either write, or authorise some one to write for her, a statement of her real intentions. All this mystery, which may excite public curiosity for awhile, must be eventually injurious to the Swedish nightingale's reputation in this country; and moreover, it is exceedingly unjust and cruel to Mr. Lumley, who is, after all, the principal sufferer in the business, since it puts it in the power of his ill-wishers to dispute the veracity of his programme, and thereby injure his theatre by causing persons to withhold their subscriptions. And in this respect I think that Mendelssohn himself has acted imprudently, if not unfairly to Mr. Lumley. He ought long ago, (for, to my knowledge, he has received all the papers in which the matter has been discussed) to have written a letter, which the Journal of Her Majesty's Theatre might be able to publish as a guarantee of his good faith to his subscribers.

Mr. D. R. Mendelssohn is one of those men who have no relish in mixing themselves up in musical quarrels; and will not be forced before the public as instruments of party warfare.

Editor. Do you know Mendelssohn?

Mr. D. R. No.

Editor. Then you had best hold your tongue on the subject. What I said is perfectly true. Mr. Lumley is unfairly treated—the matter being allowed to remain in doubt by those who should, and could, set the public right with a few strokes of the pen.

Rumour. I hear that Mendelssohn has already done so.

Editor and Mr. D. R. (together) How?

Rumour. I am told, by some who profess to have seen it, that Mendelssohn has written a letter to Mr. Buxton, his intimate friend and confidential agent, authorizing him to give full publication to the fact that he neither is nor has been engaged in the composition of an opera for Her Majesty's Theatre, or for any other establishment whatever.

Mr. D. R. This would seem to jump with what the Chronicle publishes to-day in respect to Mendelssohn. I will read it to you. (reads) "Mendelssohn's Oratorio of Elijah.—We are enabled to announce that the great composer has fully completed his alterations in the oratorio of Elijah. Many important improvements have been made, and the book (by Mr. Bartholomew) has undergone some changes. Dr. Mendelssohn will arrive here on the 13th of April, and will conduct, at Exeter Hall, the Oratorio of Elijah, according to his engagement with the Sacred Harmonic Society, for whose concerts he alone visits England; and after three performances he will depart for Switzerland in May, where he purposes to pass the summer. This Oratorio has occupied the exclusive attention of Mendelssohn since the Birmingham Festival up to the last fortnight, and notwithstanding Elijah created a sensation beyond all precedent, and secured the unanimous suffrages of amateurs, artists, and critics, such is the caution of the gifted composer in giving to the world his grand inspirations, that he was resolved to perfect that in his own estimation which the world was disposed to call already perfection."

Rumour. I could tell you much more, but I am not yet at liberty to do so. Next Thursday, if you will be at home, I will call, and you shall know all I can gather about the subject, without reserve.

Editor. Agreed. Meanwhile I shall take leave to preserve my faith unshaken in the whole of Mr. Lumley's programme—the programme, the whole programme, and nothing but the programme.

Mr. D. R. Amen—so be it.

And thus the meeting broke up, without arriving at any conclusion on any point whatever, each party continuing firm in his own opinion, and Rumour being as vague as ever. Next week, however, we are most likely to be in a position to proclaim established facts.

SQUIB, No. 1.

THE TWO B'S AND THE NEW MUSICAL PAPER.

A VISION.

M. B. seated at his bureau in a reverie. M. B. soliloquizeth.

Yes; a new musical journal is wanted. The Musical World is an ignoramus, and but nine degrees removed from being what the French call bête! Besides, I know a good lay for it, and can get at the money. Moreover, I shall pay myself for being editor, and do nothing; whereby I may become musical autocrat, and smash my opponents, swearing that Verdi is a genius, and Wallace a bore—and my brother the best musical theorist in England.

Enter D. B.

D. B. Well, how are you, old boy?

M. B. I am delighted to see you, son of my heart. I am going to begin a new musical paper.

D. B. That's right. I'll write for it.

M. B. You must; you were cut out for a newspaper writer—smart, smashing, and unscrupulous! I should rather think we could make a good paper together.

D. B. (Aside) The old humbug! (Aloud) Of course we can. With your natural elegance of style, and a little salt from me, I should think it would do. But, eh! the —! how about the muso?

M. B. Why, you know I can manage an æsthetical column or two.

D. B. Come now, joking apart, you know less about the matter than I do; and the gag that will do for a morning paper, or the Maestro, won't do on a special journal which is to tilt with the Musical World. Eh, old boy?

M. B. Why—I must —

D. B. Devil a bit. I'll write the abuse; you will sit with your hands in your pockets, or swagger about the side scenes, or the concert room; but where is our novelist and conscientious man-of-all-work, who writes a good article, and lets us father it—the steel glove with which we can arm the hand for musical battle; in a word, our gauntlet?

M. B. Alas! such men are rare.

D. B. But have one we must.

M. B. Don't you think I am capable of — I mean with care. Not that sort of slipshod style I have hitherto —

D. B. No! 'twon't do.

M. B. (Aside) He's not to be humbugged. (Aloud) Well, truth must out. I have engaged —

D. B. That will do—he's the very man.

M. B. Then you will help me; that's settled.

D. B. It is. When does No. 1 come out?

M. B. I have not quite determined, but you can get me up a good smasher on all things in general, and the Musical World and its Editors in particular. I'll take care of the rest of the number.

D. B. Yes, you may be trusted to that extent. No one is more capable of looking well after No. 1 than yourself.

M. B. (Laughing sourly) Ha! ha! very good.

D. B. (Aside) I like to see him laugh on the wrong side of his mouth. (Aloud) I suppose I mustn't pitch into Her Majesty's Theatre.

M. B. Not for worlds!

D. B. That's a pity! for when my hand is once in I like to have a go at everything in turn:—Balfé and Beethoven, the Times and the Athenæum, Congreve and Shakspeare—the more wholesale abuse is, the better. One looks unprejudiced.

M. B. That's true ; but in the present case (puts his finger to his nose) You understand me ?

D. B. Oh, ah, very good—very good (Strokes his chin) I see—e-e-e. C. R.

(Scene changes.)

MADAME BISHOP IN THE PROVINCES.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Dublin, March 1st.

THE last news I have to tell you is, that Mr. Aldridge, the African Roscius, who, according to the bills, writes himself descendant to the Royal Princes of Numidia, is performing all the celebrated sable parts at the theatre, Hawkin's Street. I am sorry to say he is playing to empty benches, for he is really a clever man, and is capital in comedy, which is perhaps not very high praise to bestow on a tragedian, but which, nevertheless, is veritable criticism, as you would have said, had you seen him in Mungo, in The Padlock. It was rather hard on poor Mr. Aldridge to bring him forward so soon upon Madame Bishop's great success. We are all now Bishop mad, and nothing will go down with us but la Bishop. The ladies are beginning to call certain articles of dress after her, cigars have been similarly christened, and I have learned that a celebrated coach-maker in Aungier-street has just invented a new vehicle to be called a Bishop. Well, now that I have played my prelude, I must open the performance. On Thursday Madame Bishop gave the second and third acts of Anna Bolena, the second act of The Love-spell, and the last act of Sonnambula. The performance, I need hardly say, went off with immense éclat, and the enthusiasm for the great artist was, if possible, greater than on any former occasion. It would seem quite an anomaly to most people, how Madame Bishop, with her extreme sensibility and abandon, could undergo in one evening the tremendous bodily and mental labour of singing through three such operas—at least their most important portions—as those in which she appeared on Thursday night, and sing to the very last note of the last finale with her voice as limpid and fresh as when she commenced the first aria, and her bodily powers apparently as much under her command, and unabated in their strength. But if we look a little further than the first glance, we shall perceive that herein consists all the excellence of the artist. Madame Bishop never forces her voice. However energetic she may appear, or however passionate she may seem at times, she husbanders her vocal resources, and never hazards her whole strength on one coup. It is thus that Rubini upheld his powers, and was equal to all occasions. In her performance of Thursday night, Madame Bishop was encored six times. The different characters she sustained required the greatest versatility of talent, and, to render them as she did, the highest vocal and histrionic powers. The performance was arduous in the extreme, nevertheless the fair cantatrice dashed off her last brilliant and astonishing variation introduced into the ondo finale of Sonnambula with all the precision and care of a first essay. Madame Bishop never rants in her singing: it may be said with truth of her, elle n'hurle pas, elle chante. I was so enchanted with Madame Bishop's performance of Anna Bolena, that I regretted excessively she only repeated the two last acts on Thursday. In consequence, as I told you in my last, of Mr. Corri's necessitated departure for Liverpool, that gentleman alone being able to sustain the part of Henry throughout. The incomplete state of the operatic department in our theatre is much to be deplored, as it prevents the possibility of procuring at a moment's notice, a good remplacant for such an important part. It must be said, however, that the manager of our Theatre Royal has done a great deal for Madame Bishop; and I understand that the fair lady feels herself greatly indebted to him for what he has done. Mr. T. Bishop is a very creditable tenor, and if P. Corri is not a Tamburini, or a Ronconi, he has the good sense to know it, and does not give himself baritonic airs, as many of your London and country singers do basely. His brother, H. Corri, is a clever actor a toute sauce, and is always ready to take anything at a moment's notice. His Dulcamara, in the Love Spell, is not bad, and he is growing daily into favour with the Dublin audiences. In my last letter I mentioned that Thursday, an extra added night, was to have been Madame Bishop's last, but it has proved to be only the penultimate, for Calcraft, seeing the great success of the singer, most judiciously gives a super extra-night, and Madame Bishop was induced to retard her departure to Scotland for some twelve or fourteen hours, and is to appear to-morrow, when the two last acts of Anna Bolena and the Love Spell will be given. She will also sing the grand Scena from Tancréd, and the favorite Chansonette, "Je suis la Bayadère." An overflow is expected. Apropos, I have just met Captain L., who is, as you know, well acquainted with all the theatrical affairs of Hawkins-street, and he told me that Mr. Calcraft had already secured the services of the prima donna for a fortnight after Easter, and has given her an increased salary. The operas selected for her performance in her engagement are Norma, Linda di Chamouni, and The Barber of Seville. In this case there is little fear that the manager will not reimburse himself for his spirited speculation, for April is a good month for theatricals in Dublin, and La Bishop is now all the rage.

I thank you for the trouble you have taken in explaining to me the meaning of an instrumental cadenza; but you mistook largely in supposing I did not comprehend it. I still am of opinion that it was a puff positive, and a resource unworthy the name of the artist who played, and the composer who wrote it, to advertise it. The cadenza, however, was safely transmitted, and was received with thunders of applause when played by Madame Dulcken. I have just learned that Templeton comes here in April. Madame Vestris and Charles Mathews are also engaged. On Wednesday next, we have a trial of new music at the Philharmonic, at which, of course, I shall not fail to attend.

Yours, in haste,

C. R.

P. S.—Hoping this may reach you in time for post, I cannot rest until I have transmitted to you a brief account of the last performance of Madame Bishop, which positively surpassed all that went before. The enthusiasm was tremendous. It was, I assure you, one of the greatest instances of a mass of people in a state of excitement I ever witnessed. The huge Dan himself at the meeting at Covent Garden, or after his best speech at the Association, was not hailed with more deafening acclamations. Such waving of hats, kerchiefs, uplifting of voices, clapping of hands, stamping of feet, and thumping of sticks, reiterated volleys of prolonged cheers, and showers of bouquets, was not heard or seen within the walls of the theatre for many, many years. Madame Bishop appeared most deeply affected, and at the end, when she was called for, was quite overpowered. This, of course, gave rise to more acclamations, and continued till I thought the house must come down. I have not time to enter into particulars of the performance. When Madame Bishop left the theatre, the greatest part of the audience stationed themselves at the stage door, to get a parting glance at their favourite singer, and in stepping into her carriage, not only immense cheering saluted her, but the crowd accompanied her to Mackin's hotel, making the air ring as they went along with cries of "Long live Bishop," "Bravo," "Come again," &c., &c. The post waits, and I have not time for another word. Adieu!

JENNY LIND AND THE GERMAN STUDENTS.

THE following amusing anecdote we copy from a German journal, but cannot vouch for its authenticity:—"At the close of last autumn, Jenny Lind had been performing in the town of G—— and had created such a furore as nearly to drive all the inhabitants mad. The theatre, at which she was engaged, was, during the nights of her performances, an arena for the wildest displays of enthusiasm; the house where she lived was nightly beset with multifarious admirers and multitudinous serenaders; the carriage in which she took her rides literally became a drag for a foot steeple-chase to all the gallants of the town—brief, she could not move without a guard; she could not speak without a bravo; she could not look without committing havoc; she could not sing without setting folk mad—mad—mad. Chiefest among these mad-men were the gowned students of the University of the town of G——. They attended every night at the theatre, and after the performance escorted Jenny Lind home, and remained serenading her all night. But Jenny Lind, though excessively grateful to the G—— students for their extra attentions and double Christian kindness, could not remain amongst them for ever, but was compelled to leave them one charming morning before breakfast. But the G—— students had been apprised of her determination to depart at matin cock; and in order to get up early they remained serenading her all night with extracts from her own favourite operas, which no doubt, from the contrast between their singing and hers, was no indifferent treat to the Swedish nightingale. In the morning they escorted her as far as the ramparts, and, halting at the gates, they gave her three and thirty hearty cheers for a farewell, besides sixteen more for a finale, and a dozen additional by way of a postscript, and several others, the most acceptable of all, when Jenny Lind was out of hearing. No sooner had the carriage disappeared at that turn in the road which winds round the base of the hill whose summit crowned with tufted trees and evergreens overlooks a great many places, and presents a delightful panoramic picture to the view of the spectator, than the students gave thirty-three grand cheers more, with casual ones, ad libitum, and flew like wildfire through the streets of G——, and made straight for the hotel where Jenny Lind had been staying, and demanded of the landlord to be shown to the nightingale's bed-room, which being indicated to them, they rushed up stairs, broke into the singing bird's nest, stripped the bed, tore the sheets into stripes, placed them on various parts of their dresses, and rushed through the streets, vociferating the name of Jenny Lind, till the very welkin rang with the syllables. The tumult was not appeased till noon, when the hurricane seemed to die off into a broken tempest, whose gusts were only heard at intervals. About this time—noon, as we said—an elderly looking gentleman, an Englishman, as might be implied from the cut of his hat, and his no moustache, who was stopping in the hotel, came into the coffee-room, trembling and excited, especially at the approach of a student. A stranger near the old gentleman, believing him to labour under the effects of illness, and compassionating him, entered into conversation with him. The old gentleman appeared delighted at meeting with a countryman: 'Sir, you are an Englishman, I am so terrified! These German students are very extraordinary people—raving mad.' 'O, not at all,' replied the other, 'wild and excitable they are certainly, but capital fellows, I assure you, and very sensible.' 'Then, by heaven sir,' returned the old gentleman, looking very much terrified and speaking very low, 'there's something political in it, and I am marked.' 'How so?'—'I got up early this morning to take my usual promenade, and while I was away,—here the old gentleman halted and appeared quite overcome by terror. 'Well, sir,' said the other,—'they broke into my room, tore up my sheets into ribbons, and are now running through the town wearing the pieces in their hats and button-holes.' The students had gone into the wrong bed-room."

THE AFFINITIES.

from the German of Göthe.

Continued from page 135.

PART II.—CHAPTER IV.

After these occurrences, after the feeling of the transient nature of human affairs which had thus been forced upon her, how strange to Ottilia must have been the intelligence, which could not remain much longer concealed from her, that Edward had resigned himself to the uncertain chances of war. None, alas, of the reflections which she had had occasion to make, escaped from her mind. It is a fortunate thing that man can only comprehend a certain degree of unhappiness. What exceeds that either annihilates him or leaves him indifferent. There are situations, in which hope and fear become one, mutually cancel each other, and become lost in a dark insensibility. If it were not so, how could we know that those who are dearest to us, and at a distance, are placed in hourly peril, and nevertheless carry on the ordinary occupations of life?

It seemed, therefore, as if some good genius had watched over Ottilia, when he brought at once into this silence, into which she seemed to have sunk lonely and unoccupied,—a wild horde, which while it gave her enough to do from without and took her out of herself, exerted in her a feeling of her own strength.

Luciana, Charlotte's daughter, had scarcely left school for the great world, had scarcely seen herself surrounded in her aunt's house, and a numerous society, than her desire to please really produced its effect, and a young man of large fortune felt an inclination to possess her. His wealth gave him a right to appropriate to himself whatever was best of its kind, and nothing seemed to be wanting except a perfect wife, for whom the world should envy him as it did for every thing else.

It was this event in her family which had hitherto given Charlotte very much to do, and to which she directed all her thoughts and correspondence, so far as the latter was not occupied in obtaining further intelligence from Edward. On this account Ottilia had latterly been more alone than usual. She was indeed aware that Luciana was coming, and had, therefore, made the necessary preparations in the house, but it was not thought that the visit was so near. There was first, it seemed, to be more writing, concerting and appointing, when the storm at once broke in upon Ottilia and the earth.

First came chamber-maids and men-servants, then vehicles full of chests and boxes, so that it was thought there were two or three sets of masters in the house. At last, however, came the guests themselves, namely, the great aunt with Luciana, and some family friends, and the bridegroom, who likewise was not unaccompanied. The vestibule was full of articles, portmanteaus, and other cases of leather. The different boxes and cases were separated with difficulty, and there seemed to be no end of luggage. All the while it rained violently, which increased the confusion. Ottilia met the tumult with the calmest activity; and her serene mode of proceeding showed forth to the greatest advantage, for she had in a short time settled and arranged everything. Every one was lodged, every one made comfortable in his own way, and considered himself well served, because he was not hindered from serving himself.

After a toilsome journey, all would willingly have enjoyed some repose. The bridegroom would have liked to be near his mother-in-law, to declare to her his love and good will, but Luciana could not be quiet. She had the felicity of being able to ride on horseback. The bridegroom had beautiful horses, and therefore all must needs mount at once. Storm, wind, and rain were not to be thought of; it seemed as if people only lived to get wet, and dry themselves afterwards. If she took it in her head to go out on foot, she did not ask what sort of clothes or shoes she had on; she insisted on surveying the plans for improvement, of which she had heard so much. What could not be accomplished on horseback was scampered through on foot. She had at once seen and given her opinion upon everything, and the rapidity of her temperament did not readily admit of a contradiction. The whole party had to endure a great deal, the female servants most of all, who could find no end of the washing and ironing, the unpicking and sewing.

She had scarcely examined the house and grounds, than she felt inclined to pay visits in the neighbourhood; and as they rode and drove quickly, the neighbourhood extended to a considerable distance. The castle was deluged with visits paid in return, and that persons might not miss each other certain days were appointed.

In the meanwhile, Charlotte, with the aunt and the bridegroom's chargé d'affaires, was occupied with settling the internal arrangements; and Ottilia, with those under her, was contriving that nothing should be found wanting amid so great a pressure, since the huntsmen, gardeners, fishermen, and tradesmen being all put in motion, Luciana always appeared like a burning comet, which carries a long tail after it. The ordinary amusement of visiting soon became insipid to her. She scarcely allowed the elder persons their quiet seat at the card table. Whoever was in any degree capable of motion—and who would not be moved by her charming importunity?—was obliged to join, if not in the dance, at least in a lively game at forfeits. And although everything, including the redemption of the forfeits, was done in reference to herself—on the other hand, no person, especially of the male sex, came off quite empty, whatever might be his condition. Nay, she succeeded in gaining some older persons of importance quite over to her side, by inquiring after their birth-days and name-days, and keeping them with particular solemnity. There her own tact was turned to account; so that while all perceived they were favoured, every one fancied himself favoured the most—a weakness of which the oldest in the party were most obviously guilty.

Although it seemed to be her regular plan to gain over men who represented rank, eminence, fame, or some other important qualification, to put to shame wisdom and circumspection, and to gain favour even with prudence itself, for her own wild and eccentric disposition—young persons were not overlooked. Every one had his share, his day, his hour, in which she contrived to fascinate and enchain him. Thus, she had even cast her eyes on the architect, who looked so ingeniously through his long black hair, stood so erect and quiet in the distance, and made such a short and intelligent answer to every question, without seeming inclined to go farther, that she at last resolved, half angry, half artful, to make him the hero of a day, and thus to gain him for her court.

It was not for nothing that she had brought with her so much luggage, and that, indeed, a great deal more had followed. She had made provision for an infinite change in her attire. If she delighted to dress herself three or four times a-day, changing from morning till night in the sort of clothes worn in ordinary society, she would sometimes appear in actual masquerade-costume, as a peasant, or a fishing-girl, a flower-girl, or a fairy. She did not dislike to dress herself as an old woman, that her young face might look all the fresher when peeping out of the hood, and indeed she so mingled together the actual and the imaginary, that people almost fancied themselves related to an elf.

She chiefly employed these disguises for pantomimic gestures and dances, in which she skilfully represented different characters. A cavalier of her train had learned to accompany her gestures on the piano, with the little music that was required. After a short preparation, they could work together at once.

One day, when during a pause which had occurred in the course of a lively ball, she had been asked, apparently in the spur of the moment (but really from an impulse secretly given by herself), to go through one of these performances; she appeared confused and surprised, and contrary to her usual custom allowed herself to be intreated a long while. She seemed irresolute, left the choice to others, asked like an improvisatore for a subject, until at last her ally, the pianist, probably according to a preconcerted plan, sat down to his instrument, began to play a funeral march, and asked her to give the part of Arternisia, which she had studied in such excellent style. She allowed herself to be persuaded, and, after a short absence, reappeared to the soft mournful tones of the march, in the form of the royal widow, walking with measured steps, and bearing the funeral urn. Behind her were carried a large black board, and a finely-pointed piece of chalk in a golden portcrayon.

One of her worshippers and assistants, into whose ear she whispered, went up to the architect, to ask him, nay, compel him (even employing a little pushing), to draw the tomb of Mausolus, in the character of Architect, and thus to cease from being a mere stationary spectator, and become one of the actors. Confused as the architect might appear externally—for in his black, close-fitting modern dress he made a strange contrast to the gauzes, crapes, fringes, enamels, tassels, and crowns—he internally commanded himself, which made the effect still more singular. With the utmost gravity, he placed himself before the large board which was carried by two pages, and with the greatest care and accuracy sketched a sepulchral monument, which was indeed more suitable for a Lombard, than a Carian monarch, but which was at the same time so beautiful in its proportions, so solemn in its various parts, and so ingenious in its characters, that people regarded its progress with pleasure, and admired it when completed.

During this time the architect had scarcely turned towards the queen, but had directed all his attention to his occupation. At last, when he bowed to her, and made signs that he believed he had executed her commands, she held out the urn to him, and testified a wish to see this copied on the top. He did so, though unwillingly, because it did not seem suitable to the character of the other part of his sketch. As for Luciana, she was at last overcome by impatience, for she had never intended that he should make a serious drawing. If, with a few strokes, he had just sketched off something, that would have looked rather like a monument, and devoted the rest of the time to her, the whole would have been more in accordance with her wishes and intentions. His conduct, on the contrary, had placed him in the greatest embarrassment, for although in her expressions of pain, in her commands and signs, and in her approval of the design which gradually progressed, she endeavoured to produce a tolerable degree of variety, and had sometimes almost pulled him round, to come into some connection with him, he became more and more formal, so that she had too often to take refuge in her urn, and look up to heaven. Nay, at last, as such situations are sure to increase, she looked more like a widow of Ephesus, than a queen of Caria. The performance, therefore, was unduly protracted; and the pianist, who usually did not lack patience, did not know how to vary his music. He thanked God when he saw the urn stand upon the pyramid, and when the queen was about to express her thanks, involuntarily struck up a lively air. By this the character of the performance was completely changed; but new spirits were given to the party, which at once expressed its joyous admiration of the lady for her excellent representation of feeling, and of the architect for his artistical and elegant drawing.

The bridegroom, in particular, conversed with the architect. "I am sorry," he said, "that the drawing is so perishable. You will, at least, allow me to take it into my room, and then to talk over it with you." "If it would afford you any pleasure," said the architect, "I can lay before you careful drawings of such edifices and monuments. This is a mere hasty sketch."

Ottilia, who was not far off, approached them. "Do not delay," she said, "to take an opportunity of showing the bridegroom your collection. He is a friend of art and antiquity, and I wish you to be better acquainted with each other."

Luciana came up, and asked, "What are you talking about?"

"About a collection of works of art," replied the Baron, "which this gentleman possesses, and which he will take an opportunity of showing to us."

"We can bring it at once," cried Luciana. "Am I not right—you will bring it at once," she added, in a coaxing tone, while she affectionately seized him with both hands.

"This might not be the proper time," objected the architect.

"What," exclaimed Luciana, imperiously, "Will you not obey the commands of your queen?" She then assumed a teasing air of entreaty.

"Do not be obstinate," said Ottilia, in a half whisper.

The architect withdrew with a bow, which said neither "yes" nor "no."

He had scarcely gone, than Luciana began to chase a greyhound about the room. "Ah!" cried she, as she accidentally ran against her mother, "how unhappy I am! I have not brought my monkey with me—people dissuaded me from it, but it is only for the convenience of my servants, that I am deprived of this pleasure. But he shall come now, some one shall go to fetch him for me. If I were only to see his likeness I should be pleased. I will, indeed, have him painted, and then he will never quit my side."

"Perhaps I can console you," said Charlotte, "by causing to be brought from the library a whole volume full of the strangest pictures of apes." Luciana screamed aloud with joy, and the folio was brought. The sight of these hideous creatures, naturally so like human beings, and rendered still more like them by the artist, gave the greatest pleasure to Luciana, and she felt quite delighted at finding in every one of the animals a resemblance to some person of her acquaintance. "Is not this like my uncle?" she mercilessly exclaimed—"this like M——, the jeweller—this like Pastor S——, and this the very image of what's his name? Apes, after all, are the real 'exquisites,' and it is quite incomprehensible why they are excluded from the best society."

She said this in the best society, but no one took it ill of her. They had grown so accustomed to accord everything to her gracefulness, that at last they allowed everything, even to her rudeness.

Ottilia, in the meanwhile, conversed with the bridegroom. She hoped for the return of the architect, when more serious and tasteful collections would free the company from all this affair of the apes. Nevertheless, he stopped away, and when, at last, he returned, he merged into the general company without bringing anything, or acting as if any request had been made. Ottilia, for the moment, was—what shall we say?—cross, angry, perplexed. She had bestowed a kind word upon the architect, and had endeavoured to procure a pleasant hour quite in his own way for the bridegroom, who, notwithstanding his infinite love for Luciana, seemed to be annoyed at her conduct.

The Apes gave way to a collation. Social games, more dancing, and at last a dull sitting about and an attempt to revive an already worn out hilarity lasted, as is generally the case, far over midnight. Luciana had already acquired the habit of being unable to get up in the morning and to go to bed at night.

About this time there was to be found in Ottilia's diary fewer records of events, but more maxims and sentences having reference to life and taken from life. As the greater part of these could not have proceeded from her own reflection, it is probable that some collection was given her, from which she copied what was suitable to herself. Many that have a more intimate reference to her own case will be easily recognised by—the red thread.*

FROM OTTILIA'S DIARY.

We like so much to look into the future because we would so willingly by our silent wishes turn to our own advantage the chances which in the future seem to be moved about in every direction.

In a large party it is difficult to avoid thinking that if chance brings together so many, it should also bring our friends to us.

We may live as retired as we will; we are sure to become debtors or creditors before we are aware of it.

If any one meets us, who owes us gratitude, it strikes us directly; but how often can we meet a person to whom we ourselves owe gratitude, without ever thinking of it?

To communicate one's self is nature; to receive what is communicated, as it is given, is cultivation.

No one would speak much in society, if he were aware how often he misunderstands others.

In repeating the words of others we make such great alterations only because we have not understood them.

He who long speaks alone before others, without flattering his auditors excites a feeling of dislike.

Every word that is uttered provokes its opposite.

Both contradiction and flattery mar conversation.

The pleasantest societies are those in which there prevails a cheerful feeling of mutual respect among the members.

The ridiculous arises from a social contrast; effected in a manner that does not offend the natural senses.

The sensual man often laughs when there is nothing to laugh at. Whatever excites him his own internal satisfaction is made manifest.

The man of understanding finds almost everything ridiculous; the man of reason scarcely anything.†

An elderly man was once reproved for occupying himself with young ladies, "It is the only way," he replied, "to grow young again, and that everybody likes."

We can bear to be upbraided for our faults, we allow ourselves to be punished for them, and on their account endure much with patience, but we become impatient if we are told to correct them.

Certain faults are necessary to the existence of the individual. It would be unpleasant to us if old friends put off certain peculiarities.

When a person does anything contrary to his usual way, we say, "He will soon die."

What faults ought we to retain, nay even to cultivate? Those which flatter others rather than offend them.

The passions are faults or virtues—only heightened.

Our passions are real phoenixes. As soon as the old one is burned the new one immediately springs from the ashes.

Great passions are diseases without hope. That which could cover them would first make them truly dangerous.

Passion is both increased and softened by confession. In nothing, perhaps, would the middle course be more desirable than in our confidences and concealments towards those we love.

* The reader will recollect this simile in the second chapter of this part.—TRANSLATOR.

† Those who have no acquaintance with the language of German philosophy must be content to pass over this maxim without comprehending it. A dissertation on the difference between "reason" and "understanding" would be too long to insert here.—TRANSLATOR.

‡ It will be remembered that Göthe was sixty when he wrote this romance.—TRANSLATOR.

(To be continued.)

* To prevent misunderstanding, it may be stated that the copyright of this translation belongs solely to the translator.

CONCERTS.

MR. H. PHILLIPS'S ENTERTAINMENTS.—Mr. Phillips gave one of his amusing concerts on Monday evening in the Music Hall, Store Street, which was attended by a select and crowded audience. The programme was divided into three parts—the two first being made up of Mr. Phillips's own compositions, nearly all bearing reference to some transatlantic legend or Yankee characteristic—the last comprising selections from popular modern writers. The first portions of the entertainment was decidedly the best. Mr. Phillips told several exceedingly amusing American anecdotes, a few of which convulsed the audience with laughter. He illustrated the Yankee peculiarities with great humour; and the manner in which he related the Kentucky Bear-hunt, wherein he himself was compelled to play a conspicuous part, was admirably dramatic. Nor were his illustrations confined to the humorous and the laughable. The entertainment was excellently studded with relations of the national characteristics, and interesting and instructive anecdotes. Each relation was followed by an illustrative song. "The Falls of Niagara," "The Prairie on Fire," and "The Kentucky Bear-hunt," were among the songs, that illustrated the different subjects introduced by Mr. Phillips, in the happiest manner. "The Bear-hunt" was encored, and Mr. Phillips supplied its place by a new manuscript composition of his own, called "Pity the Poor," a very pretty plaintive ballad, and which was most exquisitely sung. "There's a new Year coming," another of Mr. Phillips's manuscript songs, was much applauded, and deservedly; but the tune struck us as being none of the newest. In the second part, a laughing song, the words selected from one of the comedies of Beaumont and Fletcher, gave the vocalist an excellent opportunity of displaying his dramatic singing. "The Slave-market," a descriptive scena in the same section of the entertainment is almost too terrible for music, and taxes the very highest powers of the singer to give it effect; Mr. Phillips, however, acquitted himself more than creditably in rendering it effective. An American ballad, "The pleasant Ohio," adapted from an old native melody, is a singular illustration of the all-insufficiency (if we may coin a word) of music in its infancy; it was notwithstanding rendered with much spirit and effect by the singer. The favourite ballad, "My Boyhood's Home," which Mr. Phillips was wont to sing so very finely in Rooke's Amelia, once on a time on the boards of Covent Garden Theatre, was given on Monday night with all the singer's skill and power, and was greatly applauded. Lover's Irish Serenade, "The Widow Machree," and Moore's "To Ladies' Eyes," concluded one of the most amusing entertainments we have attended for a long time. Mr. Phillips was in capital voice, and in high spirits, and the audience left the Music Hall delighted at the whole performance. In answer to a notice made some weeks ago by the Athenaeum, which attempted to deteriorate the style of entertainments given by Mr. Henry Phillips, we took leave to differ from the writer of the article on various grounds, which we then put forth. On Monday evening we listened most attentively to the whole concert, and are now more than ever satisfied that such vocal entertainments as Mr. Phillips provides the public with, are not only innocent in themselves, but highly amusing and instructive.

HORN TAVERN.—The Third Concert of Classical Instrumental Chamber-Music, took place on Tuesday, at Johnson's Assembly Rooms, in the above locale. The audience was most select and attentive. The programme was as follows:—

Part I.—Quartet, No. 89, in E Flat—Op. 14, Haydn. Two violins, viola and violoncello, Messrs. H. Blagrove, Webb, Weslake, and Hancock. Quartet, No. 8, in A, Romberg. Two violins, viola, and violoncello, Messrs. H. Blagrove, Webb, Weslake, and Hancock.

Part II.—Quintet, No. 78, in A Minor—Op. 88, Ouslow. Two violins, viola, violoncello, and contra basso, Messrs. H. Blagrove, Webb, Weslake, Hancock, and C. Severn. Quartet, in C—Op. 59, (dedicated to Prince Rasoumofsky), Beethoven. Two violins, viola, and violoncello, Messrs. Webb, H. Blagrove, Weslake, and Hancock.

This programme was, on the whole, capitally executed. Ouslow's quintet was admirably performed; Mr. Blagrove played with fire, precision, and brilliancy, and the double-bass of Mr. C. Severn, although the part was written for a violoncello, came out in splendid style. The quartet of Beethoven, one of the composer's masterpieces, was also a great treat. Mr. Blagrove, however, should have changed places with Mr. Webb, who though a promising young artist, and getting through the first violin part with talent, was hardly equal to so high a flight. We marked the beautiful tone and improving style of Mr. Weslake in all the pieces. These concerts are worthy of a fuller notice, which we promise to afford them on the next occasion.

MR. LINDSAY SCOPER.—This accomplished musician gave his second soirée of classical pianoforte music on Wednesday, at the Beethoven Rooms, in Harley-street. The attendance was numerous and select, and the programme, which we subjoin, was one of high interest:—

Sonata in A major, for pianoforte and violin, Messrs. Lindsay Sloper and Deloffre, J. S. Bach. Selection from the "Pièces pour le clavecin," pianoforte, Mr. Lindsay Sloper, D. Scarlatti. German Songs, with violoncello obligato, Herr Brandt and M. Rousselot, "Wiegenlied" (All is quiet, all is still) Spohr. "Auf flügel des gesanges" (On song's bright pinions) Mendelssohn—violin-cello obligato, M. Rousselot. Sonata in F minor, op. 57, pianoforte, Mr. Lindsay Sloper, Beethoven. Aria, "In questa tomba oscura," Miss Bassano, Beethoven. Study in F sharp-major, Cramer. Study in B flat minor, pianoforte, Mr. Lindsay Sloper, Moscheles. Trio in C minor, op. 66, pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, Messrs. Lindsay Sloper, Deloffre, and Pilet, Mendelssohn.

Bach's sonata was a finished and most masterly performance on both hands. Mr. Sloper's perfect knowledge of the compositions of Bach we never doubted, but we had no expectation to find M. Deloffre so thoroughly up to the mark in them. We say this with no disrespect for his abilities; but, for the most part, we have found violinists of the French school anything but conversant with the music of the ancient masters. In the selection from Scarlatti's "Pièces pour le clavecin," the boldness, freedom, and distinctness of Mr. Sloper's execution were called into play with excellent results. It was altogether a most faultless performance. The studies of Cramer and Moscheles may be dismissed with the same criticism. But Mr. Sloper's powers of expression and unerring mechanism were more finely developed in the Sonata Appassionata of Beethoven than in any other part of the programme. The last movement was taken with extraordinary rapidity, but the energy, precision, and finish of the performer's style were preserved throughout with undiminished power. Mendelssohn's magnificent trio—very excellently rendered—made a good climax to the programme, M.M. Pilet and Deloffre seconding the exertions of the pianist with vigour and judgment. We should have mentioned that Mr. Sloper was encored in the very clever and original study of Moscheles. A word for the vocal music must conclude our remarks. Mr. Brandt, a tenor singer, who has not appeared for four years, sang the beautiful songs of Spohr and Mendelssohn* very chastely, quietly, and well—and was accompanied by M. Rousselot in an elegant and musician-like manner. In the last, "On song's bright pinions," he narrowly escaped an encore, a compliment which he and his accomplished coadjutor, M. Rousselot, well deserved. Miss Bassano being indisposed, her place was supplied by Madame Mortier de Fontaine, who sang two compositions very charmingly—a psalm by Martini and a song by Schumann, "Du mein Herz." The concert gave the highest satisfaction to all present. Mr. Sloper has handsomely changed the date of his third and last soiree, from the 17th to the 18th instant, in order to offer no impediment to the attraction of the grand concert, announced for the former day, in aid of the family of the late Mr. Kearns.

Mr. Genge gave his Fifth Annual Concert on Tuesday night at Crosby Hall. The performers included Master Thirlwall, (violinist). Mr. G. Case, who played on the concertina, and the vocalists, Mrs. R. Newton, Mrs. A. Smith, Miss Cubitt, Miss Thornton, and the Messrs. Sporie, Shoubridge, Kench, Blewitt, H. Smith, and F. Smith. The entertainment was amusing and varied. Mr. Genge has a treble voice of great sweetness. Nearly all the journals call him a tenor, which is a palpable error. He sings with feeling and expression and is capable of great things but he has much to learn before the means can fulfil the end. Let him think, study, and learn. He will be yet more than he is, if it be not his own fault; or if he be not spoiled by the high place he at present holds in public estimation. The concert was visited with much applause and several encores, and concluded most satisfactorily. The hall was very full and Mr. Genge was received in all his songs with great acclamations.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH MUSICIANS.—The concert in aid of the funds for the distressed Irish came off on Thursday last in the Hanover Square Rooms. The programme, in many respects, was very attractive. We insert it:—

Part I.—Symphony in F, No. 3, Beethoven. Cavatina, "Per vedes su quel bel rio," Mr. Burdini, (Parisian) Donizetti. Trio, the Misses and Mr. Williams, Curichman. Fantasia, "The recollections of Ireland," pianoforte, Mr. W. H. Holmes, Moscheles. Recit. and Air, "Deeper and deeper still," Mr. Braham, (Jephthah) Handel. Overture, (Don Quixote) G. A. Macfarren.

* Published by Weasel and Co., Regent Street. (See Programme.)

Part II.—"The Wood Nymphs," W. Sterndale Bennett. Song, Miss Lockey. Irish Ballad, "Savourneen deelish," Miss Bassano. Concerto, flute, Mr. B. Wells, Molique. Irish Ballad, "The Exile of Erin," Miss Dolby. Senenade, Mr. Lockey, C. E. Horsley. Overture, (The Ruler of the Spirits), Weber. Leader, Mr. Thirlwall. Conductor, Mr. W. S. Bennett.

The principal feature in the concert was the provision of a full orchestra, consisting of seventy instrumental performers, led by Mr. Thirlwall, and selected from our best native executants. The symphony of Beethoven, one of his very latest works, was heard to advantage, and was performed with great effect. Mr. Jarrett's horn playing was especially admirable in the trio of the Minuetto. Macfarren's overture is a most delicious composition, filled with the very spirit of comedy, while it everywhere displays the true taste and skill of the musician. It was performed most effectively. Bennett's overture is a work of inspiration—one of the most graceful emanations from the elegant mind of the composer. The overture to Euryanthe was the other instrumental morceau, and exhibited the capacity of the orchestra to great advantage. Mr. Holmes played Moscheles' fantasia most brilliantly and obtained great applause; and Molique's flute concertino was rendered very chastely, and with much expression, by Mr. Wells. This composition was written by the author during his late visit to England, and is illustrative of his sparkling and agreeable style. The vocal music was by no means super-excellent. Mr. Braham transported the whole audience by his still splendid method in Handel's song and taught a lesson to all our young singers, from which, if they would listen to learn, they would derive golden advantages. Curichman's pretty trio was very nicely sung; and the very clever composition of Mr. Charles Horsley was rendered with great expression and feeling by Mr. Lockey. The conducting of Mr. Bennett was remarkable for its steadiness and energy; nothing could have been better. The concert concluded a little after ten, and gave great satisfaction. The room was by no means crowded, but the receipts, we understand, are better than one might be led to suppose from the appearance of the audience. Would that all the musical societies in London would offer an equal mita to the unfortunate sufferers in Ireland.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—A selection of anthems and cathedral music was given by the above institution on Thursday evening, with the intention of exhibiting specimens of the production of the most eminent English composers who have written for the church service. In order to preserve unity of design the various compositions were given in a chronological order and included works dating from the beginning of the seventeenth century to our own immediate times. Selecting from a period of two hundred and fifty years the Sacred Harmonic Society, on Thursday evening, provided specimens of the writing of Gibbons, T. Purcell, Wise, Dr. Blow, H. Purcell, Dr. Creighton, Dr. Croft, Weldon, Dr. Greene, Robinson, Dr. Boyce, Kent, Battisbill, and Dr. Mendelssohn. The compositions of so many writers were necessarily various in merit. The selection, however, was generally good, and in most instances the performances were well and carefully given. The works which we think most deserving of eulogy were two anthems of H. Purcell, "My heart is inditing," and "O, Give Thanks unto the Lord." Dr. Croft's verse anthem, "This is the day," Verse anthem by Dr. Greene, "A God of my Righteousness," full anthem with verse of Dr. Boyce, "O Give Thanks unto the Lord," full anthem with verse of Battisbill, "Call to Remembrance," and Dr. Mendelssohn's Te Deum. With regard to the last named composer, we cannot forbear from pointing attention to a gross error which we read in the book of the performances, in which annotations were given on each separate composer; and wherein it is set forth that the Te Deum of Mendelssohn is modelled upon the style of our ecclesiastical composers. Nothing could be more removed from the truth than this statement; and we need only say, that to those who had ears for music on Thursday, no words of ours are needed to point out the difference between Dr. Mendelssohn and our service writers. In the performance of this Te Deum the choir seemed to have thrown their chief strength, and the singing was deserving of great praise. The hall was very full. The principal vocalists were Misses A. and M. Williams, and the Messrs. Lockey, Genge, Hill, Howe, Kench, and H. Phillips.

GRAND SCOTTISH ENTERTAINMENT.—A Concert was given last night in the Hanover Square Rooms for the relief of the distressed Highlanders, which, we are very sorry to say, was but indifferently attended. The orchestral and choral department was strong, the latter numbering upwards of one hundred. The vocalists engaged, or, more properly, who volunteered their services, were Messrs. Sinclair, Borraai, Burdini, J. A. Novello, and Signor Brizzi, with Madame G. Macfarren, the Misses Bassano, Dolby, Rainforth, Sarah Flower, P. Horton, M. O'Connor, and the Misses Williams. The instrumental performers consisted of Monsieur Sainton, (violin), Madame Dulcken, (piano), F. Chatterton, (harp), Mr. Distin and his four sons, (the Sax horns). The singing of Madame G. Macfarren, Miss P. Horton, Miss Bassano, and Miss Rainforth, were particularly admired. Mad. G. A. Macfarren sang a very charming ballad, in the Scotch style, "Fair Helen of Kirkconnal," which was well suited to her beautiful contralto voice, and artist-like and expressive style. Monsieur Sainton was admirable in a solo on the violin, as was also Madame Dulcken in a fantasia on the piano. Mr. F. Chatterton and the Messrs. Distin contributed largely to the attractions of the entertainments. At the end of part the first the chorus sang "Auld Lang Syne," arranged for full choir and orchestra by Mr. T. German Reed, the solos being taken by Mr. Sinclair, which was encored. The novelty of the evening was the impromptu introduction of three Highland Pipers, in splendid costume, who made their appearance between the parts, and treated the audience to some of the popular tunes of the country. We have but to add our regret that so excellent a programme put forth for so amiable a purpose should have brought together so small an assembly.

MR. MANGOLD'S.—On Monday evening Mr. Mangold gave a concert of classic instrumental music, in the Hanover Square Rooms, interspersed with vocal pieces, and furnished a very pleasing programme. Mr. Mangold opened his entertainment with the military septet of Hummel. The performance was spirited and effective. Madame Mortier de Fontaine sang Mozart's "Non Più di Fiori." This lady has a sweet voice, and her method is neat and finished. The fair vocalist, if she did not attain perfection, at least acquitted herself excellently, in rendering the beauties of the aria apparent. The "Qui la voce," aria from I Puritani is a trifle too flimsy for Miss Lincoln. This lady was heard to much greater advantage in Spohr's delicious song, "The Bird and the Maiden," which she sang extremely well. A sonata for the pianoforte and violin afforded an opportunity for the display of the executive power of Messrs. Sainton and Mangold. The violin was brilliant, and the piano sparkling—to speak in metaphor. Mr. Mangold has a firm, bold touch on the instrument, and is evidently at home in classical compositions. An air from Mitrona, quaint and pretty, was charmingly sung by Miss Sarah Flower, whose deep tones were brought out with great effect, reminding us more than once of Brambilla, the queen of contraltos. A unanimous call was made for a repetition, to which the lady, after some time, responded. A quintet of Mozart's was very finely played, all the executants fulfilling their tasks admirably. Madame Mortier de Fontaine was effective in an aria finale of Mercadante. The concert wound up splendidly with a quartet of Mendelssohn's. The rooms were full, and the entertainments concluded at a reasonable hour—a consummation, in all such cases, devoutly to be wished. Mr. Mangold deserves every credit for programme, and the manner of its performance.

SONNET.

NO. XXIV.

My dearest life—ah, didst thou know the pleasure
Which one kind loving word from thee bestows—
How round my heart a genial warmth it throws,
Filling the moments of a dreary leisure!
That little word is guarded as a treasure
In mem'ry's arms, which softly round it close,
My wounded soul to contemplate it goes,
Soothing its anguish with the deepest pleasure.
Oh, in the saddest love there is a bliss—
A rapture which is far beyond the telling,
So that we may not struggle to be free;
One word—one smile—nay, let me add—one kiss
Comes to the heart, where sorrow has been dwelling;
A moment's touch heals days of agony.

N. D.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

VIENNA.—The director of the theatre Ander-Wien has had a medal struck in honour of Jenny Lind. It contains on the one side her portrait, and on the other a star, with the motto "Nescit occasum" (it knows no setting). The medal is to be presented to Mdle. Lind with an address, signed by the élite of the society of Vienna.

NAPLES.—A new opera, Eleonora Dori, by Battista, has been produced at Naples with indifferent success. Fraschini and Madame Frezzolini performed the principal parts, but the theatre was half empty on the second night. Fraschini has since started for England.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

DRURY LANE.—Mr. Wallace's opera is running a brilliant career at old Drury, and promises to fulfil a long destiny, if we may judge by the fashionable and crowded audiences nightly assembled, and the enthusiasm with which the music is listened to throughout. Although, as we have stated elsewhere, Mr. Bunn has accepted a new opera from Mr. Laurent, yet, from the increasing success of Matilda of Hungary, there is not the least likelihood of its being put into rehearsal for many weeks yet. Nicolai's Templario was also talked of, being an opera in which Mr. Travers was much praised at Milan; but that also is, we hear, abandoned, and for the present there is every chance of Matilda of Hungary, with Miss Rainforth, the new and charming representative of the heroine, continuing for some fifty nights in succession on the boards. Mr. Wallace being, we much regret to state, seriously indisposed, Signor Schira has been under the necessity of assuming the baton in his absence. It is scarcely necessary to say that Signor Schira performs his task in a musician-like and highly satisfactory manner.

On Thursday night, after the tenth performance of Matilda of Hungary (during which the three favourite melodies of the opera, "Gone is that calmness," by Mr. Harrison, "In that devotion," by Miss Rainforth, and "A lowly youth," by Miss Isaacs, were encored with as much enthusiasm as on the first night of the opera), a new ballet of action was produced, under the title of Spanish Gallantries. The story turns upon the cross purposes of two gentlemen and two ladies, any of whom loves any but the right one, each desiring what cannot be had, and each declining what can be had for the asking, so that all four are in love with one of the four, and all four are in hate with the four that love, and all four are jealous of all four, any of any, whereby either party vexes individually the other, and either party by the other is vexed. Thereupon ensues a carnival, at which presides the god Momus, and all ends well. So that the four lovers sort not happily until Momus puts his finger in the pie; and then, as a matter of course, the lovers see their folly, and arrange matters, by an interchange of contraries, in the most peaceable manner conceivable. This plot is made the vehicle for a quantity of miming and gesturing, and for a series of very pretty and characteristic dances. To M. Blais, one of the most accomplished and experienced of ballet-masters, we owe the composition of the ballet, and the invention and arrangement of the dances, which does him infinite credit. The music by M. Blais, père, is a gathering from many sources. The incidental dances comprise a Minuet à Fandango by Mademoiselles Baderna, and Benart, (in the salon of Donna Elvira's chamber) in which the former looked very charming, and danced with stately humour, while the latter became her dress of a chevalier most prettily, displaying a pair of legs that Baily himself would leap at—a grand pas de cinq, (in the garden of the chateau, a very nice scene, which we recollect in Gysippus for Mademoiselles Dubignon, Benart, Giubilei, A. Payne, MM. Paul and Tell, a composition of considerable elegance; a seguidilla by the clever and popular Mdles. St. Louin; a pas de quatre, by Mesdemoiselles Dubignon, Louise, Benart, and M. Tell, which was capitally executed, and loudly applauded; and La Nouvelle Cachoucha by Marietta Baderna; the last three of them, in the Temple of Momus, a clever scene by Grieve, preceded by a sunrise landscape from the same pencil, which was exceedingly beautiful. The Cachoucha gave Mdle. Baderna an opportunity of displaying her capabilities as an accomplished dancer more entirely than she had previously been enabled to effect. The precision, agility, elegance, and vivacity which she evinced in her execution of this national dance were astonishing for her years, and obtained rapturous plaudits and an enthusiastic demand for repetition from the audience. Nothing daunted, the spirited young danseuse very cleverly varied all the poses and evolutions of the step, and charmed her spectators over again. The applause was again tremendous, and little Marietta was compelled to come forward several times, and acknowledge by repeated smiles, courtesies, and other demonstrations of respect, the warm appreciation of the house. It is now evident that in Mdle. Baderna, as in the wonderful Sophie Fuoco, the Covent-Garden company have secured a talent of immense promise and of great actual distinction for their ballet, about which there was so much doubt and uneasiness, previously to the engagement of Fanny Ellsler. They surely ought to present Mr. Bunn with a piece of plate, for to his enterprise they owe the discovery of both these fair and bright planets. There have been excellent pits at Drury-Lane all the week, a substantial proof that Matilda of Hungary draws money to the treasury.

ADELPHI.—On Thursday will be produced a new and original drama in three acts, by J. B. Buckstone, Esq., called The Flowers of the Forest, a Gipsy Story, supported by the talented company of this favourite theatre, including Messrs. Wright, Paul Bedford, O. Smith, Boyce, C. J. Smith, Mesdames Celeste, Fitzwilliam. Woolgar (who has recovered from her late severe indisposition), E. Harding, Laws. M. Taylor, &c.

PRINCESS'S.—Miss Bassano and Miss Anne Romer are still performing in their old parts, and nothing new has been announced. Great things, however, are talked about, to which we cannot pledge all our faith. Mrs. Butler is to appear, if report speaks aright, and Macready, and Madlle. Nau, and a new opera is being written for the present company, &c., &c. We have reason to believe some of these reports are true, and we know the manager will do all he can to uphold the character of his theatre. Meanwhile one novelty has been added to the attraction of the Princess's. A new bevy of Ethiopian Serenaders has appeared during the week at this theatre. They are good imitators of their sable brethren at the St. James'. The "Bones" we must especially notice as being of an excellent quality, and he of the tambourine merits approbation, not only for the peculiarity of the antics he plays, but for the orthodox manner in which he practically represents the hardness of a nigger's Caput. Young, "Ole Bull," deserves commendation for his solo on the violin.

FRENCH PLAYS.—We are inclined to think that few of the frequenters of this elegant theatre give M. Lafont credit for the care, study, and refinement which he brings to bear upon the parts allotted him. Many are inclined to undervalue all acting which does not deal in sobs, tears, horrors, hysterics, and convulsions. They require startling effects, and no actor is good but he who thrills their souls with affright, or shakes their sides with laughter. M. Lafont is of a school which has sent forth the first comedians of the world—Fleury, Molé, Perlet, Potier, and a host of others. He does not aim at surprising the sensibilities of his audience, he does not tear his hair, dance Jim Crow, or cheat them out of their applause by grimaces and buffoonery. His means are all legitimate; they are the result of profound and conscientious study, which is not discouraged by apparent neglect, nor led away to adopt the shorter but eventually fatal path to success. It is to be remarked that the manners and literature of the day are, as it were, stereotyped on the stage. We find in the new aspirants to artistic honours the same degree of impatience, the same feverish excitement which characterises the railroad, hot-house, high-pressure age in which we live; no matter in what branch, whether of literature, the drama, poetry, painting, sculpture, singing, or acting, there is an evident disinclination to study. The tyros fancy that time is lost which is not employed under the public gaze; the results obtained by their predecessors are spurned as old fashioned. They depend upon the powers with which they may be endowed by nature, and wantonly neglect the experience of the past. Hence new schools arise to last a few brief hours, and then disappear for ever. But in the midst of all this confusion and scrambling, there are men who avoid the general contagion, and imbued with an ardent love for their art, discard impulse without strict eputation, prefer unity of exception to mere clap-trap, avoid exaggeration, and climb up the steep ascent to fame by slow but sure degrees, never flattering themselves that its summit is attained. These men are not subject to the ordinary accidents of the uneducated artist; they are not good one night and bad the next; they are ever the same; and as improvement has ever been their object, they do go on improving, and each successive performance convinces us of some amelioration, some corner, as it were, rounded off, some polish, some new refinement. To this class M. Lafont decidedly belongs. He is a perfect gentleman on the stage, the most difficult of all assumed characters. In genteel parts he is perfectly at home; in humorous parts he never shocks our susceptibilities; he is comic without ever being vulgar; in short, as we have already stated, he is the man of the enlightened few, and not the mountebank of the multitude. Mathilde was played on Friday of last week and on Wednesday of this. The plot turns on the jealousy of a young wife, which creates the greatest mischief among her relations and friends. Madame Darbert has before marriage given birth to an illegitimate child, a fact which she has, of course, concealed from her own husband, but which she confides to the husband of Mathilde. In an interview between Madame Darbert and this gentleman, Mathilde's jealousy is excited, and in the explosion which ensues, she places her husband in the greatest peril by exposing him to the wrath of M. Darbert. There are some excellent situations brought about by the lady's jealousy, (not altogether groundless, it must be owned, in many respects) in which M. Lafont as M. Darbert, the man of high honour, gave a good delineation of dignified grief and sorrow. Mademoiselle Fargueil, as Mathilde, gained golden opinions; and M. Dumery, as we have frequently stated before, gave evident signs of improvement, and bids fair to arrive at distinction in his art. As a ball-room fop he was excellent. Les Deux Brigadiers is what may be termed in English a broad farce. The incidents are most amusing, and called down roars of laughter. The piece turns upon the attempts made by Cardinal Dubois to conceal an early marriage, which can be proved by papers in the possession of a grisette; this is done by a proposed marriage between the young lady and a nephew of the cardinal's valet, a brigadier in the regiment of Condé dragoons. The intended wife and husband are to meet at the cardinal's palace where the ceremony is to take place; but as the intrigue is conducted by the cardinal's secretary, who does not know the intended husband, he pitches on a brigadier of the Regiment de la Reine, who falls in his way, and by threats forces him to consent to the marriage; but here another scene of confusion ensues—for the wrong brigadier marries the wrong lady, who turns out to be the real grisette's sister. On this canvass a series of the most comical incidents is founded, in which nothing new is brought forward, but which produced much laughter and amusement. The plotting and counterplotting of the cardinal's two servants, the scene where the real lover appears, and the winding up of the piece by the marriage of the grisette and the real brigadier were vehicles for some very smart dialogue and witty allusions. M. Lafont was inimitable as the tall stalwart trooper. Un Mariqui se dérange is a piece in two acts, given for the first time on Monday last, Her Majesty being present. M. Maurice was formerly the pattern of a husband, but has latterly turned restless, and is never so happy as when away from his home. He returns home too late to dinner, and pretends he has been to the Bourse, where he has never set his foot; when his wife attempts to accuse him, he falls asleep and dreams about the "Bal de l'opéra." When at home surrounded by his friends he starts up and rushes out to order ices which never appear. The antithesis of this M. Maurice is a respectable physician, Bertholin, who resides in the same hotel, and who is a pattern of conjugal fidelity, so very devoted indeed, that his wife considers him a nuisance, and almost wishes he would be less faithful. This honest physician always chances to see Maurice, when the latter wishes to be concealed, and unwittingly causes a deal of mischief. In the second act we see the consequences of all his deceptions and the scrapes into which they lead him. The scene is at the "Maison d'or," overflowing with visitors after the "Bal de l'opéra." All the characters are here assembled. M. Maurice comes to sup with his "chère amie," Madame Maurice comes in search of her husband, attended by Mr. Bertholin; Madame Bertholin is present, having been to the ball with a party of friends; we have also several friends, including a marquis, a friend of Maurice's lady, a decided bully, who has a peculiar knack of shooting his rivals. We have several complicated situations, excessively droll, the effect of which is heightened by masks and dominos. At the end, M. Maurice promises to mend, tired of the perils to which his intrigues have exposed him. The piece was admirably played. Lafont and Cartigny were richly humorous. We must not omit to mention that the two wives were exceedingly well played by Mesdemoiselles Vallée and Fouquet. These two ladies are excessively useful members of the company, and not unfrequently contribute as much or more to the completeness and success of a piece as the more prominent stars who appear in it. The talent of the former lady, and the vivacity and good humour of the latter, more than merits a weekly kind word from the critic of these performances. The waiter was uncommonly well done by M. Pagenier. M. Alfred Tousez, the French Buckstone, made his first appearance last night.—J. de C.—E.

PROVINCIAL.

DUBLIN.—On Monday the eminent vocalist, Madame Anna Bishop, took her benefit at the Theatre Royal, when Anna Bolena (first time in English) and the second act of the Love Spell, were performed; Madame Bishop was the Anna Bolena in the first opera, and the Adina in the last. The house was quite full—the dress circle being crowded with fashionable parties, which, at this season of the year, and considering the state of the country, is not a small proof of the high estimation in which Madame Bishop is held by the Irish public. We have seen Grial in Donizetti's fine opera of Anna Bolena, and our opinion is, that Madame Bishop is not only quite equal to that celebrated singer in the arduous part of the injured queen, but that she surpasses her occasionally in tenderness and pathos, as well as in purity of style. Anna Bishop is always in earnest—identifies herself with the characters she represents—her byplay is excellent; and her entire action, as well as her singing, when she discovers that her friend, Jane Seymour, is her rival, were so fine and so true, that she was rewarded with thunders of applause and an unanimous encore. Nothing could be more beautiful than her last prison scene, and the manner she warbled the sympathetic melody—"Home of happy days." Miss De la Vega (Seymour), considering the disadvantage of singing duets with an artist like Madame Anna Bishop, acquitted herself well of what she had to do; so did also her sister (Smeaton), who was encored in her ballad. She has a good contralto voice. Messrs. Bishop and Corri were effective; and, upon the whole, the opera was brought out with a great deal of care—the orchestra and chorus being well drilled. Last night, on account of many applications at the box-office, Madame Anna Bishop appeared once more at our theatre, and performed three characters, entirely opposite to each other—an artistic feat which few singers in Europe could do so successfully, we think, as our fair vocalist; viz., second and third act of Anna Bolena, the second act of the Love Spell, and last of La Sonnambula, all in one evening and all sung with a most surprising freshness of voice, energy, and spirit. Again the house was full—again the applause enthusiastic, and the encores and call before the curtain repeated. We do not recollect for years a star who has so completely won the good will and sympathy of our public as Anna Bishop. We sincerely hope that that great artist will come again amongst us at a more propitious time.—Dublin Pilot, February 26.

MISCELLANEOUS.

GENERAL THEATRICAL FUND.—The eighth annual meeting of the members of this institution, established for "granting permanent pensions to actors and actresses, chorus singers, dancers, pantomimists and prompters," took place at the saloon of the Lyceum Theatre, for the purpose of receiving the reports of the committee and auditors. Mr. Buckstone (treasurer) was unanimously called on to preside. Mr. Cullenford (secretary) then read the report, from which it appeared the committee had invested 3,451l 8s. in the public securities, and that a balance of 22l 19s. 8½d. remained in the hands of the treasurer. After discharging all demands there was an increase in the receipts of last year of nearly 450l. as compared with those of the preceding year. The report having been adopted, the Secretary stated that the committee, at their last meeting, had received such a flattering statement of the finances of the institution, that they had recommended the allowance to annuitants to be increased 5l. per annum, viz., from 25l. to 30l. a year. The Chairman then announced that Mr. Macready had kindly consented to take the chair at the ensuing anniversary festival of the Fund, at the London Tavern. The Secretary also read a letter from Mr. Charles Dickens, dated from Paris, and announcing the intention of the writer to be present at the annual dinner of the society, which will take place next month. The list of subscribers contains the names of the late Duke of Northumberland, 50l.; the Duke of Devonshire, 10l. 10s. (annual); Charles Kear, Esq., 50l.; W. C. Macready, Esq.; 30l.; W. Farren, Esq., 30l.; B. Webster, Esq., 20l.; Mr. Sergeant Talfourd, 10l.; Luke J. Hansard, Esq., 25l.; Benjamin Bond Cabell, Esq., 21l.; Earl Fitzhardinge, 5l.; Earl of Ellesmere, 5l.; Douglas Jerrold, Esq., 5l.; Charles Dickens, Esq., 5l.; John Forster, Esq., 5l.; the Hon. T. Hope, 10l.; Sir Bellingham Graham, Bart., 10l.; John Strutt, Esq., 10l.; W. H. West Betty, Esq., 5l.; Sir A. Bernard, 5l.; (annual); Miss Helen Faucit, 5l.; (annual); Mrs. Glover, 5l.; J. Vandenhoff, Esq., 5l.; T. P. Cooke, Esq., 5l.; &c. The election of officers followed.—Trustees: Mr. Sergeant Talfourd, Charles Dickens, Esq., and Benjamin Bond Cabell, Esq.—Honorary Treasurer: J. B. Buckstone, Esq.—Committee: Messrs. A. Younge, E. F. Saville, Worrell, Williams, G. Osbaldeston, Buckstone, Attwood, H. Lewis, Lyon, Cullenford, Cowle (vice N. T. Hicks,) Saker, J. Howard, H. Hughes, and Morelli.—Auditors: Mr. H. T. Craven and Mr. W. Searle.—Secretary: Mr. Cullenford. The customary vote of thanks was presented to the chairman. Mr. Buckstone, in an appropriate speech, briefly acknowledged the compliment, and the meeting separated.

A NEW OPERA is already talked about at Drury Lane, to be produced as soon as Wallace's Matilda is laid aside. We trust, and believe, that the new composer will have some time to wait ere that event be consummated. Mr. Laurent, junr., the pianist, is the composer, and the libretto to which he has wedded his music, is founded on Sir Walter Scott's novel of Quentin Durward. The novel is one of the most wonderful productions of the author, but its magnificence, diversity of scene, and vigour of character, it seems to us, are scarcely suited to operatic purposes. We can fancy seeing Quentin Durward on the stage of Drury Lane performed as a lyric drama, will be something like viewing the Crucifixion of Rubens through a reverted telescope. Mr. Travers, we understand, is to play Quentin, and Mr. Borroni Louis XI. At all events, we shall have Mr. Travers in a new character, a matter of great interest to the musical public.

MR. LOVE'S ENTERTAINMENT.—This admirable ventriloquist and polyphonist gave a new entertainment on Wednesday evening, at Crosby Hall, which brought together a very crowded and respectable audience. Mr. Love commenced with a historical and philosophical lecture on the occult powers of the human voice and its contributory organs, which he illustrated in various ways clearly and copiously. He explained at great length the difference between ventriloquism and polyphonism, and gave an abstract history of ventriloquy, with a brief account of all the celebrated professors of the art from the earliest ages down to our own times. This part of the entertainment was highly instructive. It was, indeed, a most worthy homily. The second part was of a different kind altogether. In "The Trip to Hamburgh," Mr. Love exhibited his mimetic powers to perfection, and proved himself an actor of great capacity and versatility. His sudden changes from one character to another, and the celerity with which he assumed a new attire, were really feats. In the last portion of the entertainment, "A Christmas Party in the Olden Time," the facility with which he changed from a military officer to a servant lad, from a West India gentleman to a young lady of fashion, and others, excited amusement and delight in the audience. The characters he assumed are too numerous to mention, and the effects he produced can only be ascertained by beholding his performances. We shall certainly pay Mr. Love a second visit. We have seldom been more highly amused.

BEETHOVEN QUARTET SOCIETY.—The first soirée will take place on Monday, in the Beethoven Rooms, Harley Street. Thanks to the zeal and activity of M. Rousselot, the present season promises to be as brilliant as the last. Sainton, Hill, and Rousselot preserve their old places. The post of Sivori is filled up this year by M. Steveniers, first violinist to the King of the Belgians. M. Vieuxtemps is expected in the course of the season.

ON SLOW.—This composer, we are informed by La Critique Musicale, has just arrived in Paris.

PRESENTATION OF PLATE TO MR. H. FARMER.—On Friday, the pupils of this gentleman invited him to dine with them at the house of Mr. John Farmer, the Crown and Cushion, Market Street, in this town, when an opportunity was taken to present him, in token of their high esteem for his attention to their interests, and his invaluable exertions in promoting the science of music, with a splendid silver cup, and a purse of twenty-five guineas, the proceeds of a concert given to him on the 7th of December last. The following is a copy of the inscription, which is beautifully engraved on the cup—"This cup, together with a purse of twenty-five guineas, was presented to Mr. Henry Farmer, by his pupils, December 7, 1846." F. Wakefield, Esq., occupied the chair, and the evening was spent in an interesting and delightful manner.—Nottingham Review.

CARLOTTA GRISI.—This charming danseuse is daily expected in Paris, on her return from Rome. A new ballet, La Taitienne, the music by Adolphe Adam, in which she will, of course, shine as a star of the first magnitude, putting all the sidera minora in the shade by the lustre of her presence, will be put in rehearsal immediately after her return.

MENDELSSOHN'S "St. Paul" is to be performed, for the first time, at Paris, on the 19th of this month. This great work has been for nearly ten years well known to the English musical public.—Daily News.

AMATEUR MUSICAL SOCIETY.—The third performance took place last night. Full particulars in our next.

MR. HENRY RUSSELL.—The entertainments of this popular vocalist have continued to attract crowded houses during the week to the Strand Theatre.

VINCENT WALLACE.—It is with much regret that we have to announce the serious indisposition of this favourite composer, who now lies suffering seriously from an attack of ophthalmia and a general derangement of the system. Mr. Wallace caught a severe cold, when presiding in the Drury-Lane orchestra, which flew to his eyes, and affected him to such a degree that he has been unable to bear the light for several days. We trust we shall have better news to record of the author of Maritana next week.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FAIR COMPLEXION.

Under the Patronage of the Nobility and Gentry.

TO THE LADIES.—Wonderful and Important Discovery.

COCKBURN'S

ORIENTAL BOTANICAL PREPARATION,

For removing almost instantaneously cutaneous eruptions, freckles, pimples, spots, and other discolorations of the skin. After one application of the Botanic Extract, which must be used twice a day, a wonderful change will be perceived, and in the course of a few days the complexion will assume a beautiful transparent roseate hue and appearance. The extract to apply is of the most agreeable nature, and the first application will prove its wonderful efficacy. Prepared only, and sold wholesale and retail, by the sole proprietor,

GEORGE H. J. COCKBURN, 9, Aldgate, London; And Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street, London; in bottles at 2s. 9d. and 4s. 6d. each; also by Sanger, 130, Oxford-street; Keating, St. Paul's Church Yard; Johnson, 68, Cornhill; Hannay and Co., 63, Oxford street; Butler and Co., 4, Cheapside; Edwards, St. Paul's Churchyard; Frout, 229, Strand; and of all other Chemists and Perfumers in the kingdom.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE

Is acknowledged as the best specific after three years' trial, for improving the voice and removing all affections of the throat, strongly recommended to clergymen, singers, actors, public speakers, and all persons subject to relaxed throats.

The Proprietors have just received the following Testimonial, amongst many others, from MADAME ANNA BISHOP:—

"DEAR SIR,—I am happy to say that all I have heard respecting the efficacy of DR. STOLBERG'S celebrated LOZENGE is perfectly true, as yesterday, feeling myself very fatigued (singing nightly at the Theatre), I took several of the Lozenges, and my voice was very clear, and my throat quite free from relaxation. I am, Dear Sir, Yours truly, ANNA BISHOP."

"18th November 1846.—Jermyn Street."

Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Churchyard; W. Edwards and Newbery and Sons, St. Paul's Churchyard; Sanger, and Dietrichsen and Hannay, Oxford-street; and retail by all respectable Chymists in the Kingdom.

Just Published, the Opera of
MATILDA OF HUNGARY,
 AS PERFORMED AT THE Theatre Royal, Drury Lane;

WRITTEN BY ALFRED BUNN, COMPOSED BY W. VINCENT WALLACE.

London:—GRAMER, BEALE, and Co., 201, Regent-street; and 67, Conduit-street.

ACT I.

	s.	d.
1 "May Heaven protect the Queen," Introduction and Chorus	2	0
2 "The Prophet his standard was rearing," Song. Sung by Mr. Weiss ..	2	0
3 "One day I wandered," "It was a form," Recit. and Air. Mr. W. Harrison ..	2	6
4 "She comes in all her loveliness," Cavatina. Mr. Borran ..	3	0
5 "What! shall my bright and spotless crown," Duet. Miss Romer and Mr. Borran ..	2	6
6 "Before our Queen we kneel," Chorus	3	0
7 "What form is that?" "It is my Queen," Recit. and Duet. Messrs. Harrison and Borran ..	2	0
8 "Adieu, fair land," Ballad. Mr. W. Harrison	2	0
9 "The soldier silently doth stand," Finale to Act I	6	0

ACT II.

10 "At length in absence mourn'd," "Fly hence each idle fear," Miss Romer. Recit. and Air	3	0
11 "This happy day we celebrate," Chorus	3	0
12 "Long live the King," Chorus	2	6
13 "The moment comes," Canon. Messrs. Harrison, Borran and Jones ..	2	0
14 "Like waves which o'er the ocean," Barcarole. Mr. W. Harrison ..	2	0
15 "Gone is the calmness," Ballad. Mr. W. Harrison	3	0
16 "O vengeance, rage and shame," Duet. Messrs. Harrison and Borran ..	1	6
17 "Thy fondest wish, thy highest aim," Chorus	2	0
18 "They who would still be happy," Romance. Miss Romer	2	0
19 "This deep affront I did not need," Duet. Miss Romer and Mr. Harrison ..	2	6
20 "The people, past assuaging," Finale to Act II.

ACT III.

21 "These halls of revels once the scene," Recitative	2	0
22 "A lowly youth the mountain child," Ballad. Miss Isaacs	3	0
23 "Oh, welcome with shouts," Chorus and Solo	2	0
24 "In the devotion which we breathe," Ballad. Miss Romer	2	0
25 "Suppress these giddy transports," Chorus and Solo
26 "To see my King," Trio. Messrs. Harrison, Borran and Weiss
27 "What do I hear?" Duet. Miss Romer and Mr. W. Harrison
28 "Here, by our laws, for justice," Concerted Piece
29 "One gentle heart," Rondo Finale. Miss Romer

The Opera will be printed in a complete form on the 25th of March, price 42s.

PIANO-FORTE ARRANGEMENTS.

The Overture, arranged by Lavenu	4	0
Select Airs, in three books, by ditto, each	5	0
Ditto, with a Flute or a Cornet accompaniment to each book	3	0
Quadrilles from the Opera, by Coote	4	0
The Overture arranged as a Pianoforte duet, by J. W. Davison

N.B. Other arrangements are in preparation.

Concert Rooms, Hanover Square.

UNDER THE PATRONAGE OF H.R.H. THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.

A GRAND VOCAL AND INSTRUMENTAL CONCERT

Will be given at the above Rooms (the use of which has been most kindly granted by T. MARTIN, Esq.) for the Benefit of the Widow and Nine Children of the late Mr. KEARNS, (Formerly a Member of the Philharmonic Society and Ancient Concert Orchestra)

On Wednesday Evening, March 17, 1847,

To commence at Eight o'clock precisely. The following eminent artistes have most kindly promised their valuable assistance:—Vocalists—Miss Birch, Madame Caradori Allan, Miss Rainforth, Madame Albertazzi, Miss Bassano, Miss Steele, Mrs. A. Toulmin, Misses Williams, Miss Lockey, Miss Lincoln—Miss Dolby, Miss Flower, Miss Maria B. Hawes, Mme G. A. Macfarren, and Madame F. Lablache. Mr. Harrison, Mr. Travers, Mr. Allen, Signor Brizzi, Mr. Manvers, Mr. Hobbs, Mr. Lockey—Mr. H. Phillips, Mr. Machin, Mr. J. A. Novello, Mr. J. L. Hatton, and Signor F. Lablache. The members of the Choral Fund will sing a popular Madrigal. Instrumentalists:—Pianoforte, Mrs. Anderson; Messrs. Benedict and W. S. Bennett, who will perform Bach's Concerto for three Pianofortes—Violin, Messrs. Sainton, Blagrove, Wilby, and C. Patey, who will perform Maurer's celebrated Quartet for four Violins. Violoncello, Messrs. Lindley and Lucas, Contra Bass, Mr. Howell, who will perform one of Corelli's celebrated Trios. A numerous Orchestra, combining the elite of the Philharmonic, Ancient Concerts, and Opera Bands, will be conducted by Signor Costa, and will perform Beethoven's Symphony in D, and Weber's Overture to Oberon. The under-named gentlemen have already consented to serve on the committee:—Sir George Smart, Chairman. Mr. G. A. Macfarren, Secretary. Messrs. G. F. Anderson, M. W. Balfe, M. Barnett, H. Blagrove, J. Benedict, Sir H. R. Bishop, R. K. Bowley, Card, Carte, J. B. Chatterton, J. Clinton, G. Goote, W. Erat, Ewer and Co., W. Goodwin, C. L. Gruneison, T. Harper, J. L. Hatton, R. Hatton, J. Hobbs, G. Hogarth, W. Horsley (M.B. Oxon), C. Horsley, J. Howell, J. Loder, C. Lucas, C. Neate, V. Novello, R. W. Olivier, W. L. Phillips, J. Richardson, H. Smart, J. Thirlwall, W. Thomas, W. V. Wallace; Thos. Chappell, Treasurer. Tickets, 7s.; Reserved Seats, 1s. 6d. each, may be obtained at all the Music Warehouses and Libraries; the Committee, by whom Donations and Subscriptions will be most thankfully received; and of Mrs. Kearns, 13, Princes Place, Kennington Cross.

PIANOFORTES FOR SALE:

A very superior and powerful toned 6½ Octave Rosewood COTTAGE, by Zetter and Co., with metallic string plate, check action, &c., cost 60 guineas a short time since, and will now be sold for half that sum; an elegant Rosewood Semi-CABINET, 6½ octaves, with all the latest improvements, only 35 guineas; a COTTAGE, 14 guineas; a 6-OCTAVE SQUARE, by Broadwood, with metallic spring plate, only £18, cost 52 guineas; a 5½ DITTO, £4. Also, a variety of new and improved CABINET, COTTAGE, and PICCOLO PIANOFORTES, from 25 guineas each. Packed free of expense.

C. SCOTCHER,

(from Collard and Collard's), 60, Mortimer-street, Cavendish-square.
 PIANOFORTES TAKEN IN EXCHANGE.

EXETER HALL.

The Committee of the HULLAH TESTIMONIAL FUND beg leave to announce that the next

CONCERT,

(BRING THE THIRD OF THE SERIES,) ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE HISTORY OF English Vocal Music,

Will take place

ON MONDAY NEXT, MARCH 8th,

Commencing at Eight o'clock; in which will be presented, in Chronological Order, specimens from the Music of JOHN BISHOP, WELDON, CROFT, GREEN, NARRE, and BOYCE; ALDRICH, CAREY, TRAVERS, ARNE, COOKE, JACKSON, and BATTISHELL.

For the Performance of Pieces requiring Accompaniment, a NEW ORGAN has been erected by Mr. ROBSON; and the CONCERT BAND, under the Direction of Mr. WILLY, has been engaged.—The CHORUS will consist of Mr. HULLAH's UPPER SINGING SCHOOLS.

Principal Vocal Performers:

MISS RAINFORTH, MISS DUVAL,
 MR. MANVERS, MR. W. H. SEGUIN, and MR. MACHIN.
 Organist,—MR. OLIVER MAY, Conductor, MR. MAY.

TICKETS.—Area, 2s.; Western Gallery, 3s. 6d.; Reserved Seats, 7s.; may be procured of Mr. J. W. PARKER, Publisher, 445, West Strand; of the principal Music Sellers; and at the Apollonicon Rooms, 101, St. Martin's Lane.

Warren's 20 Guinea Cottage Piano-Fortes

ARE NOW SELLING AT THE

Manufactory, 71, Leadenhall Street

(Removed from 1 and 2, Liverpool Street, Bishopsgate Street.)

These Instruments are well manufactured of the best seasoned wood, FINE FULL TONE AND GOOD TOUCH. A two years warranty given with each instrument. ESTABLISHED TWENTY-ONE YEARS. The only house in London where a good sound instrument can be obtained at the above low price, (for cash only). SMALL PROFIT AND QUICK RETURNS!

JOHN WARREN, 71, Leadenhall St., opposite Aldgate Pump.

TO THE MUSIC PROFESSION.

"NASSAU STEAM PRESS,"
ANDPUBLISHING OFFICE,

60, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, CHARING CROSS.

Every description of CONCERT PRINTING, (Public or Private,) consisting of PROGRAMMES, NOTES, TICKETS, POSTING BILLS, &c., are neatly and expeditiously executed with economy and taste by

W. S. JOHNSON,

PRINTER TO HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Where also may be had "The Musical World," and all Operas, Comedies, Plays, Farces, Burlesques, and the whole of Webster's unique Acting Drama.

SONGS

FOR THE

CLASSICAL VOCALIST.

Just Published—

TWELVE SONGS,

Selected from the Compositions of

GLUCK, HANDEL, HAYDN, MOZART, PERGOLESI, PURCELL, AND ROSSI.

EDITED AND ARRANGED BY MISS MASSON,

And dedicated (by permission) to

HER MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

Price complete, bound in cloth, 12s. Also, published separately.

A list of Contents may be had on application, or will be forwarded by post. "Nothing can be more correct than the title which Miss Masson has bestowed on her volume. It is made up of the richest gems of vocal art; and they have the further recommendation of being not only rich, but rare. Miss Masson is entitled to the thanks of the musical world for this beautiful selection, for the taste and skill with which the accompaniments are arranged from the original scores, and for the clear, correct, and elegant manner in which the work is brought out.—Daily News, Jan. 29. 1847."

LONDON:—PUBLISHED BY

LEADER and COCK, 63, New Bond-street.

IMPORTANT SALE OF MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.*Messrs. PUTTICK & SIMPSON,

(Successors to Mr. Fletcher.)

Auctioneers of Music and Literary Property,

WILL SELL BY AUCTION,

At their GREAT ROOM, 191, PICCADILLY,

On TUESDAY, MARCH 9th, and following day,

At One o'clock most punctually, the Musical Library of the late Mr. GEORGE PARSON, comprising Vocal Music, Sacred Music, Handel's Works, Operas, Pianoforte and Organ Music, Instrumental Music, Theoretical and Historical Works, &c.

ALSO,

VALUABLE VIOLINS,

(Including the FINAL PORTION of the collection of Mr. FRANÇOIS CRAMER.)

Violoncellos, a Double Bass, Pianofortes by Messrs. Broadwood, &c.

May be viewed on Saturday and Monday before the sale, and catalogues had (or will be sent on application).

EXTENSIVE SALE OFHARPS AND PIANOFORTES,

Manufactured by the late Mr. STUMPF.

PUTTICK AND SIMPSON,

(Successors to Mr. Fletcher.)

Auctioneers of Music and Literary Property,

WILL SELL BY AUCTION,

AT THEIR GREAT ROOMS, 191, PICCADILLY,

And on the Premises, No. 44, GREAT PORTLAND STREET,

In a few days, (by order of the Executor of the late Mr. STUMPF), the valuable stock in trade, consisting of elegant

DOUBLE-ACTION HARPS,

In the manufacture of which the late Mr. STUMPF enjoyed, so deservedly, high reputation.

PIANOFORTES.

Horizontal Grands, and Cottages of extended compass, in mahogany and rosewood cases. Also, the stock of Instruments partly finished, Materials, Tools, Fixtures, &c. Catalogues (which will shortly be ready) will be sent on application.

N.B.—The finished Instruments, with some other portions of the stock, will be removed (for greater convenience of sale) to the great rooms of Messrs. PUTTICK and SIMPSON, 191, Piccadilly; and the trade stock and effects will be sold on the premises, No. 44, Great Portland Street.

PIANOFORTES.

Parties in want of a really good PIANOFORTE, at a moderate price, will do well to call at

J. C. JONES AND CO.'s,

2, Hanway-street, Oxford-street, a few doors on the right from Tottenham-court-road, who, from their intimate acquaintance with every kind of instrument made, have endeavoured to combine the separate good qualities of each with all the latest improvements, therefore for tone, touch, durability, and appearance these Instruments are not to be surpassed at the price.

Instruments tuned, repaired, exchanged, and lent on hire.

Tuning by the year, one guinea. Second-hand Pianos, from 3 to 30 guineas.

MESSRS.

R. COCKS'S NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC,

BY

W. VINCENT WALLACE.

"The Last Rose of Summer," "The Blue Bell's of Scotland," "Nocturne," each 3s. Pretty Merry Waltz, Anna Waltz, and L'Hirondelle Waltz, each 2s. At the urgent request of the most eminent professors of music, residing in all parts of the united kingdom, Messrs. R. Cocks and Co. have been so fortunate as to obtain from that gifted composer, W. Vincent Wallace, the above-named six pieces, which are written in his happiest style. To meet the amateur's constant demand, they have been written expressly to suit the drawing-room, as they may be acquired by memory.—Now ready, the 26th edition of Hamilton's Dictionary, of 2,500 terms, by John Bishop, price 1s. Pianos for sale and hire.

TO TEACHERS OF MUSIC.

HAMILTON'S PIANOFORTE TUTOR, with Exercises and 36 Airs fingered by Czerny, price only 4s. "This work is clearly written, and intelligible to the most ordinary capacity, and the book is worthy the attention of teachers."—Vide No. 44, Musical World. Also, by Hamilton, his Miniature Course of Harmony and Composition, five vols., each 2s. and 3s. Dictionary of 2,500 Musical Terms, 1s. Catechism of Singing, 3s.; ditto Organ, 3s.; ditto Violin and Violoncello, each 1s. "What Mrs. Barbauld in her day did for the infant reader, Mr. Hamilton in his has done for the musical beginner."—Musical World. "Mr. Hamilton has done for musical students what Mr. Pinnoch has achieved for general education."—Bent's Literary Advertiser. And to be had, on order, of all music-sellers and booksellers. Pianos and harps for sale or hire.

SCHOOL MUSIC FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

CHAULIEU'S First Six Months at the Pianoforte, six books, each 3s.; or the six in one volume, 15s. "So excellent is the plan of this truly admirable work, and so novel and ingenious its execution, that it is in the highest degree masterly. Indeed I have no hesitation in saying that for the tuition of children on the pianoforte, no work of equal merit and utility has ever come before the public; and for class or school teaching, it will be found absolutely invaluable. Country teachers and persons who have not had long experience, in tuition will by its aid be enabled to guide their pupils into a short and pleasant path, along which their progress towards excellence will be rapid and certain, and which will assuredly redound equally to their profit and their reputation."—J. Hamilton, author of The Musical Catechisms.

CATHEDRAL MUSIC.

Nearly ready for delivery, DR. BOYCE'S COLLECTION of CATHEDRAL MUSIC (under the immediate patronage of His Royal Highness Prince Albert),—newly edited by JOSEPH WARREN. In score with an accompaniment for the organ, in three large folio volumes (upwards of 1,000 pages), containing Tallis's full Cathedral Service, and numerous Services and Anthems by Farrant, Byrd, Morley, Orlando Gibbons, Child, H. Purcell, Dr. Blow, and other celebrated church composers, with an appendix to each volume, containing additional Services and Anthems, a Life and Portrait of Dr. Boyce, and new biographical particulars of the composers. Price to subscribers, £4. 14s. 6d.; to non-subscribers, £8 8s. London, Messrs. R. Cocks and Co. Ladies and gentlemen who intend to honour this new edition with their names, will please to forward them as early as possible to the publishers, where may be had John Bishop's edition of Tallis's Order of the Daily Service, in one elegant volume, gilt edges, 6s.; and separate parts of the Morning, Evening, and Communion Services, for treble, tenor, alto, and bass, 2s. each; and organ ditto, 3s.

ROYAL PIANOFORTE SALOON.

SUPERIOR PICCOLO and COTTAGE PIANOFORTES, Nos. 1 to 7, manufactured by R. COCKS and Co., No. 6, Burlington-street, London, Music-sellers to the Queen.—"These pianofortes are remarkable for the beauty and equality of their tone, the facility of their touch, and their extremely elegant exterior. They have the advantage of being firmly and compactly made, of the best-seasoned materials, and of keeping well in tune for an unusual length of time."—Musical World, Dec. 11, 1845. "It is our candid opinion that for workmanship and quality throughout, together with the extreme reasonableness of the prices, these pianofortes cannot be surpassed."—Dramatic and Musical Review, Jan. 24, 1846. N.B. A list of prices and other particulars, to be had gratis, postage free. Seven of Erard's Harps, and One Hundred Pianos for sale or hire, on very moderate terms, including several Grand Squares by Messrs. Collard and Collard, and Broadwood.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847,

A most beautiful Christmas Present, New Year's Gift,
and Etrennes.

M. JULLIEN

Has the honor to announce that his

MUSICAL ANNUAL FOR 1847

Is Published, and is by far the best work of the kind that has ever appeared; contains no less than

THIRTY PIECES OF VOCAL AND FOURTEEN OF INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC,

The greater part of which have never before been published, the copyrights
having been purchased expressly for this work, at an immense cost, with the view of rendering it immeasurably superior to any of its predecessors.

The portion which has already appeared comprise those pieces only whose decided success has induced M. JULLIEN, at the request of numerous influential patrons, to include them in this Selection.

The Illustrations, in addition to the elaborately executed Covers, Title, and Dedication pages, include

TWO MAGNIFICENT VIEWS

OF THE

Interior of Covent-Garden Theatre,

The one taken during the brilliant scene exhibited in that splendid arena of
the occasion of M. JULLIEN'S GRAND BAL MASQUE; the other a VIEW OF THE THEATRE TAKEN DURING THE CONCERTS,
the grouping of the Figures in both Views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant. To those who have visited the Theatre on either occasion, the ALBUM will form a delightful SOUVENIR, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of
the gorgeous scene.

A SPLENDIDLY-COLOURED

PORTRAIT

Of the celebrated Danseuse,

MADLE. FLORA FABBRI,

In the admired Pas, LA CASTIGLIANA.

AN ORIGINAL SUBJECT,

"THE FORTUNE TELLER,"

Illustrating BAKER's beautiful Ballad of that name.

The whole of this department of the ALBUM has been under the active superintendence of J. BRANDARD, Esq., whose pencil only has been employed in its production.

Nothing more need be said in favour of this ALBUM, and in proof of its vast superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the Contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe: viz.

ROSSINI,	VERDI,	DONIZETTI,	RUBINI,
ROCH-ALBERT,	HÖLZEL,	GOLDBERG,	SCHIRA,
SCHULZ,	STOPEL,	DUPREZ,	JOSE GOMIS,
MASARNAU,	MARATZEK,	BALFE,	JULLIEN,
HATTON,	BARRET,	ALEXANDER LEE,	KÖENIG,
KNIGHT,	BAKER,	FARMER,	LINLEY,
LAKE,	FITZBALL,	MOULD,	HURREY,
FOREST,	ALBERT SMITH,	DESMOND RYAN,	&c.

It will thus be perceived that in addition to the latest compositions of the best English Composers, the ALBUM will contain some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany, France, Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting
the attention of the Continental dilettanti.

PRICE 18s. AND £1. 1s.

ROYAL CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC

214, REGENT-STREET, AND 45, KING-STREET.

SOVEREIGN Life Assurance Company,

No. 5, ST. JAMES'S STREET,
LONDON.

Trustees.

Sir A. Brydges Henniker, Bart.
B. Bond Cabbell, Esq., M.P.

Henry Pownall, Esq.
Claude Edward Scott, Esq.

Directors.

CHAIRMAN, Lieutenant Colonel Lord

Arthur Lennox.

DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN, T. C. Granger,
Esq., M.P.

John Ashburner, Esq., M.D.

T. M. B. Batard, Esq.

Philip P. Blyth, Esq.

Henry Broadwood, Esq., M.P.

Sir James Carmichael, Bart.

Charles Farebrother, Esq., Alderman.

William Tulloh Fraser, Esq.

John Gardiner, Esq.

Aaron Asher Goldsmid, Esq.

Henry William Pownall, Esq.

Bankers, Sir Claude Scott, Bart., and Co.

Solicitors, Messrs. Davies, Son, and Campbell.

Assurances on the lives of persons in every station of life and every part of the world, granted on a plan which combines the utmost amount of benefit to the families of the assured at death, with every attainable advantage during life, which the system of Life Assurance is capable of affording.

It affords perfect security in a subscribed Capital, which guarantees the prompt settlement of every claim, with participating and non-participating rates on the lowest scale, especially for terms of years.

The Assured can anticipate or obtain the advance of the full amount of the Policy, on giving approved available security for a certain number of annual payments, as explained by the Prospectus.

Every facility is afforded to persons assuring the lives of others, so as to render such Policies effectual securities.

A new plan of gradual or accumulative Assurance, particularly adapted for young lives, and for such as cannot, without inconvenience, undertake the payment of a fixed premium, securing at once provision in case of premature death, and an accumulating fund, available during life, should occasion require.

ANNUITIES, ENDOWMENTS, ADVANCES, and LOANS, on liberal terms.

Detailed Prospectuses, with forms of Proposal, and every information, may be had on application, either personally or by letter, at the Company's Offices.

The usual commission to Solicitors and Agents.

H. D. DAVENPORT, Secretary.

BY ROYAL LETTERS PATENT.

THE DIATONIC FLUTE

Can only be procured of the Patentee, at his manufactory, 3, Bell Yard, Gracechurch Street.

This Instrument is fingered in the same manner as the ordinary flute, and may be played as perfectly in tune as the Violin. Its superiority is now acknowledged by all who have adopted it.

In March will be published, "THEORY OF THE PATENT DIATONIC FLUTE," by ABEL SICCAMA, B.A., Patentee.

MEDICAL GALVANISM.

HORNE, THORNTHWAITE, & WOOD, Successors to E. PALMER, 123, Newgate-street, in submitting their improved ELECTRO-GALVANIC MACHINES,
beg to state, that they have availed themselves of the discoveries of De la Rive, Faraday, Smee, and others, by which they are enabled to construct a coil with all the required intensity and quantity of electricity for medical use, thereby effecting both a saving of expense and trouble to the invalid, and placing in his hands
an effective, powerful, and simple instrument, that may be excited at a minute's notice, and without trouble. — Price, £3. 3s.; £3. 10s.; and £5. 5s.

PHILOSOPHICAL APPARATUS.—Every description of Apparatus connected with Chemistry, Hydraulics, Hydrostatics, Pneumatics, Frictional and Voltaic
Electricity, Electro-Magnetism, Electro-Metallurgy, Optics, (including the Dissolving Views, Photography, &c.) manufactured and sold by Horne, Thornthwaite and Wood, successors to Edward Palmer, 123, Newgate Street, London.

Foreign orders, enclosing a remittance or order for payment in London,
promptly attended to.

THE PATENT HARMONIUM.

This beautiful Instrument possesses the softness of the voice with the variety of tone of every wind Instrument, as also the power of a large Organ. It is equally suitable for Sacred Music, or the Dance, and adapted for the Drawing Room, Concert Room, Church or Chapel. Printed particulars can be had of LUFF and SON, sole agents, where the PATENT HARMONIUM can be heard from 10 till 4 daily; and where can be inspected.

LUFF & SON'S

Elegant Assortment of PIANOFORTES,

Made by experienced workmen, and thoroughly seasoned wood, all of which is prepared on the premises. They are warranted to stand well in Tune, and are prepared for extreme climates: prices one-third less than usually charged.
Instruments taken in exchange, and a liberal allowance to dealers.

LUFF and SON, 103, Great Russell Street, Bloomsbury.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, at the "Nassau Steam Press,"
by WILLIAM SPENCER JOHNSON, 60, St. Martin's Lane, in the parish of St.
Martin in the Fields, in the County of Middlesex; where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed post paid. To be had of G. Furber, Dean Street, Soho; Strange, Paternoster Row; Wiseheart, Dublin; and all Booksellers.
—Saturday, March 6th, 1847.

The Musical World.

(PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT NOON.)

A RECORD OF THE THEATRES, MUSIC, LITERATURE, FINE ARTS,
FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE, &c.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s. Stamped; 12s. Unstamped; to be forwarded by Money Order or Postage stamps to the Publisher, W. S. Johnson, "Nassau Steam Press," 60, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross.

Each Subscriber is entitled to an Admission to an Annual Concert, and a Piece of Music, (regular Music size) Monthly.

No. 11.—VOL. XXII.

SATURDAY, MARCH 13, 1847.

PRICE THREEPENCE
STAMPED, FOURPENCE

THE BEETHOVEN QUARTET SOCIETY.

THE zealous and enthusiastic lover of music, who originated this admirable society, is no more, but the example he set we trust has not been lost on his survivors. If ever an amateur deserved the title of the Mæcenas of music, it was the late Mr. Alsager. Not content, as many are, to make it an egotistical source of mere private amusement, his object was to spread taste for its more recondite and elaborate beauties far and wide, to popularize its philosophy among amateurs, and by their medium to refine the general feeling of the public. Music was his sole relaxation, his chief social delight; and as his heart was open to all the eloquence of its appeal, so were the portals of his princely hospitality thrown wide apart to welcome its professors, who, as hearers or as players, found an equally warm and generous reception. The good he thus gradually, but surely effected, was incalculable. The more profound and poetical works of the great triad of instrumental composers, which for so long had remained a sealed book to the multitude of amateurs, aye, and of musicians too, were, through his exertions, made familiar as household-gods. But it is the lover of Beethoven who should most fondly cherish the memory of Mr. Alsager. Perhaps never was there an instance of such unbounded enthusiasm for the works of a great man, as in that lamented gentleman's reverence and adoration for the chamber-compositions of Beethoven. He knew them all by heart; every one of their melodies was to him as a dear friend; he doted on them. And as the mother's fondness for her offspring is so frequently exemplified in a preference for the least generally admired:—

"The feeblest and yet the favorite;"

so was his devotion to the quartets of Beethoven. In proportion to their being unknown and more neglected was the measure of his love for them administered. He loved the first six dearly, (as who would not?) but much more dearly the three that follow. The tenth and eleventh he venerated—and the last six, "the Posthumous," he idolized; for they were the coyest to disclose the treasures of their beauty—wrapped and folded in an atmosphere of golden mist, which only the eye and the heart of enthusiasts could penetrate. So these were less courted; nay, for a time almost abandoned; and for this Mr. Alsager loved them more; felt for them more; devoted himself to their interest; and preached a crusade in their behalf, which ended in the conversion of sceptics, and the establishment of the truth, which was hidden until he unfolded it to the world. This was the noble use to which he gave up the whole of the leisure he enjoyed from those worldly occupations in the conduct of which he had earned such high distinction. In recording the opening of the third season of the Beethoven Quartet Society, it would have been but false delicacy in us to refrain from alluding, in a manner suitable to the occasion, to him who was its originator, to him who not only laid the seeds but fostered the growth, as it gradually reared its head above the ground, and who has now bequeathed it to his friend and associate in the good work, Scipion Rousselot, a musician and an enthusiast, and a fit holder of such a legacy. The day is indeed far distant when amateurs and professors of that art which he loved so well shall have ceased to mourn the loss of Mr. Alsager; a loss as unexpected as it was cruel; and it would be an unworthy affectation in us to shrink from avowing the deep sympathy we entertain for the general feeling of regret. He was an intellectual and a good man—may we never forget to cherish and revere his memory.

The first meeting for the season 1847 (the third), took place on Monday evening, at the Beethoven Rooms, which, in their new garb of white-wash, wore an appearance of desolation easily accountable to those who, like ourselves, had not entered them since last summer. However, there were so many familiar faces, that as the performances went on things began to look more cheerful, and faith and hope assumed their comfortable sway. The programme of the evening, according to the plan already adopted, comprised three quartets selected from the three different epochs of the master's career. The first was the quartet in F major, belonging to the Op. 18, which Beethoven composed in 1791, and dedicated to his illustrious patron and kind friend, the Prince Lichnowsky. In this quartet will be remarked the characteristics of Beethoven's early style, exemplified in great perfection. It is one of the most admirable of all his works, and was written just as his manner was threatening to assume its second form. Nevertheless, we have the clear design, the short and simple subjects, the independent use of the full cadence, the free control of counterpoint (some fine examples of which occur in the final movement), the natural and unaffected harmonies, and the employment of lengthened phraseology only for the effects of climax, which are the elements of Mozart's and Haydn's styles, with perhaps a greater leaning to the tender pathos of the former, than to the robust vivacity of the latter. The first movement (in F major), Allegro con Brio, has a bold subject, easily retained by the ear, and worked throughout with great fluency of counterpoint. It is highly energetic and commanding. The Adagio affettuoso ed Apassionato (in D minor), would leave nothing to be desired if Beethoven had made no progress in his art beyond what it develops. It is exquisitely pathetic, and many of its bursts of anguish would draw tears from the most callous—

"And make men tremble who never weep."

The scherno is playful and most ingeniously written; a fine contrast being produced by the very opposite character of the trio. The final Allegro (in F major), is formed on a theme which captivates by its capricious vivacity, while the treatment is masterly in its development and interesting in its variety. The introduction of the second theme is novel and beautiful, and its employment throughout the movement is marked by the most exquisite fancy. The fine effect produced by the occasional appearance of the first subject in the fugued style is also worthy the attention of those who would study Beethoven's scores with profit. There is no dryness or pedantry in it, but it appears in all the freshness of a new and beautiful thought. It may seem a bold assertion, but we cannot help stating our conviction that this quartet, which stands No. 1 on the list (although we believe it was really the third in the order of production) is equal to any of the seventeen, since from the first bar to the last it is a manifestation of genius and power of the highest order. It is also strikingly original, while it adheres in a great measure to the plan of these models which are left us in the imperishable works of Mozart and Haydn.

Before stating our impressions of the manner in which this quartet was executed, it may be as well to say a word or two about M. Rousselot's position with respect to the engagements for the season, resulting from circumstances over which he could have no control. The loss of Camillo Sivori, who is absent in America, cannot be sufficiently lamented. The idea of supplying his place by any other than Ernst or Joachim would be preposterous. But M. Rousselot did his best under the circumstances, by engaging Herr David, the celebrated violinist from Leipsic. Here he was disappointed, however—illness or some other cause rendering Herr David's advent this season impossible. At his wit's end for a substitute, the arrival of M. Steveniers from Brussels offered a means of extricating himself from difficulty, which M. Rousselot would have been unwise to overlook. Steveniers was accordingly engaged to lead the quartets in alternation with M. Sainton, until the arrival of Vieuxtemps, who is expected later in the season. This gentleman is violinist to the king of the Belgians, and enjoys a very high reputation on the continent. The F major quartet of Beethoven gave us an excellent opportunity to form a judgment of his capabilities. His execution is bold and energetic perhaps occasionally wanting in finish, but for the most part effective. His intonation is rarely at fault, and his tone though thin, is agreeable and stands out in good relief. His style is chaste, polished, and wholly devoid of exaggeration. He takes no liberties with the text of his author, moreover—which is a great point of recommendation. On the whole, though M. Steveniers is not a Sivori, he is a very excellent artist, and few will be dissatisfied with him in his post among the Beethoven quartettists. The quartet was generally well executed. The adagio gave M. Steveniers occasion to show that he is quite at home in the pathetic and expressive style, and many of his readings were highly poetical. In the finale too, his execution was often so neat, brilliant, and effective, as to elicit marks of special approval from the audience. In the other parts, Sainton, Hill, and Rousselot were all that could be desired, and the ensemble was generally most satisfactory. Some exquisite effects were produced in pianissimo passages, which did not pass unnoticed.

The next quartet performed was one which Beethoven wrote in 1808, seventeen years later in life—the C major, from the set dedicated to Prince Rasumowsky, op. 59. This contains the plaintive and mysterious movement in 6-8 measure, Andante con moto quasi allegretto, in A minor, and the magnificent fugued Finale, which rank among the most astonishing inspirations of the great musician. We have so often commented upon the beauties of this quartet,* that it is unnecessary here to dwell upon them. Suffice it that it was composed when Beethoven's second style had attained its meridian, when he had entirely forgotten Mozart and Haydn, retaining only their peculiarities of form which he had developed to gigantic proportions. It is remarkable throughout for savage independence of rhythm and harmony, for phrases long-drawn out and protracted ad infinitum, for unexpected cadences and bold progressions, for pretty melodies cut short as they are born or twisted into singular proportions by the wayward and petulant fancy of the creator, for endless successions and repetitions of climaxes, and in short for all those peculiarities which in the Posthumous Quartets are carried to the very utmost verge of musical propriety, and sometimes (must it be said?) tumble into the chasin beyond. Nevertheless it is a magnificent work, the genius of Beethoven having been in its veriest prime at the epoch of its production. There are effects in it that of themselves are worth a whole quartet; the most wonderful example we can adduce being the startling interruption of the climax in the coda of the last movement, by a single note (A flat, if we recollect) played by the four instruments in unison, and the unexpected increase of power and fullness of effect almost orchestral that distinguishes the resumption of the coda, and continues augmenting and augmenting till the very last notes have been struck. The frenzy of genius is here exerted with a grandeur that almost terrifies.

We were much pleased with the execution of this wonderful quartet. No one plays the "Rasumowsky Quartets" with more fire and abandon than M. Sainton; and the C major suits the breadth and energy of his style better than any of them. He played very finely on Monday, execution and style walking hand in hand up as far towards the walls that human fallibility is destined always to meet in its march to perfection as it was well possible for human fallibility to accomplish. The value of M. Steveniers was doubly felt in this quartet. The manner in which he made every point of the second violin tell, without improper obtrusiveness on the unity of the whole effect, proved him an excellent musician as well as an excellent violinist. Mr. Hill, on the tenor, always invaluable, in the C major quartet comes out with giant force. Mark him in the florid passage of the trio, in the sentimental bits of the Andante, and in the numberless traits de bravoure of the finale; in each and all he is excellent—quick, steady, energetic, and effective. Rousselot has made these quartets an especial and laborious study. It is not then to be wondered at that he is acquainted with every bit of light and shade that is necessary for their appropriate interpretation, and that his pure and classical style is never so well employed as when in the act of giving them utterance.

The third and last performance of the evening was the E flat, No. 15, op. 127, the first of the quartets styled "Posthumous," composed in 1824 (sixteen years after the second, and thirty-three years after the first of those included in the programme), and dedicated by Beethoven to the Russian prince, Galitzin, who, though a zealous amateur, turned out after all but a scurvy patron. No music grows more upon you than these Posthumous Quartets. At first they seem wild, vague, rambling, and incoherent; then gleams of light appear to burst out here and there, giving us, as it were, glimpses of a paradise concealed; then full floods of glory, in the form of stately and transparent melodies, sinuous and long-drawn-out, eloquent and persuasive, winning by repeated appeals to the seat of passion in the heart; then harmonies that sparkle and shine, as rubies under the influence of the sun; then effects of gigantic contrast, like mighty mountains isolated on a limitless plain; then rushings of irresistible sound, like the roar of the mighty ocean, beating and bellowing with eternal excitement, or like the torrents of some huge and ever-tumbling cataract. These at first come out in fragments, seemingly unconnected; but gradually they appear to melt into one particular hue; a tone sleeps upon the whole, as the sun's light, more or less bright according to the period of the day, upon the bosom of the earth; the thought of the composer, the sentiment of his work, breaks out by degrees, like the first peepings of the morning, and finally the whole meaning flashes upon the brain, as the noon-day sun suddenly emerging from behind a cloud, or some tremendous truth but just discovered, which has been a truth from eternity, albeit humanity's imperfection has been blind to its manifestation. We have had our doubts and qualms about these quartets. We would fain have thought them perfect, because they were Beethoven's; but for many a long day our hearts were as stone to their impression. They melted not, nor touched us. Strong in our faith, however—our faith in Beethoven—we have undergone the ordeal of influences and impressions which we have faintly striven to explain, and day after day new lights break in upon us, and carry us further and further towards conviction.

* Performed at the Musical World Concert, July 8, 1846, by Sainton, Sivori, Hill, and Rousselot, of the Beethoven Quartet Society.

The E flat quartet, performed on Monday night, is one of those most likely to make themselves ultimately understood. We never enjoyed a hearing of one of the "Posthumous" more. There is so much of dim grandeur in the Maestoso; of passion, broken on the wheel, in the Allegro teneramente; of tenderness and loving pathos in the Adagio; of capricious playfulness in its twin-sister that mixes with its being, the Andante con moto; of wild mystery in the Scherzo, and such a mingling of the whole of them in the Finale, that it is impossible to grapple with the varied intensity of our sensations in listening to it. It is a vagary—but the vagary of the poet, magnificently various, as the many-hued clouds that wait upon the sunset. The executive triumph of the evening was decidedly this quartet, to which each of the four players brought their whole amount of enthusiasm. It was indeed a fine performance. Though Sainton held the first violin, he was not first violin, for Steveniers played up to him so admirably that the effect was as of one first violin playing a double part. In such a performance station could not be taken into account; violins, tenor, violoncello were united into one loud instrument which gave utterance to the eloquent thoughts of the mighty dead—the poet who sleeps in the tomb, while his melodies, winged cherubs, fly over the face of the earth, and delight mankind with their beauty. The audience were enchanted, and rewarded the four executants with repeated bursts of applause and an enthusiastic greeting at the conclusion. M. Rousselot has thus begun the season of 1847, in spite of sinister events, most propitiously.

Among the company we observed Mr. and Mrs. Benedict, Miss Horsley, Mrs. Anderson, Miss Kate Loder, Miss Judine, (the charming young pianist and pupil of Moscheles, who delights in giving concerts of classical music, and in playing Beethoven's concertos with full orchestra,) Mr. Lindsay Sloper, Mr. Ferdinand Praeger, Mr. Hogarth, Signor Piatti, M. Lavigne, Mr. Robert Barnett, M. Bouché (the once celebrated violinist), M. Barret, Mr. Ella, M. Eugene Coulon, M. Jules de Gliemes, and many other distinguished artists and amateurs. The second meeting is fixed for Monday, the 22nd inst. We shall attend, and strongly recommend our readers to follow our example. At all events no musician should absent himself from any of the meetings.

LOLA MONTEZ.

This celebrated danseuse has been lately cutting capers after her own peculiar fashion, in Munich. It appears that she is generally accompanied in her perambulations by a novel life-guardsmen, in the person of an outrageous semi-bull-dog, who does not always confine himself to acting on the defensive, but sometimes indulges in a small morceau of spontaneous warfare, purely, it might be supposed, to keep his tusks in practice. On one occasion the fair denizen of Terpsichore (as the Morning Post would say) was taking a forenoon promenade in Louis Street, attended by her strong-sided champion, and in passing close to a grape waggon,

"In England 'twould be dung, dust, or a dray," it seems that one of the horses stared somewhat impudently at the fair lady, at which Cerberus took umbrage, and without more ado flew at him, and fastened his teeth in his throat. The waggoner, indignant, rushed upon the dog, and struck him with his whip—which observing, with the speed of lightning, the irritated Lola rushed up on the waggoner, and fractured his proboscis with a blow of her parapluie. The cartman threw up his hands to feel his nose, and finding the damage greater than the pain, gave vent to volleys of imprecations through his fingers, and calling the citizens round him, denounced the damsel with the fatal bull-dog, and still more fatal umbrella. Lola endeavoured to make her escape, but for some time was hedged in by the crowd that had gathered at the call of the damaged waggoner, all of whom visited her with threats and oaths. Bethingking herself of her umbrella, and calling on Cerberus to lend a tooth, she made for that point where the surrounding enemy was weakest, and striking two lookers on in quick succession, she pushed her way through the affrighted remainder, and bolted into a druggist's shop, closing the door after her with so much violence that every pane was broken, and thus shut herself in from the vengeance of her pursuers. The druggist, though a staid man, was inclined to ladies and bull-dogs, so he vowed to protect Cerberus and Lola from the rage of the populace. By this time a crowd had gathered round the door, led on by the waggoner, protecting his ruptured frontispiece with the aid of a red cotton pocket-handkerchief; nor did they depart before they had demolished every pane of glass in the druggist's house, and swore to return and wreak their wrath after they had dined. Lola escaped through a back door, and arrived with Cerberus at her hotel, but the people found her out, and besieged her even on her own hearth. They threatened dissolution to the house, and were about to carry their resolves into execution, when the city guard appeared, dispersed the mob, and restored the dancer and the bull-dog to comparative security. The last accounts state that the guards still watch around the house. Lola is determined to leave the affair to arbitration, and then to leave the city. A surgeon and two waggoners will be appointed to adjudicate on the wholesale value of a nose, upon which Lola will refund the sum awarded, deducting a trifle as compensation for the loss of one of Cerberus's eyes, which fortunately was blind. The entire town is divided for and against the captivating and striking danseuse, but from all we can learn, we are inclined to think that the Noes will certainly have the worst of it.

MADAME BISHOP IN THE PROVINCES.

From a Correspondent.)

On Tuesday last, Madame Bishop made her bow in the Edinburgh Theatre, in Sonnambula. She received a most flattering reception from a full and highly fashionable audience. The opera was listened to throughout with great attention; and it was evident that much was expected from the heroine of the evening. In the opening Cavatina, "Dearest Companions," Madame Bishop at once raised herself to the greatest height in the estimation of the audience; her most exquisite singing producing such an effect on her hearers, that they could not refrain from interrupting her with manifestations of delight. Every point of Madame Bishop's vocalizing, every artistic and delicate effect, was responded to by the house, that seemed fully to appreciate the talents and genius of the singer. A more critical audience could hardly be assembled within the walls of any theatre than there was at the Theatre Royal, on Tuesday evening. The artist could not have been done greater justice nor could she have received a greater amount of homage. To say the truth, an Edinburgh audience has seldom been roused to such a pitch of enthusiasm. Generally speaking, our audiences are not easily excited, but when they are excited their feelings know no bounds. Such was the case on Tuesday evening. Madame Bishop's splendid acting and magnificent singing awoke them from their natural apathy, and almost drove them wild. They were unprepared for so wonderful an exhibition of vocal and histrionic powers combined; and though they expected much, from Madame Bishop's great fame, yet the reality so far surpassed expectation as to produce amazement and surprise. The walls of the Edinburgh Theatre have not been assailed by such deafening clamour for many years as hailed them on Tuesday evening. Madame Bishop was twice rapturously encored in the finale—a compliment seldom, if ever, paid to a singer at the Edinburgh Theatre;—and when the fair vocalist came before the curtain to answer to the unanimous call of the house, the entire audience rose at her, as they were wont at Kean, and cheered her for several minutes. So much for enthusiasm for talent in Auld Reekie. Mr. Reeves performed Elvino decently; and Mr. P. Corri but indifferently. The opera was well got up. The Sonnambula was repeated on Wednesday, with increased effect and redoubled enthusiasm. As Madame Bishop's singing is heard oftener, it delights the more. Like some singers, she does not strike with all her powers at once, and leaves little or nothing to after-hearing. Her effects do not evaporate with a first performance; there is always something new to astonish and enrapture, and even when rapture and surprise are satisfied, there is always something new to learn. This is the divinest consummation of art, which only singers gifted like Madame Bishop can attain. To-night the Maid of Artois will be produced, of which you shall have due notice early next week.

THE AFFINITIES.

from the German of Göthe.

Continued from page 154.

PART II.—CHAPTER V.

Thus, in the social whirlpool did Luciana still keep urging on this bustling life. Her court daily increased, partly because her doings were exciting and attractive to a great number, and partly because she managed to gain others by her kindness and affability. Her liberality knew no bounds; and when so much that was valuable and beautiful poured in upon her, through the affection of her aunt and bridegroom, she seemed not to possess anything of her own, nor to know the value of the things, which they had heaped around her. Thus she did not hesitate a moment to take off a costly shawl and hang it round a lady, who seemed too meanly clad in comparison with the others, and she did this so archly and dexterously that it was impossible to refuse the gift. One of her court always had a purse, with the office of making enquiries in any place they entered, concerning the sick and aged, and of relieving their wants at least for the moment. Thus in all the country round she acquired an excellent name, which nevertheless caused her much inconvenience, as it frequently incumbered her with idle paupers.

But nothing so much increased her fame as her remarkably kind and persevering conduct towards an unfortunate young man, who, being in other respects handsome and well made, avoided society, because he had lost his hand, though honourably in battle. This disfigurement excited in him so much melancholy;—it was for him such an annoyance that every new acquaintance had to be informed of his calamity—that he chose rather to shut himself up, to abandon himself to reading and other studies, and to have nothing more to do with society.

The existence of this young man did not remain concealed from Luciana. He was forced to come and join first a small party, then a larger one, then one larger still; she behaved to him more agreeably than to any other, and by her urgency in obliging him, contrived to give a certain value to his loss, as she showed herself so active in replacing it. At table he was forced to take his place by her and she cut his meat, that he might only have to use his fork. If persons who were older or of a higher rank prevented this proximity she extended her attention over the entire table, and the hurried servants had to compensate the young man for that of which distance threatened to deprive him. At last she exhorted him to write with his left hand, all his efforts were to be sent to her, and thus, near or far, she always stood in connection with him. The young man did not know what had befallen him, and from this moment he really began a new life.

Perhaps we may imagine that such conduct was displeasing to the bridegroom. The contrary was the case. He considered her endeavours highly meritorious, and was so much the more satisfied in this respect that he had learned to know the almost exaggerated qualities by which she contrived to remove from herself everything that appeared in the slightest degree critical. She wished to fly about with every one at her pleasure, every one was in danger of being pushed, pulled or otherwise teased by her, but no one could venture to do the like with her, to treat her as he pleased or to return a liberty which she herself took, in the slightest way; thus she held others in the strictest bounds of decorum towards herself. While towards others she seemed every moment to be overstepping them.

Altogether one might have thought that it was her fixed maxim to expose herself equally to praise and blame, to being liked and disliked; for if she sought to gain people in various ways, she generally spoiled all again with her wicked tongue, which spared nobody. Thus not a single visit was paid in the neighbourhood, nor were she and her party ever kindly received in the castles and residences without her showing on her return, in the most reckless manner, that she liked to regard all the relatives of humanity only on the ridiculous side. There were three brothers who were overtaken by old age, while complimenting each other as to who should be married first; there was a short young lady with a tall old man; there, on the contrary, was a little active man with an unwieldy giantess. In one house you stumbled over a child at every step; another never seemed full to her, even with the largest party, because no children were present. Old married people, she thought, ought to be buried as soon as possible, that somebody might laugh in the house, when no heirs had been given them. Young married people ought to travel, because a domestic life did not suit them. Just as she dealt with persons she dealt with things, with buildings, with house and table furniture. The decorations of walls, above all, elicited some comical remark. From the oldest tapestry to the most modern papering—from the most venerable family picture to the most trivial copper-plate—all was food for her jeering remarks, so that it was a wonder that for five miles round anything was still in existence.

In this negating tendency there was perhaps no malice, properly so called; she might have been generally impelled by a wanton self-will, but in her deportment towards Ottilia, there was real bitterness. She looked down with contempt on the calm, uninterrupted activity of this dear girl; and when it was remarked, in the course of conversation, what great care Ottilia took of the gardens and hot-houses, she not only made a jest of it, while, forgetful of the depth of winter, she appeared to wonder that neither flowers nor fruit were to be seen, but she fetched so much verdure, so many branches, so much indeed of everything which was budding, and employed it for the daily decoration of the rooms and the table, that Ottilia and the gardener were not a little hurt at the destruction of their hopes for the ensuing year, and perhaps for a longer time.

Just as little did she allow Ottilia to follow in quiet her domestic routine, in which she ordinarily had moved so commodiously. Ottilia was to join all the parties of pleasure and wedding-expeditions; was to go to the balls given in the neighbourhood; was to shun neither snow, cold, nor strong night-winds, since so many others could bear them without dying. Ottilia suffered not a little on this account, but Luciana gained nothing; for although Ottilia was very simply clad, she always was, or at any rate seemed to be, the most beautiful in the eyes of the gentlemen. A soft attracting power assembled all the men around her, whether in the extended spaces she occupied the first or the last place. Even Luciana's bridegroom conversed often with her, the more so as he desired her advice and co-operation in an affair which occupied him.

He had become better acquainted with the architect, had, while over his collection of works of art, talked much with him on historical matters, and on other occasions, especially while looking over the chapel, had learned to appreciate his talent. The baron was young and rich; he made collections, and wished to build; his love for building was great, his knowledge of it was small; and he thought that in the architect he had found a man with whom he could carry out several of his views. He had communicated his intentions to his bride, who commended him, and was highly pleased with the proposal; more perhaps to detach the young man from Ottilia (for she thought she had observed in him something like an inclination) than because she thought of employing his talent for any purpose of his own. For, although he had been very active at her extempore festivals, and had offered many resources on many occasions, she always thought that she herself was the best judge. Moreover, as her inventions were generally of a common-place kind, the talent of a clever valet was just as serviceable to her as that of the most eminent artist. If she wished to pay any one a festal compliment on his birthday, or any other day of note, her imagination did not soar beyond a votive altar, or the coronation of a living or plaster head.

Ottilia was able to give the best information to the bridegroom, who had asked what was the architect's position with respect to the house. She knew that Charlotte had already been looking out a situation for him, since, if the company had not arrived, the young man would have retired immediately after the completion of the chapel, as there must necessarily be a pause in all building during the winter. Hence it would be very desirable for the clever artist to have the benefit of a new patron.

The personal connection of Ottilia with the architect was perfectly pure and dispassionate. The agreeable manners and the activity he had displayed in her presence, had amused her and pleased her like the vicinity of an elder brother. Her feeling towards him remained on the calm passionless surface of consanguinity, for in her heart there was no place left. It was completely filled with her love for Edward, and only the Deity, who penetrates everything, could share this heart with him.

The deeper the winter set in, the wilder the weather, the more impassable the roads, the greater appeared the attraction of spending the decreasing days in such good company. After a little ebbing, the house was gradually overflowed by a multitude. Officers from remote garrisons, of whom the more educated were very acceptable, the ruder very annoying to the party, were among the number, nor was there any lack of civilians, and one day the Count and Baroness arrived, completely unexpected.

Their presence seemed first to create a real court. The men of rank and social position surrounded the Count, while the ladies did full justice to the Baroness. People did not long wonder to see them both together and so cheerful, for they learned that the Count's wife had died, and that a new union would take place as soon as etiquette permitted. Ottilia remembered their first visit—every word which had then been uttered about marriage and separation, union and division, hope, expectation, self-denial and resignation. Both persons, then completely without prospects, now stood before her, close to the promised happiness, and an involuntary sigh escaped from her heart.

Luciana had scarcely heard that the Count was an amateur of music, than she managed to get up a concert, at which she wished to sing with a guitar-accompaniment. Her wish was fulfilled: she played on the instrument with some talent, and had a pleasing voice. As for the words, they were as little understood as when any other German beauties sing to the guitar. However all assured her that she sang with great expression, and she could well be contented with the applause she had received. Only a strange mischance befel her on this occasion. There was among the party a young poet, whom she particularly hoped to oblige, as she wished to have some songs by him addressed to herself, and hence she chiefly sung his songs on this particular evening. He, like all the rest, was polite, but she had expected more. She had sometimes pressed him, but could get nothing further out of him, until at last, in a fit of impatience, she sent one of her retinue to sound him, as to whether he was not delighted to hear his excellent poems so excellently sung. "My poems?" said he, with astonishment; then he added, "Excuse me, sir, I have heard nothing but vowels, and not even all of these. However it is my duty to show my gratitude for such a kind intention." The courtier was silent, while the other tried to get out of the affair with some well-sounding compliments. Luciana gave the poet to understand, in no obscure manner, that she expected something written expressly for her. If it would not have been too hard, he could have placed before her the alphabet to pick out at pleasure a poetical panegyric to any melody that might be at hand. Nevertheless, she could not get out of this affair without being wounded in her feelings; for she learned shortly afterwards that the poet had on that very evening written to a favorite melody of Ottilia's a charming poem, the tone of which was more than complimentary.

Luciana, like all persons of her kind, who constantly mingle together what is advantageous for them, and what is injurious, now wished to try her luck in recitation. Her memory was good, but her style of delivery—to speak the truth—was mindless, and vehement without being impassioned. She recited ballads, narratives, and other pieces of the kind usually employed for declamation, and had contracted an unfortunate habit of accompanying her words with gestures. Thus the properly lyric and epic were unpleasantly jumbled rather than connected with the dramatic.

The Count, who was an acute man, and, therefore, soon took a survey of the company, with their inclinations, passions, and amusements, induced Luciana—happily or otherwise—to try a new style of performance, which was very suitable to her person. "I find," he said, "many well-made people here, who assuredly must be able to imitate picturesque movements and attitudes. Should they not try to represent real well-known pictures? Such an imitation, if it requires much trouble in the arrangement, produces an incredibly charming effect."

Luciana quickly perceived that here she would be quite at home. Her fine stature, her tall figure, her face regular but expressive, her plaited light-brown hair, her slender neck,—all seemed made on purpose for a picture; and if she had known that she looked more beautiful when standing still than when in motion—since in the latter case a certain want of grace often marred the general effect—she would certainly have given herself up more zealously to this natural sort of painting.

They looked for prints from celebrated pictures, and first chose the "Belisarius," after Vandyck. A tall well-made man of a certain age was to represent the sitting figure of the blind general, the architect was to imitate the warrior standing before him in mournful sympathy, whom he really somewhat resembled. Luciana had half-modestly chosen for herself the young woman in the back ground, who is counting out a liberal donation from a purse into the palm of her hand, while an old woman seems to be dissuading her, and demonstrating that she is doing too much. Another lady, in the very act of giving alms to Belisarius, was not forgotten.

On this and other pictures they set to work right earnestly. The Count gave some hints to the architect who forthwith constructed a theatre for the purpose, and took the necessary precautions for lighting. It was not until they had plunged deep into their preliminary arrangement that they perceived their project required a considerable outlay, and that many requisites were not to be obtained in a country place in the middle of the winter. That nothing might interrupt the amusement, Luciana cut up nearly the whole of her wardrobe to make the different costumes, which the artists, arbitrarily enough, had represented.

The evening arrived and the performance took place in presence of a numerous assembly, and with great applause. Music of a significant character served to raise the expectations. The "Belisarius" was done first. The forms were so suitable, the colours were so happily distributed and the lighting was so artistically managed, that one really supposed one's self transported into another world. Still the presence of the real, instead of the merely seeming, produced a kind of painful sensation.

The curtain fell and was raised again more than once in compliance with the general desire. A musical intermezzo then amused the company, who were to be astonished by a picture of a higher kind. This was Poussin's well-known "Ahasuerus and Esther." This time Luciana had provided better for herself; as the fainting queen she displayed all her charms, and for the girls who supported her she had prudently chosen mere pretty well-made figures, none of which could in every degree compete with her own. Ottilia remained excluded from this picture, as from the rest; to represent the Jupiter-like king on his golden throne, Luciana had selected the handsomest and most robust men of the party, so that a really incomparable degree of perfection was obtained.

As a third subject, they had selected the so-called "Paternal Admonition," by Terburg; and who is unacquainted with the fine copper-plate by our Wille from this picture? A noble knightly father is sitting, with one foot crossed over the other, and seems to be appealing to the conscience of his daughter, who is standing before him. She is a majestic person, dressed in white satin, rich in folds, who, though only seen from behind, seems to indicate, by her whole appearance, that she is collecting herself. However, we see by the mien and gesture of the father, that the admonition is not very vehement and overpowering, while as for the mother, she seems to be concealing a slight degree of confusion, by looking into a glass of wine, which she is in the act of drinking.

This was an opportunity for Luciana to appear in her greatest brilliancy. Her tresses, the form of her head, the back of her neck, were beautiful beyond measure, and her waist, which was exceedingly slender, and but little shown off by the modern-antique dress worn by ladies,* was displayed most advantageously in the older costume. Moreover, the architect had taken care to adjust the rich folds of the white satin with the most artificial nature, so that this living imitation was, without question, far superior to the original picture, and occasioned universal delight. There was no end to the demands for repetition, and the natural wish to see the face of a lovely being whose back they had looked upon so long, gained so much in strength, that one impatient wag cried out the words, often written at the end of a page, "Tournez s'il vous plait," and met the approval of all. However, the performers knew their advantage too well, and had too deeply felt the meaning of these works of art to comply with this general demand. The apparently modest daughter stood quietly, without vouchsafing to the spectators the expression of her countenance, the father remained sitting in his admonitory position, and the mother did not move her eyes or nose from the transparent glass, in which, though she appeared to drink, the wine did not diminish. We need not say much of the little after-pieces, for which Dutch scenes of inns and fairs had been selected.

The Count and the Baroness took their departure, promising to return during the first happy weeks of their approaching union; and Charlotte at last hoped, after painfully toiling through two months, that she would soon be freed from the rest of the company. She was certain that her daughter would be happy when the first tumult of marriage and youth had subsided, for the bridegroom considered himself the happiest man in the world. Having a great fortune and a modest disposition, he seemed wonderfully flattered by the privilege of possessing a lady who must please everybody. He had such a peculiar way of referring everything to her, and only through her to himself that it produced an unpleasant sensation if a new comer did not at once direct all his attention to her, and sought to come into closer connection with himself, without troubling himself particularly about her, as indeed was often the case, especially with older people, on account of his own good qualities. With the architect matters were soon settled. In the new year he was to follow the bridegroom, and spend the carnival with him in the city, where Luciana anticipated the greatest delight from the repetition of such beautifully contrived tableaux, and from a hundred things besides, especially as her aunt and bridegroom seemed to regard as trifling every expense that was required for her amusement.

A general departure was then to take place, but this could not take place in an ordinary manner. Some tolerably loud jests were uttered that Charlotte's winter-provisions would soon be consumed, when the gentleman, who had represented Belisarius, and was indeed sufficiently rich, being carried away by the attractions of Luciana, to whom he had paid homage for so long a time, cried, "Then let it be in the Polish fashion. Come and consume me, and thus let it go round!" No sooner said than done. Luciana consented. The following day everything was packed up, and the whole multitude moved off into another residence. Here there was room enough, but less convenience and management. Hence arose much that was unsuitable, and this first made Luciana truly happy. The mode of life became more and more wild and disorderly. Battues in the deepest snow, and other incommodious sports of all sorts were contrived. Ladies could no more exclude themselves than gentlemen, and thus they went on, hunting and riding, sledging and rioting, from one estate to another, till they at last approached the capital. Here the intelligence how people amused themselves at court and in the city gave another turn to the imagination, and drew Luciana and her train into another sphere of life. Her aunt had gone before her.

FROM OTTILIA'S DIARY.

In the world we take every one to be that which he represents himself to be—but he must represent something. We bear the annoying better than the insignificant.

We can force everything upon society, excepting that which has a consequence.

We do not learn to know people when they come to us. To learn their real peculiarities we must go to them.

I feel it almost natural that we find a great deal of fault with our visitors, and that, as soon as they are gone, we do not judge them in the most amiable manner, for we have—so to speak—a right to measure them by our own standard. Even intelligent and charitable men scarcely abstain, in such cases, from a severe censure.

If, on the contrary, we have been with others, and have seen them in their ordinary circumstances and habits, and the situation which is inevitably imposed upon them—have seen how they act in their own sphere or adopt themselves to events—it is malice and a want of understanding to find that ridiculous which for more than one reason we ought to respect.

By what we call conduct and good manners, that should be attained which otherwise is only to be attained by force or perhaps not even by force.

Intercourse with ladies is the element of good manners.

How can the character and peculiarities or the individual co-exist with the rules of social life?

Peculiarities should first be properly brought out by social life. Every one desires what is important, only it must not be obtrusive.

A military man of education has the greatest advantages, both in life and in society.

Rough military men do not at any rate depart from their character, and as there is generally something of good humour concealed behind their strength, they are quite manageable in case of need.

No one is more intolerable than a clumsy civilian. We have a right to require refinement from him, as he has not to employ himself in any rough occupation.

When we live with persons who have a fine feeling for what is proper, we feel an uneasiness on their account if anything improper occurs. Thus I always feel for Charlotte, if any one shakes his chair, because she has a mortal dislike to the practice.

No one would join a familiar party with spectacles on his nose if he knew that we ladies at once lost the pleasure of looking at him, and conversing with him.

Familiarity, in the place of respect, is always ridiculous. No one

* The romance was written in the days of the "short waists."—TRANSLATOR.

would take off his hat immediately he had paid a compliment, if he knew how comical it looked.

There is no outward mark of politeness that may not have a deep social cause. A right education would teach the sign and the cause together.

Conduct is a mirror in which every one shows his image.

There is a certain politeness of the heart which is akin to love, and from which springs the most agreeable politeness of external conduct.

Voluntary independence is the finest situation, and how would that be possible without love?

We are never farther from our wishes than when we fancy we possess the object of our desires.

No one is more a slave than he who considers himself free without actually being so.

A person need only declare himself free, and that moment he feels to be confined. If he ventures to declare himself confined, he feels himself free.

Against the great superiority of another there is no resource but love.

There is something frightful about a superior man who is made much of by stupid persons.

They say no one is a hero to his valet-de-chambre. The reason is, that a hero can be appreciated by heroes only. The valet will probably know how to estimate those of his own class.

There is no greater consolation for mediocrity than the fact that genius is not immortal.

The greatest men are always attached to their age by a weakness.

Persons are usually thought more dangerous than they really are. Fools and clever people are alike harmless. Only the half-fools and half-wise are very dangerous.

Art is the surest way of receding from the world, and the surest way of connecting one's self with it.

Even in the moment of the highest felicity and the highest need we require the artist.

Art busies itself with the difficult and the good.

Seeing the difficulty easily managed, gives us an intuition of the impossible.

Difficulties increase the nearer we approach the goal.

Sowing is not so troublesome as reaping.

(To be continued.)

* To prevent misunderstanding, it may be stated that the copyright of this translation belongs solely to the translator.

SONNET.

NO. XXV.

THOUGH oft I tell thee of my love, I fear
Thou think'st that of my passion much I feign,
And seek in wantonness thy heart in pain,
While my own heart is from all anguish clear.
Perchance thou think'st I like to see thee near,
And smile on thee, and bid thee smile again,
To fill a moment with amusement vain,
And that some other might be quite as dear.
Dost thou think this? My life, it is not so;
Thou art mine all—to thee I wildly cling,
As he that's drowning grasps the neighbouring tree.
The passing signs of sorrow which I show
But faintly indicate my suffering.
Oh, I implore, doubt not my love for thee.

N. D.

MUSIC AT MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

THE Hargreaves Choral Society gave a dress Concert (the fourth of the sixth series) in the Free Trade Hall, Peter-street, on Thursday evening, the 25th ult. The programme, a curiosity in its way, wholly composed of glees and choruses, and wholly sustained by local artists, merits citation.

PART I.—Overture ("Oberon," Weber. Chorus Glee with an orchestral accompaniment. "Give me the harp," Sir J. Stevenson. Solo, Messrs. Walton and J. W. Isherwood. Chorus (Soprano) "Charity," Rossini. Solo, Mrs. John Wood. Chorus Glee with orchestral accompaniments "Shades of the heroes," T. Cooke. Solo, Mr. J. W. Isherwood. Nocturne, violin, Mr. C. A. Seymour, Panofka. Chorus, "Bright sword of liberty," Weber. Round, "Yes, 'tis the Indian drum," Fernando Cortes, Sir H. R. Bishop. German Glee, "The two Roses," Werner. Chorus, "Tremble, tremble, Don Giovanni, Mozart.

PART II.—Overture, "Zampa," Herold. Chorus, "The Storm Scene," Virgin of the Sun, Sir H. R. Bishop. Solo, Mrs. John Wood, Mrs. Winterbottom, Mr. Walton, and Mr. J. W. Isherwood. Chorus Soprano, "Come away with willing feet," Martyr of Antioch, Cudmore. Chorus Glee, "Strike the lyre," T. Cooke. Chorus, "The tiger couches," The Maniac, Sir H. R. Bishop. Madrigal, "Lady, when I behold," (A.D. 1859), Wilbye. Glee, "Foresters, sound the cheerful horn," Sir H. R. Bishop. March and Chorus, "Crown ye the alters," Ruins of Athens, Beethoven. Chorus, "Fill high the generous measures," Robert le Diable, Meyerbeer. Chorus, "The Chough and Crow," Guy Mannering, Sir H. R. Bishop. Solo, Mrs. John Wood, Miss Parry, and Mr. J. W. Isherwood. Leader, Mr. C. A. Seymour. Conductor, Mr. John Waddington.

The above is the remarkable scheme alluded to last week—a daring innovation on all established modes of giving concerts—consisting of no less than sixteen choruses in succession, and almost without intermission! The avowed object of the directors, in thus relying on the unaided strength of their excellent choir, was to reserve the funds, which the engagement of principal singers would have expended, in order to give the Elijah with so much the greater effect in April next; the object is doubtless a good one—but we doubt whether it will be found to have been good policy. The Free Trade Hall was at the commencement thin, and at no period of the evening was near so full as at any of the former concerts this season. We noticed a number of new faces too, and a goodly sprinkling of juveniles—evident proofs that many of the members had given away their tickets, instead of attending themselves; an ominous warning that the great body of subscribers to the Hargreaves Society were not satisfied with the bill of fare provided for them. Weber's "Oberon" was given in first rate style; the horns, which so often mar this overture in the provinces, were perfection. Sir John Stevenson's chorus made an excellent opening to the vocal business. Mr. Walton and Mr. James Isherwood, two of our resident vocalists, acquitting themselves very well in the solo parts, the whole being more effectively given, than we ever before heard it, by reason of the great number of the voices, and the addition of the full orchestral accompaniments. Rossini's treble chorus "Carita," was charmingly warbled by our Lancaster witches, and was loudly applauded. Cooke's glee, "shades of the heroes," was done in such a manner, as it would have delighted him to hear, it is a glee right well known in Manchester, and a favourite too: but all present were astonished to hear it given with such precision, such variety of light and shade, by so numerous a choir; the effect too of the band's accompaniment was even greater in this, than in Sir John Stevenson's glee. Mr. James Isherwood deserves favourable mention for his merited delivery of the solo, and the choir unbounded praise. The forte at "Raise ye hundred bards," with full band and chorus, had a thrilling effect. Mr. Seymour the leader of the band, then gave Panofka's nocturne on the violin, in a finished and masterly manner—although he does not produce the tone of some of the more celebrated solo violinists, he makes his instrument to sing as it were, and his execution is always remarkably neat and clear—he was much applauded. The next piece which calls for remark is Sir H. R. Bishop's round, who has heard much of our Manchester vocalists, and knows what they can do; but I dare say he never dreamt of their ever attempting to sing his beautiful round as a chorus, some twenty voices or so, each of the four parts! All praise to the Hargreaves Choir! they accomplished it admirably, and we were delighted with our old favourite in its dress. Werner's glee although very pretty and nicely sung, (still chorus all through) did not so well merit the encore it received as Bishop's round. The finale to Don Giovanni, wound up the first part with some capital stuff for both band and choir, and it went admirably. The second part of the concert did not go off so well, thus showing that the ear begins to tire of such a long succession of choruses, unrelieved by a single song, and that the singers tire also. Mrs. John Wood was very ineffective in the solo of the "Storm Scene," yet how well she gave the solo in "Charity." The trebles were less efficient in the soprano chorus, from the Martyr of Antioch, than we have heard them for a long time. Tom Cooke's second glee, had equal justice done to it with "Shades of the Heroes," it was most beautifully sung—not so the Madrigal, which was all but a break down. Mr. Edward's horn was again heard to advantage, in the accompaniment to the hacknied chorus of "Foresters sound the cheerful horn," which went very smoothly. Beethoven's, March and Chorus, "Crown ye the alters," would have made a noble finish to the concert, as it is a glorious composition, and was splendidly given; but no, we must have two more choruses, "Fill high the generous measure," from Robert le Diable, and Bishop's so very much hacknied, "Chough and Crow." It really is not doing justice to the Hargreaves Choir, or the indefatigable conductor, Mr. John Waddington, to crowd so many choruses into one evening's performance, to say nothing of the extra labour and diligence required in getting them up; they would have told as well again if, say one half the number had been given, and those interspersed with a due mixture of songs, duets, &c. We wish to see this society ascend to none in the provinces: hence these remarks. An experiment has been tried in this concert, which we think would be hazardous to the well being of the society to repeat. The Hargreaves Society has a character at stake now that will not admit of common place or second rate concerts, and we trust that in future it will not be necessary to pinch any one concert for the sake of another—but that the entire six each season be made as attractive as possible. This is the only way in which a large number of subscribers can be obtained; and, without means, the society falls to the ground. We trust that "Elijah," may be done, as it is hoped to be, in April—and that we may have Miss Bircó, Staudigl, and Mendelssohn on that occasion, when no doubt great eclat will be given to the Hargreave's Choral Society. Jullien had the Free Trade Hall, fuller than ever, on Wednesday last, it is said above four thousand persons were present. He is coming again in April with Pischek.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

THE past week has been signalised by the return of Madame Castellan and the debut of a new tenor, the most renowned of the actual talents of Italy,—Signor Fraschini.

Never, perhaps, did the value of competition receive a more striking illustration in the history of operatic doings, than at the present moment. All the world considered Mr. Lumley's star to have set; and even his friends despaired of its ever appearing again on the horizon. But circumstances lashed his energies into exertion; and throwing off a supineness that had grown upon him in the days of prosperity, he displayed qualities of enterprise and daring, for which few would, in the old time, have given him credit. "Where," was the question, "will Mr. Lumley get his tenors?" Mario and Salvi were secured elsewhere; but their substitutes, Gardoni and Fraschini, have been tested, and are found worthy. "Where," was again the question, "will Mr. Lumley find his barytones?" Tamburini and Ronconi were secured elsewhere; but in their stead we have Coletti and Superchi, who have equally undergone the ordeal of public judgment, and are pronounced worthy of public approval. The name of Lablache stopped the mouth of conjecture, when it opened to prate of basses; and as if that were not enough, there comes a Signor Bouché, from over the water, who, in one night's performance, wins himself a station and a name. The departments of soprani and contralti were less easy to fill up; but, if we are not greatly mistaken, the course of next month will unfold a no less satisfactory solution of that perplexing question. Two little words, displayed in large Roman characters, at the head of the Opera bills, will suffice, for a time at least, to draw the world within its walls. And if the spell those words contain prove not to be damnable sorcery and witchcraft, their influence must, perforce, endure; and thus, a season, begun in the darkness of despair, will end in the sunlight of exultation. Much, very much, depends not only upon the appearance of those two little words on the posters of Her Majesty's Theatre, but on their turning out to be worthy of the halo of glory that has shone around them through the haze of continental rumour. JENNY LIND is the spell that must charm the tide of popular favor, and cause its waves to beat upon the shores of Mr. Lumley's territory. Meanwhile, we have the graceful and feminine Castellan, who will help the improving Sanchioli to sustain the ancient and time-honored Opera-house in its battle against the armies of an adverse power.

On Tuesday night, Donizetti's pleasing opera of Lucia di Lammermoor was given, with a caste that excited a very unanimous and accountable curiosity. The story and the music are both so well known to our readers that we are saved the necessity of commenting upon either. The characters were thus supported:—Lucia, by Madame Castellan—Edgardo, by Signor Fraschini—Enrico, by Signor Coletti—Bidebent, Arturo and Normando, respectively by Signori Solari, Dai Fiori, and Guidi. Let us begin at the end, and dismissing the subordinates with a word, proceed to discuss the merits of the principals. Of the representatives of Arturo and Normando, then, we have nothing to say at all; but the character of Bidebent, being one of some consequence, we should wish to have seen in more efficient hands. Where was Frederick Lablache, an artist ever welcome to the public for his own sake, no less than for that of the name he bears, and one in every respect more competent to sing and act the part than the gentleman to whose care it was entrusted? The public have a right to put this question, and, as the public's representative, we put it for the public. Where, then, was Frederick Lablache, who on such an occasion should have been called upon to complete the strength of the caste, and ensure the well-going of much that is important in the agreeable music of Donizetti? We feel assured that the management will not answer the query, and therefore put it twice, as a sign that it is unanswerable.

But to something more agreeable. Madame Castellan has returned to us with her wonted charms of person and manner, her delicious freshness and wonderful compass of voice, her facility in the use of florid ornament and rapid utterance of notes—in short, with all the characteristics that have gained her distinction, and these strengthened and improved by the beneficial influence of a long (perhaps too long) repose. Her impersonation of the beautiful character of Lucia is marked by many very high excellencies, accompanied by some, not very striking defects. Nothing can be more prepossessing than her first two acts. The pensive heroine of Scott, with an enthusiastic temperament concealed under the covering of a gentle and innocent bearing, like water that is the deeper from its stillness, was before us, with all the interest that belongs to our recollections of one of the most pathetic of romances. Her first duet was charmingly given. In the finale to the second act there was the same womanly grace, but a want of intensity, which is the principal drawback to Madame Castellan's becoming an artist of the first rank. In the third act, the mad scene, one of the triumphs of Persiani, in her hands was deficient in reality; as a dramatic effort, indeed, it is beyond her power. But her singing was very artistic, and her execution of fioriture and passages of energy was, in many instances, astonishing. She was warmly greeted on her entrée, liberally applauded throughout the opera, and recalled upon the stage several times. That Madame Castellan is a very great favourite with the public is indisputable; and it is equally certain that she is an accomplished artist and deserving of her popularity.

Signor Coletti, in Enrico, displayed the faults and beauties we have already recorded of his talent. His voice and style, though the one is superb and the other agreeable, are both somewhat monotonous. The former produces much the effect of a fine organ-pipe, being equally resonant and magnificent, and equally incapable of gradations of tone; the latter fatigues by its want of variety. We have, moreover, to reproach Signor Coletti for dragging certain passages in the second finale, so much so as to spoil the connection and damage the effect of the music. Mr. Balfe should put his veto upon this. In other respects we can praise Signor Coletti without difficulty. He is evidently a good musician, and his value in the concerted music is inestimable. His airs are always effective, for, though he lacks energy and colour in his acting, he has a large amount of impulsive expression in his singing. Moreover—and this after all must weigh heavily in the scale—take him for all in all, balancing his merits and his defects, it would be difficult to match him at the present moment, were Mr. Lumley to scour the whole of Italy for another.

In regard to Signor Fraschini we must speak more at length. First, it may not be out of place to give a sketch of his personal history, for which we are indebted to the Morning Post :—

"Signor Fraschini was born at Padua, and was destined to become a member of the medical faculty. He had already undergone several years' study at the celebrated university of this city, when a maestro of the name of Moretti, having heard him hum tunes as he walked with him on the promenade, was so struck by his taste, that he induced him to adopt the musical profession. He began his career as a singer, in the cathedral of Padua, and in 1839, made his debut at Bergamo, in the small part of Roderigo. At that time the prima donna, who performed the part of Desdemona, was Mademoiselle Castellan. In 1840 he appeared for the first time at La Scala, in Marino Faliero. He has sung since, at various theatres in Italy. Pacini composed for him Sappho, La Fidanzata Corsa, Orazi e Curiaci; Verdi Alzira, and Mercadante Il Proscritto. The San Carlos has been his chief head-quarters lately. He has also performed with success at Vienna."

One thing is certain, that Signor Fraschini, at the present moment, enjoys the highest reputation of all the Italian singers, and before discussing his merits it is but just to acknowledge the liberality and enterprize of Mr. Lumley in engaging him. It was incumbent on the director of Her Majesty's Theatre to give his patrons and subscribers the opportunity of hearing this great Italian artist; but managers are not always ready to do what is incumbent on them, and in the present case Mr. Lumley might decently have excused himself from entering into the present engagement since he had already secured the services of a celebrated tenor, whose abilities the public had acknowledged and applauded as first-rate. We allude, of course, to Signor Gardoni. Mr. Lumley has, therefore, accomplished more than was required of him; and in treating with Signor Fraschini for the present season, has voluntarily incurred an addition to the current expenses of his establishment to the tune of something like £4000. The Morning Chronicle itself would hardly, we imagine, refuse this acknowledgment to Mr. Lumley's spirit and determination to support the dignity of his theatre "under circumstances of peculiar difficulty." Signor Fraschini is a singer of the Duprez school. His voice is a tenore robusto of immense power in the higher range, of great flexibility, and of good quality throughout. He sings entirely from the chest, and can produce the higher notes, up even to B flat, with prodigious facility. His voice is evidently under his entire control. There is never the least appearance of effort in what he does, and his passages of energy are delivered with astonishing effect. He has a straightforward manly style, occasionally disfigured by exaggeration, but generally unaffected and pure. His intonation is seldom at fault. He phrases well, enunciates his words with great distinctness, and never slackens his energies in the concerted pieces, a quality in which your great tenors are too often wanting. These are his beauties. His defects may be recorded in fewer words. His execution is unfinished; a group of notes seems to trouble him sadly, and his endeavours at ornament, rare we admit, are nearly always abortive. His lower and middle notes are less powerful than the higher; indeed, the tone seems to increase as the scale ascends, no notes in his voice being more effective than the F, G, A, and B, flat. Of his command of these he gives a remarkable exemplification in the finale to the second act, at the instant of the malediction. As an actor, Signor Fraschini has many good points; a kind of rough manliness that serves his turn admirably in passages where passion and energy are acquired is the predominant characteristic of his talent. He acts (as he sings) much better in violent than in tender situations. His gestures are somewhat angular, and his poses partake largely of the melodramatic extravagance which seems to be inseparable from the Italian dramatic school. Nothing, for example, could be more grotesque than his manner of saluting the audience, in answer to the demonstrations of approval with which he was so prodigally honoured. His attitudes were for all the world like those of Crispin, in the old French comedies. It would serve no purpose to follow Signor Fraschini through the opera. Suffice it, though the first duet (with Castellan) produced very little impression, the audience seemed to grow into a liking of the singer, as the opera proceeded and the greetings, at first cold and chary, gradually swelled into enthusiasm, and ultimately burst forth like the lava from Mount Etna, at the famous passage of "the curse," which induced the Swan of Pesaro, in one of his waggish moods, to christen him the "tenore della maledizione." He was encored in this, which he delivered with amazing force, and repeated it with redoubled vigour. We must avow, en passant, that we prefer the mode in which the incomparable Rachel breathes the curse, in Les Horaces; a withering malediction which would astound Niagara into silence. The natural effect of such a dramatic passage gains little or nothing from vociferation. Nevertheless, Signor Fraschini's curse has its peculiar effect upon the audience; and this is likely to endure, in despite of the scoffs and jests so liberally administered by the Morning Chronicle Boreas, who would fain blow the whole establishment, vocal and instrumental, of Her Majesty's Theatre off its legs. In the dying scene, Signor Fraschini fell far short of the vocal excellence of Rubini, and of the truthful pathos of Mario; but his simple unaffected reading was superior to the rapid hysterics of Moriani. On the whole, we are bound to say that the new tenor in no degree belies his reputation. Let Italian enthusiasm, be taken at its proper value, and Signor Fraschini may be said to have fulfilled the expectations entertained of him. His reception was highly flattering, and the applause was genuine. He was once or twice encored, and recalled more than once or twice upon the stage.

That fewer rehearsals had been accorded to Lucia than to La Favorita was evident from the exertions of the band and chorus, which albeit, often effective and in many places admirable, were now and then so much at fault, that but for the readiness and experience of their accomplished conductor, Mr. Balfe, they must have been at a stand still. On this point we would, with submission, remonstrate with Mr. Lumley and his excellent chef d'orchestre. After such a display of power and accuracy as was evinced on the first performance of La Favorita, amateurs and judges will be content with nothing less than that gradual and unfailing progress towards perfection which the means of the establishment, carefully fostered, cannot fail of attaining. We will give Balfe another season, after the present, to become as good as Mr. Costa, or anybody else you please. It must not be forgotten that there is a mighty difference of position between two conductors, one of whom has had a band many years under his control, while the other is saddled with a heterogeneous army of instrumentalists, gathered from east, west, north, and south, unused to each other, unused to the method of the director, and unused to orchestral playing altogether. This represents precisely the relative positions of Mr. Balfe, and Mr. Costa. How much then does it redound to the credit of the former, that, with scarcely a month's experience, he has already advanced so far on the road to perfection. There are points in Mr. Balfe's orchestra that cannot be too much commended; and none of them is more worthy of note than the precision and unanimity with which the reci-tatives (the most fidgety part of a modern Italian opera) are accompanied. Much of this no doubt is to be traced to Mr. Balfe's being himself an admirable musician, and one thoroughly acquainted with all the exigencies of recitative; but great credit, nevertheless, is due to his men for the care and attention with which they follow his directions. We shall wait for some improvements that are hinted at in one or two departments of the orchestra, and we shall then see what the spirited director can effect, backed by his new reinforcements. The wood and brass instruments want mending in several particulars; the violins want weeding and strengthening; the tenors, violoncellos, and basses want (strong as are the two latter departments) still further strength; and, to conclude, the "kitchen furniture," as musicians expressively term the noisier instruments of brass, steel, and sheepskin, wants subduing. But all this, we are sure, will in due time be effected.

After the opera, the picturesque ballet of Coralia was repeated, the graceful and finished Rosati dividing the enthusiasm of the audience with the naïve and fascinating Marie Taglioni. A word in praise of Madlle. Petit Stephan's charming pantomime and artistic dancing, in the part of Bertha, hitherto unthinkingly overlooked, must stand here as an acknowledgment of her excellence, and a reparation for a slight by no means intended. The house was exceedingly full.

On Thursday we had a variety of performances, in the usual manner of the off-subscription nights. Though we do not sympathise with the form of these Thursday-entertainments, we cannot deny that they offer an immense attraction to casual visitors of the theatre, especially those who come from the provinces, and who can only set aside a day or two to see and hear the "lions" of the metropolis. On this occasion the performances commenced with Lucia, which was given entire, Castellan and Fraschini singing much better than before, and the band and chorus evincing a much closer acquaintance with the score. The opera went off with acclamations, and the principal vocalists were repeatedly applauded, encored, and recalled before the curtain. After the opera, a divertissement, composed by M. Paul Taglioni, under the title La Slavonienne, was very cleverly executed by Madlle. Rosati and the author. This is a pas de caractère, but there is very little remarkable in it, or in the music to which Signor Pugnî has set it, and an attempt to encore it was successfully opposed. We have seen a much better dance of the kind (and better executed too) by Madlle. Cerito and M. St. Leon. A selection from La Favorita came next in order. In this was included the two tenor airs from the first and third acts, which Signor Gardoni sang in such a finished and elegant manner as to elicit an encore for both. As yet it must not be concealed that this admirable tenor is the great card of Mr. Lumley's new exportations. His voice is beautiful and powerful enough in all conscience, and his talent is of that artistic and attractive kind that appeals with equal eloquence to musicians and to the laity. Signor Bouché also took part in these fragments from Donizetti's great work. He sang the fine duet from the first act with Signor Gardoni, and acquitted himself well, although here and there his intonation was uncertain, the result, we are induced to believe, of a nervousness which the clever and pains-taking artist has failed hitherto to overcome. At the fall of the curtain Signor Gardoni was recalled and rewarded with fresh manifestations of public approval. The performances concluded with Coralia, in which Rosati and Marie Taglioni were once more applauded, encored and otherwise complimented. The talent of these charming danseuses is of that varied and refined order that their efforts never tire, and the oftener they are seen, the more they are admired. The house was crowded in every part.

Ere concluding, we may mention that the Sonnambula will be performed on Thursday, with Gardoni in Elvino, and Castellan in Amina. Carlotta Grisi, the peerless, the incomparable enchantress of the dance, has returned to Paris laden with new laurels won in the city of the Cæsars. After appearing for a few nights in a new ballet that is preparing for her (La Taitienne, the music by Adolphe Adam,) she will, we expect, come to England and once again our eyes will be intoxicated with a sight of the ethereal Giselle, the innocent and lovely Esmeralda. Among the opera on dits we may mention a rumour that Balfe's opera of Falstaff will be revived when Lablache arrives. The management could scarcely adopt a step more likely to turn out profitable. Falstaff is one of the most attractive works of its prolific composer, whose popularity is increasing every day, and whose talents and zeal have at length succeeded in vanquishing all the prejudices and sophistry that were clamorous at the first announcement of his engagement as director of the band at Her Majesty's Theatre. We are mistaken in Mr. Lumley if, by this time, he is not thoroughly convinced of the value and ability of his new conductor, successor to the admirable Costa, though he be.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANKFORT.—(From the Frankfort Observer, Sunday Feb. 21.)—The concert of Mr. Aguilar always presents a rich assortment of interesting things, and this artist knows well how to unite the varieties of which a concert should consist, to form a tasteful and harmonious whole. Mendelssohn's quartette for piano, violin, viola, and violoncello, a composition of which we cannot write too highly (in the German paper are twelve lines on this exquisite quartette, containing the highest praise), led the way, and its fiery and precise performance by Messrs. Aguilar, Eliason, Bockmuhl, and Dunnenberg, left nothing to be desired. A fantasia for the piano, of his own composition, gave Mr. Aguilar a good opportunity to distinguish himself as a pianist, not only solid and finished, but powerful and brilliant. Without doing homage to fashion, this still youthful artist has treated his instrument in a manner peculiar to himself, and though never losing his individuality, leaves the same charming impression on his audience as the performance of a Hummel, or a Thalberg might have done. A concertante for piano and violoncello, by himself and Lyepenowski, contains extremely pleasing and uncommon parts; among which, we must mention the andante, in which the low strings of the violoncello are used with excellent effect, and which was admirably given by M. Bockmuhl.—[The young English artist, of whom the foregoing speaks so highly, is mentioned in terms of equal admiration, both as pianist and composer, by the Didaskalia, of 24th Feb., the Hannoversche Zeitung, of 20th, and the Frankfort Conversations Blatts, of the 26th Feb. This concert was attended by all the English, of any distinction, in Frankfort; numerous Germans, Russians, &c.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

DRURY LANE.—Mr. Buon has announced his benefit for Monday next, and has issued a bill of such great and varied attraction as must necessarily command a bumper.

ADELPHI.—A new melodramatic piece, from the pen of Mr. Buckstone, entitled The Flowers of the Forest, was produced here on Thursday evening, and met with the most unequivocal success. The Flowers of the Forest is one of the best dramas we have seen at this theatre for a very long time. It has plot, incident, situation, character, and humour in abundance. It affords Madame Celeste excellent scope for her excellent acting; it gives room to Paul Bedford and Wright for all sorts of drolleries and gags; it offers a vehicle to Mrs. Fitzwilliam for some fine, broad, hearty, domestic painting; and provides Miss Woolgar an opportunity for distinguishing herself by her very pretty and naive acting as a Gipsy boy. Nor must we forget the character awarded to that dramatic ogre, O. Smith, who appears as a hybrid Virginius, and draws cadent tears from the pathos of the gallery. We have forbore to give an analysis of the plot, firstly, on account of the manifest absurdity of giving an analysis of any plot in general; and, secondly, on account of the manifest absurdity of giving the plot of the Flowers of the Forest in particular, as it would be doing no justice to Mr. Buckstone's admirable and simple story. The characters were all supported with great effect. Madame Celeste, as Cynthia, a romantic and passionate Italian Gipsy, was exceedingly happy, and received great applause throughout. Miss Woolgar as Lemuel, the Gipsy boy, looked most winning, and played most charmingly. Mrs. Fitzwilliam, as a home bred Gipsy, was dramatically real. Wright, as a Cheap Jack, was droller than ever, and Paul Bedford followed close on the heels of Mr. Wright in comic excellence. The Flowers of the Forest was uproariously applauded, and all the performers were called for at the end; after which Mr. Buckstone was summoned also, and made his bow.

CONCERTS.

ANCIENT CONCERTS.—The seventy-first season of these fashionable, recherché, and antiquated musical assemblies (originated in 1776) commenced on Wednesday evening, in the Hanover-square Rooms, under the direction of His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge. We have to record nothing novel in the aspect of affairs, present or prospective, as regards the direction. The orchestral and choral department are similar to those of preceding seasons; the same vocalists smile upon us; the same programme stares upon us; the same aristocratic frigidity prevails; and the same conductor presides over all. Only Sir Henry Bishop was more polite in his position to the orchestra than he was last year, for instead of presenting the skirts of his coat to the gaze of the instrumentalists, he now poses himself sideways, thus making, between the audience and the orchestra, a compromise of his front-piece. This was effected at the suggestion of Prince Albert, and is certainly in better taste than the position usually occupied by the conductor. Mr. Loder's death has deprived the orchestra of a most efficient leader, and it seems that the managing committee of the Ancient Concerts have concluded upon having no leader, as none has been appointed since; for though Mr. T. Cooke holds the nominal position of first violin, the sole conductorship and leadership have virtually merged into one, thus following out the plans adopted in all continental orchestras. Mr. Lucas continues to preside at the organ. The eight directors of the Ancient Concerts are the King of Hanover, Prince Albert, the Duke of Cambridge, the Archbishop of York, the Duke of Wellington, Earl Howe, and the Earl of Cadogan. Sir W. Curtis is treasurer, W. A. Greaterex, Esq., secretary and librarian, and Mr. Lonsdale sub-treasurer. The following is the programme of Wednesday evening:—

PART I.—Coronation Anthem, Zadok the priest, Handel. Recit, Alas! I find.—Air, If guiltless blood, (Susannah,) Handel. Chorus, Sanctus.—Quartet, Benedictus—Solo, Agnus Dei, Mozart. Recit, Chi per pietà mi dice.—Aria, Deh! parlate, (Il Sacrificio d'Abraham,) Cimarosa. Concerto 11th, violin, (Grand,) Handel. Graduale, Quodquid in orbe, Hammel. Recit, Nel chiuso centro.—Aria, Euridice! e dove sei, (Cantata,) Pergolesi. Chorus, Hallelujah, (Messiah,) Handel.

PART II.—Overture, (Occasional,) Handel. Air, Through the land so lovely blooming, (Athaliah,) Handel. Glee, Oh, bird of eve, The Earl of Mornington. Recit, And God created man.—Air, In native worth, (Creation,) Maydn. Chorus, Gloria in excelsis, Pergolesi. Aria, La vendetta, (Le Nozze di Figaro,) Mozart. Recit, Lovinski, hai cor.—Duetto, Parto I ti giudico! (Lodoviska,) Meyer. Chorus, The Lord shall reign, (Israel in Egypt,) Handel.

The entire absence of novelty in the above programme renders comment entirely superfluous. The choruses were executed with a kind of coarse energy that passes here for excellence, but does not please connoisseurs. The band was more zealous than efficient, and the general tendency of the whole performance was slovenly and slow. The only remarkable feature in the vocal music was Mr. Lockey's very artist-like interpretation of the air, "In native worth," from the Creation. The other vocalists were Made. Caradori Allan, Misses Bassano, the two Misses Williams, and Mr. F. Lablache. The latter's rendering of "La Vendetta," from Figaro, by the way, was deserving of all praise. Mr. Blugrove played Handel's concerto admirably. Applause is not permitted at these entertainments, which induces a frigidity that is enhanced by the general character of the selection, which is ordinarily of the dullest kind. A number of personages, "illustrious by birth," were present—the most illustrious of whom was the Duke of Wellington. The room was but thinly attended; however, these concerts must have some fresh blood infused into them, or they will die some day of their own torpidity. They are vastly exclusive and very expensive, considering their merits. Something better might surely be got of them.

MR. DANDO'S QUARTET CONCERTS.—Mr. Dando's fourth Quartet Concert took place on Monday evening in the Throne-room, Crosby-Hall. We were glad to find that the programme announced had the effect of bringing together all the subscribers, for the room was quite full before the concert commenced. The bill of fare was as follows:—

PART I.—Quartet in E major, No. 2, Op. 59, for two violins, viola, and violoncello, Messrs. Dando, Gattie, W. Thomas, and Lucas, Mozart. (First Time of performance in this Country.) Recit. ed Aria, Miss Dolby, "Quando miro quel bel ciglio," Mozart. Quartet in D, No. 7, Op. 18, for two violins, viola, and violoncello, Messrs. Dando, Gattie, W. Thomas, and Lucas, Mozart.

PART II.—Quintet in G minor, (Dedicated to G. Perkins, Esq.,) for pianoforte, violin, viola, violoncello, and contra basso, Messrs. Dorrell, Dando, W. Thomas, Lucas, and G. Severn, G. A. Monaghan. Solos, Miss Dolby, "Morgengraun," and "L'Quida chemomora," Mendelssohn and Hauptmann. Quartet in F major, Op. 59, (Dedicated to Count Rasomoucki) for two violins, viola, and violoncello, Messrs. Dando, Gattie, W. Thomas, and Lucas, Beethoven. The Vocal Music accompanied on the Pianoforte, by Mr. W. Dorrell.

The quartet, by Mühling, is a pretty composition, the first movement and schizzo being the best portion. The Andante is too learned but uninspired exercise of a clever musical student, and the Finale is a "fugue" without dignity. It was exceedingly well played, and from its being quite new excited some interest. Miss Dolby sang Mozart's "Quando miro" delightfully, particularly a recitative which preceded it, beginning "A questo sono." Mozart's quartet, No. 7, was a most charming performance, leaving really nothing to be desired. Next came a most interesting work—a quintet by the Englishman, Macfarren—so clever, so beautiful, as to render it worthy of a place in any programme, and by the side of any author. The players seemed to think so, for they all seemed to exert themselves to the utmost to give it effect. The result was most satisfactory, and the audience gave most unequivocal proof of the pleasure they experienced in listening to it by the bursts of applause which followed each movement. Mr. Dorrell, perhaps, never played more finely, and no praise could be too high for Mr. C. Severn's reading and execution of the double bass part. The "Barcarole" very narrowly escaped an encore. Of the two songs which Miss Dolby sang in the second part, the last is the most effective. She sang it with a grace and elegance that won an encore from all parts of the room. Mr. Dorrell accompanied the vocal music with the care and attention of a true artist. We now come to the grand effort of the evening—Beethoven's seventh quartet. The party had evidently made up their minds to do justice to the composition, and it was clear that great care had been taken in rehearsing it. The first and second movements were very finely played. In the adagio, Mr. Dando had again the misfortune to break his first string; and although another instrument was handed to him without stop or noise, the absence of equally fine quality in its tone was clearly perceptible. In the Finale Mr. Dando resumed his own violin, but it was evident that the instrument was a little unsettled; and although it would be difficult to point out any particular passage that suffered from the accident, we should have been glad if it had not happened, on account of the music as well as the player.

THE SIXTH CONCERT OF SACRED MUSIC was held on Friday evening last at Crosby Hall, Miss Mounsey as heretofore, directing and presiding at the organ. The Misses Steele, Cubitt, Bassano, and the Messrs. Lockey and J. A. Novello were the vocalists. The selections were made from the works of Travers, Keller, Cherubini, Handel, Arne, Mozart, Weis, Graun, Weber, Nenkomm, Kucken, and some lesser lights. The Hall was respectably attended, and the performance gave every satisfaction. Miss Mounsey deserves the greatest credit for the unexceptionable manner in which the concerts of sacred music are produced. They are like to improve the taste of the city amateurs.

EXETER HALL.—The third Concert, illustrative of the history of English music, in aid of the Hullah Testimonial Fund, was held on Monday evening last. The concert as before was divided into two sections, the one of sacred, and the other of secular music. The first portion consisted of some compositions of J. Bishop, Welton, Croft, Greene, Boyce, and Nares: the secular part was made up of selections from the works of Aldrich, Travers, Arne, Jackson, Cooke, and Batishill. The principal vocal performers were Mrs. Weiss and Miss Duval, and the Messrs. Manvers, W. H. Seguin, and Mr. Machin. Mr. Willy's concert band attended, and proved highly efficient in the orchestral department. The members of Mr. Hullah's upper singing school formed the choral force. Mr. May conducted, in an admirable manner, and Mr. Oliver May presided at the organ with musician-like skill. With these statistics we must needs close our notice, having noticed the previous performances at length, merely adding that it appeared to us that the choir was hardly so effective as on former occasions. The next concert will take place on Monday, April 12th.

AMATEUR MUSICAL SOCIETY.—On Friday evening, the 5th inst. —in other words, if they be correct, yesternight week, the Amateurs gave their third concert at the Store Street Rooms. The programme was most excellent, and comprised specimens of most of the great schools, ancient and modern, as the reader may judge if he only take the trouble to read it.

PART I.—Overture "Barbiere," Rossini Symphony No. 1, Spohr. Adagio, Allegro, Larghetto Con Moto, Scherzo, Finale Allegretto. March, "Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

PART II.—Overture "Zauberflöte," Mozart. Operatic Selection, by Negri, from "Robert le Diable," Meyerbeer. Symphony, No. 2, Beethoven. Adagio, Allegro Con Brio, Larghetto, Scherzo Allegro, Finale Allegro Molto. Overture "Lac des Fées," Auber.

No selection could be happier made with an idea of suiting all tastes than the above, and whether he were classicist or romancist, he must have been equally well satisfied with the bill of fare. The band was in capital trim, and performed the various morceaux with an evident relish for their beauties, and a vigorous determination to do or die.

Mr.—We beg pardon and omit the overture to his name—Balfé, or Maestro Balfé, if it like you better, or chef, or what you will, was the head and front of all this excelling, and kept the determinate, though haply somewhat juvenile band,—as natheless, all things must grow—in such Napoleonic regulation as equally proved his watchfulness and his care. Balfé is in reality the Arie, of the orchestra, he does his spiriting gently, hovering about unperceived among the instruments, now perched on the violin, or concealed in the bell of the horn, listening for some anti-Jarret note, and anon he wings his way to the double bass to detect some flaw, or he visits the flute, and oboe, and roams about—

"From wood to brass, from brass to string, being almost possessed of ubiquity, like the birds, as Sir Boyle Roach said, and briefly performing the office of manifold conductors, though these had all been good men and useful. To speak a little less in "Ercles' vein," the performance on Friday evening was more than creditable, it was highly meritorious, and the executants already exhibit manifest signs of improvement, which we are delighted to record, as our feelings strongly lean towards the success of the Amateurs. The rehearsal for the fourth concert took place last night.
To do his gentle spiriting."

MR. HENRY RUSSELL'S VOCAL ENTERTAINMENTS are given every evening at the Strand Theatre, and afford delight and amusement to crowded audiences. Mr. Henry Russell is one of the most popular of all the monologue concert givers. His voice is powerful, and not devoid of sweetness, possessing great capacity to adapt itself to serious and comic singing, of which he makes admirable use; and as a dramatic vocalist off the stage he certainly is not surpassed. With such recommendations it is no wonder that Mr. H. Russell should have established himself so firmly in the estimation of native and transatlantic audiences. We attended on Monday evening at the Strand Theatre, and left at the end of the performances, quite satisfied that Mr. H. Russell is a genius sui generis. Every song was encored, and a new one introduced in the repeat, so that the visitor to the Strand Theatre had two entertainments in place of one. The principal songs given were, "The Slave Ship," "The Pauper's Drive," "The Song of the Shirt," "The Maniac," and "The Gambler's Wife." Besides these Mr. Russell gave several nigger songs, and related several nigger anecdotes. Some of his black jokes were inimitable. The Entertainments of Mr. H. Russell are repeated every evening.

MR. E. COULON gave a very pleasing entertainment on Saturday week, at his residence, Great Marlborough-street, on which occasion Miss Coulon made her second appearance in public as a pianist. Our readers may remember in what high terms we spoke on a previous occasion of the performances of this charming young artiste. Our admiration is further increased by hearing Miss Coulon a second time. She is, in every respect, a most accomplished pianoforte player; possessing fire, energy, earnestness and feeling, with a delicacy of touch, and a brilliancy of finger, and a precision withal, that might haply cause a smile of rivalry—prospectively—on the cheek of the divina pianista, even Playel. We felt quite delighted with the young debutante's great success; for everybody in the room felt that it was a veritable success, and nothing beside; and congratulations poured on her from all sides, which she received with becoming modesty. We augur great things of Miss Coulon's future. Messrs. Sainton, Rousselot, Brizzi, and Mr. Marshall, with the ladies, Miss C. Hallen, Mrs. Toulmin, and Madame Coulon, lent their instrumental and vocal assistance to the concert. Mons. Sainton was greatly applauded in de Beriot's, Tremolo, and encored in the Carnaval de Venise. To give an idea of the sterling character of the programme we cite it in full.

PART I.—Sonata in C minor, piano and violin, Mlle. Coulon and Mrs. Sainton, Beethoven. Duo, "Les Diamans de la Couronne," Mme. Coulon and Miss C. Hallen, Auber. Air, "I saw thee weep," Mr. Marshall & C. Macfarren. Solo, "Le tremolo," violin, M. Sainton, de Beriot. Air, "De la Muette" Miss C. Hallen, Auber. "Duo, I Puritani," Mrs. Toulmin and Mr. Brizzi, Bellini.

PART II.—Trio (allegro, andante, scherzo), piano, violin, and violoncello Mlle. Coulon, Mr. Sainton, and Mr. Rousselot, Mendelssohn. Aria, "Prendi per me," Mrs. Toulmin, Benedict et de Beriot. Solo, "Le Carnaval de Venise," Mr. Sainton. Romance Française, Mme. Coulon, Musini. Fantaisie (from Lucie), Mlle. Coulon, Prudent.

Mlle. Coulon was compelled to repeat the fantaisie of Prudent, a composition, by the way, more remarkable for its difficulty than for its musical merits.

BEAUMONT INSTITUTION, MILE-END ROAD.—The concert, on Monday evening, consisted of a selection of popular music. Part I. commenced with Rossini's duet "Amor possente nome," sung by Miss Messent and Mr. Rafter. "Non piu andrai" was sung in F. Lablache's best style, which produced a loud encore. Mr. Cohan, the well-known pianist, performed his own variations upon "See, the conquering hero comes," with great ability; his execution excited much astonishment. Madame F. Lablache, a great favorite here, was deservedly encored in Linley's air "Come when the moon is breaking." The Scotch ballad "Jock o' Hazeldean," by Miss Messent, "Mary Jamieson," and "Logie o' Buchan," by Madame Lablache, were all received with favour. A Miss Eliza Nelson, who sang twice, is evidently a novice. Mr. Abbot, from the Royal Academy, performed a solo, by de Beriot, on the violin. John Parry, as usual, terminated the concert, with the "London Season," which sent the company home in happy humour. Mr. Maurice Davies presided at the piano, with his accustomed care. It is only to be regretted that, at the Beaumont, as well as at the other Literary Institutions, the progress of art, and the refinement of taste, are not treated with consideration.

MR. STERNDALE BENNETT.—The second of Mr. Sterndale Bennett's performances of classical pianoforte music took place on Tuesday evening, in the Hanover Square Rooms, before a highly distinguished audience. The order of the programme was as follows:—

PART I.—Duet in B flat, pianoforte and violin, Messrs. Blagrove and W. S. Bennett, Mozart. Preludes and Fugues, pianoforte, Mr. W. S. Bennett, J. S. Bach and Mendelssohn. Two Songs, Madame G. A.

Macfarren, "To Chloe in sickness," W. S. Bennett. "The first Spring day," (MS.) G. A. Macfarren. Chamber Trio, A major, Op. 26, pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, Messrs. W. S. Bennett, Blagrove, and Lucas, W. S. Bennett.

PART II.—Duet D major, Op. 58, pianoforte and violoncello, Messrs. W. S. Bennett and Lucas, Mendelssohn. Suite Cinquieme, from the Suites de Pieces pour le Clavecin, Mr. W. S. Bennett, Handel. Song, Mr. Hobbs, Webbe. Grand Sonata, C sharp minor, Op. 27, pianoforte, Mr. W. S. Bennett, Beethoven. Accompanist, Mr. W. Dorrell.

On the whole this programme was superior to that of the first evening. It included one of Mr. Bennett's large works, a feature in which its predecessor was wanting; and this fact alone lent it a higher interest. Mozart's sonata was a great treat. Mr. Blagrove played with purity of style, faultless in tonation, and finished mechanism; and Mr. Bennett was all that a thorough Mozartist could desire. The sonata was composed (according to the programme) in April, 1784—a fact derived, no doubt, from Messrs. Coventry and Hollier's beautiful edition of Mozart's pianoforte works, so carefully edited by M. Cipriani Potter. The prelude and fugue in E major, from Bach's Clavier bien temperé (the master-piece of the author), is among the finest things in that immense work. The prelude and fugue of Mendelssohn, in E minor, belong to a set of six preludes and fugues (published by Addison and Co.), with which even musicians are not nearly enough familiar. Mr. Lindsay Sloper introduced one of the preludes (in A flat) at his first soirée, but omitted the fugue, which is certainly introduced by the composer as a necessary pendent; a proceeding very unusual with this accomplished and classical musician. It is a very interesting specimen of the composer's style, and exemplifies a particular stage in his pursuit of the more recondite branches of the art, which ought to be a subject of inquiry to every admirer of the wonderful genius of the man. To hear Mr. Bennett play these—the Bach and the Mendelssohn—was a rare treat. The legato, which is so eminent a feature in his style, was employed to advantage in the Bach—and the fire, which makes him as unlike John Cramer (the model to whom critics will insist upon comparing him) as one pianist can be unlike another, was marvellously well bestowed upon the Mendelssohn. The prelude of the latter was encored with enthusiasm. The two charming songs of Mr. Bennett and Mr. Macfarren, old fellow-students in the Academy, and friendly rivals in their love of art, could not have been entrusted to a more conscientious interpreter than Madame Macfarren, who in the tender passion of the first, and the "sprightly, springy joyfulness" (to quote a happy expression of the Post) of the last, proved herself equally able to embody two sentiments entirely opposite. The beautiful and earnest style of this young vocalist is the seed of future eminence, which it depends upon herself to attain, and that she will attain it we have little doubt. Of these lovely songs, one, "Chloe in sickness," is well known through Miss Dolby's singing, and Messrs. Coventry and Hollier's edition of Mr. Bennett's "six songs" (to which a suite of six more have been so long and so vainly expected); but the other, "The first spring day," is one of those many vocal gems which the composer, Mr. Macfarren, seems determined to keep to himself, much to the loss of the publishers, and the disappointment of such of the public as have heard mention made of them. We differ strongly from the Morning Post and others, who place the trio in A major of Mr. Bennett among his least happy inspirations. If the utmost perfection of grace and freshness be attained in the Moderato Assai, and the essence of sparkling playfulness be consummated in the serenade, and to conclude a high amount of energy and vigorous passion be accomplished in the Allegro Fermo ("Fermo" is an original expletive, by the way,) and we entirely think that each and all of these has been achieved, we cannot for the life of us, perceive wherein lies the weakness of this trio. We, no less than the Post, "are determined to do candid justice to everything that proceeds from the accomplished mind of this elegant musician," (the elegant mind of this accomplished musician would have been better) and we, unlike the Post, are bound to say of the trio in A—not that it "is the weakest composition of its author," which is preposterous, but that it is, while one of the lightest and least elaborate, one of the most charming, melodious, and captivating. A new theory of tune has lately arisen which would put the Moderato Assai of this trio out of the plea of melody. We do not understand this new theory of tune; but we hurl defiance at it by retorting that the Moderato Assai is, from the first bar to the last, one continuous stream of melody "in many voices." Of course the execution of the trio was perfection. What less could be expected at the fingers of the composer himself, and of his ancient fellow-students of the Academy, Messrs. Blagrove and Lucas? It was listened to with attention, and liberally applauded. The serenade created the most lively sensation.

The second part must be shortly dismissed. The Allegretto scherzando, in B minor, of Mendelssohn's fine duet was deliciously played, and encored. Nothing to our ears can be more thoroughly captivating and beautiful than the Allemande and Courante of Handel's fifth suite. This was positively enchanting. We think less of the air varié, "The Harmonious Blacksmith;" but Mr. Bennett's delightful playing won rapturous applause in this well-known composition. We liked Mr. Hobbs's singing very much, but Webbe's song not a bit. The C sharp minor, one of the most perfect of Beethoven's sonatas, in the fantasia style, was marvellously executed by Mr. Bennett. The slow movement at the commencement touched every heart. The minuet and trio, in D flat, were rendered with a world of graceful playfulness; and the magnificent finale, taken with prodigious speed, made a splendid climax to an exceeding thoroughly intellectual enjoyment.

MISCELLANEOUS.

BURNING OF THE THEATRE AT CARLSRUHE.—The extent of dreadful calamity, which has lately filled the papers in every quarter, has now been ascertained. Nearly two hundred persons have been burned, or suffocated, the greater number of them being women, apprentices and children. In the dead-house in the churchyard the scene is described as awful and horrible. Half bodies, broken limbs, heads mutilated, trunks roasted, all incapable of identification present a spectacle too shocking for humanity to contemplate. The whole city is in the greatest consternation. So great and terrible an affliction has not visited Carlsruhe within the memory of living man.

ANCIENT CONCERTS.—The concerts for the remainder of the season are fixed for their date.—April 21; May 5 and 19; June 2, 16 and 30. The Messiah will be performed for the Royal Society of Musicians' Fund on the 14th of July. The dates have been changed in consequence of the General Fast having been fixed for March the 24th.

WILSON IN PARIS.—Mr Wilson gave his first entertainment on the Songs of Scotland in Paris on Monday last, when his Songs were received with much enthusiasm. Some of the Jacobite ones raised his audience quite to a fureur, and the dialogue songs, which he makes so graphic, such as "Saw ye my wee thing?"—"Hame cam our gudeman at e'en," &c., seemed to afford great delight as well as amusement. Mr. Wilson has been engaged for several of the Nobility and Gentry's Soirées. He will, we understand, resume his entertainments in the Music Hall, London, on Easter Monday. Mr. Edward Land accompanies Mr. Wilson as usual.

JOSEPH JOACHIM.—This little violinist who gave proofs of such extraordinary ability and accomplishment two years ago when in London, is likely to return this season. He has been lately playing at Dresden Mendelssohn's Violin Concerts with the greatest success, and is now engaged in writing two concerts himself, which he will play in public if he comes here. (Morning Herald.)

THE FIRST PHILHARMONIC CONCERT takes place on Monday evening. The programme contains some interesting features, but the form is novel in respect to the order of the pieces, and there is only one overture. We are not sure that we shall be able to approve of the encroachment on former models.

MR. W. V. WALLACE.—We are happy to state that the accomplished composer of Maritana is better, and fair hopes are entertained of his speedy convalescence. Mr. Wallace is still, however, seriously afflicted with inflammation of the eyes.

STAUDIGL.—This great basso will be here in April to sing in Mendelssohn's Elijah, and to fulfil his engagement with Mr. Lumley. With him will come the brothers Helmesberger, two very young and talented violinists, from Vienna.

A DEEP CRITIC.—A writer in the Morning Chronicle, in rendering account of a performance at the French Plays, sets out with a series of assertions which are evidently intended as a philosophic "show off,"—"The life of a Frenchman" says he is a vaudeville. He lives in three acts—walks about in an actor's dress more or less soiled. To him, in its most literal sense, 'all the world's a stage' but it is a vaudeville stage, modelled after the fashion of the Theatre des Variétés." Just as well might he begin his article thus:—"The life of a Frenchman is not a vaudeville. He does not live in three acts—nor walks about in an actor's dress, more or less soiled. To him, in his most literal sense "all the world is not a stage," and much less a vaudeville stage, modelled after the fashion of the Theatre des Variétés." There would be just as much truth in the one as in the other and just as much nonsense. The thing as it stands is a fine specimen of penny—a lining without any news in it, a sort of literary vomit, brought up by the emetic of pelf or the itch scribendi. And of such stuff, alas! is too much of our "criticism" manufactured. The same writer concludes his notice by informing us that M. Alcide Tousez "was called before the curtain after it fell," as though he could possibly be called before the curtain before it fell! But the sentence makes two lines more, and is set off by a new par:—the criticism altogether occupied some fourth of a column.

Mrs. BUTLER (formerly Fanny Kemble) has been engaged by Mr. Maddox, for the Princess's Theatre, and she will appear there soon after Easter. The Mrs. Butler who gave dramatic readings at the Hanover Rooms, last week, is the widow of the late Mr. Samuel Butler, the actor.

MELODISTS.—Mr. W. Sterndale Bennett and Signor Emiliani the violinist have been invited to dine with the Melodists' Club, on the 30th inst.

MR. KEARNES.—We are glad to hear that the concert which is to take place on Wednesday next, for the benefit of the late Mr. Kearnes's family, promises to be well attended.

CAMBRIDGE.—Should a general election not take place, the installation of H. R. H. the Prince Consort will take place early in July, at Cambridge, followed by a musical festival; but nothing as yet has been decided upon.

MENDELSSOHN is expected to arrive in London about the 13th of April, for the purpose of superintending the performance of his oratorio, Elijah, at Exeter Hall, by the Sacred Harmonic Society; on which occasion the orchestra will be much enlarged, especially in the instrumental department. The composer has made many important alterations in the oratorio since it was performed at Birmingham last August.

THE CATCH CLUB held its first meeting at the Thatched House Tavern on the 5th inst., and the Round Catch and Canon Club has resumed its re-unions at the Freemason's Tavern. The Glee Club will dine this day at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, Sir Felix Booth, Bart, President.

SALVI.—This tenor has taken his farewell benefit at the Italian Opera in St. Petersburg, and will soon be on his way to England. He is engaged by the Russian management at a salary of £1,000 for four months.

TAMBURINI has arrived in Paris from St. Petersburg in excellent health. He will be in London forthwith.

ALBONI.—This contralto, who is engaged by the Covent Garden Company, is daily expected in London. Critics are equally wars about her personal and mental accomplishments.

MR. HENRY PHILLIPS performed on Monday and Tuesday evenings at the theatre, Canterbury, taking his favourite parts Tom Tug, in The Waterman, and Steady, in The Quaker. The houses have been excellent, considering the time of year and season. Mr. Phillips's reception was highly flattering, and his performances were much applauded. On Wednesday evening Mr. Phillips sung at the Literary Institution, Gravesend, and on Thursday, at the Rosemary Branch, Peckham. The favourite barytone seems in great request at present.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE GENTLEMAN who applies to us for the Hon. Mrs. Norton's address, must apply to Bentley or Colburn. Mrs. Norton, we are sorry to say, is not at present, a contributor to the "Musical World."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Warren's 20 Guinea Cottage Piano-Fortes

ARE NOW SELLING AT THE

Manufactory, 71, Leadenhall Street

(Removed from 1 and 2, Liverpool Street, Bishopsgate Street.)

These Instruments are well manufactured of the best seasoned wood, FINE FULL TONE AND GOOD TOUCH. A two years warranty given with each instrument. ESTABLISHED TWENTY-ONE YEARS. The only house in London where a good sound instrument can be obtained at the above low price, (for cash only). SMALL PROFIT AND QUICK RETURNS!

JOHN WARREN, 71, Leadenhall St., opposite Aldgate Pump

HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS.

MR. STERNDALE BENNETT

Begs to announce that his

Third Performance of Classical Pianoforte Music

Will be held in the above Rooms,

On TUESDAY EVENING, the 23rd instant,

On which occasion he will be assisted by several eminent Vocal and Instrumental artists. Further particulars will be duly announced. Tickets, half-a-Guinea each, may be had at Mr. BENNETT'S residence, 15, Russell Place, Fitzroy Square, and at all the Music Shops.

MESSRS. BRAHAM'S BENEFIT CONCERT, ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.

Mr. H. BRAHAM and Mr. C. BRAHAM'S Benefit Concert,

On TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 23RD,

On which occasion the following eminent talent will appear:—Miss Dolby, Mrs. Newton, Miss Ransford, Mr. Braham, Mr. H. Braham, Mr. C. Braham, and the celebrated Ethiopian Serenaders—Pell, Harrington, White, Stanwood, and German. Conductor, Mr. Brinley Richards. Doors open at half past seven. Concert to commence at eight o'clock. Tickets may be obtained at Mitchell's Royal Library, 33, Old Bond Street; and at the Box-office.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN, Established for the purpose of rendering a more perfect performance of the LYRIC DRAMA

Than has hitherto been attained in this country.

UNDER THE DIRECTION AND MANAGEMENT OF MR. BEALE.
The Nobility, Gentry, and Patrons of Music, are respectfully informed, that the
ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA
Will Open the First Week in April.

Prospectuses to be had at the Box-office, Bow Street; at Cramer, Beale, and Co.'s, 201, Regent Street; and at all the libraries.

GOOD PIANOFORTES CHEAP

The large and valuable STOCK of PIANOFORTES manufactured by

ZEITTER & CO.,

IS NOW SELLING OFF,

At 4, New Cavendish Street, Portland Place, London,

In consequence of a Dissolution of Partnership. The Instruments, consisting of mahogany and rosewood Grands, Semi-Grands, Cabinet, Cottage, and Piccolos, are made with the patent 8-undoing Board, Metallic Plate, Check Action, and all the latest improvements. The Pianofortes made by ZEITTER and Co. have always enjoyed a preference among the nobility and gentry, having been honored with the patronage of Her Majesty the Queen, the Duchess of Sutherland, &c. The peculiar construction of the sounding-board insures their greater durability and the firm tone is well known. Parties desirous of possessing one of these superior Instruments, may now purchase the same on very advantageous terms, Grands, heretofore from 120 to 145 Guineas, are now selling at £50 to £70, and others in proportion. The premises No. 5 have been recently closed.

Mr. LINDSAY SLOPER'S

Third and last Soirée

OF

CLASSICAL PIANO-FORTE MUSIC,

WILL TAKE PLACE AT THE

Bestroom Rooms, 76, Harley-street, Cavendish-square,

ON THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 18.

Mr. SLOPER will be assisted at this Soirée by Miss DOLBY, Messrs. STERNDALE BENNETT, ROUSSELOT, DELOFFRE, and PILET.

Family tickets, to admit three to one Soirée, One Guinea each; and single tickets half-a-Guinea each; may be had of Messrs. CRAMER, BEALE, and Co.; WESSEL, and JULLIEN; and of Mr. LINDSAY SLOPER, 7, Southwick Place, Hyde Park Square.

FAIR COMPLEXION.

Under the Patronage of the Nobility and Gentry.

TO THE LADIES.—Wonderful and Important Discovery.

COCKBURN'S

ORIENTAL BOTANICAL PREPARATION,

For removing almost instantaneously cutaneous eruptions, freckles, pimples, spots, and other imperfections of the skin. After one application of the Botanic Extract, which must be used twice a day, a wonderful change will be perceived, and in the course of a few days the complexion will assume a beautiful transparent roseate hue and brilliancy. The extract to apply is of the most agreeable nature, and the first application will prove its wonderful efficacy. Prepared only, and sold wholesale and retail, by the sole proprietor,

GEORGE H. J. COCKBURN, 9, Aldgate, London; And Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street, London; in bottles at 2s. 9d. and 4s. 6d. each; also by Sanger, 150, Oxford-street; Keating, St. Paul's Church Yard; Johnson, 68, Cornhill; Hannay and Co., 63, Oxford-street; Butler and Co., 4, Chesapeake; Edwards, St. Paul's Churchyard; Prout, 229, Strand; and of all other Chemists and Perfumers in the kingdom.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE

Is acknowledged as the best specific after three years' trial, for improving the voice and removing all affections of the throat, strongly recommended to clergymen, singers, actors, public speakers, and all persons subject to relaxed throats.

The Proprietors have just received the following Testimonial, amongst many others, from MADAME ANNA BISHOP:—

"DEAR SIR,—I am happy to say that all I have heard respecting the efficacy of DR. STOLBERG'S celebrated LOZENGE is perfectly true, as yesterday, feeling myself very fatigued (singing nightly at the Theatre), I took several of the Lozenges, and my voice was very clear, and my throat quite free from relaxation. I am, Dear Sir, Yours truly, ANNA BISHOP."

"11th November 1846.—Jermyn Street."

Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Churchyard; W. Edwards and Newbery and Sons, St. Paul's Churchyard; Sanger, and Borchers and Hannay, Oxford-street; and retail by all respectable Chymists in the Kingdom.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

ON FRIDAY EVENING, March 19,

Will be performed, for the first time by the Society, Handel's Oratorio

BELSHAZZAR.

Principal Vocal Performers:—Miss Birch, Miss M. B. Hawes, Mr. Manvers, Mr. Rodds, and Mr. H. Phillips. The Band and Chorus will consist of above 500 performers. Tickets, 3s. each, Reserved Seats 5s., may be had of the principal Music Sellers; of Mr. Bowley, 53; Mr. Mitchell, 39, Charing Cross; and of Mr. Kies, 102, Strand, opposite Exeter Hall. THOMAS BIRKBEAR, Hon. Sec.

Mr. N. J. SPORLE'S

Grand Evening Concert,

AT THE LONDON TAVERN, BISHOPSGATE STREET,

TUESDAY, March 16th, 1847.

Vocal—Messdames DOLBY, THORNTON, M. O'CONNOR, A. NEWTON, M. ROSE, Messrs. N. J. SPORLE, G. GENGEL, SHOUBRIDGE, RANSFORD, TURNER, ROBINSON, F. SMITH, and JOHN PARRY. Instrumental—FREDERICK CHAT-TERTON, CAREY, G. CASE, SEDGWICK, WARD, and Miss B. WILLIAMS. Conductor—W. LOUIS LEO. Tickets, 3s. 6d. each; to be had of Mr. SPORLE, 18, Mabledon Place, Burton Crescent; the Musical Warehouses, and the London Tavern.

PIANOFORTES FOR SALE.

A very superior and powerful toned 6½ Octave Rosewood COTTAGE, by Zeitter and Co., with metallic string plate, check action, &c., cost 10 guineas a short time since, and will now be sold for half that sum; an elegant Rosewood Semi-CABINET, 6½ octaves, with all the latest improvement, only 35 guineas; a COTTAGE, 14 guineas; a 6-OCTAVE SQUARE, by Broadwood, with metallic spring plate, only £18, cost 52 guineas; a 5½ DITTO, £4. Also, a variety of new and improved CABINET, COTTAGE, and PICCOLO PIANOFORTES, from 25 guineas each. Packed free of expense.

C. SCOTCHER,

(from Collard and Collard's), 60, Mortimer-street, Cavendish-square.
PIANOFORTES TAKEN IN EXCHANGE.

TO THE MUSIC PROFESSION.

"NASSAU STEAM PRESS,"

AND

PUBLISHING OFFICE,

60, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, CHARING CROSS.

Every description of CONCERT PRINTING, (Public or Private), consisting of PROGRAMMES, NOTES, TICKETS, POSTING BILLS, &c., are neatly and expeditiously executed with economy and taste by

W. S. JOHNSON,

PRINTER TO HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE 21 YEARS!

Where also may be had "The Musical World," and all Operas, Comedies, Plays, Farces, Burlesques, and the whole of Webster's unique Acting Drama.

MEDICAL GALVANISM.

HORNE, THORNTON, & WOOD, Successors to E. PALMER, 123, Newgate-street, in submitting their improved ELECTRO-GALVANIC MACHINES, beg to state, that they have availed themselves of the discoveries of De la Rive, Faraday, Smee, and others, by which they are enabled to construct a coil with all the required intensity and quantity of electricity for medical use, thereby effecting both a saving of expense and trouble to the invalid, and placing in his hands an effective, powerful, and simple instrument, that may be excited at a minute's notice, and without trouble.—Price, £3. 3s.; £3. 10s.; and £5. 5s.

PHILOSOPHICAL APPARATUS.—Every description of Apparatus connected with Chemistry, Hydraulics, Hydrostatics, Pneumatics, Frictional and Voltaic Electricity, Electro-Magnetism, Electro-Metallurgy, Optics, (including the Dissolving View), Photography, &c.) manufactured and sold by Horne, Thornton, and Wood, successors to Edward Palmer, 123, Newgate Street, London.

Foreign orders, enclosing a remittance or order for payment in London promptly attended to.

THOMAS BAKER'S MODERN PIANOFORTE TUTOR,

M. JULLIEN

Has the honor to announce, that he has just published the above work, which he flatters himself will be found the desideratum so long sought after by the profession. Notwithstanding the improvements that have taken place in Pianoforte Playing within the last ten years, no deviation has been made in the system of teaching from Tutors of the Old School; in consequence, many gifted with brilliant talents have been unable to execute the music of the present day. For this reason the

MODERN PIANOFORTE TUTOR

Has been introduced, and met with the greatest success from the elite of the profession, who have universally adopted it. The work is divided into two parts: the first being a complete Tutor in itself, containing the

RUDIMENTS OF MUSIC,

Rules for the Formation of the Hand, Scales,

FINGER EXERCISES, &c.

Interspersed with Morceaux from the works of

Beethoven, Mozart, Spohr, Weber, Meyerbeer, Roch-Albert, Rossini, Bellini, Donizetti, &c.—Price 8s.

The second part consists of a more advanced course of Study, proceeding to the most refined style of Modern Playing;

Illustrated with numerous Examples & Exercises,

On all the various Fingerings adopted by the most eminent Pianistes of the MODERN SCHOOL: with Selections from the Pianoforte Compositions of HERZ, DOHLER, THALBERG, &c.; in fact, everything necessary to constitute a first-rate Pianist. Price 8s., or 1*l*s. the entire work.

Published by M. JULLIEN & Co.,

AT THE ROYAL MUSICAL CONSERVATORY,
214, REGENT STREET, AND 45, KING STREET,

Where all the Compositions of the above Author may be had.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847.

M. JULLIEN has the honor to announce that the sixth edition of his

MUSICAL ANNUAL FOR 1847

Is now Published, and will be found by far the best work of the kind that has ever appeared; containing no less than

Thirty Pieces of Vocal and Fourteen of Instrumental Music, The greater part of which have never before been published, the copyrights having been purchased expressly for this work, at an immense cost, with the view of rendering it immeasurably superior to any of its predecessors.

The portion which has already appeared comprise those pieces only whose decided success has induced M. JULLIEN, at the request of numerous influential patrons, to include them in this Selection.

The Illustrations, in addition to the elaborately executed Covers, Title, and Dedication pages, include two magnificent Views of the interior of Covent Garden Theatre. The one taken during the brilliant scene exhibited in that splendid arena of the occasion of M. JULLIEN'S GRAND BAL MASQUE; the other a VIEW OF THE THEATRE TAKEN DURING THE CONCERTS, the grouping of the Figures in both Views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant. To those who have visited the Theatre on either occasion, the ALBUM will form a delightful SOUVENIR, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of the gorgeous scene.

A splendidly-coloured PORTRAIT of the celebrated Danseuse, Madlle. FLORA FABBRI, in the admired Pas, La Castigliani. An original subject, "THE FORTUNE TELLER," illustrating Baker's beautiful ballad of that name.

The whole of this department of the ALBUM has been under the active superintendence of J. BRANDARD, Esq., whose pencil only has been employed in its production.

Nothing more need be said in favour of this Work, and in proof of its vast superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the Contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe.

It will also be perceived that in addition to the latest compositions of the best English Composers, the ALBUM contains some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany, France, Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting the attention of the Continental dilettanti. Price 18s. and 2*l* 1s.

ROYAL CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC,
214, REGENT-STREET, AND 45, KING-STREET.

SOVEREIGN Life Assurance Company,

No. 5, ST. JAMES'S STREET,

LONDON.

Trustees.

Sir A. Brydges Henniker, Bart.
B. Bond Cabbell, Esq., M.P.

Henry Pownall, Esq.
Claude Edward Scott, Esq.

Directors.

CHAIRMAN, Lieutenant Colonel Lord Henry Broadwood, Esq., M.P.
ARTHUR LENNOX. Sir James Carmichael, Bart.
DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN, T. C. Granger, Charles Farebrother, Esq., Alderman.
Esq., M.P. William Tulloh Fraser, Esq.
John Ashburner, Esq., M.D. John Gardiner, Esq.
T. M. B. Batard, Esq. Aaron Asher Goldsmid, Esq.
Philip P. Blyth, Esq. Henry William Pownall, Esq.

Bankers, Sir Claude Scott, Bart., and Co.
Solicitors, Messrs. Davies, Son, and Campbell.

Assurances on the lives of persons in every station of life and every part of the world, granted on a plan which combines the utmost amount of benefit to the families of the assured at death, with every attainable advantage during life, which the system of Life Assurance is capable of affording.

It affords perfect security in a subscribed Capital, which guarantees the prompt settlement of every claim, with participating and non-participating rates on the lowest scale, especially for terms of years.

The Assured can anticipate or obtain the advance of the full amount of the Policy, on giving approved available security for a certain number of annual payments, as explained by the Prospectus.

Every facility is afforded to persons assuring the lives of others, so as to render such Policies effectual securities.

A new plan of gradual or accumulative Assurance, particularly adapted for young lives, and for such as cannot, without inconvenience, undertake the payment of a fixed premium, securing at once provision in case of premature death, and an accumulating fund, available during life, should occasion require.

ANNUITIES, ENDOWMENTS, ADVANCES, and LOANS, on liberal terms.

Detailed Prospectuses, with forms of Proposal, and every information, may be had on application, either personally or by letter, at the Company's Offices.

The usual commission to Solicitors and Agents.

H. D. DAVENPORT, Secretary.

THE PATENT HARMONIUM.

This beautiful Instrument possesses the softness of the voice with the variety of tone of every wind Instrument, as also the power of a large Organ. It is equally suitable for Sacred Music, or the Dance, and adapted for the Drawing Room, Concert Room, Church or Chapel. Printed particulars can be had of LUFF and SON, sole agents, where the PATENT HARMONIUM can be heard from 10 till 4 daily; and where can be inspected

LUFF & SON'S

Elegant Assortment of PIANOFORTES,

Made by experienced workmen, and thoroughly seasoned wood, all of which is prepared on the premises. They are warranted to stand well in Tune, and are prepared for extreme climates: prices one-third less than usually charged. Instruments taken in exchange, and a liberal allowance to dealers.

LUFF and SON, 103, Great Russell Street, Bloomsbury.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, at the "Naassan Steam Press," by WILLIAM SPENCER JOHNSON, 60, St. Martin's Lane, in the parish of St. Martin's in the Fields, in the County of Middlesex; where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed post paid. To be had of G. Purkiss, Dean Street, Soho; Strange, Paternoster Row; Wiseheart, Dublin; and all Booksellers.—Saturday, March 13th, 1847.

The Musical World.

(PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT NOON.)

A RECORD OF THE THEATRES, MUSIC, LITERATURE, FINE ARTS,
FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE, &c.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s. Stamped; 12s. Unstamped; to be forwarded by Money Order or Postage Stamp to the Publisher, W. S. Johnson, "Nassau Steam Press," 60, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross.

Each Subscriber is entitled to an Admission to an Annual Concert, and a Piece of Music, (regular Music size) Monthly.

No. 12.—Vol. XXII.

SATURDAY, MARCH 20, 1847.

{ PRICE THREEPENCE
STAMPED, FOURPENCE

THE PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

THE second great event of the season has "come off" since our last. The first was the opening of Her Majesty's Theatre; the one we have now to record is the first concert of the fifth season of the Philharmonic Society, established, in 1813, by a body of the most eminent musical professors then resident in London. The interest which the leading organs of the press have begun to take in the concerts of this institution may be traced to two sources—the importance and magnitude of the performances themselves, and the qualifications of Signor Costa for the post of conductor. About the former, opinions are unanimous, criticism only being exercised upon the errors and miscalculations of the directors. But the latter is a casus belli, in which the supporters of either side take the positions of decided partisans. It will not be difficult to foresee that the question of the two Italian Operas has something to do with this controversy, inasmuch as regards the authorised organs of either party—the Morning Post for Her Majesty's Theatre, and the Morning Chronicle for the Royal Italian Opera. The former unmercifully dissects the capabilities of Signor Costa; the latter exalts him to the skies, and places him among the archangels, between Michael and Gabriel. The Morning Herald regrets, with the Post, that the office of conductor had not devolved upon an English artist. The Times declares unceremoniously that Signor Costa is not at all fitted to accomplish its duties satisfactorily, and more plain-speaking than its contemporaries, names Sterndale Bennett as the proper man. The Daily News takes no part in the question. We at once own our coincidence with the sentiments advanced by the Times. Meanwhile this war of opinion has been the medium of introducing much interesting detail, both critical and historical, of which we propose, in another article, to present our readers with some specimens. Our business now is to recount the proceedings of the first concert.

The crowded and brilliant appearance of the Hanover Square Rooms, on Monday night, placed Signor Costa's beneficial influence on the subscription list beyond the reach of doubt. But the critic's duty is not to praise a thing because it brings money, but because it is good in art. Mr. Henry Russell's "I'm Afloat" sells much more than Beethoven's "Circle of Songs," addressed by a lover to his mistress; but though the former contains the elements for ensuring mobocratic favour on a large scale, the popular composer, we are persuaded, would blush to read a criticism in which he should be preferred or compared to Beethoven, or his pleasant lyric to one of the loveliest and deepest of Beethoven's inspirations. Cela va sans dire. Therefore, in recording the fiscal results of Signor Costa's engagement as conductor, we reserve to ourselves the entire right of demonstrating its impropriety. One concert directed by the Autocrat of all the Russias, or the Emperor of China, "brother of the moon," would attract more customers than would fill the Hanover Square Rooms ten times over; but no one will insist therefrom that either of these august personages is in any way fitted for the task. Signor Costa attracts the multitude as a lion or an elephant of unusual proportions would, in a still greater degree, attract the multitude to Exeter Change or the Zoological Gardens. Signor Costa is a lion now, and a lion with a castle on his back, in the shape of the Royal Italian Opera. The people flock to see him wag his tail, to hear him roar, and behold how well he bears his burden. Signor Costa is also a man of fashion, or rather a man in fashion, and so the fashion congregates at his signal, and worships at his shrine. But we are not of the fashion, or in the fashion, and our lion-seeing days are over. We shall, therefore, criticise Signor Costa simply as Signor Costa, the conductor at the Philharmonic, with a steel pen, an iron conscience, and no quarter. We are in the position of the unsopped Cerberus, the directors having thrown us neither tickets of admission, nor advertisements, to appease us; and we shall not let their conductor cross the Styx, even though Charon, in the shape of the Chronicle, be ready to row him over. Fiat justitia—we are inexorable.

The programme of the first concert was constructed on new principles, and we cannot admire either the principles or the programme. Our readers shall judge:—

PART I.

Overture (Leonora)	- - -	Beethoven.
Song, "On Lena's gloomy heath," MR. H PHILLIPS (MS.)	- - -	Mendelssohn Bartholdy.
Sinfonia, "La Reine de France"	- - -	Haydn.
Romance, "Va, dit elle," Madame CARADORI ALLEN (Robert le Diable)	- - -	Meyerbeer.
Concerto, Piano-forte, Miss K. LODER	- - -	Weber.

PART II.

Scene, "Ah! what delight," MR. H PHILLIPS (Der Vampyr)	- - -	Marschner.
Concerto Violin, M. SAINTON (MS.)	- - -	Mendelssohn Bartholdy.
Recit. } "Ah! quanti affetti,"	}	Crescentini.
Aria. } "Sento mancar mi l'anima,"
Madame CARADORI ALLEN,	- - -	Beethoven.
Sinfonia in C (No. 1)	- - -

Conductor, M. COSTA.

Let us state our reasons for disapproving of the programme ere we proceed to criticise the performance. The overture to Leonora was the most brilliant and magnificent piece in the selection, and its position, while depriving it of the serious attention it must absolutely receive to be appreciated, helped to destroy the effect of whatever came after it. Haydn's symphony, for example, one of his earliest and most modest, was entirely crushed under the weight of it. Then the vocal music, except one song (the MS. of Mendelssohn), was wholly uninteresting. Meyerbeer and Marschner cannot be removed from the theatre without prejudice, and the scene from Der Vampyr is a very unfortunate specimen of the latter composer. Then we had only one overture, an innovation that admits no argument in its favour. Then the two most important features in the programme were from the pen of Beethoven—an injustice to other composers of merit, whose works should be played as often as practicable. Lastly, the symphonies were both selected from the early efforts of the authors, which was a miscalculation altogether, since nothing is more essential to the interest of a classical programme than variety. Postscriptum:—the second part began with a vocal solo, usurping the place of honour belonging, by right of custom and of reason, to the grand symphony of the evening, which, on the present occasion, performed the agreeable duty of playing the audience out, the few that remained to hear being unwarrantably discommoded. To sum up—the selection was in itself weak, and the alteration from the ancient form a complete failure. And now to speak of the execution.

The overture to Leonora was vigorously rendered, and the power of the orchestra demonstrated with crashing reality; but to those who do not regard noise as the principle of harmony, that delicate appreciation of the varied poetical beauties in which the work abounds, so necessary to its proper interpretation, was missing. The general movement of the allegro was decidedly too slow, which made it drag rather heavily until the piu mosso, when the proper time was accomplished. The immense force of the stringed band was brought into play with singular effect in the unison crescendo passage which leads to this part of the overture. Mr. Ribas must be especially noticed for the manner in which he rendered the difficult part allotted to the flauto primo. During the first performance H. R. H. the Duke of Cambridge sat near the orchestra. Not quite satisfied, as it would seem, with the effect, His Royal Highness signified his intention of removing to the gallery at the extremity of the room, and requested that the overture might be repeated, in order to enable him to come to a decision as to which was the most convenient spot for hearing. In obedience to His Royal Highness's request the overture was forthwith repeated. The applause of the audience however was, it must be admitted, by no means enthusiastic. Nevertheless some of our contemporaries signalize the event as a "rapturous encore," which is clearly a misnomer. A correct estimate of the quality of the orchestra was easy to make after the execution of this overture. Its beauties and defects are pretty nigh balanced. Take away some of the stringed instruments, and that important department would be unquestionably strengthened; for as invalids encumber the march of an army, so do certain of the Philharmonic violins, violas, and violoncellos weaken rather than assist the general effect of the body. It is better not to play at all than to play ill and damage the resources of the strong players. In the wind department another kind of reform is necessary. Some of the principals, whose deficiency has for years been a crying sin, should be deposed and more competent men put in their place. The cant of allowing a great national institution (which the Philharmonic professes to be) to suffer, on the plea of not interfering with private interests, would not be tolerated in any country but this. We have too often signalized the departments of the orchestra that are defective (at the risk of our own personal popularity) to make it necessary for us to point them out again. The Directors know well enough where their weakness lies; and it is the province of Signor Costa, in whom they have vested so much discretionary power, to see it mended—otherwise his office might just as well be filled by any one else; for beat he never so intelligibly, mark he never so well the accent, he cannot make a silk purse out of a sow's ear, he cannot make an inefficient orchestra discourse in perfect measure. We should be among the first to cry out for Signor Costa did he achieve such reforms as these; but if his excellence be confined to the peculiarity of his gyrations with the baton, or stick, we profess to hold it in very small account.

Mendelssohn's song is not one of his most happy inspirations. Its general effect is decidedly heavy, and the monotonous adherence to one key (G minor and major) tires the ear in a composition of such length. Still there are beauties in it that could belong to none but Mendelssohn among living composers; and these are especially to be noted in the orchestration. The words are selected from Ossian, and Mendelssohn may be congratulated on having escaped the infection of rhodomontade which was to be dreaded from the contact of his music with such turgid verbosity. Mr. Phillips, for whom the song was expressly composed, and to whom Mendelssohn presented the manuscript as a mark of professional esteem, interpreted it to admiration. Nothing could surpass the distinctness of his articulation, except the purity with which he vocalized every passage. That the song was not immediately appreciated by the audience must be laid to its depth, which could not be sounded at once without letting out more line than belongs to ordinary mixed audiences—and not to the efforts of Mr. Phillips, which were never more successfully exerted.

Haydn's sinfonia, "La Reine de France," in B flat, is one of his earliest and least musically interesting works. This pleased, however, a certain portion of the audience, to whom it brought associations of other and perhaps happier times—before "the splendor had gone from the grass," and a tree became nothing but a tree—and these naturally made comparisons in its favour by no means complimentary to modern music, like the old woman in the French comedy, who, looking at herself in a newly-fashioned mirror, ejaculated—"On faisait beaucoup mieux les miroirs en mon temps qu'à present." But the real Haydnite looks to the master's greater works for the imperishability of his fame, and the Philharmonic directors showed little "gratitude to Haydn," in choosing a symphony from his repertoire that could not stand the shadow of a chance of distinction by the side of the earliest of Beethoven. The Romance recalled those pleasant times when Niccolai's Sonata, Pleyel's Concertante, the Battle of Prague, and Griffin's Concerto, were the ne plus ultra of musical performance and composition. The Directors must have felt a wish to revive the simplicity of pastoral times, when they treated their subscribers with such Bucolic repast. The symphony was well executed; how could it have been otherwise? It is so very easy! But even here the Italian conductor made a mistake in the vivace movement, which jogged along for all the world like an andantino.

Meyerbeer's Romance is not suited to Madame Caradori Allan, and Madame Caradori Allan's fioriture were not suited to Meyerbeer, from which it may naturally be concluded that no very lively sensation was produced by this item of the vocal programme.

Little Kate Loder made a thorough hit. In selecting Weber's Concerto in E flat, she consulted brilliancy rather than beauty; but as her object in her debut was naturally rather to exhibit her powers of execution to advantage than to make display of her musical taste, she was perhaps not to be blamed for her decision. There is hardly a more difficult concerto among the compositions of modern masters than this; and moreover, which is another defence for Kate Loder, it is more rarely heard than the majority of Weber's pianoforte works. By slow and sure steps this clever young artist has been climbing up the ladder of excellence. Both in composition and in performance she has already distinguished herself greatly. She is full of energy and talent, and has every chance of becoming one of the ornaments of her profession. It was surprising to mark the decision and freshness with which, before so large and critical an auditory, and in the midst of a vast orchestra, she dashed off the bravura passages abounding in the concerto; and it was refreshing to listen to the quiet and unaffected sentiment that characterised her reading of the cantabile phrases. Altogether her performance was unexceptionable, and the unanimous applause she received was nothing less than her due. Miss Kate Loder was a pupil of the Royal Academy, where she studied under the experienced surveillance of Mrs. Anderson. She is now a professor of harmony and the piano in the same institution, to which, and to her instructress, she does the highest credit. We believe that Mr. Macfarren and Mr. Potter can claim the honour of having taught her the principles of composition.

Of Marschner's song we would rather say nothing. We have seldom listened to a more empty display of that unmeaning bombast which too many of the modern Germans, who parody Weber, mistake for fine writing. We only felt a regret that Mr. Phillips' vocal talent should have been thrown away upon it.

We pronounced our opinion of Mendelssohn's violin concerto last year, when it was played by Sivori at the eighth Philharmonic Concert; and a second hearing has confirmed us in the belief that it is one of the most perfect and beautiful compositions of that great master. It is full of genius. The three movements are finely contrasted—the allegro in E minor, gloomy and passionate—the andante, in C major, tender and expressive—the finale, in E major (preceded by an intermezzo of a few bars in the minor, as in the C minor sonata of Dussek, Op. 35, from the three dedicated to Clementi) sparkling and vivacious. It abounds in melody throughout, as new as it is exquisite, and this is set off and enriched by harmonic and orchestral treatment in which consummate learning and prodigal fancy go hand in hand. M. Sain-ton's reading of this concerto differed in many respects from that of the accomplished Sivori. It was less elegant, but more bold—less finished, but more energetic. The last movement M. Sain-ton took considerably faster than his predecessor. But as we were charmed by the passionate reading of the Italian, so we were struck by the impetuous manliness of the Frenchman. Certainly M. Sain-ton is a careful violinist, and a thorough artist in every respect. He has played three times at the Philharmonic, and on each occasion has selected a great classical work (two concertos of Spohr, and one by Mendelssohn), and it would be well if other violinists were to follow his example. M. Sain-ton never played more finely than on this occasion. He seemed to feel instinctively that a comparison would be made between himself and Sivori, whose execution of the concerto last year could not but have deeply impressed itself upon the memory of the Philharmonic subscribers. They will not less remember, we are assured, the performance of M. Sain-ton, which was marked by as many excellencies, though of another kind. But the best compliment to the violinist was offered in the unanimous applause that greeted his performance from beginning to end, showing clearly the opinion of the audience, that Sain-ton had a perfect right to tread where Sivori had trodden before.

The scena of Crescentini is such rubbish that even Madame Caradori Allan could not make it acceptable to a Philharmonic audience. If these old Italian masters are perforce to be disturbed from their long sleep, surely the disturbers might rake up something more honourable to their reputation.

As a mere matter of execution, nothing, on the whole, could have been more excellent than the symphony of Beethoven, which was received with the honors and "ovations" due to its great merits. But we entirely concur with some of our contemporaries, who complain that the allegro and the andante were both taken too slow by Signor Costa. The scherzo and finale were capitally played, and left nothing to desire but a little more decision in the horns. We were glad to remark; however, that, in this instance, Signor Costa dispensed with the absurd custom that has so long prevailed of doubling the parts for those instruments. Nothing can possibly warrant such a liberty.

Our impressions of this concert, as a whole, may be gathered from the remarks that commence this article. Both as a selection and as a performance we must pronounce it unsatisfactory; and herein we do but echo the opinion already advanced, on the morning following the concert, by some of the most important and influential of our daily contemporaries. We deeply regret—while acknowledging the Philharmonic Society to be the only refuge in this country for those examples of the highest art which have been developed in the instrumental works of the great masters—we deeply regret, we repeat, to be obliged to record so indifferent a beginning to the thirty-fifth season. Let us hope that the next seven concerts will make amends. We shall be too glad to find cause for praise instead of censure; but we owe it to our readers, on this as on all occasions, to speak the unsophisticated truth.

JENNY LIND.

Since our last, a correspondence has appeared in the morning papers, consisting of a series of letters which we have read over several times without being able to come to any conclusion as to what they mean. As some of our readers are barristers, and divers of them no doubt briefless, we are induced to print the said correspondence, inviting their professional opinion, which we shall be happy to print for the edification of our readers and the advantage of ourselves. The first letter is from Mr. Jennings, of Chancery Lane, to Mr. Bunn, of Drury Lane. It thus discourseth:—

"Sir,—I am instructed by Mademoiselle Jenny Lind to hand you the enclosed copy of a letter from that lady at Vienna, the original of which remains in my hands for your inspection. Mademoiselle Lind has voluntarily made this proposal, without assistance or advice from English lawyers, to purchase peace and escape litigation in a foreign land; and I am authorised immediately to carry it out. The proposal is final, and if you accept it, I will attend any appointment you make, and close the affair; and, on the other hand, if you object to it, or do not accept it on or before Tuesday next, I am instructed to appear and defend any suit you may think proper to institute against Mademoiselle Lind, and request you to direct your solicitor to send any process against that lady to me for appearance and defence. I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

EDWARD JENNINGS.

"A. Bunn, Esq., Theatre Royal, Drury Lane."

Mr. Jennings would seem to belong to a new Post Office Company, established for the safe non-delivery of letters. He transmits to Mr. Bunn a copy of a letter addressed to Mr. Bunn, and tells Mr. Bunn that if he, Mr. Bunn, will call upon him, Mr. Jennings, he, Mr. Bunn may see the original. Suppose the Post Office authorities were to try the same experiment with Her Majesty's subjects, what capital fun it would be to see the whole population of London rushing to the stately edifice in Aldersgate for a sight of the "originals" of letters, of which "copies" had been already handed them by the men of bags and double-knocks. It has been the opinion of counsel that a man's own letter, like a man's own carpet bag, belongs to a man's own self; but the proceeding of Mr. Edward Jennings, Chancery Lane, 9, has upset the notions on this head which have hitherto obtained. We live and learn! But our readers must be anxious for the contents of the letter of Jenny Lind to Mr. Bunn, mentioned in that of Mr. Jennings.

"Vienna, Fevrier 28, 1847.

"Monsieur,—J'ai eu l'honneur de recevoir votre lettre du Dec. 19eme, 1846, dans laquelle vous prétendez avoir à me demander des dommages intérêts pour ma non-venue en 1845. Vous connaissez parfaitement les raisons qui m'ont empêché, qui ont rendu impossible mon apparition sur votre théâtre. D'ailleurs mon arrivée n'aurait servi à rien, puisque vous n'aviez ni la traduction de l'opéra le Feldlager en Anglais, ni la musique que je devais chanter. Il est plus que probable que l'affaire devant la loi ne vous rapporterait rien; mais je ne veux pas que vous puissiez me taxer de mauvaise foi, quelque peu que je méritasse ce reproche, et je vous offre en remettant le papier signé par moi, à la personne que je nommerai à cet effet, la somme de £3,000 (deux mille livres sterling). Comme je dois venir à Londres en tout cas, je préférerais y venir avec la conscience d'avoir fait tout ce qui dépendait de moi, et je laisse à votre jugement, si vous préfererez cet arrangement à l'aimable à un procès qui vous ne rapportera peut être rien du tout. J'ai chargé M. Edward Jennings, 9, Chancery-lane, de mes instructions ultérieures.

JENNY LIND.

"à M. Bunn, Directeur du Théâtre de Drury-lane, Londres."

To which we heartily respond, Amen! We strongly recommend Mr. Bunn to accede to this "arrangement à l'aimable," hinted at by the delicious nightingale of nightingales. No attempt has been made (which might have been anticipated) by "him of the Chronicle," to throw a doubt upon the authenticity of this letter, the French being of that peculiar character that none but a Swede could possibly have written. We only complain that Mr. Bunn should be compelled to walk all the way to Chancery Lane for the purpose of "taking a sight" of a letter upon which his own name was endorsed, and which consequently, "according to the statutes," would appear (on the surface) to be his own goods and chattels. But Mr. Jennings, Chancery Lane, 9, is evidently of another opinion. For the use of our readers, who do not comprehend la langue Française sautée à la Suédoise, we present a translation into plain vernacular, which is not our own:—

[Translation.]

"Vienna, Feb. 28, 1847.

"Sir,—I had the honour of receiving your letter of the 19th of December, 1846, in which you pretend to have to claim from me damages for my non-arrival in 1845. You are perfectly conversant with my reasons for not coming, and which rendered impossible my appearance at your theatre. Besides, my arrival would have been fruitless, since you had not at the time the opera of the Feldlager translated into English nor the music which I was engaged to sing. It is more than probable that this affair, brought before a court of justice, would yield you nothing; but I am determined you shall not tax me again with bad faith, however little I merit such a reproach, and I offer to pay you the sum of £2,000 (two thousand pounds) on your returning the paper signed by me to the person I shall appoint for the purpose. As I shall in any event come to London, I should prefer coming with the consciousness of having done all that depended upon me, and I leave it to your choice and judgment whether you will prefer this arrangement to a lawsuit, from which you would probably derive nothing. I have given to Mr. Edward Jennings, of 9, Chancery-lane, all necessary and further instructions on the present subject.

JENNY LIND.

"To Alfred Bunn, Esq., Director of the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, London."

One more letter and we have done. It is from Mr. Bunn to the morning papers, apropos of the above, and has been published in all of them, with the exception of the Morning Post.—

"Sir,—I request your permission to insert my reply to the letter which appeared in the Times of yesterday, signed 'Edwd. Jennings'

"11, Finsbury-square, March 15, 1847.

"Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated the 13th instant, and have only to observe, that on receiving the original letter from Madlle. Lind (addressed to me), which you state to be in your hands, and of which you have enclosed me a copy, I will instantly reply to it. I am, sir, your obedient servant,

"E. Jennings, Esq., &c. &c."

"A. Bunn.

"Mr. Jennings waited upon me, and showed me a letter not written by, but signed 'Jenny Lind,' which he refused to leave with me, although addressed to me. To that letter I have sent an answer, giving a negative to the professional points therein sought to be maintained; but making a proposition which, if Madlle. Lind has that sense of 'disinterestedness and good faith' claimed for her, she will not hesitate to accept. As to the non-existence of any legal claim, from opinions alleged to have been delivered by the law-officers of the Crown, I beg to say, I have acted upon the judgment of the first lawyers in England and Prussia, and feel assured that no such offer as £2000 would be made, if their opinion on the contract signed at Berlin, in the presence of the British Minister, were questionable. I have the honour to be, sir, your much obliged servant.

"A. Bunn.

"London, March 17, 1847."

We do not presume to know Mr. Bunn's business better than he knows it himself; but, as his warm well-wishers, we urge him to accept the £2000, and he will entitle himself to the gratitude of the fair songstress, whom all the world here is so anxious to behold, and who has behaved so nobly, and so unaffectedly in the matter.

LOLA MONTEZ.

POOR little, stupid, pretty, pouting, chattering, good-tempered, warmhearted, reckless, extravagant, naughty Lola! Who would have dreamed, two years gone by, when we saw thee at Bonn, the cynosure of a crowd of idlers, talking so charmingly at random, laughing so merrily at everything and nothing, eating, and drinking, and smoking (dried herring, tea, and cigarettes), doing everything, in short, except listen to Beethoven's music—albeit it was Beethoven's festival, and thou hadst come from afar, with some lately acquired thousands of lires (not sterling) in thy pouch—who would have dreamed, that within the short space of four and twenty months, thou shouldst have arrived at the distinction of upsetting a whole government, of dispersing a powerful party, of captivating the whole heart of a king of a large and prosperous kingdom—the third estate in Germany!—who would have dreamed it? Not we, certes—nor Jules de Glimmes, who introduced us to thee, capricious Lola! and took us "to tea" at thy lodgings—nor Jules Janin, who was angry because thou didst "tu-toi" him—nor Fiorentino, who was thy shadow—nor Schott, who philosophised upon thy follies!—not one of us, Lola, would have dreamed of it. But here are facts. Behold thee the subject of political discussion! Behold thee, the theme of three "leaders" in the Times!! Behold thee, the mistress of the King who loves the arts!!! Behold thee, the enemy and the vanquisher of the dark and subtle Jesuits!!! Professors of Jesuitism are dismissed for thee—Jesuitical ministers resign for thee—the King's heart is open to thee! And why, forsooth, shouldst thou not, little Lola, be made a citizen of Munich? Is there in Munich such an atmosphere of rigidity (purity—so termed) that thy breath, silly wanton, should infect it as with an epidemic? No, no, it is not so. Thou art the blind instrument of Fate, who hath chosen thee as his minister, to free Bavaria and its King from a detestable tyranny and a grasping faction. Unwittingly thou hast achieved thy mission, and Fate has recompensed thee with the gratitude of the King, who will shower honours upon thee, and set thee up in high places to be adored by his subjects. And better, much better for the King, to be enslaved by thy attractions, than by the secret influence of those fanatic moles, who live in dark places and undermine empires.

Such was the current of our reflections on reading the articles in the Times, on the now engrossing theme of Bavarian politics, and more especially in perusing Lola's own letter, which proves, beyond further question, the correctness of the views set forth in the leaders of "the Thunderer." We translate it into our own pages with pleasure, where it will remain, to be re-read hereafter, as a sign of the times in which we now live.

"To the Editor of the Times."

"Sir,—Having had a copy of your paper of the 2d inst. sent to me, I trust you will, in justice to myself, insert the following short account of the real state of affairs here, and which at the same time will be a contradiction to the numerous articles which have lately appeared in the French papers:—I left Paris in June last on a professional trip, and, amongst other arrangements, decided upon visiting Munich, where, for the first time I had the honour of appearing before His Majesty, and receiving from him marks of approbation, which you are aware is not a very unusual thing for a professional person to receive at a foreign Court. I had not been here a week before I discovered that there was a plot existing in the town to get me out of it, and that the party was the Jesuit party. Of course you are aware that Bavaria has long been their stronghold, and Munich their head-quarters. This naturally to a person brought up and instructed from her earliest youth to detest this party (I think you will say justly), irritated me not a little. When they saw that I was not likely to leave them, they commenced on another tack, and tried what bribery would do, and actually offered me 50,000*fr.* yearly if I would quit Bavaria and promise never to return. This, as you may imagine, opened my eyes; and, as I indignantly refused their offer, they have since then not left a stone unturned to get rid of me, and have never for an instant ceased persecuting me. I may mention as one instance, that within this last week a Jesuit professor of philosophy in the University here, of the name of Lassault, was removed from his professorship, upon which the party paid and hired a mob to insult me and break the windows of my house, and also to attack the Palace; but, thanks to the better feeling of the other party, and the devotedness of the soldiers to His Majesty and his authority, this plot likewise failed. The late change in the Ministry that you allude to was a spontaneous act of His Majesty's, and you pay me too great a compliment in supposing that I was a party to such a measure; but from what I have seen and heard of His Majesty, I should think he had very just grounds for taking the step which he did. Since my residence here I can safely say that I have in no way interfered in any affairs not concerning myself, and as I intend making it my future abode, it is particularly annoying to me, hearing so many scandalous and unfounded reports which are daily propagated; and in justice to myself and my future prospects in life, I trust that you will not hesitate to insert this letter in your widely-circulated journal, and show my friends and the public how unjustly and cruelly I have been treated by the Jesuit party in Munich. Knowing that your columns are always open to protect any one unjustly accused, and more especially when that one is an unprotected female, makes me rely upon you for the insertion of this, and I have the honour to subscribe myself,

Your obliged servant,

Munich, March 11, 1847.

LOLA MONTEZ."

Lola, you are a casuist! You are one too much for the Jesuits! You have not read the works of St. Thomas Aquinas, but you have read the human heart, and can give them six any day in the week, with the fathers and schoolmen to boot:—"Truth is strange, stranger than fiction,"—you have proved it.

MUSIC AT CAMBRIDGE.

(From a Correspondent.)

A Concert was given on Tuesday evening, March 9, in the Town-hall, which drew together a very fashionable assembly. The entertainment commenced with a quatuor, from Costa's Malek Adel, which was sung excellently by the Misses Williams and Dolby, and the Messrs. Wrighton and H. Von Hoff. The last named gentleman next gave a song from Maritana, which was applauded, though by no means excellently sung. The Misses Williams were heard to great advantage, in a duet of Rossini's. Mr. C. Sippel, played a solo on the cornet, which was encored. Miss Dolby was encored in the grand aria, "Ah! Quel quivro," from Semiramide. A pianoforte solo, the composition of Döhler was admirably executed by Mr. Wilkinson. The Misses Williams and Mr. Wrighton, were next called on to repeat Curschman's pretty trio, "Te prego." Clinton's duet, for clarinet and flute, performed by the Messrs. F. and C. Sippel, was encored, as were likewise Linley's two ballads, "Constance," and "Primroses deck the bank," most deliciously sung by Miss Dolby. Miss A. Williams also received a similar compliment in a song of Auber's; and the concert concluded with Hatton's duet, "Two merry gay laughing faries," given by the Misses Williams. The entertainment gave the greatest satisfaction. Mr. Wilkinson, accompanied all the vocal morceaux, and acquitted himself like a musician.

THE AFFINITIES.

from the German of Göthe.

Continued from page 171.

PART II.—CHAPTER VI.

THE great disquiet occasioned to Charlotte by this visit was compensated by the fact, that she learned fully to understand her daughter, in which she derived great assistance from her knowledge of the world. It was not the first time that she had met a singular character of the kind, though she had never seen one carried to such excess. And yet she had been taught by experience that such persons when formed by life, by a variety of events, and by domestic relations, can attain a very pleasant and amiable maturity, since their self-will becomes softened, and their wandering activity takes a decided direction. Hence Charlotte, as a mother, was more disposed to put up with a phenomenon which to others might have been displeasing, as it well becomes parents to hope, while strangers only wish to enjoy, or at least do not want to be encumbered.

However, after the departure of her daughter, Charlotte was struck in a very peculiar and unexpected manner at finding that Luciana had left behind her a bad name, not only through the blameable part of her conduct, but also through that which might have been considered laudable. Luciana seemed to have made it her law not only to be joyous with those who rejoiced, but also to be mournful with those who mourned; nay, that she might put in full practice the spirit of contradiction, often to make the joyous cross, and the mournful hilarious. In every family into which she came she enquired for the sick and weakly who could not come into society. She visited them in their rooms, performed the part of a physician, and urged every one to take some strong remedy from the medicine-chest, which she always took with her in her carriage. The cures, as may be imagined, succeeded or failed, just as chance directed.

In this sort of kindness she was really cruel, and would listen to no objections, because she was perfectly convinced that her conduct was excellent. But she also failed in an experiment made on the moral side, and this it was that gave Charlotte a great deal of trouble, for it was not without its consequences, and was a topic of general remark. It was not till after Luciana's departure that she heard of it; and Ottilia, as she had been present during the affair, was obliged to give her a circumstantial account.

One of the daughters of a distinguished family had been unfortunate enough to cause the death of a younger sister, and could not banish her uneasiness on this account. She quietly employed herself in her own chamber, and could only endure the sight of her friends, when they came one at a time; for she suspected that if several came together, they might reflect among themselves upon her and her situation. To each one singly she expressed herself rationally, and would converse with them for the hour together.

Luciana had heard of this, and had at once silently resolved that if she entered the house she would, as it were, work a miracle, and restore the lady to society. She conducted herself with more than ordinary prudence, and managed to introduce herself alone into the invalid's presence, and, as far as could be observed, to gain her confidence through the aid of music. At last, however, she made a mistake; for wishing to produce an excitement, she one evening took into a gay, miscellaneous society the pale beautiful girl, whom she thought sufficiently prepared. Perhaps she would have succeeded, had not the company, from curiosity and apprehension, behaved in a very unsuitable manner, first crowding round the invalid, then shunning her, and then perplexing and exciting her by all sorts of whispering and shaking of the head. This the delicately sensitive girl could not endure. She left the room with frightful screams, which seemed to express horror at some approaching monster. The company, terrified, dispersed in all directions, and Ottilia was one of those who took the girl, now quite insensible, to her chamber.

In the meanwhile, Luciana had, in her own fashion, addressed a severe rebuke to the company, without in the least degree thinking that she alone was to blame, or allowing herself to be checked by this and other failures from her usual course of activity.

From that time the situation of the invalid had become more critical, and eventually the malady so much increased, that the parents were not able to keep the poor child at home, but were forced to send her to a public asylum. Charlotte could do nothing more than show a kind regard for the family, and thus in some degree alleviate the pain her daughter had occasioned. The affair had made a deep impression upon Ottilia, and she pitied the poor girl so much the more, because, as she did not deny even to Charlotte, she thought that with a consistent method of treatment, the invalid would certainly have recovered.

As people generally talk about disagreeable rather than agreeable subjects, there came also under discussion a little misunderstanding which had arisen between Ottilia and the architect, when on the evening before-described, he would not show his collection, in spite of her kind entreaties. This refusal—she did not know why—had always remained in her thoughts. Her feelings were quite correct; for anything that is requested by a girl like Ottilia should not be refused by a young man like the architect. However, he answered her soft reproaches with some tolerably valid excuses.

"If you knew," said he, "how roughly even persons of education treat the most valuable works of art you would pardon me for not liking to bring my own among a great number of persons. No one can manage to take up a medal by its edge, but people touch the finest impression, and the purest ground, and pass from one to another the most valuable pieces between their finger and thumb, as if this was the way of testing works of art. Without thinking that a broad sheet of paper ought to be taken up with two hands, they snatch with one hand only at an invaluable copperplate, or a drawing not to be replaced, just as a presuming politician catches up a newspaper, and by the crackling of the paper already pronounces his opinion upon the events of the world. No one thinks that if twenty persons in succession proceeded in this manner with a work of art, the one-and-twentieth would have very little left to look at."

Have not I often given you this kind of uneasiness?" asked Ottilia; "have not I sometimes unsuspectingly injured your treasures?"

"Never," replied the architect, "never! With you it would be impossible, for with you propriety is innate."

"At all events," remarked Ottilia, "it would be no bad plan if in the book of good manners, after the chapters which describe how we should eat and drink in company, a circumstantial one were added as to how one should behave in museums and among collections of art."

"In such a case, no doubt," returned the architect, "the amateurs and guardians of museums would more readily exhibit their curiosities."

Ottilia had already long forgiven him; but when he seemed to take her reproaches very much to heart, and affirmed over and over again that he would exhibit whatever he possessed, and readily exert his activity to oblige his friends, she felt that she had hurt his feelings, and was in some measure his debtor. Therefore, she could not bluntly refuse the request which he made to her in the course of this conversation, although, on consulting her feelings, which she did at once, she did not see how she could grant his wishes.

The affair stood thus. The architect had been much hurt at perceiving that Ottilia was excluded by Luciana's jealousy from the representations of pictures; he also deeply regretted that Charlotte, on account of ill health, had only been able to attend at intervals this brilliant part of the social entertainments. He was now unwilling to depart without showing his gratitude by an exhibition for the amusement of the one, and in honour of the other, far more beautiful than any which had preceded. Perhaps, without his knowing it, another and a secret impulse had acted upon him. It was to him so very difficult to leave this family, nay, it appeared to him impossible to part from Ottilia's eyes, upon the calm, kindly glances of which he had lived almost entirely during the last period.

The Christmas holidays were approaching, and it at once struck him that the representation of pictures by figures in relief is properly derived from what is called the "presepe," that is to say, form that pious exhibition which at this holy time took place in honour of the divine mother and child, when, in their apparent poverty, they were adored first by shepherds, and soon afterwards by kings.

He had completely conceived the possibility of such a picture. A fine fresh-looking boy was found, there could be no lack of shepherds and shepherdesses, but without Ottilia the thing could not be accomplished. The young man had in his mind exalted Ottilia into the "Mother of God," and if she refused this position he plainly saw that the whole project must fail. Ottilia, somewhat perplexed, referred him with his request to Charlotte. She readily accorded her permission, and even kindly overcame the scruples of Ottilia in assuming so lovely a form. The architect laboured night and day, that nothing might be wanting on Christmas-eve.

Yes—literally night and day. His necessities were few, and the presence of Ottilia seemed to serve him in place of all nourishment. While he worked for her sake it seemed as though he needed no sleep; while busied on her account it seemed that he required no food. Hence all was finished and ready in time for the solemn evening. He had succeeded in procuring some euphonous wind-instruments, which played an introduction, and served to attune the mind for what was coming. When the curtain rose, Charlotte was really astounded. The picture represented before her had been so often repeated in the world, that a new impression from it was hardly to be expected. But here the reality in the shape of the picture had its especial advantages. The whole space had rather the appearance of night than of twilight, and yet none of the details were indistinct. The exquisite thought that all the light should proceed from the child, the artist had managed to realise by a judicious mechanical contrivance in the lighting, concealed by the figures in the foreground, which were in the shade, and only illumined by oblique rays. Joyous girls and boys stood around, whose fresh countenances were sharply lit up from below. Nor was there any lack of angels, whose peculiar radiance seemed to be obscured by that of Divinity, and whose ethereal bodies seemed to grow dense and obscure compared to that of the God-man.

Fortunately the child had fallen asleep in the most graceful attitude, so that there was nothing to disturb the contemplation, if the eye fell upon the supposed mother, who with infinite grace had raised a veil to exhibit the hidden treasure. At this moment the picture seemed to be fixed. Physically dazzled, mentally surprised, the inferior personages of the tableau seemed to have moved, and to have turned away their astonished eyes for the sake of turning them back again with delighted curiosity, showing more wonder and pleasure than admiration and reverence, although even these qualities were not forgotten, and the expression of them had been entrusted to some of the more aged figures.

Ottilia's form, attitude, mien, look, exceeded all that had ever been represented by a painter. A connoisseur of fine feeling, on witnessing this phenomenon, would have dreaded lest anything should move—would have felt afraid that nothing would ever again please him so much. Unfortunately no one was there capable of comprehending the entire effect. The architect alone, who, as a tall slim shepherd, looked from the side over the kneeling figures, had the greatest enjoyment, though he did not stand at the best point of view. And who shall describe the air of the newly-made Queen of Heaven? The purest humility, the most amiable feeling of modesty, in spite of a great honour received but unmerited, was represented in her features, which expressed both her own feelings, and also the notion she formed of the character she represented.

Charlotte was delighted at the beautiful picture, but the greatest effect upon her was produced by the child. Tears streamed from her eyes, and she pictured to herself in the liveliest manner, that she hoped soon to have a similar beloved creature upon her bosom.

The curtain had been let down partly to afford some rest to the performers, and partly to introduce a change in the scene. The artist had designed to change the first picture of night and lowliness into one of day and glory, and on this account had got ready an immense array of lights, which were to be kindled during the interval.

While placed in this half-theatrical position, it had been the greatest comfort to Ottilia that no one had witnessed this pious performance excepting Charlotte and a few residents in the house. She was, therefore, somewhat astonished when she learned in the interval that a stranger had come, who had been kindly greeted by Charlotte. Who he was they could not tell her. She, therefore, resigned herself to the circumstance, that she might not occasion any interruption. Candles and lamps were burning, and she was surrounded by an infinite brilliancy. The curtain arose, and a surprising sight was revealed to the spectators. The picture was all light, and in the place of the shade, which had been entirely removed, the colours only were left, which being judiciously selected, produced a beautiful softening effect. Looking through her long eye-lashes, Ottilia observed a male figure sitting by Charlotte. She did not recognise him, but fancied that she heard the voice of the teacher from the school. A strange feeling came over her. How much had happened since she had heard the voice of this faithful preceptor! Like forked lightning the series of her joys and sorrows darted before her soul, and excited the question, "Dare you confess everything to him? How little worthy are you to appear before him in this holy form, and how strange must it appear to him to see in a mask you whom he has hitherto seen naturally!" With incomparable rapidity, feeling and reflection opposed themselves to each other within her. Her heart was oppressed, her eyes filled with tears, as she forced herself to continue the appearance of an immovable picture, and she was highly pleased when the boy began to stir, and the artist felt obliged to give the signal for letting down the curtain.

If the painful feeling at not being able to hasten towards an estimable friend had already, during the last moments, associated itself to the other emotions of Ottilia, she was now even in still greater perplexity. Should she approach in these strange vestments and ornaments? Should she change her dress? She did not deliberate in the choice, but changed her attire at once, endeavouring to calm and collect herself in the meanwhile. She had not quite recovered her self-possession, until at last, in her ordinary dress, she greeted the new visitor.

(To be continued.)

* To prevent misunderstanding, it may be stated that the copyright of this translation belongs solely to the translator.

THE TENOR OF THE CURSE.

(From Punch.)

THE celebrated Fraschini, the Tenore della maledizione, has appeared at Her Majesty's Theatre. His imprecation in Lucia di Lammermoor certainly justified all that we had heard said of it. We fully expected that our blood would run cold, and we went prepared with a thermometer, which, upon application to our pulse, indicated, during the tremendous maledizione, thirty-five of Fahrenheit. The audience would have kept Fraschini cursing all night, had it not been unreasonable to demand more than a pair of maledictions in one evening. Fortunately, our veins resumed their wonted fluency at the Fra Poco, which warmed us up after our recent chill; or we might have found our circulation completely stopped, and that, we need scarcely say, would have been the death of us. We looked in vain for the singing from the eyes, with which a contemporary has given us to understand Fraschini would favour us. He certainly acted with his eyes, and lashed himself up into enthusiasm, while the audience applauded "like winking." Fraschini has one of those voices, di petto, which are great pets with us; instead of that voce di testa which is in some cases detestable. Though we have made some cursory remarks on his curse, we do not mean to say that malediction only is his forte, for he can also take his place as a tenore di tenerezza among the very first of that quality.

SONNET.

NO. XXVI.

Avoid thee, love! so little canst thou know,
How my whole heart to thee is dedicate,
How thou to me art a restless fate,
And canst alone distribute joy or woe!
Avoid thee, love! nay, nay, thou think'st not so;
Thou know'st on thee I ever meditate,
Thou know'st that tow'rd's thee all my fancies straight,
As they were rushing homeward, ever flow.
Avoid thee! I, whom thy sweet smiles have bless'd,
Who live upon the glances of thine eye,
Who writhe with pain to see one swelling tear,
Who thy dear hand with rapture wild have press'd,
Who from thy lip have snatch'd ecstasie joy,
Thou think'st that I avoid thee—dost thou, dear?

N. D.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARIS.—Mr. Wilson, who has long been distinguished among his vocal brethren of the other side of the channel, for the admirable manner in which he gives expression to Scottish song, whether serious, pathetic, or comic, has commenced in Paris a series of musical soirées, intended to illustrate the beauties and peculiarities of the musical compositions of his native country. The first of these entertainments was given on Monday evening, in Sax's Rooms, Rue Neuve, St. George's, when the vocalist fully supported the high reputation he has long enjoyed in Great Britain. Mr. Wilson is an accomplished musician, possessing a tenor voice of the finest quality and great range; his style, which is the simplest and least ornate perhaps of any public singer of the day, is evidently fashioned on the simple ballads of Scotland, and confers on those beautiful gems of song a pathos and sweetness which would in vain be sought in the more elaborate kinds of vocalisation now generally indulged in. But what more particularly distinguishes Mr. Wilson from his brothers in Apollo is, that he is equally at home in the serious and the comic, the sad and the gay, the grand and the ridiculous; so that on Monday evening, after melting his audience to tears by the touchingly pathetic "Land o' the leal," and "The flowers o' the forest," he exhibited such a fund of native humour in his "Hame cam our gudeman at e'en," and "Get up and bar the door," as absolutely to keep his brethren of the North, of whom we noticed a tolerable sprinkling present, in a roar from beginning to end. It was something new in this classic land of song to witness an individual do the honours of an entire soirée unaided and alone; and what was not the least novelty on the occasion, was his prefacing the various specimens of his "native wood-notes wild" by a variety of anecdotes and explanatory observations, which largely aided in rendering the antique specimens of Scottish song intelligible to modern English ears. The impression created by Mr. Wilson's début before a mixed Parisian and British audience was highly flattering for that gentleman; and it is scarcely to be doubted that he will gain in public estimation, the more generally his taste and talent as a vocalist become known. Mr. Wilson, we perceive, will give his second soirée on Friday evening, the programme of which shows an equally varied and attractive bill of fare as its predecessor of Monday last.—Galignani's Messenger.

The last week of the Italiani has given us back an ancient favourite, Il Matrimonio Segreto, which exhibits Lablache in what we have always considered his greatest comic character, the deaf old uncle, Geronimo. Never did the fine old Neapolitan display more of that vivacity and spontaneous humour, which seems the peculiar gift of his countrymen, than on this occasion. The opera was well performed and sung throughout. The ladies were respectively enacted by Mmes. Persiani and the two Brambilla's; but the parts contain little room for the display of the talents of the singers. Mario was the Paolini, and was encored in his single air Pria che Spunta, which he gave with wonderful taste and beauty of tone. Tagliafico played the Count, and sang the music more than respectably, especially in the well-known comic duet between him and Lablache. We ought to mention that it was the benefit of the latter, and that a garland, colossal as himself, was hurled from one of the loges, and fell at his feet amid the laughter and applause of the public.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—M. Vieuxtemps, the great violinist, has been lately giving concerts in the imperial city, and performing at private hotels with immense éclat. On the 18th of last month he gave a concert in the imperial theatre, which realised him 6,000 francs, clear of all expenses. Mons. Vieuxtemps is about leaving Petersburg for Paris, and will arrive in London about the middle of April, to fulfil numerous and important engagements.

REVIEWS ON MUSIC.

"Il piacer dello Studio," characteristic Studies for the Flute. By ANTONIO MINASI. PROWSE.

Mr. Minasi is a good flute player, consequently any work from his pen will be welcome to professors of that instrument. The work before us commences with instructions on the acquirement of tone; the rules laid down as indispensable for that purpose are plain and concise, and contain such information on the subject as is requisite to the student; these instructions are followed by twenty-four characteristic studies of a very useful kind, one or two of which will tax the executive skill of the best flute players. The system Mr. Minasi has adopted of fingering the most difficult passages merits approbation, and will be found of service to the student. The studies are followed by an appendix, containing tables of the major, minor, and chromatic scales, and arpeggios (fingered where required), and scales of augmented notes and quarter tones; the latter we do not remember to have seen (formed into scales) in any work on the flute. Mr. Minasi's experience as a professor of the flute is a guarantee that "Il piacer dello Studio" will repay flute players for an attentive perusal; and we have no doubt the studies will prove a very useful adjunct to their daily practice. Mr. Minasi's work is intended for students of the Nicholson flute, and is printed in one volume, as well as in four separate books. The publisher has spared no expense in the getting up, and we cordially recommend it to the notice of the profession.

"Haydn's Oratorio, THE CREATION," in vocal score, with a separate accompaniment for the organ or pianoforte, Nos. 4 & 5. Arranged by VINCENT NOVELLO.

"Handel's Sacred Oratorio, THE MESSIAH," in vocal score, with a separate accompaniment for organ or pianoforte, Nos. 7 & 8. Arranged by VINCENT NOVELLO. S. ALFRED NOVELLO.

We have noticed in a former number of the Musical World these highly meritorious publications of the works of the great masters. They are, indeed, as is stated on the cover sheet, the cheapest musical publications ever offered to the public, both in respect to quality and quantity. The Messiah will be completed in twelve monthly parts: The Creation in nine. Following these master-pieces, other works of like importance will be issued in numbers, on a similar plan. Each part is sold for the small sum of sixpence, and contains sixteen pages of music, on good paper. The size is imperial octavo, and the work is got up in an admirable manner, reflecting much credit on the proprietor, Mr. Novello. The publication must have a large sale.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

OPERA LIBRETTO.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—Every one who moves in a musical circle cannot but be struck with the great want that is felt for a publication devoting some portion of its columns to furnishing the musician and the composer with the libretto for his opera. The publisher seems to consider the subject quite unworthy of his attention, and yet the musician is every where complaining of the difficulty of procuring suitable words; while, in every other branch of literature, hundreds are striving to wind the path to popularity, it is greatly to be lamented that this alone is neglected. It was not so in the days of Sheridan, and I feel convinced were the attempt made there would be found an abundance of talent willing and ready to employ their pens in the lyrical drama. I am aware that various magazines have at times published straggling pieces of poetry for music; but unless they do so on a regular plan, little benefit can result to the musicians, and my motive in troubling you, is to call attention more directly to the subject, particularly as you have now become partly a literary magazine, allow me to offer the following suggestions:—Let a portion of your journal be devoted every week to original librettos, the author receiving (if accepted) so much per column when published; the MS. to be considered your property, with the proviso, that when it is sold to either composer, publisher of music, or theatre, the author receive a certain sum, so much per cent., but the principal profit to go to your journal. I also think a similar plan might be adopted with regard to verses—a regular list being kept at your office. It is needless for me to add how deserving I think the subject is of particular attention. As a musical critic, and one who moves among musicians, the fact that young composers are sadly in want of something of the kind must be apparent to you. How many young authors would be willing to make the attempt, if you would only say you are willing to second them; and how many young composers would strive to prove their ability if a libretto could be procured at a reasonable rate, and they had the privilege of selecting from two or three. They are both desirous of proving whether they possess talent, and yet from the fact of having no organ to proclaim their wants they both remain unoccupied. If in any way you consider these suggestions plausible, I think I can prove that they are practicable, and shall be most happy to communicate with you further on the subject. With every wish for the success of both musician and author, I remain, sir, your obedient servant, F—.

3, Bedford Street, Bedford Square.

PROVINCIAL.

WORCESTER.—M. Jullien's Concert attracted a fashionable audience, numbering nearly 900. The programme presented a melange of classical and instrumental music, commencing with the overture to William Tell, in the opening movement of which the parts allotted to five violoncellos were played by two tenors, one bassoon, and two contra-bassi, and in the Rans des vaches the clarinet was substituted for the Corno Inglese; notwithstanding these exchanges, however, the overture was as brilliantly played as it possibly could be, due allowance being made for the limited strength of the orchestra, and the glaring defects of the building for musical purposes. Miss Birch was the only vocalist. She has lately infused into her style a considerable portion of animation and expression, of which she formerly had a "plentiful lack," and as her voice in its natural gifts and its mechanical management is as near an approach to perfection as may be, the result of the addition to which we have alluded may be easily surmised. Miss Birch won a rapturous and well merited encore for her graceful and clever interpretation of a pretty and graceful serenade—"Come o'er the sea,"—by Roch-Albert, in which the rippling accompaniment of the stringed instruments was extremely effective. With regard to the solo players, we need only mention their names to prove that their performance was unsurpassable; they were Richardson, flute; Collinet, flageolet; Lazarus, clarinet; Koenig, cornet-a-pistons; Bauman, bassoon; Prospre, serpent; and Cioffi, trombone. The miscellaneous selection of Polkas, Quadrilles, and so forth, were very good in their way, but we should infinitely have preferred seeing the talents of the consummate artistes composing the band employed upon materials of a more sterling and substantial character. We hear that if the needful arrangements can be completed, M. Jullien will give a grand Morning Concert about the latter end of April. He is in treaty with the celebrated Pischek to sing at a series of concerts; and should the engagement be concluded we need scarcely say that a rich treat is in store for the lovers of accomplished vocalism.—Burrows' Worcester Journal.

LIVERPOOL.—Sir Henry Bishop, last week, closed his lectures at the Collegiate Institution, with a concert of vocal music, the selection being wholly from his own compositions, and comprising a large number of choice pieces from his voluminous repertory. The audience was full, fashionable, and most enthusiastic, and Sir Henry was highly delighted with his reception, as well as with the manner in which the songs, glees, &c., were executed, many of which were new. Each part of the entertainment commenced with an overture on the organ, ably performed by Mr. Rogers. The first was from Winter's opera of Tamerlane, the second, Bishop's, the Maniac. The principal vocalists engaged were Mrs. G. Holden, Miss Thornton, Miss Parsons, Signor Sapio, and Mr. Garstin. To enumerate all the pieces which they performed would occupy too large a portion of our space; but we may state that they were taken from Maid Marian, Henri Quatre, Midsommer Night's Dream, Comedy of Errors, Haroun Alraschid, Miller and his Men, Aladdin, Tyrolese Peasant, Guy Mannering, Two Gentlemen of Verona, Cortes, Law of Java, Englishmen in India, Slave, Twelfth Night, Don John, Noble Outlaw, Clari, Romance of the Day, and Arlaxerxes. Miss Thornton, who, as well as Mr. Garstin, appeared before a Liverpool audience for the first time in the illustrations to these lectures, having been specially brought from the metropolis, displayed much taste and skill, and is an excellent singer. Mrs. G. Holden sustained the reputation which she has acquired as one of our principal local professionals, and Mr. Sapio, acquitted himself very creditably, especially in the duos. Miss Parsons bids fair to rise to eminence. Mr. Garstin is but a very poor and inefficient singer; some parts of his voice are certainly not disagreeable, but it lacks equality. It is with the greatest difficulty that he can ascend as far as F, and utterly impossible for him to reach G without bawling and distorting his features most unpleasantly. Why this gentleman should have been brought from London to perform a duty, which many of our resident artists are much better qualified to discharge with satisfaction to the audience, we do not know, but we are assured of this that the judgement and liberality of the Directors of the Collegiate Institution, or those to whom they entrust the management of these matters, are very sharply and seriously impugned in musical circles, and that if they continue to pursue the system that has now for some time prevailed, in reference to engagements, they will ere long become unpleasantly unpopular, and may some day or other be unable to obtain the services of the professional talent of the town, when it may be absolutely necessary to the success of their arrangements. The general impression is, that rather than give the required terms to any resident vocalist or instrumentalist they seem determined to send to Manchester, or London for inferior assistance, even though they may absolutely incur a greater expense. We know not how far this surmise may be correct, but we have occasionally noted some circumstances which, in the absence of explanation, apparently justify the assumption. If the fact be as represented, we recommend the instant adoption of a more sensible, consistent, and proper line of conduct; if not, we shall be glad to be made instrumental in dispelling a delusion that, we regret to say, is every day becoming more confirmed and extended. We should have stated, in connexion with our notice of the performance at this concert, that the auditory, and especially the more critical portion of it, were much delighted with the style of Sir Henry Bishop's piano-forte accompaniments. Mr. Stott, Mr. Jackson, and Mr. Andrews also aided in giving effect to some of the glees and choruses. Sir Henry was loudly cheered at the close of the performance.—Liverpool Mail.

NOTTINGHAM.—The performance of an Oratorio in Nottingham is so rare an occurrence that we felt no surprise at the anxiety and eagerness manifested by the musical public to hear Handel's "Messiah" on Monday evening, the 8th ult. On this occasion much responsibility rested upon the conductor, Mr. Henry Farrer, who had to govern with his baton a far more numerous orchestra and chorus than ever we have known to have been in Nottingham; and it is only doing him the merest justice to say that the ease, precision, learning, feeling, and energy of a true musician were evident throughout. Every lover of sacred music has, of course, heard the "Messiah" either at Exeter Hall or at one of the three great festivals, where only it has been performed on a scale commensurate with its merits; and of course vast is the difference between the 500 trained voices and instruments and the 250 amateurs (zealous and talented though they be) who meet for the second or third time in their lives. We have made these remarks merely to call attention to the variety of disadvantages under which an oratorio must be produced in a provincial town, and for which even the addition of London artists cannot wholly atone; as well as to enhance the ability displayed by an instrumental and vocal corps of which Nottingham and the neighbouring towns ought indeed to be proud. We deeply regret that pressure upon our space precludes the possibility of giving more than an outline of the performance. The Misses Williams sustained the soprano and contralto parts, and displayed all the brilliancy of execution, purity of intonation, power of expression, and intensity of feeling, for which they are famed. Mr. Marriott, of the Collegiate Church, Southwell, opened the oratorio:

evidencing the improvement resulting from his present ability to devote his whole time to the study of music. Our townsman, Mr. Baker, was the bass singer, and delivered the music allotted to him with his usual power and skill. The choruses were executed with power, and certainty; particularly "For unto us," "O thou that tellest," and "All we like sheep." "But thanks be to God" we thought scarcely so steady and brilliant as the rest. The spacious Mechanics' Hall, where the performance was given, was densely crowded.—Nottingham Journal.

WOODFORD.—A very excellent concert was given at the above place on Thursday evening, the 25th ult., under the direction of Mr. W. F. Bates, the pianist. Among the vocalists engaged we may mention Miss Sara Flower, Miss Messent, Mr. Mauvers, and Mr. John Parry. The instrumentalists were Mr. F. Chatterton (harp), and Mr. F. W. Bates (pianist.) The performance gave great satisfaction, and was most respectably attended.

EDINBURGH.—Madame Anna Bishop achieved another triumph on Thursday evening, in Balfie's opera, "The Maid of Artois," in which she personated Isoline. Madame Bishop's powers of execution are sustained without effort, while in the loftiest flights her exquisite taste still holds the sway. Nothing can exceed the richness and purity of her tone, which, in legato passages has a most delightful effect. An impassioned energy characterises her performance. The ballad, "The heart that once hath fondly teemed," was enthusiastically applauded. In the second act Madame Bishop introduces a ballad from Lavenue's opera, Loretta, "On the banks of the Guadalquivir," in the course of which occurs a long and brilliant shake, which she executes with surprising facility. The conclusion of this was a signal for a storm of applause, which called forth a repetition. Madame Bishop's dramatic powers were fully developed in the scene in the desert; her looks and gestures portrayed the horrors of thirst with vivid reality. The rondo finale, "The rapture dwelling," was the consummation of the artist's powers, blending sweetness with brilliancy, and fire with expression. An encore was demanded amid the reiterated bravi of the audience, and when the curtain fell for the second time, she was again called in front, amidst the acclamations of the whole house. We were well pleased with Mr. W. H. Reeves, who performed Jules de Montagnon. Mr. Patrick Corri, who personated the Marquis de Chateau Vieux, displayed great judgment in his performance. He sang "The light of other days" very tastefully, and merited the encore he received. The subordinate parts were played very well, especially Synnelet, by Mr. Henry Corri, and Nina, the Indian girl, by Miss H. Coveney. On Saturday evening, we had an opportunity of hearing Donizetti's comic opera, "L'Elisir d'Amore," for the first time here for many years, and in this, as in "Sonnambula" and "The Maid of Artois," the vocal powers of Madame Bishop triumphed over every difficulty. To the romance, "Oh, Elixir," she imparted all the exquisite taste and execution for which she is so distinguished. But the most striking feature in the opera was the "Grand Rondo," composed expressly for Madame Bishop, by Donizetti, at Naples. It is impossible to describe the enthusiastic encore which greeted the singing of this composition. Several of the concerted pieces were given with great effect, and loudly applauded. The character of Nemorino was ably sustained by Mr. Reeves. The Messrs. Corri also contributed to the success of the opera.—Caledonian Mercury, March 11.

EDINBURGH.—Madame Anna Bishop made her first appearance in our theatre on Tuesday evening, in the opera of "La Sonnambula;" her reception was of the most enthusiastic description. She possesses a voice of great compass, power, and flexibility, and her fine dramatic action gives an additional charm to all her vocal efforts. In the most rapid and difficult passages she displays the results of careful study and tuition, while her cadences and shakes are given with the most delicate taste and precision. Her intonation is also perfect. The beautiful morceau, "Oh, love for me thy power," was given with brilliant finish and execution, and elicited rapturous applause. But the greatest triumph of the evening was the concluding solo, "Oh, don't mingle," which she gave in the original language. Such a furor did this create, that notwithstanding its repetition, the cheering and waving of hats and handkerchiefs did not subside until the curtain again rose, and it was given a third time. We have particularised these two airs, as being the principal features in the opera which are allotted to Arina, but there were many other pieces in which she sustained a part deserving of the highest encomiums. At the conclusion of the opera, the heroine of the evening, with Messrs. Reeves and Corri, made her appearance before the curtain, in compliance with the unanimous call of a delighted and numerous audience. The character of Elvino was ably sustained by Mr. Reeves, who sung the music throughout with taste. Count Rodolph was well supported by Mr. Patrick Corri, from the Theatre Royal, Manchester, who possesses an excellent voice. The characters of Lisa and Annette found good representatives in Miss Aldridge and Miss Harriet Coveney. The choruses were well sustained. Last night the opera was repeated, and with even greater success than on the previous evening.—Ibid. March 11.

EDINBURGH.—Mr. Templeton gave his third entertainment yesterday evening in the Music Hall. The galleries were crowded, and a numerous audience occupied the centre of the room. The finest effort of the evening was "All is lost now," which Mr. Templeton gave with much pathetic feeling and graceful expression, while he sang the aria, "Still so gently o'er me stealing," with natural grandeur and ardent emotion. All the songs in the programme were greeted with hearty applause, while several encores were enthusiastically demanded, and which Mr. Templeton readily complied with.—Caledonian Mercury, March 11.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

DRURY LANE.—Mr. Bunn's annual benefit took place on Monday evening, and, as a matter of consequence, Drury Lane was crowded to excess in every part. This seems the only public occasion, during the season, which presents itself to the friends and admirers of the Napoleon of Impresarii to pay him homage and respect. Simply, we may say, Mr. Bunn is richly deserving of the greatest public support. To musical England especially has he proved himself not only its *Mæcenæ*s, but its Prometheus. The metaphor may be far-fetched; but who can deny that Mr. Bunn has created a national opera for England; has brought to light new composers, who, but for him, most probably, would have handed their MSS. over to the cheeseman; and has infused a new hope among musical men that their compositions shall not lie fallow. May not Mr. Bunn, therefore, be entitled the Prometheus of Music—at least for Drury, and that is something. The entertainments of Monday night consisted of The Bondman, in which Balfe's delicious melodies were heard with renewed delight; followed by a selection of vocal music; to which was added a Pas de Danse; whereupon ensued the favourite interlude Popping the Question; subsequently a performance by the veritable Ethiopian Serenaders; the whole concluding with The Waterman, in which Mr. Braham supported his original part of Tom Tug. The great feature of the evening was certainly Braham's appearance, which appeared to have thrown the audience into hysterics of delight. Such a reception has seldom startled the walls of any theatre, as that which hailed our old favourite on Monday night. The moment he appeared, "that's Braham," seemed to issue telegraphically from every mouth—simple words, which, ere they were pronounced, were drowned in the sudden tempest-blast of human voices that followed. A more unanimous applause we never listened to. Old and young, those who had heard, and those who never could have heard the great artist, but felt tempestuous from sympathy; the grave and gay, those who seldom vociferated, and those who seldom do anything else but vociferate at a theatre; the critic and the amateur; the professor and the scholar; the artist and the lover, all joined in making their vocal powers instrumental in paying their favourite the heartiest homage and tribute. Mr. Braham seemed quite overcome by their manifestations of enthusiasm, and was obliged to pause before he could commence his song. His appearance was no less hailed with applause in the after-piece. Mr. Harley was received with continued acclamations in a favourite melody, which he sang in his usual vivaciously comic mode. Mr. Bunn was called for at the end of the opera, and made a pithy and pointed speech in reference to his position with regard to Drury Lane and the public. He was hailed with immense cheers. The performances did not conclude till late. Her Majesty and Prince Albert honoured the theatre last night with their presence, on which occasion The Bondman, was commanded for performance, and Marietta Baderna won golden opinions in the Cachoucha.

FRENCH PLAYS.—Since our last notice we have had Casanova, or Le Fort St. André, in which M. Lafont and Mlle. Fargueil have both appeared and played with their usual skill and discretion. The title of the above-named piece boded more laxity of morals and looseness of intrigue than is usually admitted in England, and we were not deceived in our expectations. We cannot conceive what possessed the author to adopt such a title, or to seek for his subject-matter in a biography of doubtful authenticity in the first place, and even if this point be conceded totally devoid of wit and humour. We remember seeing at the Adelphi, some twelve years ago, it may be more, a piece founded on the novel of Faust, softened down it is true, yet preserving much of the salt of the original composition, which, however faulty in other respects, has at least the advantage of invention, raciness, and causticity. In Casanova we find nothing of the sort, and the people of this theatre, who occasionally express an opinion of their own, testified it most unequivocally on Friday week last, so much so, that we have no fear of a repetition of it. Although of some length, the piece is composed of very slight materials. Casanova is a bold dragoon—a man à bonnes fortunes, who makes love to every woman he meets; he is on the opening of the piece confined in a state prison for some political offence, and here he intrigues first with the governor's wife, then with the gaoler's niece, and lastly with the fiancée of his own friend; throwing at the same time the husband, the bridegroom, and the lover of the several fair ones into all the horrors of jealousy, and the ladies themselves into a complete state of mystification. On receiving the news of his enlargement, which promises a wider field for his amorous adventures, he takes unceremonious leave of the whole party, allowing them to make up matters as best they can. Lafont was excellent as the military Lothario; his acting was easy and went far to save the piece from the most unequivocal and merited damnation; Mademoiselle Fargueil, as the little Grisette, was full of vivacity and sprightliness. We may say, en passant, that these are the parts best adapted to the lady's capabilities, as Jeanneton, in Pierre le Rouge, and in this part, in Casanova, we shall be borne out and justified in our opinion. The reason is simply that in such parts as these she is more natural, she is herself: whilst in Mathilde, in the Demon de la Nuit, and similar parts, she affects a preciseness of language, an over-refinement of pronunciation, which almost degenerates into affectation. We should like to know why démon is pronounced diémon—mari miarri—and ami iamm, &c. &c. We could multiply our examples of her affectation, which destroys the effect of a superior talent by subjecting it to ridicule. Le Roi des Frontins, in two acts, was the vehicle for the debut of Monsieur Alcide Tousez. We have seen him in two of his principal parts, in that already mentioned on Friday, and in La Sœur de Jocrisse, on Monday last. In comparing him with our English actors, we think that he has many points of resemblance with Mr. Keeley, or perhaps a compound of him and Mr. Buckstone. In these two pieces he performed parts diametrically the antithesis of each other. In the Roi des Frontins, in two acts, he played the part of a rustic bumpkin, who becomes a gentleman's valet, and, by his shrewdness, is so successful in extricating his master from innumerable scrapes and difficulties, that he obtains the soubriquet of king of valets; the actor making the combination of nature, mother-wit, and clownish manners excessively amusing. In the Sœur de Jocrisse on the contrary, he is a simple, matter of fact lad, who contrives to turn everything topsy-turvy in the house where he has been admitted as a servant, through the intercession of his sister. He knocks the buttons off his master's coat, leaves his watch at the Hotel de Ville, when sent to set it by the clock, lets the parrot escape, and wonders that a cat has taken its place in the cage; and in a capital scene endeavours to persuade his master that the bird has undergone a complete metamorphosis. He breaks the vases; lights a candle with a marriage settlement, prepared by his master, who is about to wed a lady more interested than loving; by his insinuations and gaucheries breaks off the marriage, and eventually brings about a match between his master and sister. M. Alcide Tousez displayed much native imbecility, and drew down shouts of laughter. He was called for after the piece. Mademoiselle Fouquet also did her part with much vivacity and intelligence. She is a most useful little person, and evinces signs of manifest improvement. We may also mention that M. Lafont again drew down shouts of laughter in the Deux Brigadiers on Monday week, and in Un Mari qui se Dérange, on Wednesday week last. On Friday, the 12th, was produced a most pleasing little Comédie-Vaudeville in two acts, entitled the Lectrice. The plot is of the most simple description, but was peculiarly interesting to us from the excellent acting bestowed on their parts by Mademoiselle Fargueil and M. Cartigny. They were so simple, so unexaggerated, so natural, so much at home, that we almost forgot we were at the theatre. M. Cartigny in the old French officer, we mean English officer, was perfection, although there certainly was more of the Frenchman than the Englishman about him. His principal amusement is to hear the works of the great French poets read to him; this office is performed by Caroline, who, by her gentleness and unassuming manners, has inspired the old invalid with the most sincere affection and gratitude towards her. While in this situation, she meets a young officer named Sir Arthur, and, in a scene of mutual recognition, we learn her whole history. She is the daughter of the old gentleman with whom she lives; married by him to an old man whom she could not love, she had attracted the admiration of Sir Arthur, then a gay and thoughtless youth, whose attempts to obtain a nocturnal interview having been discovered, had blasted her reputation, and caused her husband's death. In this distress, she had sought admission as a stranger into her father's family, had obtained it, and endeavours to soothe the old man's sorrow by her devotion and filial piety. Her lover now does his utmost to make amends for the harm he had unintentionally done, explains the whole transaction, vindicates her innocence, and obtains her hand from her delighted father. This story is so well told, so homely in all its details, so free from false sentiment and conceit, that it met with the most cordial reception. We may particularly mention the scene in which the veteran recognises his daughter's innocence, and is reconciled to her, as in no ordinary degree affecting. Tiridate is a trifle intended to exhibit the actress's talent both in the tragic and comic line; but in the present instance we cannot unreservedly commend her efforts. Mademoiselle Fargueil did the part of La Dumesnil most charmingly in some respects, but in the whole failed. She looked the part well, but in the scene, evidently intended by the author to be a most serious one, where she plays the heroine in the young gentleman's tragedy, she elicited more laughter than was welcome to classical ears. In that intended by the great actress, we mean La Dumesnil, to disgust the young poet with theatres and actresses, she was coarse without descending to vulgarity, and entered fully into the spirit of the part. On the whole we do not like the piece itself, in spite of the excellent acting of M. Cartigny, who, although he has a most decided contempt for creatures de cette espèce, as he calls theatrical people, blubbered most heartily in the pathetic parts. There is but one good scene in it, which is the last. Mlle. Vallée was also seen to great advantage, and played with much finesse. We are sorry that M. Alcide Tousez is suffering from severe cold, so that much of the effect he would otherwise produce is lost; his enunciation, at all times imperfect and indistinct, is now perfectly unintelligible. M. Lafont has been delighting his hearers with Les deux Brigadiers and Un Mari qui se Dérange, pieces which will bear seeing several times. On Wednesday Her Majesty the Queen and the Prince Albert were present, and, instead of the two new pieces underlined on Monday, we had a repetition of Pierre le Rouge and Lekain. The house was well attended on this occasion, and we were so much the more pleased as it in a great measure proved the high esteem in which M. Lafont is held in England. We need not enter into any details of a performance which we have already noticed at great length; there was the same quiet, easy, gentlemanly carriage and manners which have made this actor a universal favorite.

J. DE C—E.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

There was nothing new on Saturday, Lucia and Coralie keeping their places in the bills. On Tuesday the same opera and ballet were presented. On both occasions the houses were excellent, and the performers were honoured with distinguished applause.

On Thursday evening, "long Thursday" was kept religiously, and none of its festivities omitted. The entertainments were varied in such a manner as to combine most of the strength of Mr. Lumley's company. There were also novelties of unusual interest:—for example, Gardoni's first appearance in a new character, and that character Elvino, which must, perforce, induce comparison between the young tenor and his celebrated predecessors, Mario and Rubini; and a new ballet by M. Paul Taglioni, inventor of the graceful Coralie. Besides these, some fragments of Lucia, with Fraschini, and the national pas de deux called La Slavonienne, first made known to the public by Mlle. Rosati and M. Paul Taglioni, on the preceding Thursday.

The Lucia fragments may be dismissed at once, with the proviso that what we advanced last week, in respect of Signor Fraschini's merits and demerits, we have found no reason to modify. He has a magnificent voice, but he is deficient in style, and his method is not good enough to ensure a perfect command of the endowments with which nature has so prodigally favoured him. Our duty towards the Slavonienne, no less, may be discharged with a reference to our article of last week, in which we rendered due justice to its not very transcendent merits.

The opera of La Sonnambula demands more attention at our hands, and the pleasure we derived from its performance renders our task of criticism less unwelcome than we are but too often disposed to find it. Without further preliminary, then, we may state that those who have not heard Gardoni in Elvino, have not had it in their power to accord full justice to his talent. Rubini and Mario fresh in the memory, we listened to the new comer with unalloyed satisfaction. Those who objected that his voice lacked power, must have been well convinced of their error, by the powerful intensity with which the famous scena of the second act, especially the aria, was delivered. We were not at all astonished at the sensation it created. The auditors were taken by surprise; but the instant surprise let them loose again, they gave uninterrupted vent to their feelings of admiration. Following Mario's example, Gardoni transposed this aria a semitone. Rubini himself, the original, was rarely in condition to sing it as Bellini wrote it, in D flat; and what Rubini could not always do, must be for ever a despair to other vocalists. A consideration which easily laid at rest our invariable repugnance to transpositions. In the other parts of the opera, Gardoni was equally successful; and it may safely be assumed that he is now established as a primo tenore in every respect worthy of Her Majesty's Theatre. Already, in so few nights, he has managed to win a larger share of favour than is allotted to the great majority of artistes; and it is not unreasonable to prophesy that he will very shortly take a place in public estimation by the side of the most renowned of the foreign vocalists, without even one exception. It is almost superfluous to add, that he was encored in the aria, repeatedly applauded during the opera, and recalled more than once upon the stage. In short, the warmest friend of Signor Gardoni could scarcely have hoped for him a more decided success. We must also praise his acting, which was easy and unobtrusive, graceful and prepossessing, and, when the situation required, full of energy and pathos. Madame Castellan's Amina is well-known to the public, and our opinion thereon has been presented to our readers on various occasions. We were more pleased with it on Thursday than we have ever been before, and were convinced anew of the improvement which we noticed in our last. Perhaps, however, if the fair singer would slightly modify her taste for excessive displays of ornament, the value of her delicious voice would be more sensibly appreciated. We readily admit her facility, but we so greatly admire her cantabile singing, that we should like to hear a little more of it. As for the audience, they were delighted with all she did, and applauded her most liberally; it is therefore, perhaps, somewhat hypercritical on our parts to carp at a performance which afforded such undivided pleasure to others.

One line must chronicle our satisfaction with the manner in which Frederick Lablache sustained the part of Rudolfo, so important in much of the concerted music. Nothing could be more able than his singing, or more agreeable and natural than his acting. We should like to see this excellent artist much oftener. It is ill-judged on the part of the management to dispense with his services in favour of others so much his inferiors.

We are tired of praising Balfe;—and yet on every new occasion we find reason to congratulate the management on the possession of so zealous and active a servant. With deference to the Morning Chronicle, which, in the fever of partisanship, forgets to speak the truth, we never heard the choruses and orchestral accompaniments to the Sonnambula so well executed at Her Majesty's Theatre, often as we have heard the opera. The pretty chorus in the finale to the first act was sung with admirable precision, and the pianos were attained to perfection. The orchestra is getting more and more under Balfe's control, and every new performance affords us fresh proof of his generalship. In thus pronouncing an opinion so directly opposite to that of our indefatigable contemporary, we are quite at ease; since the judgment we offer is a purely musical one, for which we depend upon an ear not altogether uncultivated, and an education which has enabled us to acquire the knowledge of several facts with the existence of which we have much doubt if he be acquainted.

It remains to speak of the new ballet, which must (until next week) be shortly dismissed. Thea, ou la Fête aux Fleurs is a divertissement in one act, divided into two tableaux. A more graceful subject, or a fitter vehicle for scenic and choreographic effects, was never turned to stage account. The story rests upon the love of a certain Prince Hassan for flowers, which reaches such a height that he neglects even his favourite mistress, Thea, who can no longer afford him pleasure, so absorbed is he in the pursuit of his floral amours. Thea, in despair, implores the aid of the Flower Fairy, who being a benignant supernatural, accords it. Thea is changed by the fairy's power into a rose-tree. The rose-bud attracts Prince Hassan's attention more than any plant in his garden. He plucks a rose from its branches, when lo! the Flower Fairy appears, and the whole garden is animated with spirits, decked in the colours and petals of different flowers. The Fairy reproaches Prince Hassan for his conduct, threatening him with punishment for having plucked the rose. The Prince implores her pardon, which she accords on condition that he will consent to marry the rose-tree—to which the Prince, being as enamoured as ever was the Italian prisoner of his Picciola, gladly assents. The rose-tree, assuming coyness, works the Prince into a madness of desire, but at length appears to receive his addresses with favour—when lo! the branches fade away into thin air, and the beautiful form of Thea, his faithful and neglected mistress, stands erect before him, silently reproaching him for his inconstancy. All his old love returns, and, at the command of the Flower Fairy, the Prince and Thea are united; and so the story ends.

The scenic effects to which this ballet gives occasion, are as new as they are beautiful. Mr. Marshall has outshone himself on this occasion. The last tableau is as fanciful in its way as that in Coralia, the combinations being floral instead of aquatic. We never witnessed a more exquisite illusion of colour played upon by light. The dresses were equally picturesque. The groupings displayed the corps de ballet to wonderful advantage; and the principal dances were of the first quality. Mdle. Rosati performed in such a manner as to place herself among the queens of choregraphic art, and Marie Taglioni crowned her virgin brow with new laurels. The ballet, in short, created a furor. But we must reserve all detail till our next. Meanwhile, we congratulate Mr. Lumley on the continued evidences of his spirit and discrimination, of his liberality and regardlessness of outlay, which cannot fail of sustaining him in the high position he has assumed since the beginning of his management. Let him go on thus, and he may set competition at defiance.

HANDEL'S BELSHAZZAR.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Last evening, Handel's oratorio, Belshazzar, was produced at Exeter Hall, for the first time, by the Society. The importance of the work itself, and the consideration of its first representation, warrant us, in our present circumscription of time and space, in deferring a more accurate and analytic notice till our next number. Meanwhile, we shall merely take account of the principal vocalists, and the general impression the oratorio made on the audience. The leading vocalists, therefore, were the Misses Birch, M. B. Hawes, and the Messrs. H. Phillips, J. Howe, Bodda, and Manvers. As a first performance, we may state that the oratorio was satisfactorily given, the principal singers acquitting themselves with much credit, and the chorus, generally speaking, upholding their character as efficient interpreters of this very arduous department of vocal interpretation. The general feeling left upon our minds is, that Handel's Belshazzar is by no means one of his greatest works, and that the music is elaborate and heavy, rarely indicating the great composer's highest moments of inspiration. We shall, however, enter into this subject at more length, and with more care, in our ensuing number.

MR. JULLIEN.

This enterprising and spirited conductor has returned to London for a few days, after amassing large sums of money from his indefatigable exertions in the provinces. Truly may it be said, "We have but one JULLIEN." He has given universal delight in most of the principal towns in England, and will leave the metropolis for a second tour next week.

CONCERTS.

GRAND POPULAR CONCERTS.—On Tuesday evening, the fourth of the series of these excellent and well-conducted entertainments was held in Sussex Hall, and attracted a tolerably crowded assemblage of visitors. The concert was confined entirely to vocal morceaux, comprising songs, ballads, duets, trios, glances, quartets, comic songs and scenes. The ball was opened with Balfe's beautiful quatour, "Lo! the early beam of morning," sung with good effect by the Misses M. O'Connor and Felton, and the Messrs. H. Phillips and F. Smith. Next, Mr. Geage gave a song of Blewitt's nicely, and Miss A. Williams one of Auber's charmingly; and then Mr. H. Phillips gave, by particular desire, Dibdin's "Sailor's Journal," with admirable spirit, which was rapturously applauded; and following the sea-song came the duet-sisters, whom every one knows without further naming, and sang a duet very prettily and artistically; and anon, Mr. F. Smith treated the then inmates of Sussex Hall to a second edition of Henry Russell, singing that gentleman's "Gambler's Wife" so as to create a great sensation in the room, especially when the clock struck; and subsequently Mr. H. Phillips, Mr. Harrison, Mr. Sharp, Mr. W. G. Percival, Miss Barwick, and the artistes aforesaid, aided and abetted in rendering the concert conformable to the highest expectations of all who pledged their faith to the premises of the GRAND POPULAR CONCERTS.

CONCERT FOR MR. KEARNS' FAMILY.—The entertainment held in the Hanover Square Rooms, on Wednesday evening, to assist the widow and family of Mr. Kearns, was of such a kind and character as to attract a denser audience than is often witnessed within these rooms. All the musical professors of note in London, with few exceptions, lent their aid on this occasion to render the entertainment worthy of the patronage of the public, and as a last, though poor memento of their respect and love for one of the most venerated and amiable of all their confraternity. All the principal native vocalists, all such as could escape from their dramatic and other necessitated duties, came and lifted up their voices in the cause of charity. The orchestra, conducted by Signor Costa, numbered eighty; there were ten solo instrumentalists, twenty-five solo singers, and the whole of the members of the Choral Fund attended. We have not room to particularize each morceau. We may, however, notice a few performances that stood out prominently from the rest. These were the overture to Oberon, finely executed and encored; Bach's concerto for three pianos, which, in the hands of Mr. Anderson, Mr. Benedict, and Mr. Sterndale Bennett, was splendidly interpreted; the exquisite aria from Tito, "Non più di fiori," which was given by Madame G. Macfarren in a style to cause us to believe that Mozart's music, et hoc genus omne, is decidedly her forte; and Beethoven's grand symphony in D. The concert of Wednesday evening reflected the highest credit on all parties concerned, whether it be the conductor who volunteered his eminent services, the professors and artists who aided, or the public who thronged in crowds in aid of so benevolent a purpose. In addition to the money paid for tickets by the visitors, we are informed that a handsome amount has been realized by donations. We trust the subscriptions will not cease before the widow and children will be removed from all fear of a lapse into indigence.

MADAME DULCKER'S MATINEE MUSICALE.—Madame Dulcken commenced a series of morning performances of classical piano-forte music on Wednesday, at her residence in Harley Street. The concert was interspersed with some vocal pieces, executed by Mr. Harrison, Madame G. Macfarren, and Miss A. Loder, the latter lady making on this occasion her first appearance in public. Madame Dulcken executed compositions of Beethoven, Handel and Scarlatti, with her usual taste and brilliancy, and was supported in a quartett of Weber's by Messrs. Willy, Weslake and Hausman. The fair pianist also introduced specimens of modern authors. In the vocal section we have particularly to notice Madame G. Macfarren's singing two charming songs with great expression and purity. These songs were, "The First Day of Spring," by G. A. Macfarren, a composition fraught with the deepest poetic feeling; and the "Chloe in Sickness," of Sterndale Bennett, a very delicious canzonet, plaintive and melodious. The rooms were full and fashionably attended.

CLASSICAL INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC.—A concert was given on Tuesday evening at Johnson's Assembly Rooms, Doctors' Commons, and went off excellently, the room being tolerably full. The performances consisted of Onslow's quintett, No. 4, in G minor; Mozart's quartett, No. 10, in D; Spohr's duet for violin and viola; Onslow's quintett, No. 5, in D; and Beethoven's quartett, No. 6, in B flat. The executants were Messrs. H. Blagrove, Webb, Weslake, Hancock, and C. Severn.

MISCELLANEOUS.

REMARKABLE ESCAPE.—At the Edinburgh theatre, on one occasion in which Miss Faucit appeared as Pauline in the Lady of Lyons, a rather untoward accident occurred near the close of the performances. A man, named Macdonald, a printer, who appears to have been top-heavy, fell over the front of the upper gallery into the pit, a height of about thirty feet. His fall was broken by alighting between two gentlemen, who were but slightly injured, and the man himself was taken to the Royal Infirmary, where it was found that he had sustained no very serious hurt.—Glasgow Post.

MANCHESTER.—(From a Correspondent.)—Hargreave's Choral Society.—By a paragraph in the Guardian, it appears that Dr. Mendelssohn has accepted the engagement offered to him by the directors of the Hargreave Concerts, to conduct the performance of his last oratorio, Elijah. We understand he is engaged also to conduct two performances of it at Exeter Hall—one on Friday the 16th April, the other on the Friday following, the 23rd; betwixt which dates the next concert of the Hargreave's Society must be held, we believe, Tuesday the 20th. The principal vocalists are not yet engaged; but will, most likely, if practicable, be the same engaged by the Sacred Harmonic Society. The musical folks in Manchester are on the tiptoe of expectation, that a musical treat of no ordinary character is in store for them. We trust the solo performances will be in the hands of first-rate artists. We should like to hear Staudigl, Lockey, and Miss Birch—all, however, depends on circumstances. The Harmonic Society and the Hargreave's, too, will be sure to secure the best available talent; and we hope that the production of Elijah in Manchester will fully satisfy the subscribers for any former shortcoming; and that it will redound to the credit, as well as extend the means, of the Hargreave Choral Society.

[We may add to the above, that Elijah will be given in Dublin immediately after its performance at Manchester. Mendelssohn will attend on both occasions. The principal singers will be Miss Birch (in place of Madame Caradori), Miss Dolby, for whom the contralto part was intended by the composer, in place of Miss Hawes, with Herr Staudigl, and the Lockey, who were engaged in the first representation at with Birmingham festival.—Ed.]

HULLAH'S TESTIMONIAL FUND.—The last concert of this series will take place at Exeter Hall on Monday, the 19th of April, not the 12th, as stated by mistake in our last.

MADAME LUTZER, the celebrated German prima donna, will pay a visit to London in the first week of April. She has appointed Mr. Albert Schloss as the agent of her engagements in this country.

MADAME BISHOP concludes her engagement this week in Edinburgh. On the 22d she appears in Sonnambula at Bristol; on the 23d ditto at Bath; 25th at Bath, morning performance, the Maid of Artois; and the same evening!!! same opera at Bristol—good work this. On the 26th Madame Bishop will perform in Anna Bolena at Bristol, and on the 27th ditto at Bath. On the 6th of April the fair cantatrice gives two concerts at Exeter, and proceeds soon after to Dublin to fulfil her second engagement.

MR. J. CARTE, the celebrated flute-player, continues to give his weekly concerts at Greenwich. On Monday last we attended for the first time, and were much pleased throughout with the entertainments. Among the artists engaged for that night, we noticed Miss Solomon, Mr. Manvers, Mr. F. Chatterton, and Madame G. Macfarren. Mr. Carte received immense applause for his performance on the flute, and Miss Dolby and Madame G. Macfarren divided with him the applause of the evening, for the charming and artistic manner in which they interpreted some vocal morceaux. The rest of the performers also came in for their share of acclamation.

MADAME KNISPEL, the vocalist, has arrived in London for the season.

MR. HAUSMANN, the eminent violoncellist, has returned to town, after making a successful provincial tour with JULIEN.

A GRAND BALL is announced to take place on Wednesday, April 7, at Willis's Rooms, in aid of the distressed Irish. The ball will be given under the immediate patronage of their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge. Olivier's quadrille band of twenty first-rate performers, under the direction of Mr. F. G. Tinnye, will attend. It is to be hoped that the ball will be well attended. For terms see advertisement page.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—A very splendid entertainment of vocal and instrumental music will be given at this theatre on Tuesday evening, March 30, by that most enterprising and energetic of all concert-givers, Mr. Allcroft. The principals in the vocal department, already announced, consist of Mesdames Albertazzi and F. Lablache; the Misses Birch, E. Birch, Steele, Rainforth, Poole, Hill, Sabilla Novello, and M. B. Hawes; together with the Messrs. Harrison, Travers, H. Phillips, F. Lablache, Brizzi, Allcroft, Guibilei, and H. Russell. The instrumental section comprises the names of Madame Dulcken, Mr. Richardson, and Herr Joachim, as soloists. We are delighted to announce the coming of the latter admirable young artist, whose performances on the violin are hardly surpassed by any living executant. The orchestra will be numerous and select. Some startling novelties will be provided. The celebrated Ethiopian Serenaders, who have been creating an immense sensation for some time past at the St. James's Theatre, will make their début at the Haymarket. Sixteen eminent pianists, and eight celebrated harpists, will execute a new grand Morceau de Concert, arranged expressly for this occasion: and, to crown all, selections from Rossini's Stabat Mater will be introduced; and the entertainments will conclude with the prayer from the Mosé in Egitto, interpreted by the entire vocal corps. If this be not the concert of concerts, we know not what is. Mr. Roberts will attend as leader, and the conductors will be the Messrs. Negri, Lavenue, and T. G. Reed. Altogether, a more spirited scheme we have never ante-dated; and we have no doubt that Mr. Allcroft will meet with all the success he so well merits.

CHORAL HARMONISTS.—The next meeting of this society is announced for Monday, the 22nd inst. The scheme includes Haydn's "Second Mass;" Spohr's cantata, "Christian Prayer," Mendelssohn's overture to the "Isles of Fingal," and Rombert's "Song of the Bell." We shall do our best to attend this classical gathering.

Mr. HENRY SMART, the talented organist of St. Luke's Church, Middlesex, is actively engaged in the formation of an efficient choir, for the performance of the full cathedral service at morning and evening worship at that church. A meeting of the parishioners was held some time since, to decide on the advisability of making so great a change in the mode of celebrating divine worship, when not only was the unanimous feeling in favour of such alteration, as conducive to an increased degree of devotion, but the necessary funds for carrying the contemplated improvement into effect, were voted with the greatest cordiality. This is another instance of the progress of musical feeling, and we have little doubt but that for the opposition to the further introduction of music in our church services, so strenuously exerted in high quarters, this example would be extensively followed. Mr. Smart has secured the services of two gentlemen from Lancashire, of considerable musical talent, for his first tenor and bass; and having selected from amongst the boys attached to the national schools, those whose voices and abilities gave promise of success, has, for some time past, been pursuing with them a rigid course of instruction, resulting in the formation of a choir of boys which, we have no doubt, in time will be equal to any in the metropolis. The cathedral service will be performed, for the first time, on Easter Sunday.

ABBAY GLEE CLUB.—This club, which has been established upwards of half a century, and includes, among its members, several of our best glee singers, gave its eighth soirée, on Thursday evening, in the large room of the Crown and Anchor Tavern, to a crowded audience. The selection comprised a variety of glees by Calcott, T. Cooke, Goss, Arne, Bishop, Webbe, Stevens, &c., which were well performed. We would especially commend the excellent manner in which T. Cooke's glee, "Shades of the Heroes," was rendered. The Misses Williams assisted with their charming voices and cultivated style in passing off the evening most pleasantly. They sang together Hatton's duet, "Two Laughing Fairies," which elicited an encore, and also the duet from Benedict's Crusaders, "The ties of Friendship." Miss A. Williams sang, moreover, the song from the Siren, in a manner peculiarly her own, and which always commands an encore. Some two or three German glees were introduced, but were not so effectively performed as those of the authors we have above-named. Among them were "Maying," by Müller, and "Lutzow's Wild Hunt," by Weber. This collection of glees, which are published periodically, under the name of "Orpheus," are formed on a very different model to our English glees, and require in themselves a peculiar style of singing, which we have heard but rarely attained. A few years since, Mr. Henry Smart organised a small private society for the especial study of this class of composition, which arrived at a considerable degree of perfection, but we believe the society is now extinct. A m.s. glee, by Mr. J. Howe, was well sung, and the composition in itself contains many good points. Mr. Coward played a fantasia, by Alexander Fesca, on the piano, evincing a tolerable acquaintance with the instrument, and the performance of each part concluded with madrigals by Converso and Beale, which were neatly and effectively sung.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

JUSTITIA.—We have received our correspondent's letter but not the notice alluded to. We shall be glad to hear thereupon from JUSTITIA.

Mr. J. N. SPORLE and Mr. LINDSAY SLOPER'S CONCERTS will be noticed in our next.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Warren's 20 Guinea Cottage Piano-Fortes

ARE NOW SELLING AT THE Manufactory, 71, Leadenhall Street

(Removed from 1 and 2, Liverpool Street, Bishopsgate Street.)

These Instruments are well manufactured of the best seasoned wood, FINE FULL TONE AND GOOD TOUCH. A two years warranty given with each instrument. ESTABLISHED TWENTY-ONE YEARS. The only house in London where a good sound instrument can be obtained at the above low price, (for cash only). SMALL PROFIT AND QUICK RETURNS!

JOHN WARREN, 71, Leadenhall St., opposite Aldgate Pump.

PIANOFORTES.

Parties in want of a really good PIANOFORTE, at a moderate price, will do well to call at

J. C. JONES AND CO.'s,

2, Hanway-street, Oxford-street, a few doors on the right from Tottenham-court-road, who, from their intimate acquaintance with every kind of instrument made, have endeavoured to combine the separate good qualities of each with all the latest improvements, therefore for tone, touch, durability, and appearance these Instruments are not to be surpassed at the price.

Instruments tuned, repaired, exchanged, and lent on hire.
Tuning by the year, one guinea. Second-hand Pianos, from 3 to 30 guineas.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN,

Established for the purpose of rendering a more perfect performance of the LYRIC DRAMA

Than has hitherto been attained in this country.

UNDER THE DIRECTION AND MANAGEMENT OF MR. BEALE.

The Nobility, Gentry, and Patrons of Music, are respectfully informed, that the
ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA

Will Open the First Week in April.

Prospectuses to be had at the Box-office, Bow Street; at Cramer, Beale, and Co.'s, 201, Regent Street; and at all the Libraries.

GOOD PIANOFORTES CHEAP.

The large and valuable STOCK of PIANOFORTES manufactured by

ZEITZER & CO.,

IS NOW SELLING OFF,

At 4, New Cavendish Street, Portland Place, London.

In consequence of a Dissolution of Partnership. The Instruments, consisting of mahogany and rosewood Grands, Semi-Grands, Cabinet, Cottage, and Piccolos, are made with the patent Sounding-Board, Metallic Plate, Check Action, and all the latest improvements. The Pianofortes made by ZEITZER and Co. have always enjoyed a preference among the nobility and gentry, having been honored with the patronage of Her Majesty the Queen, the Duchess of Sutherland, &c. The peculiar construction of the Sounding-Board insures their greater durability and the firm tone is well known. Parties desirous of possessing one of these superior Instruments, may now purchase the same on very advantageous terms. Grands, heretofore from 120 to 145 Guineas, are now selling at £50 to £70, and others in proportion. The premises No. 5 have been recently closed.

MESSIEURS. DISTIN,

The original and unrivalled Performers on the SAX HORNS AND SAX TUBAS,
Will give their

Popular Concerts,

Assisted by Miss O'CONNOR, Mr. WELLS, and Mr. W. S. ROCKSTRO, as follows:—

CROYDON, March 22nd; KENNINGTON, 23rd. They will perform also at NATIONAL HALL, 25th; MANCHESTER 29th, 30th, and 31st, and April 1st and 3rd; BOLTON, April 5th; WARRINGTON, 6th and 7th; LANCASTER, 8th; GREENWICH, 12th; STORE STREET, 14th; SUSSEX HALL, 15th; BEAUMONT INSTITUTION, 26th.

N.B. Cornets, Sax Horns, Sax Tubas, Mouthpieces, &c., to be had at DISTIN'S Musical Repository, 31, Cranbourne Street, Leicester Square.

FAIR COMPLEXION.

Under the Patronage of the Nobility and Gentry.

TO THE LADIES.—Wonderful and Important Discovery.

COCKBURN'SORIENTAL BOTANICAL PREPARATION,

For removing almost instantaneously cutaneous eruptions, freckles, pimples, spots, and other discolorations of the skin. After one application of the Botanic Extract, which must be used twice a day, a wonderful change will be perceived, and in the course of a few days the complexion will assume a beautiful transparent roseate hue appearance. The extract to apply is of the most agreeable nature, and the first application will prove its wonderful efficacy. Prepared only, and sold wholesale and retail, by the sole proprietor.

GEORGE H. J. COCKBURN, 9, Aldgate, London;
And Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street, London; in bottles at 2s. 9d. and 4s. 6d. each; also by Sanger, 150, Oxford-street; Keating, St. Paul's Church Yard; Johnson, 68, Cornhill; Hannay and Co., 63, Oxford-street; Butler and Co., 4, Cheapside; Edwards, St. Paul's Churchyard; Prout, 229, Strand; and of all other Chemists and Perfumers in the kingdom.

HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS.MR. STERNDALÉ BENNETT

Begs to announce that his

Third Performance of Classical Pianoforte Music

Will be held in the above Rooms,
On TUESDAY EVENING, the 23rd instant,

On which occasion he will be assisted by several eminent Vocal and Instrumental artists. Further particulars will be daily announced. Tickets, half-a-Guinea each, may be had at Mr. BENNETT'S residence, 15, Russell Place, Fitzroy Square and at all the Music Shops.

HERR PISCHEK

Has the honor to announce that he

WILL ARRIVE IN LONDON

For the Season, on

MONDAY, May 10th,

Lectures addressed to HERR PISCHEK, at JULLIEN and Co.'s, 214, ROXBURY STREET, will be attended to.

Hanover Square Rooms.Miss DINAH FARMER'S CONCERT,

MONDAY EVENING, MARCH 22ND.

Principals—Miss Rainforth, Mrs. A. Newton, Miss Cubitt, Miss M. A. Ley, Mrs. W. H. Weiss, Messrs. D. W. King, T. Williams, W. H. Weiss, J. A. Novello, Stretton and Leffer, Pianoforte, Miss Dinah Farmer; Violin, Mr. Blagrove; Harp, Mr. Frederick Chatterton; Concertina, Mr. Rd. Blagrove; Horn, Mr. Jarret; Oboe, Mr. Gratton Cooke; Flute, Mr. Richardson; with a Band and Chorus of 150 performers. Tickets, 3s.; Reserved Seats, 5s.; to be had of the principal Music Sellers, or of Miss Farmer, 5, North Crescent, Bedford Square.

THE ROYAL HIBERNIAN BALL,

In Aid of the Funds for the Destitute Irish.

Under the Immediate Patronage of His ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE—HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUCHESS OF CAMBRIDGE, &c., &c.

Will be held at

Willis' Rooms, King Street, St. James',

ON WEDNESDAY, APRIL 7TH, 1847.

Double Tickets, One Guinea; Ladies Tickets, Half-a-Guinea; Gentlemen's Tickets, Fifteen Shillings, including Refreshments throughout the evening.

Vouchers may be obtained of the Ladies Patroness, and Patrons, the Members of the Committee, the Stewards, at Willis' Rooms, or of the Hon. Treasurer and Hon. Secretary.

PIANOFORTES FOR SALE.

A very superior and powerful toned 63 Octave Rosewood COTTAGE, by Zeitzer and Co., with metallic string plate, check action, &c., cost 60 guineas a short time since, and will now be sold for half that sum; an elegant Rosewood Semi-CABINET, 63 octaves, with all the latest improvements, only 35 guineas; a COTTAGE, 14 guineas; a 5-OCTAVE SQUARE, by Broadwood, with metallic spring plate, only £18; cost 52 guineas; a 5½ DITTO, £24. Also, a variety of new and improved CABINET, COTTAGE, and PICCOLO PIANOFORTES, from 25 guineas each. Packed free of expense.

C. SCOTCHER,

(from Collard and Collard's), 60, Mortimer-street, Cavendish-square.
PIANOFORTES TAKEN IN EXCHANGE.

TO THE MUSIC PROFESSION.

"NASSAU STEAM PRESS,"

AND

PUBLISHING OFFICE,

60, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, CHARING CROSS.

Every description of CONCERT PRINTING, (Public or Private,) consisting of PROGRAMMES, NOTES, TICKETS, POSTING BILLS, &c., are neatly and expeditiously executed with economy and taste by

W. S. JOHNSON,

PRINTER TO HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE 21 YEARS!

Where also may be had "The Musical World," and all Operas, Comedies, Plays, Farces, Burlesques, and the whole of Webster's unique Acting Drama.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE

Is acknowledged as the best specific after three years' trial, for improving the voice and removing all affections of the throat, strongly recommended to clergymen, singers, actors, public speakers, and all persons subject to relaxed throats.

The Proprietors have just received the following Testimonial, amongst many others, from MADAME ANNA BISHOP:—

"DEAR SIR,—I am happy to say that all I have heard respecting the efficacy of DR. STOLBERG'S celebrated LOZENGE is perfectly true, as yesterday, feeling myself very fatigued (singing nightly at the Theatre), I took several of the Lozenges, and my voice was very clear, and my throat quite free from relaxation. I am, Dear Sir, Yours truly, ANNA BISHOP."

"18th November 1846.—Jermyn Street."

Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Churchyard; W. Edwards and Newbery and Sons, St. Paul's Churchyard; Sanger, and Dietrichsen and Hannay, Oxford-street; and retail by all respectable Chymists in the Kingdom.

THOMAS BAKER'S MODERN PIANOFORTE TUTOR.

M. JULLIEN

Has the honor to announce, that he has just published the above work, which he flatters himself will be found the desideratum so long sought after by the profession. Notwithstanding the improvements that have taken place in Pianoforte Playing within the last ten years, no deviation has been made in the system of teaching from Tutors of the Old School; in consequence, many gifted with brilliant talents have been unable to execute the music of the present day. For this reason the

MODERN PIANOFORTE TUTOR

Has been introduced, and met with the greatest success from the elite of the profession, who have universally adopted it. The work is divided into two parts: the first being a complete Tutor in itself, containing the

RUDIMENTS OF MUSIC,

Rules for the Formation of the Hand, Scales,

FINGER EXERCISES, &c.

Interspersed with Morceaux from the works of

Beethoven, Mozart, Spohr, Weber, Meyerbeer, Roch-Albert, Rossini, Bellini, Donizetti, &c.—Price 8s.

The second part consists of a more advanced course of Study, proceeding to the most refined style of Modern Playing;

Illustrated with numerous Examples & Exercises,

On all the various Fingerings adopted by the most eminent Pianists of the MODERN SCHOOL: with Selections from the Pianoforte Compositions of HENZ, DOHLER, THALBERG, &c.; in fact, everything necessary to constitute a first-rate Pianist. Price 8s., or 1's. the entire work.

Published by M. JULLIEN & Co.,

AT THE ROYAL MUSICAL CONSERVATORY,

214, REGENT STREET, AND 45, KING STREET,

Where all the Compositions of the above Author may be had.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847.

M. JULLIEN has the honor to announce that the sixth edition of his

MUSICAL ANNUAL FOR 1847

Is now Published, and will be found by far the best work of the kind that has ever appeared; containing no less than

Thirty Pieces of Vocal and Fourteen of Instrumental Music, The greater part of which have never before been published, the copyrights having been purchased expressly for this work, at an immense cost, with the view of rendering it immeasurably superior to any of its predecessors.

The portion which has already appeared comprise those pieces only whose decided success has induced M. JULLIEN, at the request of numerous influential patrons, to include them in this Selection.

The Illustrations, in addition to the elaborately executed Covers, Title, and Dedication pages, include two magnificent Views of the interior of Covent Garden Theatre. The one taken during the brilliant scene exhibited in that splendid arena of the occasion of M. JULLIEN'S GRAND BAL MASQUE; the other a VIEW OF THE THEATRE TAKEN DURING THE CONCERTS, the grouping of the Figures in both Views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant. To those who have visited the Theatre on either occasion, the ALBUM will form a delightful SOUVENIR, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of the gorgeous scene.

A splendidly-coloured PORTRAIT of the celebrated Danseuse, Madlle. FLORA FARRI, in the admired Pas, La Castiglioni. An original subject, "THE FORTUNE TELLER," illustrating Baker's beautiful ballad of that name. The whole of this department of the ALBUM has been under the active superintendence of J. BRANDARD, Esq., whose pencil only has been employed in its production.

Nothing more need be said in favour of this Work, and in proof of its vast superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the Contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe.

It will also be perceived that in addition to the latest compositions of the best English Composers, the ALBUM contains some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany, France, Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting the attention of the Continental dilettanti. Price 18s. and £1 1s.

ROYAL CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC,

214, REGENT-STREET, AND 45, KING-STREET.

SOVEREIGN Life Assurance Company,

No. 5, ST. JAMES'S STREET,

LONDON.

Trustees.
Sir A. Brydges Henniker, Bart.	Henry Pownall, Esq.
B. Bond Cabbell, Esq., M.P.	Claude Edward Scott, Esq.
Directors.
CHAIRMAN, Lieutenant Colonel Lord Henry Broadwood, Esq., M.P.
Arthur Lennox.	Sir James Carmichael, Bart.
DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN, T. C. Grainger, Esq., M.P.	Charles Farebrother, Esq., Alderman.
John Ashburner, Esq., M.D.	William Tulloch Fraser, Esq.
T. M. B. Batard, Esq.	John Gardiner, Esq.
Philip P. Blyth, Esq.	Aaron Asher Goldsmid, Esq.
	Henry William Pownall, Esq.

Bankers, Sir Claude Scott, Bart., and Co.

Solicitors, Messrs. Davies, Son, and Campbell.

Assurances on the lives of persons in every station of life and every part of the world, granted on a plan which combines the utmost amount of benefit to the families of the assured at death, with every attainable advantage during life, which the system of Life Assurance is capable of affording.

It affords perfect security in a subscribed Capital, which guarantees the prompt settlement of every claim, with participating and non-participating rates on the lowest scale, especially for terms of years.

The Assured can anticipate or obtain the advance of the full amount of the Policy, on giving approved available security for a certain number of annual payments, as explained by the Prospectus.

Every facility is afforded to persons assuring the lives of others, so as to render such Policies effectual securities.

A new plan of gradual or accumulative Assurance, particularly adapted for young lives, and for such as cannot, without inconvenience, undergo the payment of a fixed premium, securing at once provision in case of death, and an accumulating fund, available during life, should occasion require.

ANNUITIES, ENDOWMENTS, ADVANCES, and LOANS, on liberal terms. Detailed Prospectuses, with forms of Proposal, and every information, may be had on application, either personally or by letter, at the Company's Office.

The usual commission to Solicitors and Agents.

H. D. DAVENPORT, Secretary.

THE PATENT HARMONIUM.

This beautiful Instrument possesses the softness of the voice with the variety of tone of every wind Instrument, as also the power of a large Organ. It is equally suitable for Sacred Music, or the Dance, and adapted for the Drawing Room, Concert Room, Church or Chapel. Printed particulars can be had of LUFF and SON, sole agents, where the PATENT HARMONIUM can be heard from 10 till 4 daily; and where can be inspected.

LUFF & SON'S

Elegant Assortment of PIANOFORTES,

Made by experienced workmen, and thoroughly seasoned wood, all of which is prepared on the premises. They are warranted to stand well in Tune, and are prepared for extreme climates: prices one-third less than usually charged. Instruments taken in exchange, and a liberal allowance to dealers.

LUFF and SON, 103, Great Russell Street, Bloomsbury.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, at the "Nassau Steam Press," by WILLIAM SPENCER JOHNSON, 60, St. Martin's Lane, in the parish of St. Martin's in the Fields, in the County of Middlesex; where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed post paid: To be had of G. Purkes, Dean Street, Soho; Strange, Paternoster Row; Wiseheart, Dublin; and all Booksellers.—Saturday, March 20th, 1847.

The Musical World.

(PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT NOON.)

A RECORD OF THE THEATRES, MUSIC, LITERATURE, FINE ARTS,
FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE, &c.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s. Stamped; 12s. Unstamped; to be forwarded by Money Order or Postage Stamps to the Publisher, W. S. Johnson, "Nassau Steam Press," 60, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross.

Each Subscriber is entitled to an Admission to an Annual Concert, and a Piece of Music, (regular Music size) Monthly.

No. 13.—VOL. XXII.

SATURDAY, MARCH 27, 1847.

{ PRICE THREEPENCE
STAMPED, FOURPENCE.

NOTICE,—An ARIA, written expressly for

SIGNOR CARDONI,

by a celebrated Italian Composer, will be presented to the Subscribers of the "Musical World," with the First Number of the month ensuing.

JENNY LIND.

THE mystical correspondence apropos of the nightingale of nightingales has been continued since our last. Edward Jennings, Esq., Chancery-lane, 9, is evidently not a man to be brow-beaten. He accordingly addresses the following letter to Mr. Bunn, at half-past ten o'clock on Friday night, and a copy thereof to the editor of the Morning Post, which the editor of the Morning Post forthwith publishes in his paper of Saturday, prefacing its introduction with the observation that "No answer has been returned to Mlle. Jenny Lind's solicitor, as will be seen by the following letter:—"

[Copy.]

9, Chancery Lane, March 19, 1847.

"Sir,—I am still waiting for the answer to my communications, which you promised should be immediate. On my part, all the forms of courtesy and business have been observed. On my first addressing you I had the honour of observing that the letter of Mademoiselle Lind was open to your inspection, and that of your legal advisers. On your expressing a wish to have this letter in your hands to satisfy yourself, I called upon you, and whilst I stated that this note formed an essential part of my instructions, and I could not therefore part with it, I placed it in your hands to peruse. On returning it, you stated that you were perfectly satisfied as to its authenticity, and would give me a reply in the course of that day. This answer I therefore beg leave to demand directly at your hands, and I trust that if you are now held by a bond to other parties, which prevents your acceptance of a gift of peace, of which you of course could not foresee the generous offer, and still less the extraordinary liberality—I trust you will consider it due to yourself and to Mlle. Lind, in all fairness, to state the circumstances. I have the honour to be, sir, your obedient servant,

(Signed)

"E. JENNINGS.

"To Alfred Bunn, Esq., Theatre Royal, Drury-lane."

Next morning the Cerberus of the Morning Chronicle, ever watchful at his post (no pun), prints and comments upon the above, annexing to it, by way of tag, a copy of a letter from Mr. Bunn, of Drury-lane, to Jennings, Esq., Chancery-lane, 9, which runs as follows:—

"Dawley, near Hays, March 20, 1847.

"Sir,—I cannot admit of your putting words into my mouth I never uttered, or constructions upon my conduct not founded on fact; and with this observation I dismiss your nonsensical remarks of 'demand directly'—'a bond to others'—'a gift of peace'—'generous offer'—'extraordinary liberality' &c. &c.—evidently intended for further exparte publication. I stated to you that I would send an immediate answer to the letter you showed me, bearing the signature of 'Jenny Lind'; and although I believed, and still believe, that letter to have been concocted in London, I did answer it at once, addressing Madlle Lind herself at Vienna. As you state she is a client of yours, I refer you to her for the nature of my reply.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,"

"C. B. Jennings, Esq., &c. &c. &c."

"A BUNN.

We are as much in the dark as ever. Were it not a clear impossibility, we should think that Mademoiselle Jenny Lind would please both parties, by coming to London, and not coming to London, at one and the same period. Meantime the Post chronicles (no pun), in one of its recent articles on the Opera, the fact that Jenny Lind has started from Vienna, on her route to London. This would settle the question but for a paragraph in the same paper, lower down the same column, which, after trumpeting the praises of Jenny Lind in Meyerbeer's Camp of Silesia, states that another opera is preparing for her at the An-der-Wien Theatre. How this can be reconciled with her having already started from Vienna for London, we leave the Post to decide.

POSTSCRIPTUM.—In the Morning Post of Wednesday, March 24, we read as follows:—

"We are happy to state that during the performance a foreign courier arrived, bringing letters announcing the departure of Mlle. Jenny Lind from Vienna, on her way to fulfil her engagement at her Majesty's Theatre. The letters also announce the arrival, immediately after Easter, of Staudigl. Thus we shall have the great Italian basso, Lablache, and the greatest German basso at the same time. Novelty will succeed novelty—Ernani on Saturday, I Due Foscari after Easter week, whilst Jenny Lind will make her debut in Alicia, in Meyerbeer's grand opera of Roberto il Diavolo."

In the same column occurs the following:—

"The enthusiasm of the Viennese public for the opera of The Camp of Silesia continues unabated. At each representation the Imperial Theatre, notwithstanding the great increase of prices, is filled to excess, and the receipts invariably amount to about 11,000 florins (about 600*l.*). The opera of Robert le Diable is about to be reproduced, in which Mlle. J. Lind will fill the part of Alice as well as that of the Princess. It is said M. Meyerbeer has undertaken to set to music for the theatre An-der-Wien, a new opera, the words of which are by M. Baurenfeld.

Will our excellent contemporary oblige us by an explanation of this seeming contradiction? It is not easy to understand how Jenny Lind can be about to appear in Robert le Diable, having already started for London. We have no doubt, however, that the matter will be cleared up, as we hinted above, and that Jenny Lind will be proved, as we hinted above, ubiquitous.

LOLA MONTEZ.

It appears that the letter which has gone the round of the English and French press, stopping short at the Journal des Debats, is after all nothing more than a hoax. The Journal des Debats suspecting the hand-writing not to be Lola's, declined inserting the letter. The National, less wary, gave it insertion. It runs as follows:—

[Translation].

"Sir—I have read in your journal infamous articles against my person, and against one of the most just and most noble of Kings. Far from complaining of them, I rather congratulate myself on an aggression which gives me the opportunity of enlightening you with respect to me. Knowing so well your fairness as to be assured that you will consider it a duty to defend a woman, exposed to the infernal intrigues of the Jesuits, and of their blind partisans, I hope that you will also be kind enough to insert the present letter in one of the earliest numbers of your journal. Arrived at Munich towards the commencement of the month of October of last year, I soon saw with astonishment the Jesuits exercised a fatal and immense influence in that city, as well as in all Bavaria. Having loudly declared myself against such an abuse, and being ignorant that the last Ministry conformed itself to their principles, I saw myself imperceptibly and adroitly exposed to the cruel intrigues of which the disciples of Loyola are capable, without having given cause for them by my own conduct. Since then every day brought new attempts; calumny in all its forms was employed; I received menaces of being poisoned, assassinated; every day insulting letters, bearing my signature, were addressed to the most respectable persons of the capital, in order to excite them against me. Even an offer of a life income of 50,000*fr.* was made to me if I would consent to disappear without noise, but I refused the proposition with indignation. His Majesty the King having, of his own free will, dismissed a professor of the University belonging to the Jesuits' party, I was assailed in the house I inhabit by a mob which was paid by them, and though I had never meddled in any matter which concerned the Government, I saw myself exposed to the danger of being stoned to death. Happily the good sense of the inhabitants of Munich, and the wise measures of the authorities, soon reduced the mob to order. This statement of facts proves sufficiently the injustice that the newspapers have done me. If I had had any influence, and if I had consented to use it on behalf of my enemies, instead of being persecuted as I am now, they would not have failed to declare me the heroine of their patron, and then there would have been not only a Saint Ignatius Loyola, but, according to their proverb that "the end sanctifies the means," they would have proclaimed a Sancta Lola!

(Signed) "LOLA MONTEZ."

A provincial journal, The Cheltenham Looker-on, gives the following history of the fair intriguer's life; which, albeit we altogether doubt its authenticity, we reprint for the edification of our readers:

"WHO IS LOLA MONTEZ?—The donna is of a very good Spanish family, but was born in Ireland. Her friends returning to Spain, young Lola accompanied them, and in due course, at an early age, married an officer in the Spanish service, and mixed in very good society. This marriage did not turn out a very happy one, and Donna Lola eloped with an Irishman; she was afterwards abandoned by her lover in Dublin, when she commenced a career of profligacy remarkable only for its audacity. One of her many admirers procured her some lessons in stage dancing, and had influence enough to get her an engagement at the Opera. She appeared as Lola Montes, the whole matter having been kept as secret as possible. But the men of the omnibus box, and the habitués of the stalls, recognised in the new "Spanish dancer" their old friend "Betsy Watson," and the whole affair was voted a "take in." Lola then proceeded to Paris where she failed. From Paris she went to Berlin, and from Berlin to Munich, where, it seems, she has completely enslaved the King. It is difficult to say which runs to the greatest excess, his Majesty's infatuation, or the lady's insolence. Lola had, before the "bull-dog" story, managed to make herself tolerably notorious by refusing to rise when the Royal Family entered the Theatre, according to the custom at Munich, and persisted in retaining her seat in her box even when the propriety of rising was suggested to her. The King of Bavaria must be a sad fellow indeed, even when tried by the very lax standard of German court morality. The most beautiful room in his palace is that which is devoted to the portraits of his mistresses. The apartment is hung with crimson-coloured velvet, and the portraits of some dozen beautiful women, all in deep gold oval frames, decorate it. The effect is beautiful in the extreme. The Ministers and attachés of the German Courts here (London) are quizzed unceasingly by the quondam friends of "Betsy Watson," for the doting fondness of the Bavarian King."

If any of our readers believe a word of the above, we congratulate them on their good faith. We ourselves do not, and were we asked our reason for publishing it, we should be puzzled to give it. But it is too late now to leave it out.

MADAME BISHOP IN THE PROVINCES.

(From a Correspondent.)

Madame Bishop terminated her engagement in Edinburgh on Friday the 19th instant. The evening's performance, announced as her benefit, was Donizetti's Anna Bolena, slightly compressed, and the grand scena from Tancredi, "O patria dolce." The house was very full, and most fashionably attended. The singing of Madame Bishop created an immense sensation. She was hailed with cheers repeatedly throughout the opera. The acting of Madame Bishop was no less the theme of admiration. She possesses great fire and vigour, and the subdued portions of her performance are marked by fine discrimination and taste. Her pathos, above all, is exceedingly beautiful. With those various and rare qualifications the artist could not fail to rouse the audience to a state of enthusiasm, and there has been seldom more excitement witnessed and heard in a theatre, than there was in the theatre Royal on Friday night. A singular circumstance took place on Friday evening, which tells more loudly than newspaper organs, or voices of friends, the high estimation in which Madame Bishop is held by those who have heard her, and the value they attach to that which they have once heard her sing. After the scena from Tancredi had been encored and repeated, a number of slips were sent round from the front to the stage-door, requesting the fair cantatrice to favour the audience once more with her exquisite new Rondo Finale from L'Elisir d'Amore. Madame Bishop at once consented, and after the interlude, came on in Adina's costume, led by Mr. Reeves as Nemorino, and was received with applause which endured for a considerable time. The Rondo was unanimously encored, and was repeated; and after the curtain fell, Madame Bishop was recalled before the curtain to receive a farewell salutation from an Edinburgh audience. It is really impossible to do justice to the ebullition of genuine feeling of kindness and admiration which roused the assembly when the fair vocalist appeared. Not the gentlemen only, but ladies rose up, and waved their handkerchiefs, and the roar of voices might have been heard at the end of Princes-street, or at Holyrood House. Such a theatrical parting has been rarely seen. It is due to Madame Bishop, as a lady, to state, that her unassuming, gracious, and conciliating behaviour has won the suffrages of all those with whom she came in contact on the stage, whether they were principals or secondaries. It is well known that her attendance at rehearsals was punctual to a moment, and that during rehearsal, although she had been singing every night, she sang in full voice, in order to benefit the other performers. Her conduct in this respect is worthy of remark, and might afford a good lesson to some great singers without a tithe of her ability. Take it for all in all, Madame Bishop's engagement in Edinburgh has been the most successful for very many years. The tenor, Mr. Reeves, seems to improve, as he sings more in consort with Mde. Bishop. We cannot speak very loudly in praise of the band or the chorus. The leader, however, Mr. Mackenzie, is deserving of a good note of comment. He acts as an able general over a very minute and inefficient army.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

There has been no change of performances since our last. La Sonnambula was given on Saturday and on Tuesday, with the new ballet of Thea, and Marie Taglioni's Pas de la Rosière between the acts of the opera. The audience was brilliant and crowded on both occasions. On Thursday there was no performance. To-night Ernani will be given.

Gardoni has confirmed the impression he produced on his first appearance in Elvino. We cannot pay him a greater compliment than to say that he is worthy of being associated with Rubini and Mario in the personation of that arduous character, at once the fear and the desire of youthful tenors. With the public he is already as great a favorite as ever trod the boards of Her Majesty's Theatre. Castellan is always graceful and unpretending. Balfe is effecting wonders with his orchestra and chorus. The Boreas of the Chronicle may bluster till his cheeks burst, he cannot prevent the public from appreciating real merit wherever it is to be found.

The new ballet of Thea has completely won the public heart. A more picturesque and beautiful spectacle was never placed upon the stage. As for Carolina Rosati, after what has been said of her in The Times, we despair of apostrophizing her in adequate terms. Nevertheless, we propose dedicating an "æsthetic column" to her, and the fascinating Marie Taglioni, on a near occasion. The Bouquet, with Rosati as the rose, creates a furor night after night, and the step in which she ties her pretty feet in a knot, and unties them again, is like a little bit of flickering sunshine demonstrated in choregraphy. A triple encore is the invariable sequence, and Rosati, never tired, grows lithier and stronger with each repetition. Little Taglioni is a flower that one fears to caress lest one should crush it. Her pas in the second tableau is inimitable for natural simplicity and grace. With no other danseuses than these Mr. Lumley's ballet would be complete. What will it be when Grahm, and Cerito, and Taglioni, and Perrot, and above all, the peerless Carlotta, shall arrive!

Mr. Lumley has thus accomplished his ante-Easter season with singular credit to his establishment. The question is no longer how he will get artists of sufficient consequence to carry him through, but how he can find enough to do for the artists he has secured. He has really an embarras de richesses. Six months ago he had nothing before him but despair—an empty stage and empty benches. But, as it were, by a waive of his hand, he has summoned before him a goodly array of talent; he has created a new atmosphere of stars of the first magnitude; he has made a world out of nothing. Balfe, his faithful lieutenant, has seconded him with all the zeal and energy for which his character is remarkable. He has collected a mighty band of vocalists and instrumentalists, which he has organized and marshalled into discipline. It was thought impossible to find either singers or players, but here is a goodly host of them, armed at all points, and ready to do battle in the cause of their general. The fuss made about Jenny Lind and Mendelssohn serves very well to throw dust in the eyes of unreflecting persons; but Jenny Lind will be shortly here, and Mendelssohn too, to speak for themselves; and that Mr. Lumley will be justified by both of them, we do not, and never did, entertain a doubt.

Let us summon common sense to aid us in the argument. Those who know Mendelssohn, and those who have been with him lately, are perfectly aware that he takes an immense interest in the rivalry now going on between the two Operas. A gentleman who has lately come from Germany, and has been staying with Mendelssohn at his own house, assures us that he talks of nothing else. With him it is a national question—a question of rivalry between two opposite schools, the German and the Italian. Need we insist upon a matter so well-known as the entire want of sympathy which Mendelssohn entertains for the latter, and the devotion with which he adheres to the former? "Oh," he has been heard to exclaim, "let Mr. Lumley get Jenny Lind, and he will have it all his own way." Jenny Lind is a German singer, and Mendelssohn prefers German singers to Italian singers, as he prefers German composers to Italian composers. The truth is, that in this question, which is to him a question of art, Mendelssohn is all for Mr. Lumley. Arguing from these facts, which are authentic and incontrovertible, is it at all preposterous to suppose that Mendelssohn was in treaty with the director of Her Majesty's Theatre to write an opera, and that opera The Tempest of Shakspeare? Is it not, on the contrary, rather probable than improbable? That Scribe has made a libretto from the text we know; that a literary gentleman in England has been engaged to translate it into Italian verse, we know. Is it, then, at all likely that Mr. Lumley would have entered into these engagements for the mere gratification of throwing away his money? Moreover, we have heard Mendelssohn declare, that, if ever he wrote an opera, The Tempest would be the subject of his choice. Again, those who know how particular Mendelssohn is in finishing his works, how long a time he occupies in their completion, and with what reluctance he allows them to go out of his hands before they have received the last polishing touches of his pen, will not be at all astonished that an opera promised by him for one year should not be ready till the next. Mendelssohn does not, and will not, compose to order—he waits for inspiration. How long was Elijah expected before it was produced? Why, even at the last moment, only three weeks before the Birmingham Festival, he wrote to a friend in London, and in the course of his letter expressed a hope that his oratorio might be ready in time—hinting, thereby, that it was by no means a certainty. And when it was produced, disdaining his triumph, he took away with him, to Germany, the score and all the vocal and orchestral parts, with the intention of revising and correcting. He was not satisfied. How much less easily would he be satisfied with an opera, which, were he ever so discontented, after hearing one performance, he could not possibly withdraw without injuring the theatre at which it might be produced. An oratorio is given once during a music meeting; an opera must be given many times during the season, to repay the expense of getting it out, and must continue to be represented, with all its faults on its head. Elijah was performed once, achieved a triumph, was withdrawn by the composer, who was not satisfied, although the public was, and has never been played since, any where, although all Germany is anxious to hear it. The Tempest, on the contrary, once represented, must remain at the manager's disposal, until it has served his turn and run out its attraction. On these grounds we reiterate the belief we have so often expressed, that the promised opera of Mendelssohn is no invention of Mr. Lumley's, but a thing actually contemplated, and, for ought we know, in process of completion. At the same time, we shall not be at all surprised, knowing Mendelssohn's character, his love for his art, and the sedulous care he takes of a reputation at once the most brilliant and the most solid in musical Europe—we shall not, we repeat, be at all surprised if the production of the opera be deferred till next season. Mendelssohn will not be hurried in the composition of his small, much less of his great works—and for this who can blame Mr. Lumley? In arguing thus, we do but render justice where it is due—to Mr. Lumley's integrity, which we will not see unfairly impeached, and to Mendelssohn's sensitiveness, which is one of those traits in his character that constitute him so thoroughly the great and conscientious artist. Meanwhile the long rhapsody, published in the Morning Chronicle, on Thursday, we set down at its proper value. To those who judge impartially and think seriously it signifies nothing. Supporting our claims to be called unbiassed and impartial, however, we quote that portion of it which relates exclusively to Jenny Lind and to Mendelssohn.

"Our present object is to refer to the two great causes of complaint specified in the above article against the Morning Chronicle. We are accused of not believing in the advent of Jenny Lind, and of having pronounced the promised opera of the Tempest, by Mendelssohn, to be moonshine. As to the 'Jenny Lind' vexed question, we have never published a line that was not based on documentary evidence. We have expressed our opinion that she would never come to London with two contracts against her, and our opinion was grounded on Jenny Lind's verbal declarations and her own letters. If we should prove to be wrong, therefore, it will be Jenny Lind herself who has deceived us and the public."

There is no deception in the matter, nor any thing that insinuates a hint of Mr. Lumley's want of faith. The practice of "buying off" engagements, by paying the dedits, is no novelty, and thus stands the case:—Jenny Lind is engaged to appear at Drury Lane for a stipulated sum in the year 1845. She does not come to her engagement, and two years pass over without any claim for damages or compensation on the part of the Drury Lane management. In 1847 an offer, on a much larger scale, is made to her by the director of Her Majesty's Theatre. Having heard nothing, meanwhile, from Drury Lane, Jenny Lind thinks herself (naturally enough) free to accept, and accepts the new offer. In the interim arises the competition between the two operas in London, and as a corollary thereto, the threatened action for damages on the part of the first engager. Jenny Lind takes fright, and is coy in fulfilling her new engagement with Mr. Lumley. In the name of reason and of right, how can Mr. Lumley be blamed for this? He might decently have withdrawn Jenny Lind's name from the bills and have let the matter drop. But no—Mr. Lumley thinks too seriously of his devoir to the public, and eschewing a disappointment that he could not possibly foresee, he offers, in addition to the large amount of the stipulated terms to the songstress, to pay two thousand pounds as a compensation to the lessee of Drury Lane Theatre. If that functionary declines this liberal proposition, is it the proposer's fault? Evidently no—and none but interested persons could possibly fix the charge upon him. In respect to Mendelssohn the Chronicle remarks:—

"The 'Mendelssohn' affair, we repeat, was not only mere 'moonshine,' but something worse: what word is required to characterise this transaction we shall leave to the imagination of our readers. We find the following pledge in the prospectus of her Majesty's Theatre for the season 1847, issued on the 19th of January last:—

"The celebrated Dr. Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy will likewise visit England, and produce an opera expressly composed for her Majesty's Theatre, the libretto founded on 'The Tempest' of Shakspeare, written by M. Scribe.

Miranda,	Madlle. JENNY LIND,
Ferdinand,	Signor GARDONI,
Caliban,	Herr STAUDIGL,
Prospero,	Signor LABLACHE."

Now we distinctly repeat that Mendelssohn never gave a promise nor entered into an engagement to compose the opera of 'The Tempest,' and that he has written to Mr. Lumley to withdraw his name from the prospectus and advertisements, as he (Mendelssohn) did not intend to produce the opera in the season 1847. And yet in the 'programme' of Her Majesty's Theatre, of March 23, 1847, that is, only last Tuesday, it is declared, 'by authority,' that the statements of the Morning Chronicle 'are skimbleskamble stuff,' and the subscribers are led to believe that the pledges in the prospectus of Her Majesty's Theatre will be fulfilled in every respect."

When Mendelssohn, with his own lips, or in a letter signed with his name, shall declare that he never had an engagement to write an opera for Mr. Lumley, we shall believe it, and not till then. His silence on the subject is presumptive evidence in favour of the lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre. At the same time we entirely agree with the writer in the Athenæum, that it was Mendelssohn's duty to his friends in England, no less than to his European reputation, to have set the public right, and the matter at rest, long ago. The sophistry of the Chronicle may be easily exposed by reference to the two portions of the last paragraph, which are printed in italics. The first declares that Mendelssohn "never gave a promise, or entered into an engagement" to write the opera; and the second, assumes that he has written to Mr. Lumley, stating that he "did not intend to produce the opera in the season 1847." The dishonest inconsistency of this is plain enough for a child to penetrate. If Mendelssohn never thought of composing the opera at all, what reason was there for his writing to say that he was not going to produce it in 1847? Why 1847 any more than 1867? But time will speak the truth, and we have little doubt, in justifying Mr. Lumley, that it will prove our words correct.

THE AFFINITIES.

from the German of Göthe.

Continued from page 187.

PART II.—CHAPTER VII.

So far as the architect desired that the best might befall his patronesses, it was agreeable for him, when he departed, to know that they were in the good company of the valuable assistant to the school; but inasmuch as the latter drew the favor of the ladies to himself, the architect felt it in some degree painful to find his place so soon, and as his modesty admitted, so well, nay, so perfectly supplied. Hitherto he had always delayed, but now he was forced away; for that which he would be compelled to put up with when absent, he was unwilling to endure when present.

It served much to cheer him in the midst of these half-mournful feelings, that the ladies, on his departure, presented him with a waistcoat, which he had seen them both embroidering for a long time, not without silently envying the happy man to whom it might once belong. Such a gift is the pleasantest which a loving, respectful man, can receive—since, if he thinks of the unwearying toil of the fair fingers, he cannot help flattering himself that the heart will not be entirely without participation, during so constant a work.

The ladies had now to entertain a new gentleman, towards whom they felt kindly intentions, and who, they thought, ought to be happy when with them. The fair sex harbour a peculiar, internal, unchangeable interest, which nothing in the world can make them abandon, while, on the other hand, in external social relations, they allow themselves willingly and easily to be surveyed by the man who gives them occupation, and thus by repulsiveness and susceptibility, by firmness and yielding, they carry on that government, from which, in the social world, no man can emancipate himself.

If the Architect, as it were, according to his own good will and pleasure, had exercised and displayed his talent for the pleasure and utility of his friends—if his occupation and converse had been with this feeling, and according to their views, the presence of the Teacher soon brought with it another mode of life. His great gift was to speak well, and discourse in conversation upon the relations of humanity,—especially those connected with the education of youth. And thus a tolerably palpable contrast to the former course of life was produced; the more so, as the Teacher did not entirely approve of the manner in which the time hitherto had been exclusively employed.

Of the living picture, which had received him on his arrival, he did not speak at all. When, on the other hand, with complacency, they showed him the church, the chapel, and the things connected with them, he could not suppress his feelings and his opinions upon the subject. "For my own part," said he, "I am by no means pleased with this mingling of the sacred with the sensual—I am not pleased when persons set apart, consecrate, and deck out certain particular places thus, for the first time, to harbour and sustain a feeling of piety. No external circumstance—not even the commonest—should disturb in us that feeling of the divine, which can accompany us everywhere, and consecrate every spot into a temple. I like to see the divine service of a household performed in a room, where people are accustomed to eat, to meet socially together, to amuse themselves with playing and dancing. That which is highest, which is most distinguished in man, is formless; and we should avoid giving it any other form than that of noble deeds."

Charlotte, who already had a general notion of his sentiments, and inquired into them still more closely in a short time, at once made him active in his own way, by causing the garden-boys, who had been trained by the architect shortly before his departure, to march into the great hall, where they looked exceedingly well in their gay, clean uniforms, with their regular movements, and a certain natural liveliness. The Teacher examined them in his own fashion—some, by a number of questions and terms, displayed the disposition and capacities of the children; and, in less than an hour, without seeming to do anything of the kind, really advanced and instructed them to an important degree.

"How do you manage it?" said Charlotte, as the boys departed. "I have listened very attentively. Nothing has been touched upon, excepting things perfectly familiar; and yet I do not know how, in so short a time, and with so much desultory talking, I should contrive to make them speak with such consistency."

"Perhaps," replied the Teacher, "one ought to make a secret of the advantages of one's profession. Nevertheless, I cannot conceal from you the simple maxim, according to which this, and still more, may be effected. Comprehend an object, a matter, a conception, or what else you please to call it; hold it firmly, make it plain to yourself in all its parts, and then you will find it easy, in the way of dialogue, to ascertain, among a mass of children, how much of it is already developed in them, and what has to be excited or taught. The answers to your questions may be as unsuitable, may be as wide from the mark as possible, provided your counter-question again draws the mind within, and you do not allow yourself to be moved from your own point. Thus the children must at last think, comprehend, be convinced, but only of that, and in that manner, which the teacher pleases. The greatest fault, on his part, is to allow himself to be led from the mark by his pupils, so that he cannot hold them to the point of which he is actually treating. Only try this at the earliest opportunity, and you will be greatly amused."

"This is pleasant," said Charlotte; "a good method of education is precisely the reverse of the rules of good society. In society one ought to adhere to nothing; in education it is the highest command to contend against all distraction."

"Variety, without distraction, would be the finest motto for teachers and for life, if this estimable balance were but easily obtained," said the Teacher, and he was proceeding further, when Charlotte called upon him once more to look at the boys, who, in long procession, were then in the act of passing through the court. He testified his satisfaction at the circumstance, that the boys were obliged to go in uniform. "Men," he said, "should wear an uniform from youth upward, because they must accustom themselves to act together; to link themselves among their fellows, to obey in a mass, and to work for a whole. Moreover, every kind of uniform favours the military disposition, as well as a more disciplined and decided course of conduct; and, besides, all boys are born soldiers, as we may see by their games of battle and contention, their stormings and their climbings."

"Then," said Ottilia, "you will not blame me for giving no uniform dress to my girls. When I bring them before you, I hope to please you with an agreeable mixture."

"Of that I greatly approve," replied the Teacher; "ladies should always be variously attired—every one in her own fashion, that she may learn what is really appropriate and becoming to her. A still more important cause is, because she is destined through her whole life to stand alone and to act alone."

"That appears to me very paradoxical," observed Charlotte; "we are scarcely ever for ourselves."

"Oh, yes," replied the Teacher, "with respect to other women, you certainly are. Only consider a lady as in love—as a bride—as a wife, as a housewife and mother, she always stands isolated, is alone, and likes to be alone. Even the vain woman furnishes a case in point. Every woman excludes the others, according to her very nature; since, from every one, everything is exacted, which the whole sex is bound to afford. It is not so with men. One man deceives another—would create for himself another, if none were existing, while a woman could live on eternally, without thinking of producing another of her sex."

"One need only," remarked Charlotte, "say what is true in an odd way, and at last, what is merely odd, appears true. We will take to ourselves what is best in your observations, and, nevertheless, as ladies hold together with ladies—aye, and work in common, too, that we may not give the men too great an advantage over us. Nay, you will not grudge us the little malicious pleasure, which we must feel the more vividly, when the gentlemen do not remarkably agree together."

With much attention, the Teacher now investigated the manner in which Ottilia treated her little pupils, and on this subject testified his decided approbation. "You very rightly," said he, "bring up your subjects to immediate utility only. Cleanliness accustoms the children to set a value upon themselves, and all is gained, if they are excited to do what they have to do with cheerfulness and self-respect."

He also found, to his great delight, that nothing was done for the sake of appearance, and with a reference to externals, but all with a reference to the internal, and to absolute necessities. "With how few words!" he exclaimed, "might the whole business of education be expressed, if every one had ears to hear!"

"But you will not try with me," said Ottilia, affectionately.

"Yes, I will, readily," replied the teacher, "let boys be brought up as servants, and girls as mothers, and all will go right."

"As for the mothers," said Ottilia, "the ladies may let that pass, since even if they are not mothers, they must always make up their mind to act as nurses. But our young men would think much too highly of themselves to become servants, since we can easily see in every one of them, that he deems himself more fitting to command."

"On this account we will conceal it from them," said the teacher "we flatter ourselves into life, but life flatters us not. How many men would like to do that voluntarily, which they are obliged to do in the end? But let us leave these reflections, which do not concern us now."

"I congratulate you that you are all to employ a right method with your pupils. If your smallest girls go about with dolls, and stitch together a few rags to clothe them; if the elder girls take care of the younger, and the house thus serves and assists itself; then the further step into life is not great, and such a girl finds in her husband what she has quitted with her parents."

"But with the educated classes the problem is very complicated. We have to pay regard to high, more delicate, finer, and especially, social relations. Hence we teachers must cultivate our pupils with a view to external effect. This is necessary and indispensable, and would be quite right, if the bounds were not overstepped; for while the intention is to train children for a more extended sphere, they are easily driven into the unlimited, and that which their internal nature properly demands is no longer kept in view. Here lies the problem, in the solution of which preceptors will more or less fail or succeed."

"Many of the accomplishments, with which we adorn our pupils at the school renders me uneasy, because experience tells me of how little use they will be in future. How much is thrown aside, how much is consigned to oblivion, as soon as a lady finds herself in the situation of a housewife, or a mother."

"In the meanwhile, as I have once devoted myself to this profession, I cannot refrain from the pious wish, that I shall some day, in company with a female assistant, succeed in perfectly cultivating in my pupils that of which they stand in need, when they pass into the field of their own activity and independence, so that I may be able to say to myself, 'in this sense is their education completed.' But, indeed, another education is sure to be added, which nearly in every year of our life is occasioned by circumstances, if not by ourselves."

How true did Ottilia find this remark! How much had she been educated during the past year by an unexpected passion! What temptations did she see floating before her, if she only looked to the immediate future!

The young man had not undesignedly made mention of an assistant—a wife, since with all his modesty he could not avoid hinting at his views in a remote fashion. Nay, many circumstances and events had moved him to approach some steps nearer to his aim, on the occasion of this visit.

The Governess of the school was already advanced in years. She had long looked among her assistants, male and female, for a person who should regularly enter into partnership with her, and had at last made the proposal to the Teacher, in whom she had great reason to place confidence. He was to conduct the establishment together with her, and after her death was to succeed as heir and sole possessor. The chief matter now seemed to be that he should find a suitable wife. In secret, he had Ottilia before his eyes, and in his heart; but, nevertheless, many doubts were excited which again were in some measure balanced by favorable events. Luciana had left the school; Ottilia was more at liberty to return. Something had, indeed, been whispered about the affair with Edward, but the matter, like other occurrences of the sort, had been heard with indifference. Nay, the very event might be conducive towards the return of Otilia. However, no resolution would have been formed, no step would have been taken, had not an unexpected visit given a particular impulse. In any sphere, the appearance of important persons cannot be without its consequences.

The Count and the Baroness, who so often found themselves in the situation of being questioned as to the value of different schools, because almost every one is embarrassed about the education of his children, had resolved to become especially acquainted with this one, of which so much good had been said, and could, in their new position, make such an experiment together. But the Baroness had also another design in view. During her last residence with Charlotte, she had circumstantially talked over with her the whole affair concerning Edward and Otilia. Again she insisted on this one point—Otilia must be removed. She endeavored for this purpose to give courage to Charlotte, who still stood in awe of Edwards' threats. Different expedients were talked over; and, while on the subject of the boarding-school, the Teacher's predilection for Otilia likewise came under discussion, and the Baroness resolved all the more to pay her intended visit.

She arrives, and becomes acquainted with the Teacher. The establishment is surveyed, and Otilia is mentioned. The Count likes to talk about her, having handed to him her letter during the last visit. She had approached him—nay, was even attracted by him, because she thought that by his solid conversation she would see and know that which had hitherto remained unknown to her. And as, in Edward's society, she forgot the world, so in the presence of the Count did the world first appear desirable. Every attraction is mutual. The Count felt an inclination for Otilia, and liked to regard her as a daughter. Here, again, she was in the way of the Baroness, and more so than at first. Who knows what this lady might have contrived against her in the days of a warmer passion? Now it was enough if, by marrying her, she could make her harmless to married ladies.

She, therefore, in a gentle, though effective manner, sagaciously invited the Teacher to undertake a little expedition to the castle, and without delay to approach the realization of those plans and wishes, which he had communicated to her without reserve.

With the full consent of the Governess, he set out on his journey, harboring the best hopes in his mind. He knew that Otilia was not unfavorably disposed towards him, and if there was some difference of rank between them, the spirit of the times would easily set that straight. Moreover, the Baroness had made him sensible that Otilia would always remain a poor girl. "It was no advantage," she said, "to be related to a wealthy family, for, however great the fortune, one would scruple to take a large sum from those who by reason of greater proximity seem to have a more complete right to the property." And it is certainly strange that man seldom employs, for the benefit of his favorites, the great privilege of disposing of his property after death; but, as it seems from regard to ancient usage, only favors those, who would possess his property after him, if he had no will at all.

His feelings on the journey made him quite Otilia's equal, and his hopes were increased by a kind reception. He did not, indeed, find Otilia so frank towards him as she was wont to be, but she was more matured—more educated—and, we may say, altogether more communicative than he had known her. They allowed him familiarly to investigate much that had especial reference to his department. Yet, when he was about to draw near his object, he was restrained by a certain internal timidity.

Once, however, Charlotte gave him an opportunity, when, in presence of Otilia, she said to him, "Now, you have examined pretty closely all that is growing up in my sphere—how do you find Otilia?" You are at liberty to express your opinion in her presence."

Upon this the Teacher, with a great deal of discernment and a calm expression, stated how greatly Otilia was altered to advantage, as far as concerned a freer deportment, a more ready mode of communication, and a higher glance into worldly affairs, which was shown more in her actions than in her words; but he added, that he thought it would be greatly to her advantage if she returned for some time to the school, to appropriate to herself, fundamentally and permanently, what the world gives only in fragments—producing more confusion than satisfaction, and often coming too late. "He did not wish," he said, "to enlarge on the subject; Otilia herself best knew from what a connected course of instruction she had been torn."

This Otilia could not deny; but she could not confess what she felt at these words, as she scarcely knew how to interpret it for herself. It seemed to her that there was nothing unconnected in the world, if she thought of the man she loved; and she did not comprehend how, without him, anything could be connected.

Charlotte replied to the offer with judicious kindness, saying that both herself and Otilia had long desired a return to the school. At this time, indeed, the presence of so dear a friend and assistant had been indispensable, but henceforth she would raise no obstacle, if it were still Otilia's wish to return to the school, and remain there long enough to complete what she had begun, and perfectly to appropriate to herself what had been interrupted.

The assistant received this offer with joy. Otilia could say nothing against this, although she shuddered at the very thought. Charlotte, on the other hand, thought to gain time; she hoped that Edward would only return to find himself a happy father, for then, she was convinced, all would come right, and Otilia would be provided for, in some way or other.

After an important conversation, which affords matter for reflection to all who participate in it, there generally comes a certain pause, which resembles a general embarrassment. They walked up and down in the room, the Teacher turned over some books, and at last came to the folio which had remained lying since Luciana's time. When he saw that it contained nothing but apes, he closed it immediately. This occurrence probably gave rise to a conversation, of which we find traces in Otilia's diary.

FROM OTILIA'S DIARY.

How can we reconcile it to our feelings to copy disgusting apes so carefully? We already humiliate ourselves when we regard them only as animals, but we become really malicious, when we obey an inclination to look out for persons of our acquaintance under such marks.

A certain perverseness is required to amuse one's self readily with caricatures and distorted pictures. I owe it to our good Teacher, that I have not been tormented with Natural History; I could never feel on friendly terms with worms and chafers.

On this occasion he confessed to me that it was the same with him. Of nature, he said, "We should know nothing except the living things which immediately surround us. With the trees that bloom, grow green, bear fruit around us—with every shrub which we pass—with every blade of grass over which we walk, we have a veritable relation—they are our true compatriots. The birds which hop backwards and forwards in our boughs, and sing in our bower, belong to us—speak to us from our youth upward, and we learn to understand their language. Let us only ask ourselves, whether every strange creature, torn from its natural circumstances, does not make upon us a certain painful impression, which is only deadened by custom. A varied, bustling sort of life is required to endure the presence of apes, parrots and negroes."

Often, when a curious desire after such strange things has come over me, I have envied the traveller who sees such wonders in living constant connection with other wonders. But he, in his turn, becomes another man.

That investigator of nature is alone worthy of respect who knows how to represent and describe to us the most foreign singular things, with their locality and vicinity, and always in their most peculiar element. How much I should like once to hear Humboldt describing.

A cabinet of natural curiosities may appear to us like an Egyptian tomb, where the different idols, animal and vegetable, stand round embalmed. It is suitable enough, for a priest-caste to busy itself with them in a mysterious gloom; but such things should not be introduced into general instruction, especially as they may easily supplant what is nearer and more estimable.

A teacher, who can awaken in us the feeling for one good deed, for one good feeling, does more than one who gives us whole series of subordinate natures, according to their form and name; for the whole result is no more than we may have without the trouble—namely, that the human form above all, and most peculiarly, bears in itself the image of the Deity.

Let individuals be free to occupy themselves with whatever attracts them, gives them pleasure, or seems useful to them, but after all—"The proper study of mankind is man."

(To be continued.)

. To prevent misunderstanding, it may be stated that the copyright of this translation belongs solely to the translator.

SONNET.

NO. XXVII.

WHEN I have press'd thine hand within mine own,
Hast thou ne'er felt how fierce the grasp has been,
As though my hand would crush the hand within,
Or hold it till together they had grown?
By that wild pressure, love, would I make known
That cancer, pain, which holds my heart between Its firm unyielding claws, and works unseen,
Nor e'en allows one solitary groan.
And in all love there is a savage bliss
In giving some slight pain where we adore,
As though that pain were witness of our truth.
'Twas thus the ancients had their "biting kias,"
And love was never deem'd complete before
The blood burst forth beneath the lover's tooth.

N. D.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE MARSEILLAISE.—In the garrison of Strasburgh was quartered a young artillery officer, named Rouget de Lisle, a native of Lous le Saulnier, in the Jura. He had a great taste for music and poetry, and often entertained his comrades during their long and tedious hours in garrison. Sought after for his musical and poetical talent, he was a frequent and familiar guest at the house of one Dietrich, an Alsatian patriot, mayor of Strasburgh. The winter of 1792 was a period of great scarcity at Strasburgh. The house of Dietrich was poor, his table was frugal, but a seat was always open to Rouget de Lisle. One day, when there was nothing but bread and some slices of smoked ham on the table, Dietrich, regarding the young officer, said to him with a sad serenity, "Abundance fails at our boards, but what matters that, if enthusiasm fails not at our civic fetes, nor courage in the hearts of our soldiers. I have still a last bottle of wine in my cellar. Bring it," said he to one of his daughters, "and let us drink to France and liberty. Strasburgh should soon have its patriotic solemnity. De Lisle must draw from these last drops one of those hymns which raise the soul of the people." The wine was brought and drank, after which the officer departed. The night was cold. De Lisle was thoughtful. His heart was moved; his head heated. He returned staggering to his solitary room, and slowly sought inspiration, sometimes in the fervour of his citizen soul, and anon on the keys of his instrument, composing now the air before the words, and then the words before the air. He sang all and wrote nothing, and at last, exhausted, fell asleep with his head resting on his instrument, and awoke not till daybreak. The music of the night returned to his mind like the impression of a dream. He wrote it, and ran to Dietrich, whom he found in the garden digging winter lettuces. The wife and daughters of the old man were not yet up. Dietrich awoke them, and called in some friends, all as passionate as himself for music, and able to execute the composition of De Lisle. At the first stanza cheeks grew pale, at the second tears flowed, and at the last the delirium of enthusiasm burst forth. The wife of Dietrich, his daughters, himself, and the young officer threw themselves crying in each other's arms. The hymn of the country was found. Executed some days afterwards in Strasburgh, the new song flew from city to city, and was played by all the popular orchestras. Marseilles adopted it to be sung at the commencement of the sittings of its clubs, and the Marseillaises spread it through France, singing it along the public roads. From this came the name of "Marseillaise.—Lamertine's Histoire des Girondins.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA COVENT-GARDEN.—Signor Tamburini arrived in London on Wednesday night, at Mivart's Hotel, accompanied by his son, in good health and spirits. The Assur in Semiramide has been consequently the first arrival. Letters from Paris also announce that the new Arsace, Mdlle. Alboni, the great contralto, had reached that capital on Monday last from Venice, as also the tenor Lavia, who will be the Idreno, and the basso Polonini, the High Priest in Semiramide. Advices have been received from all the leading artists, except Alba, the basso, who was at Barcelona, that they were on their way to London, to fulfil their engagements at the Royal Italian Opera. Before the end of next week Madame Grisi, Madame Persiani, Madame Ronconi, and Mdlle. Steffanone (Prime Donne), Mario, Salvi, Lavia, and Tulli (tenors). Alboni (contralto), Corbari (mezzo soprano), Ley, Marini, Rovere, Polonini (basses), and Tamburini and Ronconi (baritones), with the artists for secondary parts, will be at their post. The decorator (Mr. Ponsonby) and assistants are now engaged in fixing the ornamental devices for the fronts of each tier of boxes, of the two amphitheatres and of the gallery. The beautiful ceiling is now open to view, the colossal scaffolding having been removed, except the portion under the proscenium, which Signor Verardi is now painting. Mr. Albano, whose untiring energy has accomplished the herculean task of re-constructing the interior in less than four months, has undertaken that before the close of the ensuing week, everything shall be ready for the full stage rehearsals. Heavy bets are pending as to the opening of the Theatre on Tuesday, the 6th of April, but the indefatigable architect, or rather civil Engineer, for such is Mr. Albano's profession, has never for one moment since he began his enormous labours in the first week in December, expressed the slightest doubt on the subject, and those who have watched the progress in the works, day by day, could but feel perfect confidence in him, when such marvels were evident at every successive stage. Printed regulations for carriages, and for the facilities of egress and ingress, will be ready in a few days. In order that there may be no interruption to the labours of the upholsterer and decorator, it will be found absolutely necessary to exclude visitors to view the theatre, after this day, except the subscribers, and artists engaged in illustrating the splendid interior. After a careful inspection of every portion of the theatre, the certificate of the official referees, or government surveyors under the Metropolitan Building Act, has been given as to the solidity of the works, the massiveness of which has elicited the approbation of the most eminent architects and builders. The novel and ingenious plans of Mr. Albano to warm and ventilate the theatre have been much admired.—Chronicle.

MADLE MARS, the celebrated French actress, died lately in Paris, at a very advanced age.

THE PATENT HARMONIUM.—We heard so much of the extraordinary qualities of this instrument, that we were determined to ascertain and investigate the truth thereof. Accordingly, we repaired, on critical thoughts intent, to the manufactory of Luff and Co., Great Russell Street, Bloomsbury, the agent for the patentee, and, by good fortune, arrived just as Mr. Julian Adams was expounding the magical properties of the Harmonium to a knot of inquirers. Mr. Julian Adams is a professor of this instrument; and from his masterly performance we were able to gain a tolerable insight into its mysteries. The Harmonium is scarcely as large as a piccolo pianoforte: it possesses immense advantages over every instrument capable of yielding but one tone: and it combines the variety of the organ with the facility and delicacy of the piano. The patent Harmonium contains twelve stops of the usual qualities, which are capable of being so varied, that the performer may produce all the effects of a full band. By a certain management of these stops an extent of seven octaves may be obtained; though, with regard to the notes used, the Harmonium contains but five and a half, or six octaves. The tone is mellow, loud, or reedy, according as the various stops are used: and when the Grand Jeu is drawn a volume of tone is produced equal to a very loud organ. This instrument may be used for more purposes than those of sacred performances, the delicacy of its touch allowing the most rapid passages to be played on it with effect; and a particular management of the stops rendering it so that it may sound in every respect equal to a piano. The Harmonium may be made available at church, concert room, or private abode. We cannot too strongly recommend this admirable instrument.

MR. ALLCROFT'S CONCERT.—We beg leave to call the attention of our readers to the splendid programme put forth by Mr. Allcroft for his concert next Tuesday. All the first-rate talent in the metropolis is engaged, and a musical feast is prepared that can rarely be enjoyed.

PROVINCIAL.

BRISTOL.—From a Correspondent)—Madame Anna Bishop commenced her short engagement at the Bristol Theatre on Monday last—the opera was La Sonnambula—the fair cantatrice's reception was splendid. In her first cavatina she received three cheers of applause, and throughout the opera she was immensely applauded; her last rondo finale was encored with enthusiasm, and she was called before the curtain with acclamations. On Tuesday, the 23d, she sings at Bath, and on Thursday evening we shall have the Maid of Artois. The house last night was well attended.

EDINBURGH.—Association for the Revival of Sacred Music.—On Tuesday the classes of this institution were examined in the Music Hall at a morning and evening meeting. Among those who were present in the morning and evening (and some of them on both occasions), we observed the Chairman of the Association, Lord Murray, the Hon. Mr. Primrose, Sir George Warrender, Lady Ruthven, Sir George and Lady Harriet Suttie, Lady Arbuthnot, Lady Keith Murray, Sir William Murray, Sir James Ramsay, Robert Graham, Esq., David Milne, Esq., of Milne Graden, Richard Trotter, Esq., of Morton Hall; Professors Pillans, Donaldson, and Smith; Rev. Dr. Grant, Rev. R. H. Stevenson, Robert Paul Esq., Dr. Schmits, rector of the High School, &c. At the morning examination 700 children were present, and made a very gratifying appearance, demonstrating that they had been taught, not only to read and sing musical notes correctly, but that the ear had been cultivated to distinguish, and to translate into musical notation, any tune which they might hear. During the examination some melodies and some pieces from Mozart were handed by the directors to Dr. Mainzer to play, and the pupils, although they had never heard them before, very readily and successfully stated the notes of which they were composed. "The Shepherd Boy" was sung by some children from three to five years of age. "Oh, had I Jubal's Lyre," from Handel's Oratorio, was sung by fifteen children. In the evening about 200 of the more advanced children sang several compositions of Handel, Shield, Arnold, Kent, Cherubini, &c., in a manner to elicit deserved applause. The Association has been nearly three years in existence, and has demonstrated its efficiency to promote a revival of sacred vocal music, so greatly needed throughout Scotland, and to supply the humbler classes of society with innocent and rational amusement.—Evening Courant.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.—Mr. Harrison's benefit drew a crowded audience on Thursday night. The popular tenor selected Balfe's clever opera of the Daughter of St. Mark, and a fragment of Masaniello, in both of which he sung with immense applause, and exerted himself with unflagging spirit. Miss Messent highly distinguished herself in the soprano part in the last mentioned opera, and won golden opinions from the public. The theatre closes to night until Easter week, when a magnificent Easter entertainment will be produced. The engagement of the clever M. Blasis, and his charming and intelligent pupil, Marietta Baderna, concludes to night. They are both secured by Mr. Beale, of the Royal Italian Opera. The forthcoming grand Easter spectacle of this theatre is called The Desert: or, The Imaun's Daughter, and will, it is said, surpass all previous productions of this kind at Drury Lane. Two immense elephants, twelve camels, upwards of sixty horses, one hundred choristers, &c. will appear in the passage across the Desert by the caravan. Several new and striking effects of combined scenery and machinery will take place, among which the halt of the Caravan in the Desert; the Caravan attacked by the Bedouins; the representation of the Simoom; or the Wind of Fire, with the rising of the sand, will not be the least effective. The principal part of the music will be taken from Felicien David's Le Desert, and all the choral, and some of the operatic strength of the theatre will be used. To give every effect to the procession, Mr. Hughes has been engaged to supply the Mammoth carriages from his equestrian establishment lately arrived in this country. To give some notion of the size and magnificence of these vehicles, we shall make an extract from the Leicester Mercury, in which they are described at full:—

"THE SPLENDID 'MAMMOTH' CARRIAGES.—We have been highly gratified this week to see the splendid new pictorial carriages which are now being built for Mr. Hughes, the proprietor of the well-known 'Mammoth' Equestrian Establishment. These carriages may truly be described as of a most novel description. They are lofty and long, and on each side the panels are divided into three compartments by rich gilt carvings in the Louis-Quatorze style, and each panel is occupied by a spirited and cleverly-executed painting—one descriptive of some of the peculiarities of Eastern life, another taken from the history of the Crusaders, another depicting a mountainous and rocky pass with a troop of horsemen desfilng through it, and others again giving representations of camels, elephants, &c. Most of the sketches from which these paintings are executed, we believe, are originals. The ground-work between the panels is a beautiful ultra-marine blue, cross-hatched with vermilion; and the carving and gilding of the whole outer framing are very rich, and produce an excellent effect. The Queen's arms decorate the hinder part of the carriage; and both the under-carriage and wheels are painted and gilt in a very tasteful manner, the centre of each wheel being appropriately surmounted by a fine lion's face. In addition to the pictorial carriages, the grand camel or band carriage, also belonging to Mr. Hughes, is also well worthy of a visit. It is in the form of two gigantic dragons, which, if the like are not to be found in the drawings of Buffon, are frequently to be met with in the pages of heraldic works; and these two recline on massive gilt carvings. With their long and forked tongues outstretched, they have the appearance of being on the watch for some unhappy traveller.—

'Whose bones they would grind to make their bread.'

The decorations of this carriage (which weighs no less than four tons) are profuse in number, and have been executed with extreme care and elegance."

Mr. Bunn is never wanting in novel resources to gratify his visitors, and we are inclined to believe that he has now hit upon a real means of delighting them, which will redound to his character as a public caterer, and make the treasury pregnant with profit. We trust it may prove so. Mr. Bunn has had many buffes and rebuffs of late, but he stood bravely against them, and beat them back, as a rock beats back the waves that, in their fury, would fain swallow it up. Fortune owes Mr. Bunn a good turn. We trust she won't desert him now. Pardon the pun!!!!

THE HAYMARKET.—The Light Troop of St. James's had on last Saturday a capital reception at this favourite little theatre, for which they were not a little indebted to Mr.

Buckstone, who exploited a single joke with great perseverance and wonderful success. The truth is, a piece with Buckstone in it must be a success. The man's face is a sure laugh whenever he choose to ask for one, and in a farce or light drama he chooses to ask for it at every sentence he utters. This was the case upon Saturday, and the consequence was the complete success of the little piece he acted in. Not that in itself it was bad; on the contrary, although as we said before it rejoiced in one positive joke, it displayed plenty of that scintillating repartee and sparkle which were however borrowed from our neighbours on the other side of the channel. One of the chief attractions of the piece it was indebted to for, was the universal preponderance of female characters, a characteristic which it seems to have copied from Mr. Bourcicault's last comedy, and which we think a very decided improvement on the old system of making up a drama in the proportion of one woman to sixteen men, as if the fair sex were too strong a drug to be used other than sparingly. Enough, however, of discussion dissertatum. Mr. Buckstone and the females dove-tailed into the intrigue of the piece shared with the author the laurels of the night, and we have little doubt that Mr. Webster will derive from his last success every possible pecuniary reasons to be gratified with it, a result not always to be ensured by a night's applause.

PRINCESS'S THEATRE.—A melo drama called the Dream of the Heart, has been during the week produced at this theatre, with scarcely so much success as the neatness of its construction, and the excellent acting of Mrs. Stirling so well deserved. This lady acted a species of mesmerised Sonnambula, which formed the thread of the plot, being worked upon by a half philosophic, half honest scamp, who, on the advice imparted from her slumbering lips, sails from America, and leaves her dear France to wear the orange flowers, and lace of marriage. It is needless to say, that ultimately the wheels of the theatrical fortune rotates to the right place, and the marriage of our heroine is broken, for the purpose of giving her to the arms of her original lover. The plot is not perhaps too substantial, but the neatness of the piece—evidently French,—and the deliciously finished acting of Mrs. Stirling, ought, as we have said before, to have saved it from the half discontent which attended its termination.

Shakspeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream, with Mendelssohn's overture, and other music is preparing in great splendour for the Easter holidays. Auber's opera La Barcarole, is also in rehearsal; and Mrs. Butler will give a series of performances immediately after Easter. So that the management is not idle. But where are the English operas so long expected? That of Mr. Howard Glover for example, and the new one by Macfarren?

FRENCH PLAYS.—“Le Mariage au Tambour” has been played several times since our last. It has turned out a most agreeable addition to Mr. Mitchell's repertoire. The cast was strong, as it included the three stars who now reign triumphant at this elegant little theatre. The story is founded on an episode in the first French Revolution: the heroine, Louise d'Obernay, is the daughter of a noble house, who has aided in the escape of her brother, an officer in the army commanded by Condé: she is, consequently, proscribed by the revolutionary tribunals, and, seeks a refuge in the house of her nurse, where she remains concealed under the disguise of her foster-sister. It happens that a party of Republican soldiers, under the order of Sergeant Lambert, are billeted upon the house: this Sergeant Lambert is himself a nobleman, but he prefers his country to the absurd conventionalities of rank; and he has chosen rather to defend it against the invading army, in a subordinate position, than to enlist in the hostile band of emigrants. Louise is struck by the lofty bearing and gentlemanly manners of the Sergeant, in spite of his affectation of ruggedness and coarseness; she resolves to confide in his honour; and hearing that the regiment is about to pass the Rhine, she adopts the suggestion thrown out by him in jest, and doffing the dress of a Vivandière, she puts herself under his more immediate safeguard, and sets out with the company. Ere twenty-four hours have elapsed the disguised nobleman is deeply enamoured with the pretty Vivandière; and she, unknowingly, is not without acknowledging the merits of the handsome Sergeant, and being struck with the high qualities of his mind—not, however, confessing, even to herself, such a sentiment in favour of one so much beneath herself in rank and station. The admiration of her beauty pervades the whole troop of soldiers, and a furious rivalry springs up amongst them; so much so, that the Captain of the troop calls upon her to select one for her husband. She hesitates; but this only makes matters worse, and to avoid being denounced suspecte, she chooses Lambert, with whom she is forthwith united by le mariage au tambour, the drum-head marriage. Left alone with her husband she appeals to the generous sentiments she has discerned in him, and is not deceived in her confidence. He swears on the cross which he wears next his heart, the last gift of his mother, that he will respect Louise as a beloved sister, stipulating only, that should she consider him worthy of her love, she will avow it by restoring to him the cross he then gives her. (We remember a scene somewhat similar to this in one of Scribe's little vaudevilles, entitled “Un Mariage de Raison,” the only difference being that a key is substituted for the cross). They have just been separated, when the brother of Louise is led in a prisoner; she effects his escape, and flies with him to their friends, beyond the Rhine, leaving Lambert in utter misery at her supposed duplicity, for he fancies that it is her lover with whom she has escaped. In the third act Lambert, now a Colonel, is quartered at the very chateau, in Germany, inhabited by the Vicomte d'Obernay and his sister. Several years have elapsed, but Lambert, although convinced he has been deceived by Louise, still loves her; his tenderness for her has undergone no change. An interview takes place between them, which proves that his suspicions were unfounded, and that he has wronged her by deeming her unfaithful. He now resolves to remove the claim which he had previously resolved to enforce, in order to revenge on her all the pain he had suffered on her account; but she, in whom a long absence had gradually converted into love the inclination she from the first had manifested towards him, and her admiration for his noble qualities and elevated sentiments, restores the cross, and all ends to the satisfaction of the parties concerned. Mademoiselle Fargueil elicited much applause by the admirable manner in which she played the part allotted to her. M. Lafont was perfection in the noble-minded Sergeant, and M. Duméry made a capital Tambour Maître, the real French type. On Thursday, Her Majesty and Prince Albert honoured the theatre by their presence, when the pieces performed were, the Mariage au Tambour, and the Roi des Frontins. Friday was the last performance before Easter. On Easter Monday we are promised our charming little Rose-Chérie who delighted us, so much last year. J. de C—E.

CONCERTS.

BEETHOVEN QUARTET SOCIETY.—The quartets performed at the second meeting were No. 3 from Op. 18, in D major; No. 7 from Op. 59, in F major; and No. 15 from Op. 181, in C sharp minor. The No. 3, composed in 1791, and dedicated to Prince Lichnowsky, is one of the most melodious and graceful of the early quartets. The subjects are short, and the plan of each movement as clear and symmetrical as in Haydn and Mozart. The quartet was well played, M. Steveniers holding the place of first violin, M. Sainton that of second, Mr. Hill tenor, and M. Rousselot violoncello. The No. 7, composed seventeen years later in (1808), and dedicated to Prince Rasumovsky, is one of the most thoroughly Beethovenish of the master's works. The Allegro is a fine specimen of that large development which characterises all he wrote during the middle period of his career. The Adagio, in F minor, portrays a world of despair and gloom; it is one of those peculiar movements of which Beethoven alone knew the secret, preserving amidst an appearance of fragmentary brokenness, entire unity of purpose and of feeling. It is only when you have listened to the last note that you comprehend the full meaning. The attention is kept continually on the stretch; the ear and the mind are astonished by cadences seemingly endless, and which after all are interrupted, as though the master disdained to minister to the ordinary laws of rhythm. And then, what a prodigy of fancy and invention is the Finale—fashioned upon a theme so apparently insignificant! But in a simple national tune Beethoven foresaw infinite combinations of harmony and counterpoint. The performance of this quartet, in which M. Sainton took the first violin, and M. Steveniers the second, Mr. Hill and M. Rousselot occupying their usual places as tenor and violoncello, was the triumph of the evening. It would be invidious to single out one for praise where all laboured so zealously; and the highest compliment we can offer to the players is involved in the assurance that their performance was a faultless specimen of pure quartet-playing, each instrument fulfilling its duties to the utmost, without any attempt at obtrusive prominence. The No. 15, composed sixteen years subsequently (in 1824-5) and dedicated to Baron Stutterheim, was also a clever performance, but not so near to perfection as the other. There are no less than twelve changes of time in this quartet; the rhythms and accents are complicated and various; the phraseology is often singularly fantastic. Yet in no work has the fertility of Beethoven's invention manifested itself more prodigally. Some of the subjects are as fresh and innocent as those of his early youth; others present the gravity of his sterner age; while some are marked by that quaint mixture of simplicity and extravagance which is one of the chief elements of his latter style, and is no where so strongly evidenced as in the Posthumous Quartets. The variety of interest excited is almost without precedent. The whole character of the composition appears to be based upon effects of violent contrasts. The ease with which these are attained, and the art with which they are made subservient to consistent unity of design, prove how equally philosophical and poetical was the genius of Beethoven. The room was brilliantly attended, and the performers were complimented throughout the evening with the most flattering demonstrations of approval.

Mr. BOLYNE REEVES' first concert took place on Monday for the benefit of the distressed Irish. The rooms were crowded at an early hour, and the programme held out promises of the most satisfactory nature which were more than realised. Mr. Reeves is a deserving artist, and may take his place among the most promising performers on his instrument. We hailed with much pleasure the re-appearance of Madame Catrufo, who sang with much feeling and expression the "Come l'adoro" of Bellini. This lady has a contralto voice of great compass, her intonation is faultless, and her interpretation of the music admirable. She and Miss Ellen Lyon won golden opinions in the duet of Mercadante, "Dole conforto al misero." The latter lady holds out high promises of future excellence, and much pleased us in her solo "Bel raggio lusinghier," by Rossini, by the great progress she has already made. The other vocalists were Miss Sabilla Novello, who needs no praise from us, Madame de Fontaine, Signori Marras Brizzi and Gallo, who achieved in the most satisfactory manner the pieces allotted to them. Mr. John Lee also sang with true feeling Schubert's song "Der Wanderer." The entertainment gave universal satisfaction, and was listened to with delight to the end. We must not forget a Canon by Signor Catrufo, which was one of the gems of the evening.

THE MESSRS DISTIN gave a concert on Tuesday last, at the Horns Tavern, Kensington, which was very well attended, and gave great satisfaction. The Messrs Distin were assisted by Miss M. O'Connor, and Miss E. Loder, as vocalists; and by W. S. Rockstro, who performed on the piano. The principal performances were a quintetto from Guillaume Tell, by the Distin family, on the Sax-horns, played with great effect; the favourite aria from Robert le Diable, "Robert, toi que j'aime," arranged as a quintette for the Sax-tubes; a madrigal, performed by the brothers Distin on four Sax-tubes, and clamorously encored; Mr. Distin's fantasia, on "The Soldier Tir'd," executed per se, and rapturously re-demanded, and obligingly repeated; and the selection from the Huguenots, performed on the Sax-horns by the Messrs. Distin. There were other morceaux, vocal and instrumental, which obtained the favour of the audience. Miss Baynes presided at the piano.

ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—The benefit concert of Mr. Charles and Mr. Hamilton Braham took place at this theatre on Tuesday evening. The house was well attended by a numerous and aristocratic audience. The vocalists were Miss Dolby, Miss Ransford, Mrs. Newton, Mr. Braham, and his sons. The programme contained the names of most of our popular composers, and the selection evidently afforded the utmost satisfaction. Soon after the commencement of the concert, Mr. Richards apologised for the absence of Mr. Braham, who was unable to attend, in consequence of a severe cold. Amongst the performances of the evening we must notice the exquisite manner in which Mr. Charles Braham sang "The Flowers of Friendship," and also a new ballad, "The Rose and the Vine." Miss Dolby sang with the success that invariably attends her. She gave with great effect an aria by Mercadante, and Linley's ballad, "Constance," and also with Mr. Charles Braham, Balfo's duo, "The Sailor Sighs." Miss Ransford, who possesses an admirable voice, and must become an acquisition to our concert rooms, produced much sensation in a recitative and aria by Mercadante, and with Miss Dolby sang very charmingly "Vanne se alberghi." During the evening Mr. Charles Braham introduced a new song by Brinley Richards, "Hark! Maiden, hark!" written by Fitzball. The effect was unquestionable, and the interpretation of the song reflects much credit upon Mr. C. Braham's taste and judgment. The song was loudly applauded, and narrowly escaped an encore. We feel certain that Mr. Charles Braham will one day occupy a very eminent position in the list of our English vocalists, provided he does not allow himself to become satisfied with the success that has already attended his efforts. Mrs. Newton sang "Una Voce," and Dr. Arne's charming song, "Where the Bee sucks." Mr. Hamilton Braham, for the first time, delivered a song called the "Dead Trumpeter"—a highly dramatic composition, and well selected to illustrate the resources of Mr. H. Braham's fine voice. In the "Sea Kings" he was also eminently successful, and entered into the gay and reckless character of the Rover with a spirit and power that makes one regret that he does not turn his attention to the stage, upon which with care and study, he would become a great acquisition. The performance concluded with Nicholai's duo; "The Exile's Return," sang very effectively by Mrs. Newton and Mr. H. Braham. The concert was conducted by Mr. Brinley Richards with his usual ability and success.

THE BEAUMONT INSTITUTION. (From our own Correspondent).

—A numerous body of persons were assembled at these rooms on Monday evening, on the occasion of Mr. Braham's concert. The admirers of the "Veteran of Song" had evidently come with the full intention of revelling in all the glories and excitements of "Biscay's Bay" and the "Death of Nelson," in addition to which the programme announced that Mr. Braham would sing a new scena, the incidents of which were taken from the field of Waterloo, entitled "Shaw the Life-Guardsman," the words by Fitzball, and the music by Brinley Richards. Great, therefore, was the anticipations of the worshippers of dramatic songs—the very idea of Waterloo filled the mind with all those fearful incidents of "smoke and cries of the wounded," so deliciously interpreted by the gallant heroes at the Surrey and Astley's; but the course of love is not the only thing that runneth not smoothly. The clock tolled the hour of eight, but no vocalists had even arrived. The audience became restive; the restive became vocal; the vocalisation, in a rapid crescendo, burst forth with all the violence of storm. In the midst of this émeute the secretary appeared on the platform, and succeeded, after a few touches of mesmerism, in tranquilizing the perturbed minds of his auditors. He briefly informed them that, at the last moment, Mr. Braham found himself so very unwell from the effects of cold, that he could not possibly appear that evening, and that every exertion had been made by Mr. Charles and Mr. Hamilton Braham, and an excellent horse and Brougham to procure the assistance of several eminent vocalists, but without success, as they were previously engaged; and after a touching appeal to the generosity of the house—à la Bunn—the speaker sat down—i. e. would, had there been a chair—amidst much applause. The whole duties of the concert, therefore, devolved upon the exertions of Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Charles Braham; and considering the arduous task which they were called upon so unexpectedly to perform, we have no hesitation in saying that the entire performance reflected the utmost credit upon them. Mr. Charles Braham sang an encored in a very pretty ballad, "The Rose and the Vine," the composer's name was not printed. Mr. Hamilton Braham sang with great spirit a new song by Brinley Richards, called "The Sea Kings." This was likewise uproariously re-demanded and encored with great applause. Towards the close of the evening a sort of musical dialogue was introduced by Messrs. C. Braham and Richards, and, considering that it had not enjoyed the luxury of a rehearsal, went off with considerable éclat. The plot and incidents ran thus:—While Mr. C. Braham was preparing himself for a duo with his brother, a cry was raised for the "Lads of the village;" after some delay Mr. Charles Braham and Mr. Richards appeared. The introduction began and finished with a brevity truly marvellous. It consisted of the bass note with the M. A. 3rd, A. M. I. 5th, and the O. C. 8th (we believe our friend, Mr. F. Flower, will apprise us if the abbrev. be wrong), all these sounds were heard simultaneously; and as two individuals were seized with a fit of talking, the chord evidently was not without some effect. The song began, and charmingly the lugubrious melody was uttered by Mr. C. Braham, when a sudden halt alarmed the audience. After a sotto voce conversation with the conductor, another stave was effected. But it soon became evident that the accompanist and Mr. C. Braham were enjoying a sort of hide-and-seek exercise in modulation; for no sooner did the "Lads of the Village" arrive at one key, when the accompaniment was found somewhere else, and so on, vice versa, for some time, when another halt, and a sotto voce conversation, interrupted with cries of "Bray-vo," "Hoevoov," ensued. A new idea had evidently shot up in Mr. C. Braham's mind, as he very quaintly and jocularly informed the audience, "that neither he nor Mr. Richards had got a copy of the song, and that Mr. Richards could not exactly play it, because he had never heard it." This seemed so perfectly satisfactory that the speech was heartily applauded, and the vocalist and his indefatigable conductor descended the platform, evidently amused and astonished with their success. We must not conclude this notice without remarking upon the effective manner in which the vocalists gave "All's Well," this was greatly applauded and encored. The concert terminated about ten. Mr. Brinley Richards conducted.

MR. N. F. SPORLE'S annual vocal and instrumental concert was given on the evening of Tuesday, the 16th, at the London Tavern. The entertainments were of the best kind, and were excellently varied so as to suit the many-coloured fancy of the audience. The concert was conducted on the long-Thursday principle, which simply means, to give the greatest quantity of amusement in the smallest space of time. The first part contained twelve performances, and the second part contained twelve performances; but the items were so capital, and the interpreters so perfect, that no weariness resulted from the longitudinality of the entertainments, though the numerous encores considerably elongated the performance. To particularize all the items we cannot, but to specialize some of the items we can. And first to designate the executants—Miss Dolby, Miss Morriatt O'Connor, Miss Thornton, Miss Mary Rose, Mrs. A. Newton, Mr. Genge, Mr. Ransford, Mr. Robinson, Mr. Farquharson Smith, Mr. Turner, Mr. N. F. Sporle, and Mr. John Parry, were the vocalists; while the instrumental performers numbered Miss Binfield Williams on the piano, Mr. F. Chatterton on the harp, Mr. George Case on the violin, and Mr. A. Sedgwick and Master J. Ward on the concertina. Among the excellencies of the entertainment, we shall notice the very neat and finished performance of Miss Binfield Williams, in a dashing composition of Hertz. This lady improves considerably. Miss Mary Rose, a pupil of Mr. Louis Leo, a very young debutante, in despite of a great state of nervousness, which nearly put her hors de combat at her first appearance in public, gave indications of skill as an artist, and displayed a voice rich and pure in quality. We expect good fruits from this young lady's talents and gifts, and the excellent instructions which she receives. Mr. Frederick Chatterton performed a fantasia on the harp with great brilliancy and power, and was vociferously applauded. A pretty, and somewhat quaint ballad of Mr. Sporle's, received an encore with great applause, and was repeated with acclamations. Miss Dolby sang Linley's very pleasing ballad, "Constance," beautifully, and was rapturously encored. As a matter of course John Parry was similarly complimented in both his songs. Mr. Carte was immensely applauded in a solo on the Boehm flute. Miss Morriatt O'Connor pleased her hearers by her unaffected method in Balfe's "Child of the Sun." Miss Dolby gave a Scotch song, which was received with universal commendations; and the concert concluded with John Parry's affecting comic song, "The White Cat." The room was full, and the audience were highly pleased with the entertainments, and Mr. Sporle received the congratulations of all who attended, and great was the success thereof. Mr. Louis Leo conducted with his usual ability.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—The first concert for the season took place in the Hanover-square Rooms. The following programme was performed in presence of a very full audience:—

PART I.—Funeral Anthem, "When the ear heard him," Miss Ransford, Miss Salmon, Mr. Herbert, and Mr. Wetherbee, and chorus, Handel. Cantata, "Let all on high their voices raise." Soli by Miss Stewart, Miss Salmon, Messrs Gardner, and Wetherbee, Weber. Concerto Dramatique, violin, Mr. A. Simmons, Spohr.

PART II.—Chorus, MS., from a Mass; the Soli by Miss Cheeseman, Miss Salmon, Mr. St. Albin, and Mr. Weeks, H. Wylde. Recit. and Air, "But who is he?" Miss Ransford, (Joshua) Handel. Concert Stück, Pianoforte, Mr. J. T. Mew, Weber. Song, "O had I Jubal's lyre," (Joshua) Handel. Trio and Chorus, "Most beautiful appear," Miss Cheeseman, Mr. St. Albin, and Mr. Weeks, (Cretion) Haydn. Duetto, "Qual anelante," Miss Solomon and Miss K. Ward, Marcello. Trio and Chorus, "Though all alone," Miss Ransford, Mr. Herbert, and Mr. Wetherbee, (Mount of Olives) Beethoven. Conductor, Mr. C. Lucas. Principal violin, M. Sinton.

The Royal Academy of Music, says the Morning Chronicle, was instituted in 1822, and is under the immediate patronage of her Majesty. The Queen Dowager is the patroness, Prince Albert, the King of Belgium, and the Duke of Cambridge, vice-patrons, and the Duchess of Kent, vice-patroness. The committee of management consists of the Earl of Westmoreland, the chairman, who was mainly instrumental in the formation of the institution, and to whom it is deeply indebted; Sir G. Clerk, chairman, ad interim; the Earls of Wilton and Fife, Lord Saltoun, the Hon. A. Macdonald, Sir G. Warrender, Lieut.-General Sir A. Bernard, K.C.B., Sir J. Campbell, K.C.T.S., and the Rev. F. Hamilton, A.M.; Captain Bontein is the superintendent, and Mrs. Weiss the governess. Mr. Cipriani Potter is the principal of the musical department; Mr. C. Lucas the conductor, and M. Sinton first violin. Amongst the professors are Sir G. Smart, Sir H. Bishop, Signori Crivelli and Negri, Messrs. Goss, Neate, W. S. Bennett, W. L. Philipps, J. Bennett, W. H. Holmes, Mrs. Anderson, Madame Dullen, Miss Kate Loder, &c. There are also professors for Italian and general literature, declamation, &c. The pupils may be either in-door students, residing at the academy in Tenterden-street, or out-door students; and all branches of music are taught, the selection being made on entrance. The tuition is for 40 weeks during the year, and the students, when competent, are appointed sub-professors. Certain advantages are given to the students who leave the academy, there being three classes of certificates to be gained by study and good conduct. Four King's scholarships were founded in 1834, the gainers receiving their musical education for two years gratuitously, when the late scholar may compete a second time. Many of our most distinguished musicians have received their musical education at the Royal Academy. There can be no question, however, that its advantages might be materially increased, if the legislature could be prevailed upon to extend its patronage by a financial support, so as to form a national Conservatoire. At present the Royal Academy is dependent on the payments of the pupils, private donations, and the annual proceeds of a fancy dress ball.

We have few remarks to offer on the above programme. There was only one composition by a pupil of the institution, Mr. Wylde's MS. chorus. Mr. Wylde is now an associate, not a student in the institution. He is a very clever and rising professor, and the fragment of his Mass was so well written, and so instinct with true musical feeling, that we regretted not to hear the whole of it. It was executed with care by the chorus, band, and soloists, and exceedingly well received. The performance of M. A. Simmons on the violin, and that of Mr. J. T. Mew on the pianoforte, may be commended as ambitious attempts, arguing well for the courage and energy of the young executants. Miss Ransford, the beauty of whose voice we have acknowledged some time ago, evinced an improvement in style and execution, that demands special remark. Miss Stewart must also be named as one of the vocal students most likely to attain eminence. She was much and deservedly applauded in her recitative and air from Weber's "Hymn to Jehovah." The Funeral Anthem of Handel was performed in respect to the memory of Sir William Curtis, Bart., (lately deceased) who was an old and staunch patron of the Academy. For the same reason, all the students in the orchestra and chorus were attired in mourning. The old custom of forming the orchestra out of the actual pupils of the institution is now done away with, we presume, from lack of efficient talent. This is a great pity, and shows that reform is wanting somewhere. We shall return to the subject.

CHORAL HARMONISTS.—This Society gave its fifth concert for the season on Monday last. The Mass selected for the occasion was Haydn's in C. Being generally well-known, it was performed with admirable precision. We could not, however, but regret the absence of Miss Lockey, from indisposition; for although Miss Cubitt kindly consented, at a very short notice, to supply her place, this young lady's voice is not adapted to the soprano parts of the Mass. In consequence, the Benedictus was omitted, which we the more regret, as it is but seldom that we have opportunities afforded us of hearing the masses performed at all in the style originally intended by the composers. Miss Dolby sang, in her usual chaste and impressive style, the air from St. Paul, "But the Lord is mindful of his own;" and the first part concluded with Spohr's Cantata, "The Christian's Prayer," the solo parts of which were as ineffective as in Haydn's Mass, from the same reason. Croce's madrigal, "Cynthia, thy Song," (1590) commenced the second part. No improvement seems to take place in the manner in which the madrigals are sung, but on the contrary, there seems to have been a retrograde movement in this respect. We perfectly well remember, some years back, when the madrigals were universally encored for the artistic style in which they were sung, but now they scarcely receive a mark of approval. If it is a rule to sing a madrigal, surely it is worth while to have it rehearsed. Mendelssohn's overture to the "Isles of Fingal" was well played. Mr. Lockey sang the cavatina from the Zauberflöte, "O cara imagine;" and Mr. Machin, "The Mariner's Song," by Frau Keiser. A duet of Haydn's, for soprano and tenor, was inserted in the programme, but in lieu thereof, Miss Cubitt sang an extra song. Romberg's "Song of the Bell" concluded the evening's entertainments, Miss Cubitt, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. Machin singing the solo parts. The band was led by Mr. Dando, and Mr. Westrop, as conductor, showed, by the able management of the forces under his command, what may be done with amateurs, in music like Spohr's, to which they are not accustomed.

MISS DINAH FARMER.—This zealous young pianist gave her annual concert at the Hanover Square Rooms on Monday evening, before a crowded audience. In the true spirit of an artist, Miss Farmer had provided a full orchestra for the occasion, and with its assistance, she delighted her friends with a very spirited performance of Weber's Concert Stück, which was loudly applauded throughout. Miss Farmer also gave a vigorous and effective reading of a brilliant and showy duet, on airs, from Guillaume Tell, in which she enjoyed the valuable co-operation of Mr. Blagrove. This performance was also received with unanimous and well-merited applause. The list of vocalists was numerous, comprising Mrs. A. Newton, Mrs. W. H. Weiss, Misses Rainforth, Sara Flower, M. A. Ley, and Cubitt; Messrs. D. W. King, T. Williams, J. A. Novello, and Mr. W. H. Weiss. There were two novelties in the programme, both of which merit notice:—a scena by Mr. T. M. Jolly, and a very pleasing song, "The Minstrel's return," by Mr. Howard Glover. These were both cleverly sung by Mrs. A. Newton, a clarionet obligato part in the former being beautifully played by Mr. Maycock, first clarionet in the Drury Lane orchestra. Both were received with great favour. Miss M. A. Ley obtained much and deserved applause in Wallace's popular ballad (from Matilda), "A lowly youth;" and Miss Sara Flower, in an air by Donizetti, by her fine voice and impressive style, created quite a sensation among the audience. Fantasias on the concertina and harp by Mr. R. Blagrove and Mr. F. Chatterton, agreeably varied the entertainments. The conductors were Mr. Holmes, the distinguished pianist, his intelligent pupil, Mr. S. Noble, and Mr. Hopkinson. The concert was very long, but gave general satisfaction.

AMATEUR MUSICAL SOCIETY.—The following was the programme of the fourth meeting on the 19th inst., at the Music Hall, Store-street:—

Symphony, G minor, Mozart. Overture, "Oberon," Weber. Operatic Selection, "Lucia di Lammermoor," Donizetti. Overture, "The Siege of Rochelle," Balfe. Symphony, C minor, Beethoven. Overture, "La Gazza Ladra," Rossini.

The band is greatly improving. The overture to Oberon was capitally played, and encored. Balfe does wonders, and is well seconded by his forces. The room was crowded.

CROSBY HALL.—Mr. W. Rea commenced a series of three classical chamber-concerts last night, in the Throne-room. His programme was very ambitious, including some of the most elaborate compositions of Bach, Scarlatti, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Sterndale Bennett. Mr. Rae is, as yet, but a young pianist, though he has evidently imbibed good notions of art from his master, Mr. Sterndale Bennett, and bids fair, with the aid of assiduous study, to make some figure in his profession. His performance last night developed much real excellence and considerable promise. His fault was in attempting too much, and not always hitting the mark. He has a firm touch, a full tone, and no little energy in his style. In rapid passages, however, he is fidgety, and is often indistinct: his cantabile playing lacks sentiment, and his phrasing is frequently abrupt. His best performances were Bach's violin sonata, in E major, with Mr. Dando, and Mozart's grand duet for the pianoforte, with Mr. Sterndale Bennett. In these compositions he was more at ease than in those which he played alone. The Scherzo, and Rondo Piacevole of Sterndale Bennett, the former especially, were almost beyond his grasp; and he would have done much better to defer till a latter period the difficult Caprice, in F sharp minor, of Mendelssohn. All things considered, however, there was much promise and evidence of the right feeling in what Mr. Rea performed. Some vocal pieces were nicely sung by Miss Cubitt and Mr. Williams, accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Rockstro. The room was densely crowded, and Mr. Rea was liberally applauded in most of his pieces.

MADLIE. ROSALIE THEMAR's grand Soirée Musicale took place on Thursday evening, at the Hanover Square Rooms, before a crowded and fashionable audience. The fair beneficeaire performed during the first part, Mayseder's second trio, Op. 52, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, (in conjunction with M. Steveniers and Signor Piatti), a grand fantasia on themes from Lucia di Lammermoor, by Prudent, and a selection of morceaux by Dohler and Prudent, in a highly creditable manner. In the second act, she played a grand duet with M. Benedict, and a fantasia on a theme of Ernani, composed by herself; in both morceaux she appeared to great advantage. The remainder of the programme was interpreted by Madame F. Lablache, Miss Eliza Nelson (encored in Lavenue's ballad, "Happy Heart"), and Signor F. Lablache, as vocalists; and M. Steveniers and Signor Piatti as instrumentalists. We must particularly commend Madame F. Lablache for the manner in which she sung Morlacchi's aria, "Notte Tremenda" (by the bye, originally written with a flute accompaniment obligato); she was greatly applauded. John Parry was received with great favour, being, as usual, encored in both his songs. Mr. Benedict conducted in a highly effective manner.

MR. LINDSAY SLOPER'S SOIREE.—The third and last of these first-rate entertainments took place in the Beethoven Rooms, on Thursday the 18th. The attendance was very numerous, and the audience highly attentive. The programme was as follows:—

PART I.

Duet in F major, for two performers on one pianoforte, Messrs. Sterndale Bennett and Lindsay Sloper,	Mozart .
Recit. and Aria, Miss Dolby.....	Mozart .
Fantasia in F sharp minor, Op. 28, (pianoforte, Mr. Lindsay Sloper).....	Mendelssohn .

PART II.

Sonata in G minor, Op. 5, No. 2, for pianoforte and violoncello, Messrs. Lindsay Sloper and Rousset, Allemande and Gigue, from the "Harpisichord Lessons".....	Beethoven .
Caprice from the "Suites des Pièces".....	Lulli (anno 1670): J. S. Bach .
Fuga in E minor, from the "Suites des Pièces," (pianoforte, Mr. Lindsay Sloper).....	Handel .
Song, Op. 8, No. 3, Miss Dolby.....	Lindsay Sloper .
Study in G minor.....	W. S. Bennett .
Selection from a Set of 24 Studies, (pianoforte, Mr. Lindsay Sloper).....	Lindsay Sloper .

We have already spoken our sentiments fully of Mr. Sloper's refined and elegant talent. He delighted his audience, as usual, on this occasion, and was greeted with liberal applause. Mozart's duet, with Sterndale Bennett, was a rare treat. It is seldom we can hear two such pianists, and two such musicians together. The fantasia by Mendelssohn, was a fine performance. The last movement was taken at tremendous speed, but Mr. Sloper accomplished it to the end without tiring either himself or his auditors. Lulli's beautiful old allemande was encored. The same compliment was paid to Mr. Sloper's song, "Dear is my little Native Vale," a very elegant and charming trifle, which Miss Dolby rendered with exquisite feeling. The audience separated at an early hour, perfectly gratified with their entertainment. We are pleased to hear that during the season Mr. Sloper will give a grand concert, with orchestra, in the Hanover Square Rooms.

MUSICAL UNION.—Mr. Ella gave his first meeting at Willis's Rooms, on Tuesday afternoon. H. R. H. the Duke of Cambridge was present, with nearly three hundred rank and fashion. The programme was as follows:—

Quartet in C, No. 32, Haydn. Quintet in E, flat Op. 92. Piano, violin, viola, violoncello, and c. basso, Hummel. Double Quartet E minor, No. 3, Op. 87—four violins, two violas, and two violoncellos, Spohr.

Executants. First Violin, M. Sainton. Second Violin, M. Deloffre. Viola, Mr. Hill. Violoncello, Signor Piatti. Violins extra for double quartet, Herr Goffrie and Mr. Thirlwall. Viola, Mr. R. Blagrove. C. Basso, Mr. Howell. Pianoforte, Herr Benedict.

The performance gave general satisfaction. M. Benedict took the pianoforte part in the quintet, which he executed in masterly style; Sainton's playing in the double quintet was in the highest degree vigorous and spirited; Sig. Piatti is an exquisite quartet player, which is a rare distinction for solo performers on the violoncello, who ordinarily confine themselves to the interpretation of mere fantasias and pieces de circonstance. Messrs. Goffrie, Thirlwall, and Howell, proved of high utility in the second violin and double-bass parts, albeit, by the way, we hardly thought Mr. Ella justified in assigning to a double-bass a part which Spohr intended for a second violoncello. Mr. Hill, the tenor, was, as usual, perfect, and was well supported by his junior, Mr. R. Blagrove, in the second tenor. The programmes raisonnées with which Mr. Ella supplies his visitors would be more useful and agreeable were they written in a style somewhat less smacking of the ex-cathedra. Being fallible like other mortals, Mr. Ella would command more attention were his opinions delivered with an air of modesty. Moreover, the public having nothing to do with Mr. Ella's private opinions of the Earl of Falmouth, which are altogether out of place in a concert bill.

MR. DANDO'S.—The fifth of this gentleman's interesting quartet concerts took place on Tuesday evening, in the Throne Room, Crosby Hall. The attendance was very good. The selection was as follows:—

PART I.—Quartet in G major, No. 75, for two violins, viola, and violoncello, Messrs. Dando, Gattie, W. Thomas, and Lucas, Haydn. Song, Mr. Kench, "When I view thy form," Behrens. Grand Septet in D minor, Op. 78, for pianoforte, flute, oboe, horn, viola, violoncello and contra basso, Madame Dulcken. Messrs. Ribas, Nicholson, Jarrett, W. Thomas, Lucas, and C. Severn, Hummel.

PART II.—Quartet in E flat major, No. 10, Op. 74, for two violins, viola, and violoncello, Messrs. Dando, Gattie, W. Thomas, and Lucas, Beethoven. Song, Mr. Kench, "Repose," C. B. Czapek. Ottetto, in C minor, for two oboes, two clarinets, two horns, and two bassoons, Messrs. Nicholson, Horton, Lazarus, Key, Jarrett, Hooper, Keating, and Johnstone, Mozart. Accompanyist, Mr. Walter C. Macfarren. We have only space to commend the general style of the performance, and record the entire satisfaction of the audience.

MR. STERNDALE BENNETT'S. At the third and last of those intellectual entertainments on Tuesday evening, in the Hanover Square Rooms, Mr. Bennett provided his visitors, who mustered in strong and brilliant array, with the following programme:—

Part first.—Quintet, in E flat, pianoforte, oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon, composed March 1784, Messrs. W. S. Bennett, Grattan Cooke, Williams, Platt, and Baumann, Mozart. Lieder ohne Worte, 4th book pianoforte, Mr. W. S. Bennett, Mendelssohn. Song, Mr. Marshall, "The Past," W. S. Bennett. Grande Sonate, "L'Invocation," pianoforte, Mr. W. S. Bennett, Dussek.

Part Second.—Sonata in C minor, No. 2, Op. 30, pianoforte and violin, Messrs. W. S. Bennett and G. A. Griesbach, Beethoven. Fugue in E minor, posthumous, pianoforte, Mr. W. S. Bennett, J. S. Bach. Part Songs, Nos. 1 and 6, Op. 63, Mendelssohn, Misses Ransford and Salmon, pupils of the Royal Academy of Music. Selection from the pianoforte works of W. S. Bennett, Mr. W. S. Bennett. Accompanyist, Mr. W. Dorrell.

The volk lied of Mendelssohn and the fugue of Bach were unanimously encored. The Invocation of Dussek was a superb performance; and the selection from the composer's own works, (consisting of his Allegro Grazioso, Op. 18, and three musical sketches called the Lake, the Millstream, and the Fountain), was a treat of no ordinary kind to the lovers of the highest order of pianoforte playing. Mr. Marshall sang "The past," with taste and feeling, and the Misses Ransford and Salmon obtained a well merited encore in the first of Mendelssohn's melodious part-songs—"I would that my love." Mr. Dorrell's accompaniment was in his usual finished style. Altogether the entertainment was as varied and interesting as it was refined and classical, and the audience left the room with general regret, that it was the last for the season. It is, however, a consolation that Mr. Bennett has advertised a grand concert, with orchestra, in the Hanover Square Rooms, for Thursday, June 10th. We shall then have the pleasure of hearing some of his more important and elaborate works.

MISCELLANEOUS.

WEIPPERT'S SOIRÉE DANSANTES.—Held every Monday evening at the Princesses Concert Room, continue to attract crowded and elegant assemblages. The soirées on Monday last, was of the most brilliant of the season. The dancers were indefatigable; the band was excellent, and the music the most danceable that could be selected from the repertoire of Weippert, Jullien, Coota, Tolbecque, Koenig, W. L. Phillips, Costa, and Bosissio, whose "Esmeralda Waltzes," are gems in their way. WEIPPERT'S "Princesses Polka," and "Ethiopian Quadrilles," are spirited and agreeable compositions.

ILLNESS OF MR. MACREADY.—We regret to be under the necessity of stating that Mr. Macready's performances, which were to have commenced last night, (Monday), and to which the playgoers of Manchester, have been looking forward with such interest, are deferred in consequence of sudden indisposition.—Manchester Express.

THE VOCAL CONCERTS will not be resumed this season, Miss Hawes, Miss Birch, Messrs. Hobbs, Lockey and H. Phillips having declined to lend their assistance; or, to speak more properly, as directors of the Vocal Concert, they have thought fit, for reasons best known to themselves, to remit them altogether.

DEATH OF MR. MORALT.—This favourite and distinguished tenor-player, died on Thursday week, at his residence in Howland Street, Fitzroy Square. He was in his sixty-third year. Mr. Moralt was for thirty-seven years a member of the Royal Society of Musicians; he was for many years principal tenor of the Philharmonic Band, and of the orchestra of Her Majesty's Theatre; and principal second violin at the Ancient Concerts.

MR. KEARNS'S CONCERT.—We are glad to hear that the late Mr. Kearns's widow and children will benefit about 210% from the concert which took place on Wednesday last. Morning Post.

MR. WILSON left London on Saturday for Aberdeen, where he is about to give a series of his Scotch entertainments. Mr. Land accompanied him. Mr. Wilson's success in Paris, has been unprecedented.

SALE OF MUSICAL WORKS.—The valuable musical property of Mr. J. A. Stumpff, late of 44, Great Portland Street, will be sold by auction by Messrs. Puttick and Simpson, on Tuesday, March 30th, and following days, at their Rooms, Piccadilly. A Catalogue has been transmitted to us. The musical collection is rich and varied. Among the curiosities and varieties to be proffered for sale, we may note, a portrait and snuff-box of Beethoven, each with a lock of his hair: ten MSS. in the autograph of Mozart; a wedding service of Sebastian Bach's in his own hand-writing; a scrap of writing in Beethoven's own hand, written on his death bed for Mr. Stumpff; besides various autographs of other great men, including Spohr, Goethe, &c., &c. Attention is particularly called to seven manuscript compositions of Beethoven, presumed to be unpublished. Among these are three overtures. We strongly recommend all musical amateurs and connoisseurs to attend Messrs. Puttick and Simpson's sale on Tuesday next.

MADemoiselle MARIETTA BADERNA's engagement terminates this week at Drury Lane. The fair danseuse, however, remains in London to fulfil her avocations at the Royal Italian Opera.

MRS. BUTLER, A MANAGER.—The Observer states it to be more than probable that Mrs. Butler (late Miss F. Kemble, for it is necessary to make the distinction, as there is another Mrs. Butler, who has advertised readings at Crosby Hall), will ere long become lessee of one of our metropolitan theatres; the present tenant of the house being willing to dispose of his interest in it at only a moderate profit, namely, 1,000*l.* a year beyond the comparatively low rent he now pays.—[There is no truth in this report. Mrs. Butler is engaged by Mr. Maddox, to give a series of performances at the Princess's Theatre, immediately after Easter.—ED.]

JOSEPH JOACHIM.—We have from good authority, that it is not quite certain whether this young violinist will come to England during the present season. If he comes, it will not be before the middle of April.

MR. C. H. ADAMS, the celebrated astronomical lecturer, will give a series of readings at the Adelphi Theatre during Passion Week, in which he will introduce an account of the new planet, and explain its theory. These most interesting lectures are exceedingly worthy the notice of those who would wish to make themselves acquainted with the motions of the heavenly bodies, and speculations arising therefrom. Mr. Adams's splendid orrery will be exhibited as usual. The lectures will treat at large on the phenomena of the Sun, Moon, Stars, Planets, Satellites, &c., and will describe more particularly the annular solar eclipse of the present year.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MR. PIO CIANCHETTINI.—Thanks for our Correspondent's kind note. We shall be glad of his Anecdotes of Zingarelli.

MR. ALFRED WELDON.—We cannot recommend our Correspondent any course more profitable to take than a course of Harmony-Lessons under Macfarren, or some competent instructor.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.

THE 109th ANNIVERSARY FESTIVAL

In aid of the Funds of this Charity, will take place
On Monday, April 10th,

IN THE FREEMASON'S HALL,

On the same grand scale as heretofore.

PRESIDENT OF THE DAY—LIEUTENANT-GENERAL LORD SALTOUN.
J. A. Wood, Sec.

TO THE MUSIC PROFESSION.

"NASSAU STEAM PRESS,"

PUBLISHING OFFICE,

60, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, CHARING CROSS.

Every description of CONCERT PRINTING, (Public or Private,) consisting of PROGRAMMES, NOTES, TICKETS, POSTING BILLS, &c., are neatly and expeditiously executed with economy and taste by

W. S. JOHNSON,

PRINTER TO HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE 21 YEARS!

Where also may be had "The Musical World," and all Operas, Comedies, Plays, Farces, Burlesques, and the whole of Webster's unique Acting Drama.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE

Is acknowledged as the best specific after three years' trial, for improving the voice and removing all affections of the throat, strongly recommended to clergymen, singers, actors, public speakers, and all persons subject to relaxed throats.

The Proprietors have just received the following Testimonial, amongst many others, from MADAME ANNA BISHOP:—

"DEAR SIR,—I am happy to say that all I have heard respecting the efficacy of DR. STOLBERG'S celebrated LOZENGE is perfectly true, as yesterday, feeling myself very fatigued (singing nightly at the Theatre), I took several of the Lozenges, and my voice was very clear, and my throat quite free from relaxation. I am, Dear Sir, Yours truly, ANNA BISHOP."

Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Churchyard; W. Edwards and Newbery and Sons, St. Paul's Churchyard; Sanger, and Dietrichsen and Hannay, Oxford-street; and retail by all respectable Chymists in the Kingdom.

MUSICAL COLLECTIONS & STOCK IN TRADE

OF THE LATE MR. A. J. STUMPF, OF No. 44, GREAT PORTLAND STREET.

PUTTICK & SIMPSON,

(Successors to Mr. FLETCHER),

Auctioneers of Literary Property,

Will SELL BY AUCTION, partly at their Great Room, 191, PICCADILLY, and partly at No. 44, Great Portland Street, The Residence of the late Mr. STUMPF,

On TUESDAY, March 30th, and following day,

At One most punctually, the entire Musical Collections, consisting of numerous MANUSCRIPTS

OF

MOZART, BEETHOVEN,

And other celebrated composers (some unpublished), Printed Music, Curiosities; also the valuable Stock of

PIANOFORTES AND HARPS,

Of improved and elegant construction. Together with the partly finished Instruments, well-made and seasoned Materials, Tools, Household Furniture, &c. May be viewed on the Saturday and Monday before the sale. Catalogues are now ready, and will be sent on application.

EXTENSIVE COLLECTION OF MUSIC,

Consisting of many Thousand Pieces,

500 ENGRAVED MUSIC PLATES, &c.

Being the greater part of the Stock of Mr. N. B. CHALLONER, late Professor of the Harp (retired).

PUTTICK & SIMPSON,

(Successors to Mr. FLETCHER),

Auctioneers of Literary Property,

Will Sell by Auction at their Great Room, 191, Piccadilly, ON THURSDAY, APRIL 1st,

At One most punctually, the valuable Collection of Music, consisting of Preceptive and other works for the Pianoforte, Vocal and Miscellaneous Music, more than 500 Engraved Plates of works of high reputation. May be viewed two days before the sale, and Catalogues now had.

FAIR COMPLEXION.

Under the Patronage of the Nobility and Gentry.

TO THE LADIES.—Wonderful and Important Discovery.

COCKBURN'S

ORIENTAL BOTANICAL PREPARATION,

For removing almost instantaneously cutaneous eruptions, freckles, pimples, spots, and other discolorations of the skin. After one application of the Botanic Extract, which must be used twice a day, a wonderful change will be perceived, and in the course of a few days the complexion will assume a beautiful transparent roseate hue appearance. The extract to apply is of the most agreeable nature, and the first application will prove its wonderful efficacy. Prepared only, and sold wholesale and retail, by the sole proprietor,

GEORGE H. J. COCKBURN, 9, Aldgate, London;

And Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street, London; in bottles at 2*s.* 9*d.* and 4*s.* 6*d.* each; also by Sanger, 150, Oxford-street; Keating, St. Paul's Church Yard; Johnson, 68, Cornhill; Hannay and Co., 63, Oxford-street; Butler and Co., 4, Cheapside; Edwards, St. Paul's Churchyard; Prout, 229, Strand; and of all other Chemists and Perfumers in the kingdom.

MISS STEELE

(Professor of Singing at the Royal Academy of Music), begs to announce a Performance of Sacred Music,

ON WEDNESDAY, MARCH 31st,

At Two o'clock, at the CONCERT ROOM, 71, MORTIMER ST., CAVENDISH SQUARE.

Vocalists—Misses Rainforth, Steele, and M. B. Hawes; Messrs. Hobbs, Locket, and Machin, with a Chorus. Conductor—Mr. Fisher. The PATENT HARMONIUM will be used. Tickets, 5*s.*, at the Musicellers, and of Miss STEELE, 9, Albany-street, Regent's-park.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA,

COVENT

GARDEN.

UNDER THE DIRECTION AND MANAGEMENT OF MR. BEALE.

The Nobility, Gentry, Subscribers, and Patrons of Music are respectfully informed, that the

NEW THEATRE WILL OPEN

On Tuesday, the 6th of April,

WHEN WILL BE PERFORMED ROSSINI'S OPERA-SERIA OF SEMIRAMIDE,

IN WHICH

MADAME GRISI,

(From the Scala at Milan, her first appearance in this country),

SIGNOR LAVIA,

(From the Imperial Theatre of St. Petersburg),

SIGNOR POLONINI,

(From the Imperial Theatre, Vienna),

AND SIGNOR TAMBURINI,

(His first appearance in London for four years) will sustain the principal characters.

In the course of the evening

THE NATIONAL ANTHEM

Will be performed by the entire strength of the company.

To conclude with a new Ballet, in two tableaux, by M. ALBERT, entitled

L'ODALISQUE.

The music composed by Signor CURINI (from the San Carlo, at Naples).

PREMIERES DANSEUSES:

MLLE. FLEURY,

(From the Académie Royale at Paris),

MLLE. BERTIN,

(From the Imperial Theatre, Vienna, and from the Académie Royale),

MLLE. NEODOT,

(From Madrid),

M. MABILE,

M. GONTIE,

(From Madrid), &c.

DIRECTOR OF THE MUSIC, COMPOSER, AND CONDUCTOR—M. COSTA.

ORGANIST—MR. VINCENT NOVELLO.

THE SCENERY BY MESSRS. GRIEVE AND TELBIN.

The Machinery by Mr. Allen. The Properties by Mr. Blamire. Artiste Costumière—Mrs. Bailey. The new drop scene by Signori Ferriand Verardi. Tickets, Stalls, and Boxes, for the night or season, to be obtained at the Box-office; and at Messrs. Cramer, Beale, and Co.'s, 201, Regent-street. The doors will be opened at half-past Seven o'clock, and the performance to commence at Eight.

Just Published:

ESSAY ON CLASSICAL CHAMBER MUSIC

BY C. GUYNEMER.

PRICE 1s.

To be had of the Author, 73, George-street, Portman-square, And of all the principal Music Sellers.

Warren's 20 Guinea Cottage Piano-Fortes

ARE NOW SELLING AT THE
Manufactory, 71, Leadenhall Street

(Removed from 1 and 2, Liverpool Street, Bishopsgate Street.)

These Instruments are well manufactured of the best seasoned wood, FINE FULL TONE AND GOOD TOUCH. A two years warranty given with each instrument. ESTABLISHED TWENTY-ONE YEARS. The only house in London where a good sound instrument can be obtained at the above low price, (for cash only). SMALL PROFIT AND QUICK RETURNS!

JOHN WARREN, 71, Leadenhall St., opposite Aldgate Pump

HAYMARKET THEATRE.

Mr. ALLCROFT'S

Grand Sacred and Miscellaneous Concert,

ON TUESDAY NEXT, MARCH 30TH,

At which will appear Mesdames Albertazzi, Birch, E. Birch, Lablache, Steele, Poole, Hill, Novello, and Miss Maria B. Hawes; Messrs. Harrison, Travers, H. Phillips, F. Lablache, Brizzi, Guibeli, and Mr. Henry Russell; also the original Ethiopian Serenaders. Solo performers—Madame Dulcken, Richardson, and Herr Joachim. During the evening a grand Morceau de Concert for sixteen eminent pianists and eight celebrated harpists. Conductors—Messrs. Negri, Lavenu, and T. G. Reed. Leader—Mr. Roberts. Boxes and Stalls, 5s.; pit, 3s.; gallery, 2s.; upper gallery, 1s. Private boxes, tickets and places may be had at Mr. Allcroft's Music Warehouse, 15, New Bond-street.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY,
EXETER HALL.

On WEDNESDAY EVENING, [MARCH 31st,

Will be performed HANDEL'S ORATORIO,

THE MESSIAH.

Principal Vocal Performers:—Miss Birch, Miss Kirkham, Miss Dolby, Mr. Lockett, and Mr. H. Phillips. The Band and Chorus will consist of above 500 performers. Tickets, 3s. each. Reserved Seats in the Gallery, 5s.; in the area, 10s. 6d., may be obtained of the principal Music-sellers; of Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing Cross; Mr. Ries, 102, Strand; or of Mr. Mitchell, 39, Charing Cross.

THOMAS BREWER, Hon. Sec.

PIANOFORTES FOR SALE:

A very superior and powerful toned 6½ Octave Rosewood COTTAGE, by Zeitter and Co., with metallic string plate, check action, &c., cost 60 guineas a short time since, and will now be sold for half that sum; an elegant Rosewood Semi-CABINET, 6½ octaves, with all the latest improvements, only 35 guineas; a COTTAGE, 14 guineas; a 6-OCTAVE SQUARE, by Broadwood, with metallic spring plate, only £18., cost 52 guineas; a 5½ DITTO, £4. Also, a variety of new and improved CABINET, COTTAGE, and PICCOLO PIANOFORTES, from 25 guineas each. Packed free of expense.

C. SCOTCHER,

(from Collard and Collard's), 60, Mortimer-street, Cavendish-square.
PIANOFORTES TAKEN IN EXCHANGE.

JUST PUBLISHED, No. II OF WOOD'S EDITION
OF THE

SONGS OF SCOTLAND:

With Symphonies and Accompaniments for the Pianoforte.

Edited by G. F. GRAHAM.

In addition to the Music and Poetry of the Songs, the Work contains brief Notices of their History, when these can be derived from authentic sources. To be completed in TWENTY MONTHLY NUMBERS, at SIXPENCE each. Each Number to contain Eight Songs. Published with the Magazines on the first of every month.

CONTENTS OF No. I:—

Flowers of the Forest, old set	Kind Robin lo'es me
Ditto ditto, modern set	Oh why left I my hame
Gloomy Winter	Bide ye yet
Bonnie Wee Thing.	Roslin Castle.

No. 2:—

The Bush aboon Traquair	How sweet this lone vale
Auld Robin Gray (old air)	My love's in Germany
Ditto ditto (new air)	Green grow the Rushes O!
My tocher's the jewel	O true love is a bonny flower.

Published by WOOD & Co., Music-sellers, 12, Waterloo Place, Edinburgh;

And to be had of OLIVER & BOYD, Edinburgh; J. ALFRED NOVELLO, 69, Dean Street, Soho, and 24, Foultry; and SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, & Co., London.

THOMAS BAKER'S MODERN PIANOFORTE TUTOR.

M. JULLIEN

Has the honor to announce, that he has just published the above work, which he flatters himself will be found the desideratum so long sought after by the profession. Notwithstanding the improvements that have taken place in Pianoforte Playing within the last ten years, no deviation has been made in the system of teaching from Tutors of the Old School; in consequence, many gifted with brilliant talents have been unable to execute the music of the present day. For this reason the

MODERN PIANOFORTE TUTOR

Has been introduced, and met with the greatest success from the elite of the profession, who have universally adopted it. The work is divided into two parts: the first being a complete Tutor in itself, containing the

RUDIMENTS OF MUSIC,

Rules for the Formation of the Hand, Scales,

FINGER EXERCISES, &c.

Interspersed with Morceaux from the works of

Beethoven, Mozart, Spohr, Weber, Meyerbeer, Roch-Albert, Rossini, Bellini, Donizetti, &c.—Price 8s.

The second part consists of a more advanced course of Study, proceeding to the most refined style of Modern Playing;

Illustrated with numerous Examples & Exercises,

On all the various Fingerings adopted by the most eminent Pianistes of the MODERN SCHOOL: with Selections from the Pianoforte Compositions of HERR, DOHLER, THALBERG, &c.; in fact, everything necessary to constitute a first-rate Pianist. Price 8s., or 15s. the entire work.

Published by M. JULLIEN & Co.,

AT THE ROYAL MUSICAL CONSERVATORY,

214, REGENT STREET, AND 45, KING STREET,

Where all the Compositions of the above Author may be had.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847.

M. JULLIEN has the honor to announce that the sixth edition of his

MUSICAL ANNUAL FOR 1847

Is now Published, and will be found by far the best work of the kind that has ever appeared; containing no less than

Thirty Pieces of Vocal and Fourteen of Instrumental Music,

The greater part of which have never before been published, the copyrights having been purchased expressly for this work, at an immense cost, with the view of rendering it immeasurably superior to any of its predecessors.

The portion which has already appeared comprise those pieces only whose decided success has induced M. JULLIEN, at the request of numerous influential patrons, to include them in this Selection.

The Illustrations, in addition to the elaborately executed Covers, Title, and Dedication pages, include two magnificent Views of the interior of Covent Garden Theatre. The one taken during the brilliant scene exhibited in that splendid arena of the occasion of M. JULLIEN'S GRAND BAL MASQUE; the other a VIEW OF THE THEATRE TAKEN DURING THE CONCERTS, the grouping of the Figures in both Views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant. To those who have visited the Theatre on either occasion, the ALBUM will form a delightful SOUVENIR, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of the gorgeous scene.

A splendidly-coloured PORTRAIT of the celebrated Danseuse, Madlle. FLORA FABRI, in the admired Pas, La Castigliani. An original subject, "THE FORTUNE TELLER," illustrating Baker's beautiful ballad of that name.

The whole of this department of the ALBUM has been under the active superintendence of J. BRANDARD, Esq., whose pencil only has been employed in its production.

Nothing more need be said in favour of this Work, and in proof of its vast superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the Contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe.

It will also be perceived that in addition to the latest compositions of the best English Composers, the ALBUM contains some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany, France, Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting the attention of the Continental dilettanti. Price 18s. and £1 1s.

ROYAL CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC,

214, REGENT-STREET, AND 45, KING-STREET.

SOVEREIGN Life Assurance Company, No. 5, ST. JAMES'S STREET, LONDON.

Trustees.
Sir A. Brydges Henniker, Bart.	Henry Pownall, Esq.
B. Bond Cabbell, Esq., M.P.	Claude Edward Scott, Esq.
Directors.
CHAIRMAN, Lieutenant Colonel Lord Arthur Lennox.	Henry Broadwood, Esq., M.P.
DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN, T. C. Granger, Esq., M.P.	Sir James Carmichael, Bart.
John Ashburner, Esq., M.D.	Charles Farebrother, Esq., Alderman.
T. M. B. Batard, Esq.	William Tulloh Fraser, Esq.
Philip P. Blyth, Esq.	John Gardiner, Esq.
	Aaron Asher Goldsmid, Esq.
	Henry William Pownall, Esq.
Bankers, Sir Claude Scott, Bart., and Co.
Solicitors, Messrs. Davies, Son, and Campbell.

Assurances on the lives of persons in every station of life and every part of the world, granted on a plan which combines the utmost amount of benefit to the families of the assured at death, with every attainable advantage during life, which the system of Life Assurance is capable of affording.

It affords perfect security in a subscribed Capital, which guarantees the prompt settlement of every claim, with participating and non-participating rates on the lowest scale, especially for terms of years.

The Assured can anticipate or obtain the advance of the full amount of the Policy, on giving approved available security for a certain number of annual payments, as explained by the Prospectus.

Every facility is afforded to persons assuring the lives of others, so as to render such Policies effectual securities.

A new plan of gradual or accumulative Assurance, particularly adapted for young lives, and for such as cannot, without inconvenience, undertake the payment of a fixed premium, securing at once provision in case of premature death, and an accumulating fund, available during life, should occasion require.

ANNUITIES, ENDOWMENTS, ADVANCES, and LOANS, on liberal terms. Detailed Prospectuses, with forms of Proposal, and every information, may be had on application, either personally or by letter, at the Company's Offices. The usual commission to Solicitors and Agents.

H. D. DAVENPORT, Secretary.

THE PATENT HARMONIUM.

This beautiful Instrument possesses the softness of the voice with the variety of tone of every wind Instrument, as also the power of a large Organ. It is equally suitable for Sacred Music, or the Dance, and adapted for the Drawing Room, Concert Room, Church or Chapel. Printed particulars can be had of LUFF and SON, sole agents, where the PATENT HARMONIUM can be heard from 10 till 4, daily; and where can be inspected

LUFF & SON'S

Elegant Assortment of PIANOFORTES,

Made by experienced workmen, and thoroughly seasoned wood, all of which is prepared on the premises. They are warranted to stand well in Tune, and are prepared for extreme climates: prices one-third less than usually charged.

Instruments taken in exchange, and a liberal allowance to dealers.
LUFF and SON, 103, Great Russell Street, Bloomsbury, W.

HERR PISCHEK

Has the honor to announce that he

WILL ARRIVE IN LONDON

For the Season, on

MONDAY, May 10th,

Letters addressed to HERR PISCHEK, at JULLIEN and Co.'s, 214, REGENT STREET, will be attended to.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, at the "Nassau Steam Press," by WILLIAM SPENCER JOHNSON, 60, St. Martin's Lane, in the parish of St. Martin's in the Fields, in the County of Middlesex; where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed post paid. To be had of G. Purkiss, Dean Street, Soho; Strange, Paternoster Row; Wiseheart, Dublin; and all Booksellers.—Saturday, March 27th, 1847.

The Musical World.

(PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT NOON.)

A RECORD OF THE THEATRES, MUSIC, LITERATURE, FINE ARTS,
FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE, &c.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s. Stamped; 12s. Unstamped; to be forwarded by Money Order or Postage Stamps to the Publisher, W. S. Johnson, "Nassau Steam Press," 60, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross.

Each Subscriber is entitled to an Admission to an Annual Concert, and a Piece of Music, (regular Music size) Monthly.

No. 14.—Vol. XXII.

SATURDAY, APRIL 3, 1847.

{ PRICE THREEPENCE
STAMPED, FOURPENCE.

NOTICE.

Next Week, with No. 18, will be GIVEN to the Subscribers only, a SONG, composed expressly for SIGNOR CARDONI.

THE PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

NEVER since these concerts were originated have they been the object of such general attention as now; and all because an Italian musician is director of the orchestra, and opinions are at variance as to his qualifications for the office. Signor Costa has reason to feel flattered by the importance which the public and the press attribute to his movements. Never was such a fuss made about a conductor. Applauded when he comes on, applauded when he goes off—at the beginning and at the end of each morceau, no matter how played—he would be something less than human were he to preserve his equilibrium under the circumstances. But Signor Costa is human, and the puffing of his friend in the Chronicle has succeeded in turning his head. That functionary has set up a golden calf in the market-place, an effigy of the "herculean" conductor, and every one must fall down and worship, at the risk of being peppered in the Chronicle. No journal must presume to hint that Michael Costa, who describes semi-circles and diagonal lines in the air with a stick, is anything short of Julius Cæsar in merit, or the Chronicle straightway addresses a broadside to its disadvantage. The Times was rash enough to insinuate something of the kind, and fearful was the punishment it received. A paragraph from one of its musical articles, headed "The Times in 1847," was printed side by side with another paragraph, headed "The Times in 1844," in the Chronicle of Tuesday! It is true, the two articles treated of entirely different matters; it is true they had no kind of relation to each other; but what a triumph for the Chronicle to be able to point to the two and say, "Look upon this picture and on this!" A leader from The Times upon the Montpensier marriage in 1846, and a leader upon Daniel O'Connell in 1840, placed in juxtaposition, would have served just as well, and would have been just as beside the subject. But it is the pride of the Chronicle to be original, and the musical department, in this quality, beats all the press hollow. The Chronicle, with a short-sightedness and a thickheadedness for which it has been remarkable since the spring of 1846, when the editorship of its musical articles devolved upon the present writer, insists upon making the conductorship of Signor Costa at the Philharmonic a party question apropos of the two Italian operas. But the mistake is, that instead of doing good to his idol, this unwise course of proceeding will be likely to do him injury. The golden calf will probably be riven to shatters some fine morning, like the idol of Nabucco in Verdi's opera. Signor Costa has a right to demand protection from his friends, who, in endeavouring to establish for him a reputation for what he is not, run the chance of knocking down for him the reputation for what he is. We have never been disposed to underrate Signor Costa's talent, and in his proper sphere are ready to acknowledge him on all occasions. But it is preposterous to insist, that because he is admirable in the conduct of an Italian opera, he should, of necessity, be admirable in the conduct of a German symphony. And yet this is the argument involved in the rhapsodies of the Chronicle, with a sling and a stone for any one who is disinclined to admit its soundness. For our own parts, if Rossini himself were appointed director of the Philharmonic orchestra, and were ready to accept the post, we should not be satisfied, and for the same reasons that disincline us towards Signor Costa in his present position. Signor Costa is an excellent conductor, and can make a band go together, in no matter what music, as well as any man, and better than many: but making a band go together is not the only duty of a conductor. If expression be of any value in orchestral performances, it will hardly be denied that the conductor should be able to give it. But the conductor cannot give the expression without a long and intimate acquaintance with the style of music he has to conduct. He must have been educated in it. To say that it can be acquired by an adult, in an instant, is nothing short of an absurdity; and the Chronicle itself will not have the hardihood to claim this distinction for Signor Costa, whose youth was nurtured in the frivolities of the Italian school, and who till last year has never been accustomed to the kind of music he is now appointed to direct. The fact is, that Signor Costa is receiving his education—undergoing a course of lectures—learning the rudiments and the principles of a new art—with the assistance of the Philharmonic orchestra, and at the expense of the Philharmonic members, associates, and subscribers. It may be all very agreeable for the writer in the Chronicle to preside at the lessons of his friend, Costa, and to puff them, the morning after, in the pages of the devoted Chronicle; but the four-guinea subscribers have a right to expect a conductor who is thoroughly conversant with the music he has to direct. One of Rossini's overtures would go splendidly under Signor Costa's baton—and we expect a treat on Tuesday at the Royal Italian Opera, from the Semiramide—but one of Beethoven's symphonies is quite a different matter.

The second concert of the Philharmonic Society took place on Monday evening, when the Hanover-square rooms (or rather room, as the ante-chamber was closed), were filled by a brilliant company. The selection of the first part of the programme was made with reference to the period—Passion-week. This is the first time the Philharmonic Society has given a performance in Passion-week, and we trust the last. The step was ill-advised, and told against the sale of guinea-tickets, as might have been expected. But the ante-chamber was closed as a precautionary measure, lest the room should appear less crowded than at the first concert; but though the precautionary measure produced the effect intended, it failed to escape the observation of those who were looking out for squalls. The programme was as follows:—

PART I.—Sinfonia in C Minor, from the Last Judgment, Spohr.—Air, "Jerusalem," Miss Birch, Chorus, "Oh! happy and blest," Song, "Oh God! have mercy," Mr. H. Phillips, (St. Paul) Mendelssohn Bartoldy.—Mass in C, Beethoven.

PART II.—Choral Sinfonia (the principal voice parts by Miss Birch, Miss M. Williams, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. H. Phillips) Beethoven.—Conductor, Mr. Costa.

Why the term sinfonia was applied to the second overture in Spohr's Last Judgment we cannot guess, unless to deceive the inexperienced subscribers into the idea that they were going to have the ordinary two symphonies that form part of the Philharmonic programmes. The Italian term sinfonia applies to any piece of instrumental music, and has quite a different meaning from the German word sinfonie and the English symphony. In England we term the few bars of instrumental introduction that precede a ballad symphony, and the Philharmonists might just as consistently make sinfonia stand for the commencement to Mr. Henry Russell's ballad of "The Maniac." We were not sorry, however, to hear Spohr's overture, which is a fine piece of music, and, no less than the first sinfonia in the same Last Judgment, should long ago have found its way into the Philharmonic programmes. Perhaps the objection may be urged that these instrumental pieces suffer from being separated from the oratorio to which they belong. This might hold with the one played on Monday night, which is a pot-pourri of subjects afterwards employed; but there is such a pleasure in listening to the gorgeous instrumentation of Spohr, that we are never sorry to listen to any composition from his pen, especially when so satisfactorily executed as the "sinfonia in C minor" (which, by the way, has a long episode in E minor, that is strongly out of sorts with the rest) at the second Philharmonic concert. Signor Costa was quite correct in the time, and conducted with fire and decision. Nevertheless, the "Sinfonia" produced little effect upon the audience, who scarcely deigned to give it a hand.

The three pieces from St. Paul were injudiciously selected. The effect of the song in B minor, after the chorus in E flat, was by no means good. The compositions themselves are beautiful, but being all slow movements the result of their performance in immediate succession was tedious. Miss Birch's voice is just what is demanded for the beautiful air in B flat, and the accompaniments were played delicately, which, as there is so much for the wood-instruments, rather surprised us. The chorus, one of the loveliest things in St. Paul, went smoothly; but Signor Costa rather exaggerated the tempo, which occasionally made it drag. The rallentando at the end was skilfully managed, though rather overdone. The choristers were irreproachable, both in taste and execution. We should have preferred hearing the elegant figure of accompaniment, which the violins sustain all through the chorus, a shade more distinctly—for, though it ought not to be obtrusively prominent, Mendelssohn would hardly have bestowed such pains to finish and elaborate it, unless he had intended it to be heard. Mr. Phillips's "Oh, God, have mercy!" is too well-known and appreciated to need criticism here.

The performance of the mass in C is entitled both to praise and blame, but as the good predominated over the bad, we shall not dwell upon the defects in detail. Signor Costa's mistakes were chiefly to be traced to his uncertain feeling as to the times, and his undecided manner in indicating them. He frequently led the band off at one time, and then feeling himself wrong, dragged it back, or hurried it forward, as occasion demanded.

On the whole, the choral symphony was not so well performed as when it was last executed under the direction of Mr. Moscheles. We gave so long a description of it on that occasion, that we have nothing more to say on the subject, with the proviso that every new hearing convinces us that the three instrumental movements exceed, in grandeur and beauty, almost everything of the kind that the art has produced. With this conviction, we cannot but feel regret that Signor Costa should have suggested, or what is just as bad, should have tolerated the mutilation of the scherzo, by omitting the reprises of each part, and the da capo of the entire movement, which, as it was played, was destitute of that clear design for which, like Mozart, Beethoven is such a rigid stickler. What was worse, the audience encored the scherzo, and Signor Costa, true to the standard of ill taste, declined to repeat more than the trio and the fragment of the coda, which is only consistent in the position Beethoven has assigned it. We agree entirely with the strictures bestowed by the principal organs of the morning press upon Signor Costa for this unwarrantable liberty with Beethoven's master-piece. It was altogether unworthy a musician of his standing and pretensions, and would seem to declare, beyond a doubt, that he has no real sympathy with the great school of art.

The effect of this concert, good as were all the individual pieces, was heavy and monotonous. We were not sorry to hear the mass, although the Catholic cathedral is its proper place; but few cathedrals possess the resources, vocal and instrumental, which are at the disposition of the Philharmonic Society, and such a noble composition makes its own apology wherever it may be introduced. It was, however, too long and too elaborate a work to precede the still longer and more elaborate choral symphony. At the end of the first part, the audience had had enough of such serious music for one concert, and the sequel proved the mistake of judgment which had induced the performance of both on the same evening. During the choral movement there was incessant moving towards the door, on the part of individuals who, caring more for getting home in good time than for hearing Beethoven's work complete, indulged their own egotism at the expense and to the annoyance of those who sufficiently respected the great master to wish to hear him out to the very last note.

CHAPPELL V. PURDAY.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Vice-Chancellor of England, which was argued before his Lordship on the 20th of March, and reported in The Times on the 23d. The case stood over for judgment.

The bill was filed by Mrs. Chappell against Mr. Purday, to restrain the publication of the overture to the opera of Fra Diavolo, and for an account, she alleging that she had the sole legal right to the publication of the music. The first decree made by the Vice-Chancellor was, that the bill should be retained for a twelvemonth, with liberty to Mrs. Chappell to bring an action to test the validity of her alleged legal title; but, in the event of her omitting to bring such action within the specified time, then the bill was to be dismissed without costs. An action was, however, brought in the Court of Exchequer, and eventually a verdict was come to, negativing the exclusive right claimed by the plaintiff. The suit in Chancery was then brought before the Court on further directions, when the Vice-Chancellor made the decree complained of by the present appeal, namely, dismissing the bill, but without costs. The appellant contended that the bill ought to have been dismissed with costs.

The Lord Chancellor this morning gave judgment, and said, after stating the nature of the proceedings at law and in equity, that a party coming to a court of equity for the protection of a legal right, if he failed in establishing such legal right at law, must as a matter of course also fail here. Such was the general practice of this court; and it was founded upon the principle, that if a person brought an action and failed he was in the same situation as if he had brought no action at all. The two orders made in the court below were totally distinct in their nature, and could not both stand. The first order was that the bill should be retained for a certain time, but that if no action were brought by the plaintiff within that time, then the bill should be dismissed with costs. It certainly appeared most inconsistent to say, that if no action should be brought, the bill should be dismissed with costs, but if an action were brought and failed, then the bill should be dismissed, but without costs. The first decree made by the court below was the right course to be pursued, and must be followed out, but the two decrees together, as they stood, were irreconcilable. It was not possible to infer that the costs of the suit had been refused from any conduct on the part of the defendant; the court had waited the result of the action at law. Moreover, if the defendant had caused any extra expense in the action at law by his mode of pleading or otherwise, it could not affect his right to the general costs in the suit in equity. The question was one of importance, both with regard to the practice of the court and principle which ought to guide it. There were many cases in which the costs were in the discretion of the judge, and from the exercise of which discretion there was no appeal; the reason being, that the judge, on appeal, could not have all the facts before him which influenced the mind of the judge below, unless there were a re-hearing of the whole case, and therefore the practice of the Court had always been, in such cases, to refuse an appeal for costs alone. But where there was a fixed rule of the Court with respect to particular costs, the Court or Judge could have no discretion in the matter; and if it appeared on the face of the decree that the Court below had irregularly dealt with the costs, the Court, on appeal, would not affirm such decree. That in cases of this kind, where, on the face of the decree, costs had manifestly been given contrary to the rule of the Court, an appeal was allowed for the costs alone, was proved by many cases—"Cowper v. Scott," decided by Lord Northampton; "Taylor v. Southgate," and "Angell v. Davies," both in reported in 4 M. and C.; and the case of "Owen v. Griffith," in Ambler, where Lord Hardwicke stated, that in some cases the rule that there should be no appeal for costs alone might, and had been, dispensed with. The result therefore was, that if the Court, on appeal, could not decide the point without a re-hearing of the cause, then there could be no appeal for the costs alone, but otherwise where the defect appeared upon the face of the decree. In this case the Vice-Chancellor had gone against the practice of the Court in not dismissing the bill with costs, and the more so, as the two decrees made by him were inconsistent with each other. So much of the last decree as directed the bill to be dismissed without costs must be varied, and the bill must be dismissed with costs.

THE AFFINITIES.

from the German of Göthe.

Continued from page 208.

PART II.—CHAPTER VIII.

THERE are few persons who know how to employ themselves with that which has passed only immediately. Either the present forcibly holds us to itself, or we lose ourselves in the past, and seek, as far as is possible, again to evoke and restore what is completely lost. Even in great rich families, which are so much indebted to their ancestors, it is generally found that the grandfather is thought of more than the father.

Our teacher was excited to make reflections of this kind, when on one of those fine days on which the departing winter is in the habit of imitating spring, he had walked through the large old castle-garden, and had admired the avenues of lofty lime trees and the regular method of laying out the grounds, which had originated with Edward's father. They had thriven admirably according to the intention of their planter, and now, when for the first time they had to be acknowledged and enjoyed, no one said any more about them. They were scarcely visited, while taste and outlay had been directed far and wide towards another side.

On his return he made the remark to Charlotte, who did not take it in ill part, "While life carries us on," she replied, "we think we are acting from ourselves, are choosing our own activity and pleasures, but indeed, if we look closely into the matter, they are only the plans and inclinations of the time, which we also are compelled to bring into execution."

"True," said the teacher, "who can resist the stream of circumstances? Time moves on and with it move views, opinions, prejudices, and tastes. If the youth of a son fall exactly in a period of transition, we may be assured that he will have nothing in common with his father. If the latter lived in a period when pleasure was taken in appropriating much to one's self, in securing, limiting, and concentrating this property, and in fortifying one's enjoyment by a retirement from the world, the former will, in such a case, endeavour to extend himself, to communicate, to diffuse, and to open what has been hitherto locked up."

"Whole periods of time," observed Charlotte, "are like the father and son, whom you describe. Of that state of things, when every little town was forced to have its walls and moats, when every noble mansion was built in a marsh, and the smallest castles were only approachable by a drawbridge, we can now scarcely form a conception. Even greater cities now remove their walls, the moats even of princely castles are filled up, the towns are only so many large hamlets, and when we observe this in our travels, we may believe that the universal place is secured, and the golden age at our doors. No one ever thinks himself comfortable in a garden which does not look like an open country; nothing should remind us of art or confinement, but we wish to draw our breath quite freely and unconstrainedly. Have you a notion, my good friend, that from this state we can return into another—into the former one?"

"Why not?" said the teacher; "every situation has its difficulties, the limited as well as the free. The latter presupposes superfluity and leads to prodigality. Let us keep to your example, which is striking enough. As soon as want appears, self-limitation is restored. People who are compelled to make use of their ground and soil again raise walls about their gardens that their produce may be safe; hence a new view of things gradually arises. The useful again gets the upperhand, and even he who possesses much thinks he will be forced to use it all. Believe me, it is possible that your son may neglect all the park plans, and again retire behind the solemn walls and under the tall lime trees of his grandfather."

Charlotte was secretly rejoiced to hear a son predicted, and, therefore, pardoned the teacher for his somewhat unkindly prophecy as to the possible fate of her dear beautiful park. Hence, she replied, quite good-humouredly, "We are neither of us old enough often to have seen contradictions of the kind, but if one looks back upon one's early youth, recollects the complaints of older persons, and takes countries and towns into the survey, no objection particularly could be made to the remark. But, should no opposition be made to such a natural course, should not we be able to reconcile father and son, parents and children? You have been kind enough to prophecy a son for me, but must he stand in direct opposition to his father? Must he destroy what his parents have built, instead of completing it and elevating it if he proceeds in the same spirit?"

"There is, indeed, a rational method to accomplish this," replied the teacher, "but people seldom apply it. Let the father make his son a part-possessor, permit him to join in building and planting, and allow him to have, like himself, a harmless power of discretion. One activity may be woven into another, but never can be stuck on. A young twig easily and readily unites itself with an old trunk, to which no mature branch can any longer be joined."

The teacher was glad that, at the moment, when he saw himself forced to take leave, he had chanced to say something pleasant to Charlotte, and had thus confirmed her favour anew. He had already been too long absent from home, but he could not make up his mind to return until, perfectly convinced that he must allow the time of Charlotte's confinement to pass over before he could hope for any decision with respect to Otilia; he, therefore, submitted to circumstances, and with these hopes and projects returned back to the governess.

Charlotte's confinement approached; she kept herself much in her chamber; the ladies assembled round her formed her more limited society. Otilia took care of the household affairs, while she scarcely ventured to think on what she did;—she had fully resigned herself, she wished to be even still more serviceable to Charlotte, to the child, to Edward—but she did not see how it was possible; nothing could save her from the most complete state of mental perplexity but the daily performance of her duty.

A son came happily into the world, and the ladies all agreed that he was the very image of his father. Otilia alone secretly differed from this opinion, when she congratulated the invalid, and greeted the child with the warmest affection. While the preparations were going on for the marriage of her daughter, Charlotte felt much pained by the absence of her husband, and now the father was not to be present at the birth of his son, nor to determine the name, by which he should in future be called.

The first of all the friends who appeared to offer their congratulations was Mittler, who had posted his spies to bring him immediate notice of the event. He came in very good humour. Scarcely concealing his triumph in the presence of Otilia, he spoke aloud before Charlotte, and was the very man to banish all cares, and to set aside all the obstacles of the moment. The christening must not be long deferred. The old pastor, with one foot already in the grave, was by his blessing to connect the past with the future; the child was to be named Otto, for it could have no other name than that of the father and the friend.

It required all the decisive urgency of this man to set aside the hundred scruples, dissuasions, delays, hesitations, suggestions for alteration or improvement, waverings, opinions, and changes of opinion. In such affairs, from a difficulty removed others generally arise, and while one wishes to spare the social relations, some are sure to be compromised.

The office of giving written notices of the fact, and of inviting persons to the christening, was undertaken by Mittler. This was to be finished at once, as he considered it of the greatest consequence that a piece of good fortune, which he deemed so important to the family, should be communicated to the rest of the world, which sometimes wishes evil, and talks evil. Indeed, the late events, connected with Edward's passion, had not escaped the public, which remains firm in the conviction that whatever happens, only happens that it may have something to talk about.

The ceremony of the christening was to be solemn but short, and limited to a few. The party assembled,—Otilia and Mittler, as sponsors, were to hold the child. The old pastor, supported by the servant of the church, approached with slow steps. The prayer being over, the child was placed in Otilia's arms, and as she looked down upon it with affection, she was not a little startled at its open eyes, for she thought she was looking into her own, and such a resemblance was enough to surprise any one. Mittler, who next took the child, was likewise startled, as in the general formation of the face, he discerned such a striking likeness of the Captain as he had never before seen.

The infirmities of the good old pastor had prevented him from accompanying the act of baptism with more than the ordinary service. Mittler, full of the subject, remembered his early clerical performances, and it was generally his way to think in every case how he should now speak and express himself. On this occasion he could so much the less restrain himself, as he was only surrounded by a little party of friends. Hence, towards the end of the ceremony, he began readily to put himself in the place of the pastor, to express, in a cheerful discussion, his hopes and his duties as a god-father, and to continue this so much the longer, as he thought he could perceive Charlotte's approbation in her satisfied air.

It escaped the observation of the stout orator, that the good old man would have liked to sit down, and still less did he think that he was on the way to produce a greater evil; since after he had emphatically described the relation of every party present to the child, and had thus exposed Otilia's self-control to a pretty severe trial, he at last turned to the old man with these words, "And you, venerable father, can now say with Simeon: Lord, let thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen the saviour of this house."

He was now in train to make a brilliant conclusion; but he remarked that the old man, for whom he held the child, first seemed to bend towards it, but afterwards sunk rapidly back. Having been scarcely kept from falling, he was carried to a chair, and notwithstanding all the assistance rendered at the moment, they were forced to pronounce him dead.

So immediately to see and think of birth and death, the coffin and the cradle, not merely with the imagination but with the eyes; to combine these monstrous contrasts, was a difficult problem for the bystanders, especially when so suddenly performed. Otilia alone looked with a sort of envy on the departed one, who still retained a kind, engaging expression. The life of her soul was killed—why should the body be still preserved?

If in this manner the melancholy events of the day led her to the contemplation of perishableness—of parting—of loss, she was, on the other hand, consoled by wondrous nocturnal visions, which assured her of the existence of her beloved, and confirmed and animated her own. When in the evening she had lain down to rest, and was still floating in the sweet sensation, between sleeping and waking, it seemed to her as if she was looking into a space perfectly bright, yet softly illumined. In this she saw Edward quite plain, not dressed as when she had seen him before, but in military uniform, and always in a different position, which, however, was perfectly natural, and had nothing fantastic about it—thus he was standing, going, lying, riding. The form, which was finished to the minutest detail, moved voluntarily before her, without anything being done on her part—without her willing it, or exerting her imagination. Often she saw him surrounded, especially by something moveable, which was darker than the bright ground, but she could scarcely distinguish the shadowy forms, which sometimes appeared to her as men, horses, trees, and mountains. She generally went to sleep while the apparition was before her, and when, after a tranquil night, she woke in the morning, she was refreshed, consoled, and felt convinced that Edward was still living, and that she stood in the closest relation to him.

(To be continued.)

. To prevent misunderstanding, it may be stated that the copyright of this translation belongs solely to the translator.

MADAME BISHOP IN THE PROVINCES.

(From a Correspondent.)

Seeing you were kind enough to insert my notice of Madame Bishop's performances, and as it chimed in so well with my own feelings, I have attended both here and in Bristol at the operatic entertainments, and trouble you with my notions resulting therefrom. I assure you, it requires no small degree of resolution in such doleful weather to quit one's cosy fireside, to venture three times a week to any performance, especially in such a busy, filthy place as Bristol. I forget where I left off in my last, and not having a number of the Musical World at hand, I shall briefly recapitulate the per-performances of the Prima Donna, and get at last into the right channel. Madame Bishop commenced her engagement at Bristol, on Monday, the 22nd of March, and debuted in Sonnambula. The house was not full, but it was fuller than I expected. There were many sufficient causes to keep the visitors from the theatre. First of all the increase of taxation, which has lately been laid on heavily on the inhabitants of this place and the surrounding neighbourhood owing to the increased influx of Irish paupers. In addition the private, as well as public subscriptions, have positively drained all the better classes, and left them scarce a doit to expend on unnecessary amusements. Besides these weighty causes, the approximation of the Fast day and Passion-week have disposed very many holiwise, and turned them entirely from profane indulgences. These causes will assuredly more than account for the uncrowded appearance of the house. But what was wanting in number, was supplied by enthusiasm, Madame Bishop's reception from beginning to end being such as her most ardent admirers could have desired. I can hardly remember whether, or no, I entered in my last into details on the performance. I will merely mention here that she repeated the finale three times. By the way I take leave to differ from you, or a writer in your journal touching this same Rondo finale, as it is sung by Madame Bishop. I have read in an article of the Musical World, whether in the leading columns, or elsewhere, I cannot now recall, a paragraph disputing Madame Bishop's judgment in singing the finale to the Sonnambula in Italian. Certainly it would have been better if it could have been avoided. Other vocalists have given the rondo with the English words, but at what a sacrifice. There never were words written to music more inharmonious than these adapted to "O, non giunge." Can any thing be more ridiculous, as far as enphony is concerned, than the substitution of "Oh! don't mingle." It is almost impossible to find a syllable more difficult to convey in musical sound than that same—gle, more than all, when it falls on an accentuated note as it does here. You will, I am sure, on cogitation, agree with me, that Madame Bishop was entirely justified in adopting the Italian version of the rondo. But to return from digression. On Tuesday, 23rd March, the Sonnambula was repeated at Bath. Thursday following, the Maid of Artois. The attendance was very respectable, though here again another cause was superadded to those above-named for deterring visitors from the theatre, viz., the death and funeral of our respected member Colonel Langston. The same evening the Maid of Artois was performed at Bristol. Both performances were received with great acclamation, the fair singer being in admirable voice, and singing with all her accustomed purity of intonation and fine artistic skill. On Friday at Bristol again we had an operatic entertainment for the benefit of Madame Bishop, consisting of selections from Anna Bolena, of the Love Spell, and the celebrated scene from Tancredi, "O, patria dolce." The house was full on this occasion. Madame Bishop was labouring under the effects of a cold, notwithstanding which she was encored in "Di tanti palpiti," which indeed she sang splendidly. Her artistic powers are, beyond a shadow of disputation, of the very highest order. Madame Bishop appears to follow, in the tempo and peculiar accentuation of Rossini's grand and beautiful aria, her great predecessor, Pasta. Certainly since the time of that incomparable artist, I have heard no singer who has pleased me as much as Madame Bishop in "Di tanti palpiti." The same performances were repeated at Bath for Madame Bishop's benefit. The house was extremely full, particularly the dress circle, which was occupied by all the rank and fashion now at Bath. The performance went off with great eclat. The fair singer was not quite recovered from her hoarseness. An apology had been made for her previous to the commencement of the performance, but so great is Madame Bishop's skill and art, that her hoarseness was hardly perceptible. The new rondo in the Love Spell was encored, as was also the duet with Dulcamara. I understand Mrs. Macready is so satisfied with the results of Madame Bishop's engagement, that she has re-engaged her for five nights more in Easter week. This requires no comment. Mr. T. Bishop, Mr. P. Corri and Mr. Chute were the artists who assisted Madame Bishop in the different operas. They did their best, and on that score they are entitled to leniency; and to be lenient, I must needs say very little about them. Mr. T. Bishop has a sweet voice, but it lacks power and dramatic tone. Chute, the stage-manager, was very good in Dulcamara—only I wish the next time he performs this character in the Love Spell, he may not dance about so much, and sing a little more. Mr. P. Corri has an effective bass voice, and, with study and perseverance, would become a good singer. It must certainly be of immense advantage to these gentlemen, who have so much to learn, to have such an artist as Madame Bishop performing with them continually. They cannot fail to improve, unless they be the veriest dunces in Christendom.

Addio—I shall write again on the 1st instant.
Bath, March 29.

NICHOLAS ZINGARELLI.

I VISITED Naples in July, 1816, for the purpose of studying vocal composition, under this celebrated composer, and there did I remain until 1819. In Zingarelli I found not only an able and experienced instructor* in that branch of the art, but also a warm-hearted and most sincere friend; in short he treated me more like an old and highly valued friend than a pupil. On my return to England, at the end of 1819, I sent

* This was even Rossini's opinion, for my dear and ever-to-be-lamented father consulted him on the occasion, and more than once.

him, as a small (but very sincere) token of gratitude, ten of Handel's best oratorios, in score. This he immediately acknowledged, and with many thanks—thanking me and my father for our gratitude—and expressing himself better pleased than ever with the ever immortal Handel (as he called him, il sempre immortale Handel). Indeed Handel was one of his prime favourites and so was Haydn, then Gluck and Mozart. He valued Handel and Haydn more for their melodies and Gluck and Mozart for their harmony. Of the Italian composers, Sacchini was his great favourite, then Guglielmi and Paisiello, then Piccini, Paër, Tomelli, and Cimarosa; but yet, above all these, Handel might have been pronounced his supreme favourite, and so far he showed his taste as well as his impartiality. Zingarelli's Masses and Stabat Mater, for four voices, will live for ever, and so will his oratorios, The Destruction of Jerusalem and The Triumph of David, as also the third act of his Romeo and Juliet, his cantata of Orestes and Electra at the Tomb of Agamemnon, and his Stanzas of Tasso. Not only his melodies may be mentioned with great praise, but even, at times, his orchestral accompaniments; for, if they are not upon a par with those of a Rossini, or an Auber, they are far superior to those of most of his contemporaries, this will readily be admitted by any impartial judge of music. Zingarelli was born in Naples in 1752, and died there in 1837, at the age of eighty-five, universally regretted, not only for his transcendent abilities as a vocal composer, but also for his amiable qualities and various accomplishments. He had resided there for a number of years and was director of the Royal Academy (or Conservatorio, as it is called) of Music. Amongst his pupils may be mentioned, Morlacchi, Mercadante, and the lamented Bellini. I have not mentioned "Emperor Beethoven" amongst Zingarelli's favourite composers; the fact is, at that time, I do believe, that he was very little, if at all, acquainted with his matchless masterpieces, but since that he got familiarized with them and, from what I have heard, appreciated them at their full value; in fact, he had too much taste and feeling to deprecate any man of genius and much less such a luminary as Beethoven!

PIO CIANCHETTINI.

SONNET. NO. XXVIII.

Oh! thou hast had compassion on my heart,
Waking it from the dream of dark despair,—
Pouring benignantly a compound rare
Into its wounds, so that they cease to smart.—
A compound of kind words—of looks that dart
From clear, mild eyes—of kisses sweet though rare,
Which penetrate the soul, and linger there
When lips which made them are compelled to part.
Yes, thou hast said thou lov'st me, and each sign,
Each glance, each smile has that sweet truth confess'd
So plainly that no room for doubt is found;
And I may freely say that thou art mine—
And mad with rapture clasp thee to my breast,
Smiling upon the storm that howls around.

N. D.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

No anticipated event connected with musical matters within our recollection has caused so great a sensation in the public mind as the opening of the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden. The causes which have conduced to this excitement are manifold and curious. First of all the sudden revolt and segregation of the principal forces of Her Majesty's Theatre, together with their subsequent enrolment under a new gonfalon, moved all connected with operatic matters to surprise and wonder. Next the announcement, that the rebel legions, as the facetious Post facetiously called the seceders, had established their Pandemonium at Covent Garden, and were about to turn the temple of Shakspeare—we beg pardon—of Jullien, into a rival Opera House, elicited astonishment. Then other causes arose. The mysterious names and monies which were to make up the means and appliances of the new house, driving to desperation conjecture, wherein figured a Salamancan Count, whose wealth was countless, and a man of Ross, or a child of Ross, or one with some such designation, whose benevolence and good intentions went hand in hand with his teeming coffers to raise the new Ephesian dome, and endow it with magnificence undreamt of before:—then, the amount and variety of the new subscribers, many of whom came from the ranks of the seceders themselves;—and anon, the might and fame of the leading powers of the new cohorts, chosen from, or rather congregating into one band the musical Titans of Europe. Moreover, the immense patronage bestowed upon the new establishment threatening downfall to the elder house was a grand moving power. In addition, the strenuous exertions of the latter to resume its pride of place, and fill up the vacated chairs of greatness, and the success that to a certain extent attended its endeavours; and above all, the championship arrogated by two morning journals, who supported their respective parties, and girded their loins for battle, doing more justice to their cause by their earnestness and courage than by their ratiocination or grammar. Here were reasons multiplied to stir up the general mind. For a long while it was considered an undertaking preposterous as hewing Mount Athos into a statue, and arduous as melting the Alps with vinegar, to convert the temple at Covent Garden into a throne that could compete with the glories of the old Opera. But when the reformers went really to work; when Covent Garden was filled with hundreds of artisans; when, after a few brief moons, the rubbish had disappeared, the scaffolding had fallen, and confusion had yielded to order and beauty, then, at last, doubt gave place to astonishment, and credulity could no longer wink: for lo!

“The ascending pile
Stood fix’d her stateliest height; and straight the doors,
Opening their brazen folds, discover, wide
Within, her ample spaces o’er the smooth
And level pavement; from the arched roof,
Pendent by subtle magic, many a row
Of starry lamps and blazing cressets, fed
With naphtha and asphaltus, yielded light
As from a sky. The hasty multitude Admiring entered; and the work some praise,
And some the architect.”

Meanwhile the new Opera had issued a prospectus that startled all Europe. We may assert, without fear of contradiction, that nearly all the first celebrities in the musical world were engaged. No one can doubt this when we name Grisi, Persiani, Tamburini, Mario, Salvi, Ronconi, and Marini. Not content with this array of unsurpassable talent, any single name belonging to which would alone have filled a continental theatre, and created a furor for a whole season, the Royal Italian Opera projectors instigated a close search throughout all Italy, and replenished their forces with vocalists of the highest repute—another cause for wonder. Was not this adding perfume to the violet? In the interim, the alarmists, as we may well designate the members of the opposition stalls, were by no means idle or dilatory. They procured the most famous tenor in southern Italy. But the most famous tenor in southern Italy did not turn out so famous in northern England. Fraschini made a hit certainly, and the hit told; but the impression it left was feeble. An importation from the Royal Academy of Paris was much more successful. The youthful and gracious Gardoni was found incomparably greater than even his partizans expected. Another matter for wonder—the new Opera had omitted, in its acute research, one of the most delicious tenors in Europe. Gardoni was a hit, and has left the impression. We now come to the greatest cause of wonder. The name of Jenny Lind had been for a long time trumpeted throughout all Germany as the first of all modern sopranis, with one exception. Reader, mark the words in italics. We have something to say thereanent presently, that will doubtless astonish your strong senses. The new Opera disregarded the German reputation of the Swedish nightingale, and reposed their confidence in Grisi and Persiani. The enemy saw their opportunity and seized it. They engaged Jenny Lind. But, another matter for wonder—Jenny Lind, after being engaged by the old house, was claimed by the manager of Drury Lane on the strength, or weakness, as it may turn out, of a prior engagement. We shall not recapitulate matters with which every reader is now acquainted. Enough to say, Jenny Lind goes to the Haymarket Opera under violent protest from Mr. Bunn. We have said some few lines above that Jenny Lind had the greatest reputation in Germany as a singer with one exception. That solitary exception is Pauline Viardot Garcia, the sister of Malibran. Reader, dost thou remember, when first the name of Jenny Lind was bruited abroad on the winds of controversy, perusing in the pages of the “Musical World” our astonishment that both the Italian Operas should have overlooked a greater artist and a better singer than Jenny Lind in the person of Pauline Garcia? Did we not reiterate our astonishment and strongly advise the lessee of Her Majesty’s Theatre to give up all claims to the former, and engage the latter? Did either of the barrel-organs of the Opera houses take up our counsel, or did either of the Opera houses improve upon our hint? No! And what is the consequence? We find at the eleventh hour that both parties are contesting for this same artist. They have at length discovered, O! most dilatory conclusion! that Pauline Garcia is a greater artist and enjoys a higher repute than the far blazoned Jenny Lind. O, wonder upon wonders! our opinions are chronicled, and we now say, that whichever of the two Italian Opera houses possesses Pauline Garcia, it can boast of a singer who may divide the Imperial soprano crown, yea, with Grisi herself.

We have now to speak of the opening of the Royal Italian Opera on Tuesday next. The excitement that pervades all musical classes and the opera-going public is indescribable. The opera selected for the first night is Rossini’s Semiramide, one of the great maestro’s most unequal works, but undoubtedly one which presents to the three principal personages of the drama the highest scope for the exhibition of dramatic and vocal excellence. Semiramide is one of Grisi’s greatest efforts. Her acting is surpassingly grand and the music finely adapted to display her power and vocal graces. In Assur, Tamburini will exhibit his high tragic capabilities, but the music will hardly show the beauty and method of his style to perfection. If this great artist be half as good as he was four years ago he must create an immense sensation. Take him all in all, he was, to say the least of him, one of the finest baritones that ever graced the boards of Her Majesty’s Theatre. To an organ of power, sweetness, great expression, and amazing flexibility, he adds dramatic capabilities of the very highest order, pathos deep and free from exaggeration, passion intense and varied, and action at once highly graceful and dignified. In comedy Tamburini may be styled superexcellent. His Figaro and Dandini are perfect models of buffo acting and singing. Of the new debutante, Signora Alboni, we know nothing, saving from report. The Chronicle speaks of her in lavish terms of eulogy. We hesitate before we join anticipations with our enthusiastic cotemporary. In our next number our readers may depend upon hearing our truthful sentiments. Of the band we can record our conviction that it will prove the most efficient in Europe. Our faith is hardly so strong in the chorus. On Tuesday night we shall listen and adjudicate. Semiramide, we learn, will be produced in a style of magnificence, commensurate with public expectation. To give effect to the martial portions of the music a military band—the Coldstream, we believe—will be employed on the stage. No expense, we are assured, will be spared to render the mise en scene worthy the new establishment. A ballet by M. Albert, in which Mademoiselles Fleury, Bertin, Neodot, &c. will perform, conclude the entertainments. The Chronicle tells us that “the first chord struck will be the national anthem, in which Grisi, Persiani, Mario, Salvi, Tamburini, Morani, (meaning, of course, Marini), &c. will sing the verses, with the entire strength of the company and the Coldstream band in the ensemble.” This is the first time we have been informed, that “God save the Queen” is a chord! Let that pass! Nathless, this may be a slip of the pen and is scarcely worth chronicling among the grammatical licenses of the would-be supporter of the Royal Italian Opera.

We shall conclude our anticipations with some account respecting the building and decorations of the Royal Italian Opera, taking leave to quote from the enthusiastic writer in the Chronicle, who seems to have made himself thoroughly conversant with all doings within, as well as without, the walls of Covent Garden.

“The proscenium, consisting of two pair of magnificent Corinthian columns, with entablatures and cornice with the superstanding soffit, is in the hands of the decorator. The ceiling over the pit has been constructed and completed with strict regard to acoustics; it forms an elliptical base of a spheroidal section, of which the main axis is 70 feet by 62 transversely. The arrangement of this ceiling, in conjunction with the proscenium, has been so contrived that the singers are brought into juxta position with the audience, and it is calculated that owing to this exquisite form, the singers will not be obliged to strain their voices, as is too frequently the case in large theatres, destroying so many delicate organs. The veteran Braham, who visited the former scene of his triumphs the other day, complimented Mr. Albano on his success in the theatre as desirable for sound. The ceiling has been painted in Paris, by Signori Ferri and Verardi, and has excited great admiration in that capital of the connoisseurs. The painting was received on Saturday, in two huge packages twenty feet long. Signor Verardi commences this day to fix the canvases to the ceiling, and in a week or ten days the enormous forest of poles and spars, forming the scaffolding, from the pit floor to the roof, will be removed, and the colossal proportions of the interior will gloriously stand forth a monument of skill and ingenuity. The royal arms will be in relief on the proscenium, which will be in harmony with the allegorical painting of the ceiling. The new road under the portico, to enable the visitors to descend from their carriages at once inside the theatre is completed. The hall, with its gigantic columns, at the foot of the grand staircase, is quite ready. Everybody is amazed at the space in the corridors, round the tiers of boxes; a coach and six could drive around the grand tier. The elevation, breadth, and depth of the private boxes, and the seats for the pit stalls are on a larger scale than has hitherto been allowed for the comfort of an audience, and the graceful curve in the form of the façade of each tier will be a most grateful accommodation, especially to the long-limbed sinner. The double entrances to the pit for ingress and egress, to avoid opposing streams, and the two separate entrances for the stalls, are everything that can be desired. Nothing can be more noble than the suite of rooms, on ascending the grand staircase, before the crush room is reached. One of the greatest changes in the building is in the arrangement for the Queen's box and the other royal boxes. From the moment that her Majesty was graciously pleased to select the double box, Nos. 5 and 6, on the grand tier, from the proscenium, it was resolved that the state and private apartments connected with her Majesty's box, should be on a scale of magnitude and magnificence never before attempted in any English theatre. The royal boxes are quite separated from the grand tier. The old corkscrew staircase, long and tiresome to ascend, has been removed, and an entirely new and commodious staircase, appropriated exclusively to her Majesty and the members of the royal family, has been erected. The royal carriage will be under cover on its arrival in the court-yard of the royal entrance, and her Majesty will thus be able to alight without being exposed to the weather. Although the extent of accommodation has not reached that of the San Carlo for royalty, still for grandeur, comfort, and convenience, her Majesty's box and suite of rooms at the Royal Italian Opera are altogether unrivalled in any other house, and Mr. Albano's plan has delighted every one who has visited the theatre. We have stated that there are six tiers of boxes, but such is the beautiful form of the theatre, that the extreme boxes on the uppermost tier command an excellent view of the stage, thus solving a problem in the construction of the interior that had hitherto been deemed impossible. Mr. Albano, before he began his labours, submitted three plans for adoption—the first would have rendered Covent Garden the largest theatre in the world; the second brings it in size after the Scala of Milan and the San Carlo at Naples; and the third brought it under the dimensions of Her Majesty's Theatre. It was the second, or medium size, that the proprietors accepted, and has been carried out. The number of boxes is as follows:—

Proscenium, or stage boxes (four on each side)	8
Pit tier	30
Grand tier	34
First tier	34
Second tier	28
Third tier	28
Fourth tier	26

Total number of private boxes . . . 188

There are eight rows of stalls, making 256 seats, and 24 at the sides—280 in all. There are ten rows of seats with arms and backs to them in the pit, which, when full, will hold nearly 400 persons. Great praise has been bestowed on the introduction of the two amphitheatres—the first, which is in the fourth tier, will be fitted up with 148 stalls, at a price between the pit-stall and a private box for each individual. The second amphitheatre, level with the fifth tier, contains the same number of stalls, will be at a lower price, and full dress will not be required. The gallery is commodious, but it is not so large as that of Her Majesty's Theatre, but elevated as it necessarily is, the stage can be well seen, and, owing to the new formed ceiling, will be equally adapted for hearing.

We have little further to add. A few nights more—but three—and the excitement consequent upon the opening of the Royal Italian Opera—but it will be long ere the effects of the introduction of a new Italian Opera into the metropolis will have evaporated. Time alone, in his rounded journey, will tell the consequence. We are not prescient, or we might augur the downfall of one house and the uprise of the other. Of one thing we feel somewhat assured in looking to the future, namely, that two Italian Operas cannot exist together in London, and, as a natural consequence of the foregoing, that the theatre which is conducted on the most liberal principles and which devotes itself most strenuously to the production of the best music in this country, will, as sure as the stars shine by night, in the end be predominant. With this prediction we close our remarks on the Royal Italian Opera, wishing it every success at its outset.

“Will melt in the past like the yeast on the wave.”

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

THERE has been only one representation since our last, but that was a highly successful one. On Saturday Verdi's opera of Ernani was given with the usual ballet entertainments. The house was inconveniently crowded.

Our opinion of Verdi in general and of his Ernani in particular, has been already given, and as it affords us no pleasure to say disagreeable things we shall not repeat them

For those who are not acquainted with Victor Hugo's fine play on which the libretto of this opera is constructed we copy the following from the elegant brochure, distributed nightly in the place of bills, in the boxes and stalls of Her Majesty's Theatre:—

"The scene passes in Spain in the reign of Charles V. Ruy Gomez de Silva, grandee of Castile, although old, has preserved the chivalric and unbending principles derived from his ancestors. He wishes to marry his niece Elvira; but she already loves Ernani, and is by him passionately beloved. Ernani (John of Arragon) is son and heir of the Duke of Segorba, who fell a victim to the royal displeasure. John of Arragon, a price set upon his head, has fled to the mountains, changed his name, become a chief of brigands, and the terror of the country. The King of Castile, Don Carlos, known afterwards as Charles V., also loves the beautiful Castilian; and, while sighing beneath her window, sees a youthful cavalier introduce himself mysteriously to her chamber—it is Ernani. The King profits by the signal he has surprised to procure an interview with the lady; he declares his passion, and is about to tear her from the protection of her uncle, when Ernani appears to defend her. The scene which takes place between the rivals attracts Gomez by its noise, when the King, after hesitating between his dignity and his anger and jealousy, discovers his rank, and gives, as a pretext for his disguise, his desire to consult Gomez relative to a conspiracy against his title to the empire and his life. Preparations for the marriage of Don Ruy with Elvira are making, when Ernani, disguised as a pilgrim, comes to claim hospitality at the castle. He is received; but his love betrays itself, and Elvira throws herself into his arms. Ernani, seized and condemned to death, reveals to Gomez the passion and attempts of the King. A terrible pact is the consequence; Gomez and Ernani agree to join the plot against Don Carlos, and, as the price of his liberty, Ernani consents to hold his life at the discretion of Gomez. The conspirators meet; but their proceedings have been discovered, and they are surprised and arrested by the King. Proclaimed emperor, Charles V. forgets the wrongs of Don Carlos. He pardons Ernani, restores to him his titles, and unites his hand to that of Elvira. But the inflexible Gomez advances, claims the life of Ernani, and summons him to redeem his pledge. The sacrifice is accomplished, and the lover kills himself in view of the felicity which awaited him."

Such a subject in the hands of a composer of dramatic genius might have been made much of, but in the hands of Verdi it has given birth to a few sentimental cantilenas, one or two pretty cabalettas, some unison choral snatches, and nothing else. The opera itself is a caput mortuum. Its chief claim to notice rests in its being Verdi's dullest work, a distinction not easy of acquirement.

The opera was splendidly cast on Saturday night. We are indebted to our liberal cotemporary, the Chronicle, for the following, which includes the casts of 1845 (the year of production in England) and of the following year, besides that of the present year:—

	1845.	1846.	1847.
Ernani	MORIANI.	CASTIGLIONE.	FRASCHINI.
Don Carlos	BOTELLI.	BENSICH.	SUPERCHI.
Ruy Gomez	FORNASARI.	FORNASARI.	BOUCHE.
Elvira	Signora RITA BORIO.	Signora PASINI.	Mde. CASTELLAN.

The first year was tolerable, the second a failure altogether, (three debutantes being damned in one night). The superiority of the present cast needs no demonstrations, a glance at the names is enough to prove it. The performance on Saturday was altogether highly satisfactory, and raised Mr. Lumley's company many per cent in the estimation of his subscribers. Madame Castellan sang exceedingly well throughout the opera, and accomplished all her fortitude with unerring certainty. The "Ernani involami" was a brilliant and finished piece of vocalising, though it has been so terribly hacknied in English concert rooms that it lost all the charm of freshness—if, by the way, any such charm could belong to so trite a composition. Superchi may be said to have made his debut on this occasion. The music of Don Carlos, we are told, was written for him; be that as it may, he sang and acted so well as to show himself admirably fitted for the part. His great hit was in the air "Vieni meco" in which his mezza voce was quite charming and won him a loud encore. Bouché was capital in Ruy Gomez; his singing was artist-like and his acting impressive. Fraschini hardly came up to the expectations of his admirers, until the last act, when his singing was really energetic and beautiful. In short nothing could have gone better than the popular trio (we forgot the name, but it is Verdi's best known effort, having been heard in every concert room in the three kingdoms) in the hands of Castellan, Fraschini, and Bouché; it was loudly encored, and, at the fall of the curtain, the artists were re-called. There were also loud calls for Superchi, but having nothing to do in the last act he had most probably taken his leave. The chorus and band were admirable; the value of Balfe's exertions is gradually becoming known and appreciated. On several occasions, during the opera, there were marked indications of approval from the attentive part of the audience, who are aware of the importance of the orchestra and are ready to acknowledge its too often unappreciated exertions. To conclude, we have never heard an opera at Her Majesty's Theatre go off more brilliantly. Throughout the four acts, or parts as they are called, the encores, recalls, and other demonstrations of satisfaction on the part of the audience were more numerous than we have time to reckon.

The ballet of Thea, with the admirable Rosati, and a divertissement from Coralia, with the delicious Marie Taglioni, made up the measure of enjoyment, which was keenly relished by all present.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert attended, and all the brilliant assembly that in the morning had adorned the Queen's drawing room. The house presented a most dazzling appearance, and every one felt that the season had fairly begun.

Next week we intend to take a retrospective view of the doings of Her Majesty's Theatre up to the present epoch of the season 1847.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

ST. PETERSBURGH. — (From a local Journal.) — Musical re-unions are varieties in the city of the Czars. True, there are some private mansions in which certain evenings of each week are devoted to the best purposes of music; but these are merely exceptions which confirm the rule. In general the public are but little acquainted with the instrumental compositions of the great masters, and their amount of musical knowledge is gleaned either from the Opera House or the churches. Mons. Vieuxtemps, during his sojourn in the imperial city, perceived the vacuum, and at once established a musical re-union, or conversazione, to fill up the void. He collected around him all the musicians of note, he invited a large circle of friends and acquaintances, and provided the most estimable works of Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Spohr, Mendelssohn, and others. He established a musical fire-side: he created a taste for music where none before existed: the benefits conferred by these re-unions were inestimable, no less in a social than an artistic point of view. Around him he congregated members of all classes and all societies. In his rooms might be seen the musician and the amateur—the nobleman and the bourgeois—the lord and the lady—ambassadors, marshals, officers, authors, churchmen, poets, professors, and merchants. Mons. Vieuxtemps gave three matinées three successive Sundays, at which we had the good fortune to attend. In these concerts there were performed two quartetts of Haydn; two quartetts of Beethoven; one quartett of Spohr; one quintett of Mozart; two trios, one of Beethoven, the other of Mendelssohn, and a sonata of Mons. Vieuxtemps for violin and piano. These morceaux were most admirably executed by M. Vieuxtemps, the brothers Albrecht, M. Gross, and a young pianist (newly arrived in St. Petersburg). M. Honore, who, by his co-operation at the matinées, has already won golden opinions from all classes. The last matinée will take place to-morrow, as M. Vieuxtemps is shortly to take his departure, when, as a matter of course, the re-unions will be broken up. This is heartily to be lamented. To-morrow we shall hear the quartett of Mendelssohn in D minor; a sonata of Beethoven for violin and piano; and the quartett in C sharp minor of Beethoven—and then, behold an end! Mons. Vieuxtemps will then repair directly to Paris, at which capital he will give a series of concerts. This violinist is certainly one of the very greatest artists on his instrument in modern times. By combining simplicity with grandeur he has realized the supremacy of art. He is equally the master of the classic and romantic school. He unites the breadth and large manner of Viotti, with the impetuosity and caprices of Paganini. He has regulated the faults of both styles, and amalgamating them, has proved that art is not sepearable, but is one, indivisible and perfect for him who can comprehend it, and make it available practically. Mons. Vieuxtemps has our best wishes and our best thanks whithersoever he goes. He has proved himself, since his sojourn amongst us, not only a great artist, but an amiable personage: not only the enthusiast, devoted heart and hand to his art, but the kind friend and hearty acquaintance. Mons. Vieuxtemps has been one of the most favorite artists that ever came to St. Petersburg. We repeat, he has our best wishes whithersoever he may go.

REVIEWS ON MUSIC.

“Wood’s Edition of the Songs of Scotland.” Edited by G. F. GRAHAM.—WOOD AND CO., EDINBURGH.

WE have received the first number of a publication, purporting to supply a cheap and handsome edition of the songs of Scotland, in a neat form, to be completed in twenty monthly numbers. The number before us, No. 1, contains “The Flowers of the Forest,” old and new set; “Gloomy Winter’s now awa;” “Bonnie wee thing;” “Kind Robin lo’es me;” “O, why left I my hame?” “Bide ye yet;” and “Roslin Castle.” The work is finely printed on good paper, and is of imperial quarto size, and the music is carefully arranged. Altogether the production deserves every support, and, we are sure, will receive it. We are delighted to find so excellent a musician as Mr. T. Mudie, of the Royal Academy, appointed as one of the supervisors of the work. His name will be a guarantee for the worth and intention of Mr. Wood’s publication. We most strongly recommend the new edition of the “Songs of Scotland,” to all lovers of ballads in general, and to lovers of Scotch ballads in particular.

“Valse Brillantes,” for the pianoforte. Composed by F. R. VENUA.—LEONI LEE AND COXHEAD.

A SET of very pleasing waltzes arranged for four hands, and adapted to moderate performers. We can recommend these unpretending compositions as being the offspring of a musical mind, and as possessing that tune or melody so necessary to works of this class, and without which they neither live, breathe, nor have their being. A dance of any kind without a tune, can scarcely merit the name—and yet we have lived to hear such so defamed. Mr. F. R. Venua’s compositions are dances indeed!

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

PASSACAGLIA.

To the Editor of the “Musical World.”

MY DEAR SIR,—It is no easy task to trace out the origin of some words; the part most essential to those who adopt words of doubtful origin is to maintain their general signification and application. A composer may, for instance, write a good madrigal, and be unacquainted with the origin of the word, which may come from Madre, because it was customary to sing hymns to The Mother. Passacaglia very probably comes from the Latin word Passiculus, which means a light step. But of this, who can be certain? For there might have lived a man of the name of Passacaglia, and I should as much regret taking away his right to the merit of this species of composition as I always lament to read of the extravagant praise of some musicians and singers, who deserve but a quarter of the eulogiums past upon them; for it does injury to the art, and, as years roll by, will only show the worthlessness of undue and high-flown criticism. A Passacaglia need not be written in three-fourths time, nor be “a slow dance.” If these constituted its essential qualities, then the two greatest masters have not preserved its original form; and it is scarcely likely that they should not have done so, when we consider the time in which they flourished—I allude to S. Bach’s splendid Passacaglia in three-fourths time, in C minor, and Handel’s in common time, in G minor. It would puzzle even Taglioni, Cerito, &c., to invent chance figures to these compositions. But the writers of the press being more eloquent on the subject of dancing, those profound in their observations on music, I will hold silence on this—their favourite topic—or they may discover that I am a greater admirer of a homely sort of dancing than that which reminds one of the twist of a wooden leg, for so dexterously straight do these gifted dancers twist one of their legs round and round. Now, as regards any further explanation of the Passacaglia, I must refer Mr. Allen to my essay, wherein I have written all that is required for the construction of one. Should your readers, Mr. Editor, desire me, through your journal, to explain away any other part of my work which is not clear to them, I shall be happy to do so; for the better it is understood, the more it will be approved of, because Abbè Vogler’s system is complete from the beginning to the end, and therefore it will bear the strictest examination. I will not disown that there is much that is new to be found in my essay, and I leave to others the right to scrutinize all I have introduced into the science of music. With great satisfaction I learn that eminent musicians and distinguished personages approve of my work; but as there may be some who may not, let me at once observe that they will carefully avoid all public discussion with me respecting a system which is known and, in part, adopted by the best German theorists. But are not the prejudices of those men always the strongest who most decline calm investigation, although unfortunately they are not always the least severe in their private opinions and animosities?

I am, truly yours,

3, Keppel-street, Russell-square.

FRENCH FLOWERS.

P.S.—Would it not be much to the advantage of all vocalists if “CONCERT PITCH” were at least half a tone lower? Why distress the human voice for a mere nominal advantage? We are told that a change of a semitone would materially effect the brilliancy of instrumentation!! What odd notions must be entertained concerning the requisites necessary to produce brilliant orchestral effects. It is a pity that this petty whim should so injuriously effect all vocal music; if it did not do so, this would be too insignificant a matter to write about.

To the Editor of the “Musical World.”

MY DEAR MR. EDITOR,—If, by presuming to ask you a scientific question, I shall be considered as having violated the rules of decorum, you will, I trust, attribute it to the proper, and, as I hope, pardonable cause—namely, the very high opinion I entertain of your sound musical judgment above all other scientific authorities as published.

It is a popular saying—

“Who shall decide when DOCTORS disagree?”

Now, the decision, in my opinion, upon such disagreements can only be safely arrived at by a knowledge of the competency of the DOCTORS.

Now, sir, in the present case, you are regarded as a physician in an art, about which at this moment a slight musical question is pending.

Your reply will oblige several subscribers,

March 24, 1847.

ZÉTO.

QUESTION.—HAS CORELLI, in any passage known, violated in the slightest degree, or departed from, the prescribed laws of HARMONY?

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—If you could inform me what are the regulations to be observed in taking a musical degree, you would much oblige

A CONSTANT READER.

[Perhaps our friend D. S. will answer these questions for us.—Ed.]

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

(BEAUMONT'S FEE.)

SIR,—Can you inform me the length of time an author is entitled to the copyright of a song? With many thanks for past favours,

I remain, sir, yours obediently,

Lincoln, March 22.

A SUBSCRIBER.

PROVINCIAL.

DOVER.—On Tuesday the 9th, the second annual grand concert of the Amateur Sacred Choral Society was held at the Apollonian Hall. On this occasion it was assisted by the vocal talents of Mrs. and Miss Byers, Mr. George Genge, and Mr. Farquharson Smith, who also conducted. Mr. Doone, as pianist, conferred his gratuitous services, and also sang a recitative and air by Neukomm, "Speak, thou silent Heavens." Mr. T. B. Morris was the leader of the orchestra. The chorusses were executed with great precision. Miss Byers is a young lady of great promise. Her air, with chorus, "The marvellous works," met with a unanimous encore. Mr. Genge, with his pure treble voice, sang an air from Mehul, "Ere infancy's bud had expanded," and an air of Handel, "Thou shalt bring them in," both of which were encored. Mr. F. Smith and Miss Byers, in the recitative and duet, "Adam and Eve," were effective. Mr. F. Smith, in "Rolling in foaming billows," and its recitative, and that from Handel, "I feel the Deity within," gave full scope to his powerful organ. Nor must we omit to mention Mr. Richards in "He was despised." As a whole, it was the best concert of this society, which deserves all encouragement.—Dover Telegraph.

SALISBURY.—This theatre closed on Thursday evening with the "Provoked Husband," "A Day in Paris," and "A Day after the Wedding." We fear that Mr. Davis has had but an unprofitable season comparatively with the last; but nothing else could be expected when we compare the two companies. Last year there was Mrs. Gurner and Mr. Davis as leading lady and gentleman, and we defy any country town to produce two better. This there has been no regular leading man, and the first lady's business has devolved on Miss Maguire (O'Hara is the theatrical name); and never did any one so mistake her profession as this lady. She has no single qualification for the stage. With light, thin sandy hair, and lean figure, she was an awful contrast to Mrs. Gurner's Lady Townly of last season both in appearance and as an actress; and how Mrs. Davis could allow the exhibition she did on Friday night, with herself and Mrs. Watson both in the theatre, and either of whom (although not in their line of business) would have played the character much better, we are at a loss to know. Well might the Salisbury paper say on the occasion of Miss O'Hara playing Juliana, "It was here we missed Mrs. Gurner." No, no, Mr. Manager, you must not give us a good dinner one day and starve us another. A Gurner one season and an O'Hara the next. But we well know the difficulty of procuring talent, and that you are always ready to pay liberally for it when you can get it.

LINCOLN.—(From our Correspondent).—On Friday, March 24, a concert of sacred music, given by Mr. G. Brook, in the County Assembly Rooms, was very numerously attended, and gave much satisfaction. The vocalists were, Mrs. Turner, and Masters Thomas and Travis, Mr. Martin, Mr. Knowles, Mr. Turner, Mr. Brook, and all of the cathedral choir. Part first was a selection from the "Messiah"; the second part a miscellaneous selection, including Beethoven's song, "The Quail Cry," well sung by Mr. Turner, and tastefully accompanied by his clever pupil, Mr. F. Ward. Mrs. Turner, Mr. Knowles, and Mr. Martin, were much, but not too much applauded. Mr. Harmston's playing (violin) gained him a similar compliment. Some of the choruses were well sung, particularly "For unto us a child is born."

NEWBURN.—(From our Correspondent).—Mr. Frederick Wright has lately erected an organ in the Newburn Concert Rooms, and opened it on Thursday last, with two sacred concerts, or selections from Handel's Judas Maccabeus. They were both well and fashionably attended, and the performance gave so much satisfaction, that Mr. F. W. intends giving a series. The singers were Miss Byers, (who gained great applause) Miss Duval, Mr. Turner, and Mr. R. T. Smith. Mr. Sturges was at the organ, and Mr. Garman conducted. The choruses were exceedingly well done by an efficient number of singers from Exeter Hall and Brighton Societies.

MAIDSTONE.—On Tuesday evening Mr. Robert Green, the pianist, with the Misses Williams, Mr. H. Phillips, Mr. Willy, and Mr. W. H.

Seguin, gave an entertainment at the Corn Market Room, which was deserving of more patronage than it received; the scanty audience affording another melancholy proof of the utter absence of musical taste in Maidstone, which, unfortunately, pervades all classes. The Misses Williams warbled in their usual delightful manner, and never, perhaps, did their voices blend more harmoniously than in the duets of "The woodbirds," and "We are two merry fairies," both of which were encored, as were the "Indian Maiden's song," by Miss A. Williams, and Knight's "Soldier's daughter," by Miss M. Williams. They are also heard to great advantage with Mr. W. H. Seguin, in Welch's glee of "The merry gypsies," and Bishop's "Sleep gentle lady." Henry Phillips gave Calcott's "Last man," in splendid style; nor was he less effective in his own scena of "The bear hunt." His new song of "There's a new year coming," is a charming ballad, and was excellently rendered by Mr. Phillips. Mr. W. H. Seguin gave "Non piu andrai" very pleasingly, as also Loder's "Philip the Falconer." The great treat of the evening was the Duo Concertante for the pianoforte and violin between Mr. Robert Green and Mr. Willy, upon favourite themes from Rossini's "Guillaume Tell." Everybody knows the rich tones of Willy's violin and his perfect mastery of the instrument; and when we say that Mr. Green's performance fully supported it, we need say no more to make ourselves comprehended by musicians. It was indeed a high treat, and was duly appreciated by the audience, and so were Mr. Willy's solo on the violin and Mr. Green's fantasia on the pianoforte, the "March Marocaine," by Leopold de Meyer. Mr. Green is one of the best accompanists we have heard. He really accompanies the singers, and not, as is too frequently the fashion, drowns their voices by playing in the fortissimo style. We must conclude, as we commenced, by pronouncing this to have been one of the most delightful concerts given here for some time; and we again regret that there is not sufficient taste in the good old town of Maidstone to encourage musical talent.—Maidstone Gazette.

CONCERTS.

MR. ALLCROFT.—This miscellaneous musical entertainment took place on Tuesday evening at the Haymarket Theatre. As we gave a preliminary notice, in which we stated the full particulars of the concert, it is not necessary to enter into any lengthened detail on the present occasion, merely contenting our readers with a brief allusion to the performances which were most favourably received. The sixteen pianos and eight harps, it may well be imagined, did not greatly tend to enhance the performance of the Stabat Mater of Rossini. Though effectively given, both by vocalists and instrumentalists, it went extremely heavy, and seemed by no means suited to the tastes of the majority of the audience. It was, however, patiently endured; more, we opine, on account of the sacred character of the music, given at a sacred season, than from any beauty in itself made manifest to the general comprehension. We are by no means of that class who can espy no merit in Rossini's Stabat Mater; and we felt somewhat aggrieved at the profane addition of pianos and harps to the score. The first part altogether was sufficiently dull; nor did the prayer from the Mossé, which closed this section of the entertainment, redeem its monotony. The second part was of a lighter and more amenable character. The band played the overture to the Gazza Ladra tolerably well, and Madame Dulcken executed a fantasia of Wallace's, which was much applauded. Then Signor F. Lablache and his cara sposa obtained a tumultuous encore in "Dunquo io son" most deservedly, and Miss Rainforth was equally complimented in a ballad of Balfe's. Besides these, we had a Miss Hill, very nervous in a song of Flotow's, whom (Miss Hill, not Flotow,) it would not be fair to criticise on this occasion, and a descriptive march on eight harps, descriptive of nothing but confusion and uncertainty. Nevertheless, to make amends, the BRIDAL POLKA was performed by the full orchestra, with the addition of the sixteen pianists and eight harps, which of course enraptured the audience beyond all that went before. Of the third part we did not remain to hear much. There was the usual selection of native and foreign morceaux, and one or two encores. Just before we left, Mr. Henry Russell sang his descriptive scena, "The Ship on Fire," which he repeated amid great acclamations. In the course of the evening the Ethiopian Serenaders from the St. James's introduced a selection from their popular entertainment, and were encored. We are obliged to forego any special remarks on the several singers, though we would willingly bear testimony to the excellent assistance rendered to the evening's amusement by Miss Birch, Miss M. B. Hawes,

Mr. Travers, Mr. H. Phillips, and others. The theatre was crowded in every part.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The usual performance of the Messiah, during the season of Lent, took place on Wednesday. The principals engaged were Mr. Lockey, for the tenor, and his excellent singing of the music allotted to him, confirmed the good choice of the Directors; Miss Birch for the soprano, who sang her music "as usual;" Miss Dolby for the contralto, whose chaste rendering of the air "He was despised," brought it back in all its freshness to our mind; and a young lady, Miss Kirkham, a relative and pupil of Mr. and Mrs. Anderson (we believe), sang the music generally given to the second soprano. This young lady, judging under all the circumstances of a first appearance, and the natural timidity consequent thereon, has a voice of good quality, and has evidently been under a strict course of instruction. She is apparently very young, and we have no doubt that in time will prove a valuable acquisition to our concert singers. The choruses were sung better than usual. "For unto us a child is born" was encored, and the "Hallelujah" was rendered as well, if not better, than we have ever heard it. We are bound, however, again to lift our voice against the so frequent use of the organ, as not only in the choral pieces, but also in the solo and concerted parts, points and effects are frequently marred from its indiscriminate use. We would urge on the organist the study of the score of Handel, and with his knowledge of orchestral effects, he must be aware of such parts where its introduction is not needed. The Hall was well filled. We observe that the first performance of Elijah is announced for the 16th instant.

MISS STEELE'S SACRED CONCERT took place at Blagrove's Rooms, Mortimer-street, on Wednesday morning. The selections displayed taste and judgment, comprising some of the best and most favorite morceaux of Handel, Himmel, Purcell, Haydn, Mozart, Mehül, and Mendelssohn. The principal singers were Miss Rainforth, Miss M. B. Hawes, and the Messrs. Hobbs, Lockey, and Machin. Purcell's anthem, "O, sing unto the Lord," was well performed, the solo parts being entrusted to the efficient hands, or rather voices, of Miss Rainforth, Miss Steele, Mr. Hobbs, and Mr. Machin. "In native worth," was given with exceeding taste and feeling by Mr. Lockey. Miss Steele was excellent in the air from Saul. "O Lord, whose mercies;" and Miss Hawes no less so in Mehül's beautiful song, "Ere infancy's bud." Mendelssohn's quartett, "When the West," was capitally sung, without accompaniments, by Miss Rainforth, Miss Hawes, Mr. Machin, and Mr. Lockey; and a quartett and chorus from Mozart's Mass, No. 12, was also rendered effective by the same vocalists, substituting Miss Steele for Miss Rainforth. This finished the first part. "He was despised," by Miss Hawes; "From mighty Kings," by Miss Steele; and the choruses, "For unto us," and "The Heavens are telling," were among the best performances of the second part. The chorus was good considering its force, and the whole concert was excellently conducted under the offices of Mr. Turle.

MR. HENRY PHILLIPS devoted the Tuesday evening of Passion week to an entertainment, in which he gave illustrations of Sacred Songs, taken from the works of Handel and Haydn. The concert, or to speak more properly, the illustrated lecture, was held at the Marylebone Institution, Edward Street, Portman Square. Mr. Phillips prefaced the entertainment with some very pertinent remarks on the combination of music and poetry. The origin of the term "Oratorio" was explained by the lecturer thus:—"The word was not introduced until 1720, when Handel first composed 'Ruth,' and being first heard in the private chapel, or oratory, of the Duke of Chandos, suggested to him the term Oratorio, which was thence used, and has been applied to all Oratorios since. The life of Handel was briefly touched upon in the introduction, and his composition descanted upon, and the places named where they were written. All this afforded much interest to the audience. In part first, Mr. H. Phillips introduced songs from "The Messiah," "Alexander's Feast," "Samson and Joshua," in the second part, "Judas Maccabeus," the "Creation," and the "Messiah" furnished the selection. Mr. Phillips was greatly applauded during the evening, and was encored with acclamation in the Recitative and air from Judas Maccabeus, "Tears such as tender fathers shed." His singing of this magnificent composition was really admirable. The room was very full. Mr. Turle, organist of Westminster Abbey, presided at the piano.

THE NEW PHILHARMONIC CHAMPION.

THE Philharmonic Society has at last discovered, or invented a tutelary genius for itself. The shield of the Morning Chronicle has been thrown across its hallowed walls by the great Jenkins, who is henceforth to be the Apollo of that Parnassus, it always being pre-understood that he shall learn how to write good grammar; and that he shall endeavour to comprehend how a violin is tuned. Mr. Grattan Cooke wished him to acquire the gamut upon the oboe, but the notion was overruled, the wildest imagination never having conceived either the "golden haired Elector," or Jenkins, playing upon such an instrument. The first act of the new deity, in defence of the committee and members, has been to tweak the nose of the Thunderer, i. e., to beard the Times. "Inconsistency," quoth the new Apollo, and thereabout did he quote a paragraph as long as our arm, and another paragraph still longer, having no relation whatever to the cause, in point, to prove that the Times did not always esteem Mr. Macfarren a genius, or Mr. Sterndale Bennett a giant; as if the aforesaid Apollo Jenkins thought that the Morning Chronicle was really an immaculate journal, and had never chaunted the praise of that Mr. Lumley whom it is now at every moment seeking the opportunity to ruin. Reflect, Magnus Apollo, that there was a time when you wished to take your budding chaplet and untuned lyre into the enemies camp; when the hand and the olive were held out upon your part by kindly friends, and when you were not quite so determined to uproot the dynasty of Lumley from things theatrical. Perpend this most musical Jenkins, and append unto thy reflections—as a species of moral dishclout to the tail of thy conscience—the time hallowed proverbs, that he who dwells in a glass-house should not throw stones; and that it is a bad joke on the part of the pot to call the kettle black, even when new-scrubbed by the purifying entrance into a new journal. It is in serious soberness that we take upon ourselves to read thee this lecture, for we have a reverence for thy bad grammar, and should be grievously disappointed at the day of thy death, being fully aware that none could in that respect at least replace thee. In grammar, its use and its abuse the unkindest critic must allow thee to be unrivalled. Shall there be no more English, or German music, because thou wilt only of Italian? Shall no puppy dog, i. e. Morning Paper bark because thou chooseth to growl? Go to, there be other men in the world and other deities too than thee, Appollo Jenkins, and they will none of thee and thy Parnassus. But in serious mood and to tell the truth, it is with great difficulty that we can be serious with thee after thy exposition of Verdi's genius two mornings since. We have almost destroyed that great composer: do thou praise him and the work completes itself for, to do thee justice, thou art the most fatal champion to the causes in defence of which thou bucklest on thine own armour who has yet couched goosequill in rest or blemished the spotless and maiden face of foolscap. We, upon our own parts, swear to give thee and the Philharmonic our blessing when they play one symphony of the great master correctly, and when thou inditest twenty-five lines, which Cobbett and Lindlay Murray would pronounce respectable English.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MISS LUCOMBE.—Our readers will be glad to learn that this lady's success on the Continent has been very great. Private letters from Florence speak in high praise of her. Her voice, it is said, has been authenticated as one of the most brilliant and promising in Italy, by the dictum of the amateur composer, Prince Joseph Poniatowski. Before she left England, this young lady had energy and intention, which, indeed, as many returned travellers show, can hardly be taught by foreign study. They may be refined however; and for art's sake, and for the credit of England, we trust that in the present instance, refinement may keep pace with development.—Birmingham Journal.

THE PROVINCIAL BISHOP.—(From Punch).—"Our friend the Musical World is in a state of weekly excitement about the progress of LA BISHOP—as he artistically calls her—in the provinces. We are told that such was the enthusiasm on her last appearance in Edinburgh, that the audience began pulling out their pencils and writing on slips of paper, which were sent round to the stage-door, requesting the performance of various morceaux in addition to those in the programme. Why the dilettanti preferred writing instead of speaking out, and calling for what they wanted, our musical friend has not informed us; but La Bishop, in the most obliging manner, consented not only to sing the morceaux requested, but to sing them every one in character. When the rondo finale from L'Elisir d'Amore was requested by a slip sent round from the slips, La Bishop came forward in a few minutes dressed in the costume of Adina, and the tenor aided her amiability by appearing with her, dressed as Nemorino, though he had not a note to deliver. Such amiability was never heard before, either in or out of any theatre in Europe. It is strange, that with all the attraction of La Bishop everywhere out of London, the manager of Drury Lane Theatre should have been so self-denying as to exclaim "Nolo episcopari, I will have no more Bishop!"

MRS. NISBETT.—This celebrated actress will make her re-appearance at the Haymarket Theatre on Monday, April 12, in her original character of Constance, in Sheridan Knowles's comedy of The Love Chase.

ADELPHI.—A local sketch, called Jenny Lind, will be performed at this popular theatre on Monday, April 12.

CHURCH MUSIC.—A letter from Rome states that the Pope is about to revive a project conceived by his predecessor, Gregory XVI., to reduce the church music to its primitive simplicity.

ASTRONOMICAL LECTURES.—Mr. C. Adams commenced his series of these very interesting lectures, on Monday evening last, at the Adelphi Theatre. We have rarely been more pleased with an entertainment. The lecturer took great pains to render his explanation evident to the understanding of the commonest portion of the auditory. He made use of sundry diagrams variously coloured, to assist him in expounding the inclination of the ecliptic and equator; the cause of the seasons' changes; the parallaxes of the fixed stars, and the eccentricity of the orbits of the comets. Some of the transparencies were very beautiful, especially the orrery, which was exhibited towards the end of the lecture. Mr. Adams introduced a brief account of the new planet, and contended that the discovery thereof is as much due to his namesake, Mr. Adams, as to the French astronomer, M. Le Vivier, both having at the same time arrived at the conclusion that there must be a disturbing body beyond the planet Uranus, the announcement of which gave rise to observations that ultimately led to the discovery. Between the parts, Mr. and Mrs. Johnson performed several favourite airs on the musical glasses, which seemed to take the audience mightily, for every morceau was encored. The house was very full, and the audience listened to Mr. Adams very attentively. The lectures were repeated during the week, with the exception of Friday night.

ARRIVAL OF THE MONSTER TROUPE OF HORSES, ELEPHANTS, &c., FOR DRURY-LANE THEATRE.—On Saturday, at half-past two o'clock, the grand equestrian company engaged by Mr. Bunn to perform at Drury-lane, arrived at the Euston-square terminus. The two Elephants, who were obliged to perform the journey from Birmingham on foot, owing to their being no railway conveyance sufficiently large to contain them, arrived first, drawing after them a huge and richly ornamented carriage, in the shape of a fiery dragon, twenty-one feet in height. Soon after the elephants were housed, the two o'clock train arrived, consisting of forty-five carriages, with trucks, horse-boxes, &c., and the debarkation of the biped and quadruped performers commenced. The entire company of male and female artists, musicians, painters, and auxiliaries, next landed. Fifty-four horses, ten camels, ten ponies, and a great number of new and curiously fashioned carriages, of ancient and modern architecture, with emblematical devices, formed a portion of the cortège, which occupied two hours in unpacking.

DRURY-LANE THEATRICAL FUND FESTIVAL.—Mr. Harley, the master, and Mr. W. Bennet, the secretary to this ancient and most benevolent institution, have already commenced operations calculated to give effect to the annual feast, which the perpetual president, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, has appointed to take place in Freemasons' hall, on Friday, the 23rd of April. On this occasion the "Drury-lane," takes precedence of the "Covent-garden Fund Festival;" not, however, invidiously, it being an arrangement long entered into that the sister funds should celebrate their anniversary alternately.—Observer.

THE COMMITTEE OF DRURY-LANE THEATRE AND THE RENTERS.—A correspondent states that the committee of this Theatre have proposed to the renters to give them proprietors' shares, to be created to the number of 3,000 as a bonus, instead of their annuities and annual admissions. The original grant to the renters was an annuity of 25*l.* a year, which is at the present time reduced to 12*l.* 10*s.* The committee will allow the renters three "lives," instead of their annual nominations. The sum of 90*l.* is understood to be the worth of a renters' share with its annual admission; the shares of the proprietors are stated to be worth in the market about 1*l.* for every 100*l.* share; of these shares of the proprietors there exist 3,000, to which 3,000 more would be added by the new arrangement offered for acceptance by the committee.—Observer.

CURIOS MUSICAL FACT.—The undisputed sovereignty of Verdi over the present composers of Italy, has produced the publication of a new lithographic sketch at Milan, which may give some idea of the length to which Italian infatuation can go. This print represents the new Maestro crushing under his feet a score or two of dead composers; one of the previous mentioned feet being on the neck of the living ROSSINI!

VERDI.—In an elaborate defence of this sublime composer, the Chronicle observes:—"Verdi is the Martin of painting; it is the melodrame of art." We always thought Martin a painter, and Verdi a musician, but it appears to be vice versa. We should like to be told what the "it" means which we have displayed in capitals. Will our contemporary enlighten us?

MR. ELLA had an interview with Tamburini on Wednesday last, at Mivart's hotel. Nothing as yet has transpired of what took place.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—It is stated that the grand chandelier of this theatre has cost nearly 4000*l.* In consequence of the death of Mr. Moralt, Mr. Hill is installed as premier tenor of the orchestra of this establishment. Mr. Thomas, formerly leader of the band at Covent Garden theatre, supplies the vacancy left by Mr. Hill's appointment, and Mr. Westlake is also engaged as tenor player. Mr. John Loder, as one of the second-violins, is also retained.

GRAND MASONIC BALL.—"The old Concord Lodge" of Freemasons held their annual ball on Tuesday evening last, at Weippert's Spacious Rooms, in Davies Street, Berkeley Square, and a truly magnificent affair it proved. The officers of this, one of the principal lodges of the craft, appeared in their collars and jewels, and the majority of the ladies were adorned with a rich rosette, surmounted by a splendid masonic emblem (square and compass) manufactured in silver, from the design, of the worshipful master, for the laudable occasion. The ball was most respectably and numerously attended, nearly 200 in number having assembled at an early hour, and the gay and festive scene continued uninterrupted until the break of day. The music was excellent, and too much praise cannot be given to the Master and stewards, for the spirited manner in which the ball was conducted throughout. The proceeds will be applied to Masonic charity.

MADAME ANNA BISHOP sings next Monday, the 5th of April, at a Concert at Exeter; on the 6th, up to the 10th, she is re-engaged by Mrs. Macready to perform, alternately at Bath and Bristol; on the 12th she will be at Leamington; she returns afterwards to Edinburgh and Dublin, and will be back to London, for the whole season, on the first of May next. Mr. Allcroft had offered an engagement to Madame Bishop for his concert, on the 30th of March, as also did the committee of the Beaumont Institution and that of the Western Literary Institution for some concerts in April, but her provincial engagements did not allow her to accept them.

GENERAL THEATRICAL FUND.—The Second Festival, in commemoration of the establishment of this society, was held at the London Tavern on Monday. Mr. Macready presided in the chair, and was supported by Mr. Charles Dickens and Mr. Horace Twiss. Among the company present we noticed Mr. J. Collett, M. P., Mr. E. Brewster, Mr. Jules Bonedict, Mr. T. P. Cooke, Mr. Cullingford, Mr. S. Faucit, Mr. Landseer, Mr. Lyon, Mr. Buckstone, and other theatrical gentlemen. A strong array of talent mustered in the music gallery. Among others we observed, the Misses Rainforth, Dolby, Sarah Flower, M. Williams, A. Williams, Locky, Kirkham; with Messrs. Allen, Francis, Machin, Young, Kench, Bruton, Locky, Manvers, F. Chatterton, Carte, and Blewitt. Mr. J. L. Hatton conducted. The arrangements were excellent. The gallery was filled with ladies which gave great animation to the scene. After the health of the Royal Family was drunk with honours, Mr. Macready rose and proposed "Success to the Fund." In his speech, Mr. Macready animadverted severely on the exclusive system of the Drury Lane and Covent Garden funds, and insisted that they neither merited nor required support. His address was received with great applause. Mr. Dickens also made a short speech in allusion to the system pursued by the committees of Drury Lane and Covent Garden respectively, regarding the theatrical funds of each theatre. Several other gentlemen made speeches. The chairman announced that Her Majesty had signified her intention of becoming patron of the institution and had sent a donation of 100 guineas. Among the list of subscriptions read by Mr. Cullingford, the secretary, we can only call to mind those of the Duke of Devonshire, 10 guineas; Mr. Macready, £10; Miss Burdett Coutts, £10; and Mr. Strutt, £10. The entire subscription amounted to nearly £400. The chairman and several other gentlemen retired at an early hour but the festivities did not conclude until the small morning hours.

MELODISTS.—The Third Meeting of the Melodists' Club was held on Tuesday, at the Freemason's Tavern, where a numerous party dined, E. Goldsmid, Esq., in the chair. Non nobis and several fine glees were well sung by Messrs. E. Taylor, Parry, Horn, Gear, King, Hatton, Machin, Blewitt, Foord, Manvers, Hill, Shorebridge, Young, Spencer, &c., &c. Songs were also sung by Messrs. Horn, Hatton, Young, Machin, and Blewitt. The treat in the instrumental department was one of the very highest order, for Mr. Sterndale Bennett performed two of his charming morceaux, the Romance Genevieve and Rondo Piacetole, in first-rate style. There was no rushing up and down the finger-board, hops, skips, and jumps, but a most legitimate, classical performance, which called forth the rapturous plaudits of the delighted company. Signor Emiliani played an andante, with variations, of his own, on the violin, accompanied by Mr. Bennett, most admirably; he is a tasteful and a highly finished performer on his own instrument; he was applauded to the echo. The honorary secretary announced, that three candidates had entered the list for the prize, offered by Sir Andrew Barnard, for a Druidical ode and chorus, to be sung by Mr. Machin, accompanied by Sir Henry Bishop, at the Meeting on the 27th instant, when his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge will honour the club with his presence.

CONCERT FOR THE LATE MR. KEARNS'S FAMILY.—Hanover Square Rooms, March 27, 1847.—At the Final Meeting of the General Committee, this day, it was unanimously resolved:—"That 'the cordial thanks of the Committee be presented to the Editor of The Musical World for his kind and liberal assistance, which has tended so greatly towards the pecuniary success of the Concert.'" The Committee are happy to state that the exertions and good-feeling, evinced by all concerned on this truly charitable occasion, will enable them to transmit to the unfortunate family £237 6s. 8d., of which sum £69 4s. 9d. has been already received in donations, per list, in the possession of T. Chappell, Esq., the honorary treasurer; additions are still being received by him, the honorary secretary, and the chairman.—(Signed) George Smart, Chairman."

JENNY LIND.—The director of the theatre Ander-Wien, at Vienna, has had a medal struck in honour of "The Swedish Nightingale." It contains on the one side her portrait, and on the other a star, with the motto, "Nescit occasum." (It knows no setting). The medal is to be presented to Mlle Lind with an address, signed by the elite of the society of Vienna.

NEW MUSIC.—"The Sabbath,"—A very pleasing poem under this title, written by Mr. D. Clarke, of Liverpool, has been set to music, the composition of Mr. William Henry Cooke, who has gallantly dedicated his production to a lady, in compliment to her literary acquirements. The words and air are appropriately united, the solemnity of the former having duly impressed the mind and guided the instructions of the composer. The melody, which is remarkably sweet, is in the key of A flat, and will, doubtless, become a great favourite by the fireside, where a taste for music is cultivated.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Warren's 20 Guinea Cottage Piano-Fortes

ARE NOW SELLING AT THE
Manufactory, 71, Leadenhall Street

(Removed from 1 and 2, Liverpool Street, Bishopsgate Street.)

These Instruments are well manufactured of the best seasoned wood, FINE FULL TONE and GOOD TOUCH. A two years warranty given with each instrument. ESTABLISHED TWENTY-ONE YEARS. The only house in London where a good sound instrument can be obtained at the above low price, (for cash only). SMALL PROFIT AND QUICK RETURNS!

JOHN WARREN, 71, Leadenhall St., opposite Aldgate Pump.

MADAME ANNA BISHOP,

Will return from the Provinces to London, for the whole season, the first week in May.—Professional applications, directed to

No. 28, GREAT QUEEN STREET, LINCOLN'S INN,
will be attended to.

PIANOFORTES.

Parties in want of a really good PIANOFORTE, at a moderate price, will do well to call at

J. C. JONES AND CO.'S,

2, Hanway-street, Oxford-street, a few doors on the right from Tottenham-court-road, who, from their intimate acquaintance with every kind of instrument made, have endeavoured to combine the separate good qualities of each with all the latest improvements, therefore for tone, touch, durability, and appearance these instruments are not to be surpassed at the price.

Instruments tuned, repaired, exchanged, and lent on hire.
Tuning by the year, one guinea. Second-hand Pianos, from 3 to 30 guineas.

MRS. LIONEL RODWELL,

Begs to inform her Friends and Pupils, that she has removed from
No. 66, Great Portland Street, to

No. 9, Brunswick Place, Regent's Park.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA,

COVENT

GARDEN.

UNDER THE DIRECTION AND MANAGEMENT OF MR. SEALE.

The Nobility, Gentry, Subscribers, and Patrons of Music are respectfully informed, that the

NEW THEATRE WILL OPEN

On Tuesday next, the 6th of April,

WHEN WILL BE PERFORMED ROSSINI'S OPERA-SERIE OF SEMIRAMIDE,

IN WHICH

MADAME GRISI,

(From the Scala at Milan, her first appearance in this country),

SIGNOR LAVIA,

(From the Imperial Theatre of St. Petersburg),

SIGNOR POLONINI,

(From the Imperial Theatre, Vienna),

AND SIGNOR TAMBURINI,

(His first appearance in London for four years) will sustain the principal characters.

In the course of the evening

THE NATIONAL ANTHEM

Will be performed by the entire strength of the company.

To conclude with a new Ballet, in two tableaux, by M. ALBERT, entitled

L'ODALISQUE.

The music composed by Signor CURINI (from the San Carlo, at Naples).

PREMIERES DANSEUSES:

MLLE. FLEURY,

MLLE. BERTIN,

(From the Académie Royale at Paris),

(From the Imperial Theatre, Vienna, and from the Académie Royale),

MLLE. NEODOT,

M. MABILE,

M. GONTIE,

(From Madrid),

(From Madrid), &c.

DIRECTOR OF THE MUSIC, COMPOSER, AND CONDUCTOR—M. COSTA.

ORGANIST—MR. VINCENT NOVELLO.

THE SCENERY BY MESSRS. GRIEVE AND TELBIN.

The Machinery by Mr. Allen. The Properties by Mr. Blamire. Artiste Costumière—Mrs. Bailey. The new drop scene by Signori Ferriand Verardi. Tickets, Stalls, and Boxes, for the night or season, to be obtained at the Box-office; and at Messrs. Cramer, Beale, and Co.'s, 201, Regent-street. The doors will be opened at half-past Seven o'clock, and the performance to commence at Eight.

FAIR COMPLEXION.

Under the Patronage of the Nobility and Gentry.

TO THE LADIES.—Wonderful and Important Discovery.

COCKBURN'S

ORIENTAL BOTANICAL PREPARATION,

For removing almost instantaneously cutaneous eruptions, freckles, pimples, spots, and other discolorations of the skin. After one application of the Botanic Extract, which must be used twice a day, a wonderful change will be perceived, and in the course of a few days the complexion will assume a beautiful transparent roseate hue appearance. The extract to apply is of the most agreeable nature, and the first application will prove its wonderful efficacy. Prepared only, and sold wholesale and retail, by the sole proprietor,

GEORGE H. J. COCKBURN, 9, Aldgate, London; And Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street, London; in bottles at 2s. 9d. and 4s. 6d. each; also by Sanger, 150, Oxford-street; Keating, St. Paul's Church Yard; Johnson, 68, Cornhill; Hannay and Co., 63, Oxford-street; Butler and Co., 4, Cheapside; Edwards, St. Paul's Churchyard; Prout, 229, Strand; and of all other Chemists and Perfumers in the kingdom.

TO THE MUSIC PROFESSION.

"NASSAU STEAM PRESS,"

AND

PUBLISHING OFFICE,

60, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, CHARING CROSS.

Every description of CONCERT PRINTING, (Public or Private,) consisting of PROGRAMMES, NOTES, TICKETS, POSTING BILLS, &c., are neatly and expeditiously executed with economy and taste by

W. S. JOHNSON,

PRINTER TO HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE 21 YEARS!

Where also may be had "The Musical World," and all Operas, Comedies, Plays, Farces, Burlesques, and the whole of Webster's unique Acting Drama.

MONS. VIEUXTEMPS

Has the honor to announce that he

WILL ARRIVE IN LONDON,

For the concert season, from St. Petersburg, on MONDAY, APRIL 19.

All letters addressed to him at M. JULLIEN'S, 214, Regent Street; will be attended to.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE

Is acknowledged as the best specific after three years' trial, for improving the voice and removing all affections of the throat, strongly recommended to clergymen, singers, actors, public speakers, and all persons subject to relaxed throats.

The Proprietors have just received the following Testimonial, amongst many others, from MADAME ANNA BISHOP:—

"DEAR SIR,—I am happy to say that all I have heard respecting the efficacy of DR. STOLBERG'S celebrated LOZENGE is perfectly true, as yesterday, feeling myself very fatigued (singing nightly at the Theatre), I took several of the Lozenges, and my voice was very clear, and my throat quite free from relaxation. I am, Dear Sir, Yours truly, ANNA BISHOP."

Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Churchyard; W. Edwards and Newbery and Sons, St. Paul's Churchyard; Sanger, and Dietrichsen and Hannay, Oxford-street; and retail by all respectable Chymists in the Kingdom.

JUST PUBLISHED, No. II OF

WOOD'S EDITION

OF THE

SONGS OF SCOTLAND:

With Symphonies and Accompaniments for the Pianoforte.

Edited by G. F. GRAHAM.

In addition to the Music and Poetry of the Songs, the Work contains brief Notices of their History, when these can be derived from authentic sources. To be completed in TWENTY MONTHLY NUMBERS, at SIXPENCE each. Each Number to contain Eight Songs. Published with the Magazines on the first of every month.

CONTENTS OF No. I:—

Flowers of the Forest, old set	Kind Robin lo'es me
Ditto ditto, modern set	Oh why left I my name
Gloomy Winter	Bide ye yet
Bonnie Wee Thing.	Roslin Castle.

No. 2:—

The Bush aboon Traquair	How sweet this lone vale
Auld Robin Gray (old air)	My love's in Germany
Ditto ditto (new air)	Green grow the Rushes O!
My tocher's the jewel	O true love is a bonny flower.

Published by WOOD & Co., Music-sellers, 12, Waterloo Place, Edinburgh;

And to be had of OLIVER & BOYD, Edinburgh; J. ALFRED NOVELLO, 60, Dean Street, Soho, and 24, Poultry; and SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, & Co., London.

To the Queen's Most Excellent Ma'esty, and the British Army and Navy.

J. KOHLER'S NEW PATENT LEVER INSTRUMENTS.

J. KOHLER having brought to perfection and obtained Her Majesty's Letters Patent for the above invention, which he has applied to the CORNOPEAN, TRUMPET, CORNETTO, TROMBONES, and FRENCH HORNS, he can now with great confidence, after an experience of Five years in bringing the action to its present state of perfection, recommend them to Her Majesty's Army and Navy, and all Professors and Amateurs. The advantages that this Patent gives to these Instruments are:—

1. All the Tones and Semitones produced by the Patent Lever are quite as perfect as the Natural Notes on the Instrument.
2. The intervals on the DIATONIC and CHROMATIC Scales are perfect, the compass greater, and the most rapid and difficult passages may be performed with a precision, freedom, and fulness of tone, and comparative ease to the performer.
3. Combinations in harmony, which never before could be performed at all by any Brass Instruments, may now be executed with perfect ease, and Ten or Twelve Instruments on this principle can produce a more rich and sonorous effect than Twenty Four could do on the old principles. The harshness of tone in the former Brass Instruments is entirely done away with, and a set of these Instruments heard together, produces Military and harmonious effects never before heard.

These Instruments are now in use in HER MAJESTY'S PRIVATE BAND, FIRST LIFE GUARDS, ROYAL HORSE GUARDS, GRENADEER GUARDS, FUSILIER GUARDS, ROYAL ARTILLERY, 60TH ROYAL INFANTRY, &c. Testimonials, Drawings, and Prices, forwarded on application to J. KOHLER'S Manufactory, 35, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London.

THE FOLLOWING

OPERAS, BALLETS, SPECTACLES, &c.

ARE PUBLISHED BY

W. S. JOHNSON,

GENERAL PRINTER AND PUBLISHER,

"NASSAU STEAM PRESS," 60, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, CHARING CROSS.

WEBSTER'SACTING NATIONAL DRAMA,

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE DRAMATIC AUTHORS' SOCIETY.

Comprising every successful new Play, Farce, Melo-Drama, &c. produced at the London Theatres, correctly printed from the Prompter's Copy.

Vol. I.

With a Portrait of J. R. PLANCHE, F.S.A., price 7s. in cloth, contains:—

- | | | |
|------------------------|------------------------|--|
| 1. The Two Figaros. | 7. Walter Tyrrell. | 10. My Young Wife and my Old Umbrella. |
| 2. The Country Squire. | 8. The Tiger at Large. | 11. The Middle Temple. |
| 3. The Quaker Subject. | 9. The Bridal, &c. | 12. Riquet with the Tuft. |
| 4. The Sentinel. | | |
| 5. The Modern Orpheus. | | |

Vol. II.

With a Portrait of TYRONE POWER, Esq., price 7s. cloth, contains:—

- | | | |
|------------------------|-------------------------|------------------------|
| 13. A Quarter to Nine. | 18. Rory O'More. | 22. Why did You Die? |
| 14. Blanche of Jersey. | 19. Advice Gratia. | 23. Valsha. |
| 15. The Bottle Imp. | 20. The Original. | 24. Bengal Tiger. |
| 16. Court Favour. | 21. Barbers of Bassora. | 25. St. Patrick's Eve. |
| 17. The Spindle. | | |

Vol. III.

With a Portrait of CHARLES MATHEWS, Esq., price 7s. cloth, contains:—

- | | | |
|-----------------------|--------------------------------------|------------------------------|
| 26. Puss in Boots. | 31. The Culprit. | 35. The Spitalfields Weaver. |
| 27. The Ringdove. | 32. Confounded Foreigners. | 36. The Rifle Brigade. |
| 28. The Black Domino. | 33. The Dancing Barber. | 37. Angelina. |
| 29. Our Mary Anne. | 34. All for Love; or the Lost Field. | 38. Truth. |
| 30. Shocking Events. | | |

Vol. IV.

With a Portrait of T. HAYNES BAYLEY, Esq., price 7s. cloth, contains:—

- | | | |
|---------------------------------------|-------------------------|-------------------------------------|
| 39. You Can't Marry Your Grandmother. | 42. A Hasty Conclusion. | 46. The Irish Lion. |
| 40. Spring Lock. | 43. The Meltonians. | 47. Lying in Ordinary. |
| 41. The Valet de Cham. | 44. Weak Points. | 48. One Hour; or the Carnival Ball. |
| 45. Groves of Blarney, &c. | 45. Naval Engagements. | |
| | 47. British Legion. | |

Vol. V.

With a Portrait of J. B. BUCKSTONE, Esq., price 7s. cloth, contains:—

- | | | |
|---------------------------------|-------------------------|------------------------|
| 51. White Horse of the Peppars. | 55. The Devil's Opera. | 59. Ask no Questions. |
| 52. Gemini. | 56. Tom Noddy's Secret. | 61. "But However—" |
| 53. The Artist's Wife. | 57. Forty and Fifty. | 62. Nicholas Nickleby. |
| 54. A Lesson for Ladies. | 58. Sane and Systems. | 63. Married Life. |
| | 59. Printer's Devil. | |

Vol. VI.

With a Portrait of B. WEBSTER, Esq., price 7s. cloth, contains:—

- | | | |
|--------------------------|-----------------------------|--------------------------|
| 64. Oliver Twist. | 69. Grace Darling. | 72. Burlington Arcade. |
| 65. Chase is Come Again. | 70. The Court of Old Fritz. | 73. His First Champagne. |
| 66. Mr. Greenfinch. | 71. Jane Lomax. | 74. Isaac Walton. |
| 67. My Little Adopted. | 72. "Queen's Horse." | 75. Swiss Swains. |
| 68. Maid of Croissey. | | |

Vol. VII.

With a Portrait of BAYLE BERNARD, Esq., price 7s. cloth, contains:—

- | | | |
|-----------------------------|-------------------------|------------------------|
| 77. Sayings and Doings. | 81. Single Life, &c. | 84. King O'Neil. |
| 78. Dr. Ditworth. | 82. The Village Doctor. | 85. Jack Sheppard, &c. |
| 79. The Happy Man. | 83. The Hall Porter. | 86. His Last Legs. |
| 80. School for Scandal, &c. | | |

Vol. VIII.

With a Portrait of J. S. KNOWLES, Esq., price 7s. cloth, contains:—

- | | | |
|---------------------------|---------------------------------|-------------------------------|
| 87. The Dream at Sea, &c. | 90. Heartlets the Forsaken, &c. | 93. Brian Borloma, &c. |
| 88. H. R. | 91. The Wreck Ashore, &c. | (Written by S. Knowles, Esq.) |
| 89. Victoria, &c. | 92. Isabelle, &c. | |

Vol. IX.

- | | | |
|-----------------------------|---------------------------|--------------------------|
| 94. The Fortunes of Smike. | 98. The Place Hunter. | 102. A Lover by Proxy. |
| 95. Hobbs Dobbs and Stubbs. | 99. The Greek Boy. | 103. Peter and Paul, &c. |
| 96. The Irish Attorney. | 100. Boarding School, &c. | 104. Locomotion. |
| 97. How to Pay the Rent. | 101. The Woman Hater. | |

Vol. X.

- | | | |
|------------------------------|----------------------------|-------------------------------|
| 105. Alma Mater, &c. | 109. Who's Your Friend? | 112. The Fox and the Goow. |
| 106. Grandfather Whitehead. | 110. Caught in a Trap, &c. | 113. Cesar de Bazan. |
| 107. Cautious of Literature. | 111. The Thimble Rig. | 114. The Mysterious Stranger. |
| 108. The Last Day. | | |

Vol. XI.

- | | | |
|--|---|----------------------------------|
| 115. The Chimes, &c. | 117. The Mother and Child are Doing Well. | 120. The Irish Dragon. |
| 116. The Green Bushes; or a Hundred Years Ago, &c. | 118. The Sheriff of the County. | 121. Clarissa, &c. |
| | 119. St. George & the Dragon. | 122. Deeds of Dreadful Note. |
| | | 123. The Miseries of Human Life. |

Vol. XII.

- | | | |
|---------------------------------|---|------------------------|
| 124. Cricket on the Hearth, &c. | 128. Did you ever send your Wife to Cambria well? | 130. Peter Wilkins. |
| 125. Lioness of the North, &c. | 129. Beggar on Horseback, &c. | 131. Black Dogma, &c. |
| 126. Taming a Tartar. | | 132. Borough Politics. |
| 127. The Cabin Boy. | | |

Vol. XIII.

- | | | |
|----------------------------|---------------------------------|--------------------------------------|
| 128. Wonderful Water Cure. | 135. Jockey Club. | 137. Look before you Leap, &c. |
| 129. Eugenia Clairville. | 136. Mrs. Sarah Gamp. | 138. Old Heads and Young Hearts, &c. |
| 130. The Round of Wrong. | 140. The School for Seehem, &c. | 141. The Flowers of the Forest. |

In demy 8vo., QUID PRO QUO; OR, THE DAY OF DUPES, MASTER CLARKE, and MOONSHINE, 2s. 6d. each.

The words of the following OPERAS;

- | | |
|--|---------------------------------------|
| THE BONDMAN, Balfe. | THE MAID OF ARTOIS Balfe |
| LORETTA Lavenu. | THE CROWN JEWELS, Auber. |
| STRADELLA, Flotow. | THE CRUSADERS, Benedict. |
| DON QUIXOTE Macfarren. | MARITANA Wallace. |
| THE FAIRY OAK Forbes. | GUILLAUME TELL Roosini. |
| THE ENCHANTRESS Balfe. | GERALDINE Balfe. |
| DAUGHTER OF ST. MARK, Balfe. | LA SONNAMBULA Bellini. |
| THE STREN Auber. | SAPPHO Pacini. |
| THE BOHEMIAN GIRL Balfe. | DON PASQUALE Donizetti. |
| BRIDES OF VENICE Benedict. | KEOLANTHE Balfe. |
| LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR Donizetti. | BETTLY Donizetti. |
| BRIDE OF LAMMERMOOR Donizetti. | CASTLE OF AYMON Balfe. |
| | ROBERT THE DEVIL Meyerbeer. |
| | MATILDA OF HUNGARY Wallace. |

SONGS, DUETS, &c.

Price 6d. each.

- | | |
|------------------------|------------------------|
| SEVEN MAIDS OF MUNICH. | THE FLOWER OF LUCERNE, |
| ACIS AND GALATEA, | QUEEN OF THE THAMES. |
| KING ARTHUR, | |

BALLETS, Price 6d. each.

- | | |
|--------------------|-----------------------|
| WAGS OF WAPPING. | OFFSPRING OF FLOWERS. |
| IMELDA. | PAQUITA. |
| LA TARENTULE. | THE ISLAND NYMPH. |
| THE DEVIL TO PAY. | THE DEVIL IN LOVE. |
| LES DANAIDES. | GISELLE. |
| THE PERI. | LADY HENRIETTA; OR, |
| THE CORSAIR. | THE STATUTE FAIR. |
| BEAUTY OF GHENT. | ROBERT AND BERTRAND |
| THE MARBLE MAIDEN. | |

BURLESQUES & SPECTACLES, 6d. each.

- | | |
|----------------------|------------------------|
| BATTLE OF RIGHT. | THE WONDERFUL LAMP |
| THE CRICKET ON THE | IN A NEW LIGHT. |
| HEARTH, &c. | ALADDIN: THE WONDER- |
| OPEN SESAME; OR, A | FUL LAMP; OR, NEW |
| NIGHT WITH THE | LAMPS FOR OLD ONES. |
| FORTY THIEVES. | THE MAGIC MIRROR, &c. |
| VALENTINE AND ORSON. | TIMOUR THE TARTAR. |
| CINDERELLA. | WHITTINGTON & HIS CAT. |

THE WIGWAM.

THE PRINCESS WHO WAS CHANGED INTO A DEER, &c.

Where also may be had, the Whole of WEBSTER'S NATIONAL ACTING DRAMA,
FROM NOS. 1 TO 140 INCLUSIVE.

AND

HORNE'S GUIDE OF MEDICAL GALVANISM, Price 1s.

Any Copies of these Operas, Plays, &c. forwarded by post, the amount being sent in postage stamps.

THOMAS BAKER'S MODERN PIANOFORTE TUTOR.

M. JULLIEN

Has the honor to announce, that he has just published the above work, which he flatters himself will be found the desideratum so long sought after by the profession. Notwithstanding the improvements that have taken place in Pianoforte Playing within the last ten years, no deviation has been made in the system of teaching from Tutors of the Old School; in consequence, many gifted with brilliant talents have been unable to execute the music of the present day. For this reason the

MODERN PIANOFORTE TUTOR

Has been introduced, and met with the greatest success from the elite of the profession, who have universally adopted it. The work is divided into two parts: the first being a complete Tutor in itself, containing the

RUDIMENTS OF MUSIC,

Rules for the Formation of the Hand, Scales,

FINGER EXERCISES, &c.

Interspersed with Morceaux from the works of

Beethoven, Mozart, Spohr, Weber, Meyerbeer, Roch-Albert, Rossini, Bellini, Donizetti, &c.—Price 8s.

The second part consists of a more advanced course of Study, proceeding to the most refined style of Modern Playing;

Illustrated with numerous Examples & Exercises,

On all the various Fingerings adopted by the most eminent Pianistes of the MODERN SCHOOL: with Selections from the Pianoforte Compositions of HERZ, DOHLER, THALBERG, &c.; in fact, everything necessary to constitute a first-rate Pianist. Price 8s., or 15s. the entire work.

Published by M. JULLIEN & Co.,

AT THE ROYAL MUSICAL CONSERVATORY,
214, REGENT STREET, AND 45, KING STREET,

Where all the Compositions of the above Author may be had.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847.

M. JULLIEN has the honor to announce that the sixth edition of his
MUSICAL ANNUAL FOR 1847

Is now Published, and will be found by far the best work of the kind that has ever appeared; containing no less than

Thirty Pieces of Vocal and Fourteen of Instrumental Music,

The greater part of which have never before been published, the copyrights having been purchased expressly for this work, at an immense cost, with the view of rendering it immeasurably superior to any of its predecessors.

The portion which has already appeared comprise those pieces only whose decided success has induced M. JULLIEN, at the request of numerous influential patrons, to include them in this Selection.

The Illustrations, in addition to the elaborately executed Covers, Title, and Dedication pages, include two magnificent Views of the interior of Covent Garden Theatre. The one taken during the brilliant scene exhibited in that splendid arena of the occasion of M. JULLIEN'S GRAND BAL MASQUE; the other a VIEW OF THE THEATRE TAKEN DURING THE CONCERTS, the grouping of the Figures in both Views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant. To those who have visited the Theatre on either occasion, the ALBUM will form a delightful SOUVENIR, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of the gorgeous scene.

A splendidly-coloured PORTRAIT of the celebrated Danseuse, Madlle. FLORA FABRI, in the admired Pas, La Castigliani. An original subject, "THE FORTUNE TELLER," illustrating Baker's beautiful ballad of that name.

The whole of this department of the ALBUM has been under the active superintendence of J. BRANDARD, Esq., whose pencil only has been employed in its production.

Nothing more need be said in favour of this Work, and in proof of its vast superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the Contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe.

It will also be perceived that in addition to the latest compositions of the best English Composers, the ALBUM contains some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany, France, Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting the attention of the Continental dilettanti. Price 18s. and £1 1s.

ROYAL CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC,
214, REGENT-STREET, AND 45, KING-STREET.

SOVEREIGN Life Assurance Company,

No. 5, ST. JAMES'S STREET, LONDON.

Trustees.
Sir A. Brydges Henniker, Bart. B. Bond Catbelle, Esq., M.P.	Henry Pownall, Esq. Claude Edward Scott, Esq.
Directors.
CHAIRMAN, Lieutenant-Colonel Lord Arthur Lennox. DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN, T. C. Granger, Esq., M.P. John Ashburner, Esq., M.D. T. M. B. Batard, Esq. Philip P. Blyth, Esq.	Henry Broadwood, Esq., M.P. Sir James Carmichael, Bart. Charles Farebrother, Esq., Alderman. William Tulloh Fraser, Esq. John Gardiner, Esq. Aaron Asher Goldsmid, Esq. Henry William Pownall, Esq.
Bankers, Sir Claude Scott, Bart., and Co.
Solicitors, Messrs. Davies, Son, and Campbell.

Assurances on the lives of persons in every station of life and every part of the world, granted on a plan which combines the utmost amount of benefit to the families of the assured at death, with every attainable advantage during life, which the system of Life Assurance is capable of affording.

It affords perfect security in a subscribed Capital, which guarantees the prompt settlement of every claim, with participating and non-participating rates on the lowest scale, especially for terms of years.

The Assured can anticipate or obtain the advance of the full amount of the Policy, on giving approved available security for a certain number of annual payments, as explained by the Prospectus.

Every facility is afforded to persons assuring the lives of others, so as to render such Policies effectual securities.

A new plan of gradual or accumulative Assurance, particularly adapted for young lives, and for such as cannot, without inconvenience, undertake the payment of a fixed premium, securing at once provision in case of premature death, and an accumulating fund, available during life, should occasion require.

ANNUITIES, ENDOWMENTS, ADVANCES, and LOANS, on liberal terms.

Detailed Prospectuses, with forms of Proposal, and every information, may be had on application, either personally or by letter, at the Company's Offices.

The usual commission to Solicitors and Agents.
H. D. DAVENPORT, Secretary.

THE PATENT HARMONIUM.

This beautiful Instrument possesses the softness of the voice with the variety of tone of every wind Instrument, as also the power of a large Organ. It is equally suitable for Sacred Music, or the Dance, and adapted for the Drawing Room, Concert Room, Church or Chapel. Printed particulars can be had of LUFF and SON, sole agents, where the PATENT HARMONIUM can be heard from 10 till 4, daily; and where can be inspected

LUFF & SON'S

Elegant Assortment of PIANOFORTES,

Made by experienced workmen, and thoroughly seasoned wood, all of which is prepared on the premises. They are warranted to stand well in Tune, and are prepared for extreme climates: prices one-third less than usually charged.

Instruments taken in exchange, and a liberal allowance to dealers.

LUFF and SON, 103, Great Russell Street, Bloomsbury.

N.B.—The terms of Mr. JULIAN ADAMS, the celebrated performer upon the Patent Harmonium, can be had of LUFF and SON.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, at the "Nassau Steam Press," by WILLIAM SPENCER JOHNSON, 60, St. Martin's Lane, in the parish of St. Martin's in the Fields, in the County of Middlesex; where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed post paid. To be had of G. Purkess, Dean Street, Soho; Strange, Paternoster Row; Wiseheart, Dublin; and all Booksellers.—Saturday, April 3rd, 1847.

The Musical World.

(PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT NOON.)

A RECORD OF THE THEATRES, MUSIC, LITERATURE, FINE ARTS,
FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE, &c.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s. Stamped; 12s. Unstamped; to be forwarded by Money Order or Postage Stamps to the Publisher, W. S. Johnson, "Nassau Steam Press," 60, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross.

Each Subscriber is entitled to an Admission to an Annual Concert, and a Piece of Music, (regular Music size) Monthly.

No. 15.—VOL. XXII.

SATURDAY, APRIL 10, 1847.

{ PRICE THREEPENCE
STAMPED, FOURPENCE.

NOTICE.

Our Subscribers are presented this week with a ROMANCE, composed by ANGELO FINELLI expressly for SIGNOR CARDONI, of Her Majesty's Theatre.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

We promised, in our last, to take a retrospective view of the proceedings at this establishment, up to the present point of the season 1847. When the peculiar difficulties under which Mr. Lumley opened his campaign are taken into consideration, it must be a matter of surprise to every person of reflection, not merely that he should have been able to effect what he has effected, but that he should have contrived to sustain the credit of his establishment at all. Shortly after the conclusion of last season all the great vocalists, with a single exception, who had for so long constituted the main attraction of the establishment, with the majority of its band and chorus, seceded, and constituted the nucleus of a formidable opposition. No manager was ever placed in a more difficult position than Mr. Lumley. The cause of the secession of his company is no business of our's. We have refrained, and shall continue to refrain, from commenting on it. It was enough that the cloud of adversity lowered above his head—big drops burst at intervals—the thunder muttered restlessly, and an awful tempest threatened to explode. In his time of unabated prosperity we were not the thick and thin adherents of Mr. Lumley. We neither courted nor flattered him. We were satisfied, in criticising him fairly, to render our readers and ourselves justice. But as then we were disposed to give him credit for whatever we could praise in his management, much more do we feel inclined, now that the monopoly he once wielded is trampled under foot, to lend him a helping hand. In this spirit we have criticised what has already been effected during the present season, and in this spirit we are our present remarks. Their sincerity may be tested by a comparison of our past conduct in relation to Her Majesty's Theatre, and needs no further pleading.

begin at the beginning—Mr. Lumley's first difficulty to find substitutes for the band and chorus that had deserted him. The old band had been trained to great efficiency by a conductor of eminent talent and indefatigable industry—Signor Costa, now director of the orchestra at the Royal Italian Opera, the life and soul of the opposing establishment. Mr. Lumley was, as it happened—and it might easily have happened otherwise—very lucky in his choice of a successor to Signor Costa. Perhaps no artist in the country, better qualified for the post by education, taste, and ability, could have been selected than Mr. Balfe. The sequel has guaranteed his efficiency no less than his fidelity and zeal. By judgment and energy little short of magical, in an incredibly brief time, Mr. Balfe has filled the empty seats of the orchestra with an army of instrumentalists more numerous than their predecessors, and, if less used to discipline, scarcely less complete and efficient. It would be preposterous to assert that this new band is faultless. There are defects that weaken its power and must be remedied to make it worthy of the part it has to play. In some points it is first-rate, in others it is second-rate, in some it is mediocre, and, in a very few, it is decidedly bad. But, it is not to be supposed that Mr. Balfe is blind to the drawbacks that tell against the perfect ensemble of his orchestra. On the contrary, he observed them at once, and, since the opening of the theatre, has been gradually administering remedies in necessary changes and modifications. He has yet, however, much to do, but he will do it with as small delay as possible. Meanwhile there are elements in his orchestra that make it capable of reaching the highest possible efficiency: Some of the leading instrumentalists of Europe are enrolled among its members. We need but mention the names of Piatti, Lavigne, L'Anglois, Templini, Zeiss, &c., to show the kind of artists who occupy the foremost ranks. Moreover those that remain from the old set number Tolbecque, Nadaud, and other such men among them. It is not, therefore, unreasonable to suppose that in a short time Mr. Lumley's band will be all that the most fastidious connoisseur could reasonably hope for.

The chorus may be disposed of in fewer words. Suffice it that last season, and for many years previous, it was lamentably inefficient, while, at present (thanks to Mr. Balfe) it is a splendid and capable body, worthy of any European establishment; its faults are so few that it would be mere hypercriticism to specialize them. Those who have heard the operas of La Favorita, Lucia di Lammermoor, Nino, La Sonnambula, and Ernani, during the present season, can testify to its worth.

The band and chorus obtained—essentials in an operatic company more vitally important than managers are apt to suppose, or managers to allow—the question of principal vocalists remained to be solved. Prima donnas, and tenors, and baritones, and basses must be hunted up from every corner of musical Europe, to supply the place of those who had seceded. Where were they to be found? Mr. Lumley went abroad, and others in his interest went abroad, and for some months there was a scouring of the continent for singers. Some were engaged, others treated with, some proposed to, others suggested. All the world of London was on tiptoe with anxiety to know what Mr. Lumley had found, and as the coming season cast its shadow before, the desire to see his prospectus was unanimous and invincible; the guesses, speculations, and reports, thereupon were legion. Never, since the birth of the Opera, had so much curiosity prevailed about the programme of the season's engagements. The press, divided into cliques of Lumleyites and Anti-Lumleyites, issued daily philippics on either side, and reports filled the atmosphere like locusts. At length the prospectus appeared. The public was astonished by its completeness and brilliancy. There was novelty and there was excellence, and an unusual amount of both. We need not recapitulate its contents, which are already so familiar to our readers. The day subsequent to the publication of this prospectus, the press teemed with articles in which its merits were discussed. The Lumleyites lauded it to the skies. The Anti-Lumleyites (who could not deny its superiority) took the very unusual and unwarrantable course of declaring it to be a sham—"mere moonshine." All these matters stand already recorded in our pages, and the consequences thereof. At length the Opera opened, on Tuesday the 16th of February. Three of the new engagements, Gardoni, Superchi, and Bouché, made decided hits—the first mentioned, one of the most decided ever known at the Opera. Madame Sanchioli (a previous year's engagement) was found vastly improved. The quality of the band and chorus, which Balfe had enlisted and trained, was tested by the encore of an overture and some choral pieces, an event unusual at the Opera. The whole performance, in short, was on such a scale of efficiency as to set all doubt at rest about Mr. Lumley's chance of being able to weather through the season. We heard some of the oldest habitues of the Opera declare that they never remembered so brilliant a first night. La Favorita was repeated several times, until the first representation of Verdi's Nino brought Coletti, a baritone not unknown to England, but so wonderfully improved that it was nearly the same thing. Coletti made an unquestionable impression, and even the adversaries of Her Majesty's Theatre pronounced him a first-rate artist. Not satisfied with this, Mr. Lumley kept up the fire magnanimously, and in a few days he introduced to us Fraschini, a young Neapolitan tenor of great renown, whom he had secured at a large expense. Fraschini appeared in the Lucia. He was received with the utmost favour, and if the majority preferred Gardoni's purer style of singing, this did not make Fraschini's success the less. Subsequently Gardoni appeared in La Sonnambula, and in that opera thoroughly fulfilled all the anticipations that had been raised by his débüt. He was established a primo-tenore of first-rate pretensions. Superchi's appearance in Ernani raised him also many degrees higher in public esteem, while Fraschini and Bouché added to their laurels in the same opera. Thus the strength of the opera department was tested before Easter, and proved to surpass all expectations.

In the ballet Mr. Lumley's management has ever been famous. His prospectus this year is more splendid and varied even than usual. At present we have only to record the appearance of two stars in the choregraphic horizon, whom Mr. Lumley has spelled away from sunny Italy—Carolina Rosati and Marie Taglioni. Our opinion of these excellent and charming artists has been given too often to need repetition. They are the heralds of more stars to come—stars that have long twinkled in our hemisphere, whose beams have long been worshipped—and they are beautiful heralds, worthy the honour of announcing the return of their more celebrated sisters of the dance. In a word, the ballet this year promises to surpass all that has preceded it, and this for Mr. Lumley's management is a matter of no small significance.

In the scenic department Mr. Lumley has wisely retained the talented Mr. Marshall, and in this and in all particulars of the mise en scene (with occasional exceptions in respect to the dresses of the subordinates, which are not always in the best taste,) the theatre has manifested remarkable improvement.

Thus far, at least, every item in the prospectus has been fulfilled, with the solitary reserve of Madame Montenegro, who was announced to appear before Easter. But Madame Montenegro has been here some time, and will appear this evening in Verdi's Idua Foscari. Are we not, therefore, fully justified in remaining consistent to our frequently urged faith in the whole letter and spirit of Mr. Lumley's programme?

The remainder has yet to be fulfilled. Meanwhile the inimitable Lablache will shortly appear in Donizetti's sparkling opera, L'Elisir D'Amore, in which Gardoni's Nemorino will not be the least attraction, and Lucille Grahn will add to the already great attractions of the ballet this evening.

So much has been said in disfavour of Mr. Lumley's promises, by certain journalists, that, as impartial "chroniclers," we have thought it just to collect the facts as they have occurred, up to the present moment, and place them before our readers in such order as to enable them to form their own unbiassed judgment. We should be foremost in defending courageous criticism, however severe, for it is of more importance to art that truth should be told than that the interests of any managers should be served. But, when criticism is all on one side it demands rigid examination, in order that so much of it as is true may pass current, and that what is false may be extracted and cast aside.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent, April 3, 1847.)

THE Theatre Royal here was suddenly closed on the 23rd ultimo, by the unforeseen illness of Mr. Macready, but has been opened since to—first of all—a group of imitators of the original Ethiopian Serenaders, rejoicing in the appellation of Ethiopian Harmonists, who commenced their performance on the 25th. Not having much taste for 'nigger' melodies in general, 'Ethiopian' copyists in particular, we did not honour them with a hearing; had it been the original party who first appeared at the St. James's Theatre, Messrs. Pell and Co., we might have gone out of sheer curiosity, as, in their way, we understand they were really clever; but, as Punch says, "we are having a glut of Ethiopians," and the false taste which can give encouragement to such so called 'musical entertainments' well deserved Punch's biting satire, wherein he suggests that at the next performance of 'Otello,' at Her Majesty's Theatre, 'Buffalo gals' should be introduced with Lablache on the bones! To crown the matter, we see in to-day's Manchester Guardian, an announcement, for Easter Monday, of a party of 'Female American Serenaders', seven in number! Old Cobbett, some years ago, expressed his dread of the influx of Bavarian broom girls to this country but how was his horror increased on seeing one among the swarms that then came over about to be a mother! "The vermin (as in his coarse style he termed them) besides coming in shoals have absolutely begun to breed here!" This week the Distin Family have given a concert at the Theatre Royal each evening, except Good Friday, we are sorry to, report to thin audiences. Very likely its being Passion Week would prevent many from attending the theatre even at a concert, else their unrivalled talent would, no doubt, have had a better appreciation in Manchester. Their performances, especially in quintets, are truly marvellous; it is the very perfection of horn-playing and cannot be surpassed: they make their sax-horns and sax-tubas discourse most eloquent music, and a most interesting group of performers they appear—the old man and his four sons; they deserve better success than they have this time met with in Manchester. A Miss Moriatt O'Connor varied the concert by singing some ballads in a pleasing unaffected style, in the last of which (an Irish one) she was encored. Macready is re-announced for the 17th instant.

We see, by this day's Guardian, also, that the Hargreaves Choral Society have announced the 'Elijah' for the 20th instant. Principal vocalists:—Miss Birch, Miss Dolby, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. H. Phillips. Staudigl, it appears, has an engagement offered to him to which he has never deigned any reply. The directors have even written to Mr. Lumley for his permission for Staudigl to accept the engagement; the following is his reply:—

Her Majesty's Theatre, March 25, 1847.

"SIR,—I am requested, by Mr. Lumley, to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 29th instant, and, in reply to say, that however much he might feel inclined to grant the request of the Hargreaves' Choral Society, he is obliged, for the present, to decline making any arrangements for the engagements of artists at Her Majesty's Theatre. I have the honour to be your most obedient servant,

CHARLES THOMPSON.

To CHARLES SEVERN, Esq., Hon. Sec.,

Hargreaves' Choral Society, Manchester."

What can we gather from this? Is Staudigl coming to Her Majesty's Theatre after all—and when? We see that Phillips is engaged in his stead at Exeter Hall also.

Jullien! Verily Jullien is a mighty magician! by the magic of whose wand (or baton) thousands are attracted—so as thousands never went to any concerts before in Manchester—the Distins were here last week giving charming concerts of their kind, yet their marvellous Sax-horns and their wonderful performance on them drew only the most meagre audiences—they had not Jullien to conduct for them! On Monday the 5th instant, Easter Monday, the Free Trade Hall was filled to overflowing, the only extra attraction beyond the very name of Jullien was the fact of his bringing Herr Pischek to appear, for the first time, in public here. He has twice appeared in Manchester before, once each season at the Concert Hall, but the masses for whom Jullien caters had as yet had no opportunity of hearing the great German baritone. Jullien, besides being a magician is a tactician, and of the first order. Who is there can draw as he does? Who can so excite the public mind? With admirable tact he took care, at his last concert here in February, that small hand-bills should be freely distributed to the thousands then present, announcing in his puff preliminary, "The engagement, at great expense, of Herr Pischek!" To effect which, Jullien—the great Jullien himself had to make a special journey to Germany in the month of December last—that a congé had been conceded a month earlier than usual—which would enable the Manchester public to hear "The greatest singer on the Lyric stage of Europe, whose voice combines all the qualities of tenor, baritone, and bass, &c. &c. &c., early in April." He next took care to keep attention alive to the fact that Herr Pischek was coming by preliminary advertisements during the month of March—the consequence was that when he did come excitement was at its height and the Free Trade Hall was literally crammed at advanced prices—the promenade being advanced from one shilling to eighteen pence, the gallery from two shillings and sixpence to three shillings and sixpence. All this was done too without any extra attraction in the band—the only names in the programme being the usual ones of König, Collinet, Richardson, and Sonnemberg. There were many absentees as compared with the band he had with him last time. Where were Barret, Baumann, Casolani, Lazarus, Cioffi, Prospero? &c., rehearsing with Costa at Covent Garden, we presume. Jullien had not altogether omitted to replace these admirable artists and in their place secured some executants of respectability at any rate on such instruments. Who they were did not appear; very likely of the new band at the old Italian Opera. The bassoon we noticed as having a remarkably fine tone. The oboe was well played and then we had three of the first rank who were just as little noticed in the programme as the strangers, viz., Tolbecque, the leader of the Italian Opera at Her Majesty's Theatre, Jarrett on the horn, and Rousselot on the violoncello. In spite of these celebrities, however, and their great conductor, the band did not go so well together, or produce that effect which we have been accustomed to look for at these concerts. Some of the music selected too was anything but good, two pieces especially, we are compelled to find fault with as far below what the same composers have hitherto given us, viz., two waltzes (valse) called a deux temps—one "The Olga, or Princess Valse," by Jullien, the other, "Jenny Lind," by König. The first is a sort of ugly copy or imitation of the Bridal Valse, but how vastly inferior! they are both short of melody or beauty of any kind, to our taste. We had some few pieces of good music, Weber's Euryanthe (spoilt by a tubby pair of drums) and Beethoven's C minor symphony, the most charming piece of the night, only stinted of strings as all Beethoven's music is at Jullien's concerts. We had also a selection from Don Giovanni: but come we now to the feature of the night, Pischek! our expectations had been raised perhaps too high by Jullien's puffs, consequently they were not fully realised. He is a beautiful singer and has a most exquisitely finished delivery, with a voice of amazing flexibility and compass: still we fancied we detected a tendency to vibration or tremulousness, Fornasari's besetting sin, and should have liked a little more of the sostenuto, the sustained manner in which Staudigl as a basso and Donzelli as a tenor, are the finest exemplars we ever heard; the songs he gave us were one from Spohr's Faust, "The Chimes;" "My Heart's on the Rhine; and last, not least, his celebrated "Standard Bearer;" the two last were encored. He comes again on Tuesday, the 13th, when he is to give "Adelaide," and Jullien is calling in the assistance of the band of the First Royals, who are stationed at our barracks, in order to give effect to his British Army Quadrille: moreover, it is announced as Jullien's Annual Benefit. Whose benefit was it on Easter Monday, Monsieur Jullien? when some five thousand persons were present and when you must have netted a clear £300 at least, but all conquerors must have their reward and why not so great a general as Jullien?

THE AFFINITIES.

from the German of Göthe.

Continued from page 216.

PART II.—CHAPTER IX.

SPRING had come later, but more suddenly and joyously than usual. Ottília found in the garden the fruit of her foresight; it was budding, putting forth leaves, and blossoming in the proper time. Much that had been prepared in well-arranged beds and green-houses now at once advanced towards nature, which at last worked from without, and all that had to be done and tended was now no longer, as hitherto, a mere hopeful toil, but became a cheerful enjoyment.

But she had to console the gardener on account of many a gap which had arisen among the plants in pots through Luciana's wildness, and the destroyed symmetry of many a crown of foliage. She cheered him up by saying that all would be speedily restored, but he had too deep a feeling, too pure a conception of his craft, for these grounds of consolation to profit him much. Little as the gardener must be distracted by the fancies and inclinations of others, just as little must the quiet course be interrupted which the plant takes in attaining permanent or transient perfection. The plant resembles wilful men, from whom any thing may be got when they are treated after their own fashion. A calm survey, a quiet consistency, the doing of what is quite suitable in every season, in every hour, is perhaps required of no one more than of a gardener.

The good man promised these qualities in a high degree, and on this account Ottilia worked with him so readily, but for some time he had not been able to employ with comfort his peculiar talent. For although he was able to do to perfection all that belonged to the plantation and kitchen-garden, and also all that was required for an ornamental garden in the old style—as indeed one person succeeds more than another in this or that particular—although in the management of an orangery, of flower-bulbs, of pink and auricula cuttings he might have challenged Nature herself, nevertheless the new ornamental trees and fashionable flowers remained in some measure strange to him, while, of the infinite field of botany, which was opening with the time, and the strange names which occur in that science and were buzzing about, he had a sort of dread which made him cross. What his masters had begun to order the year before he looked upon as so much useless expense and extravagance, as he saw many valuable plants leave the premises, and did not stand on remarkably good terms with the market gardeners, who did not serve him with sufficient honesty.

After many attempts he made a sort of plan, in which he was so much the more confirmed by Ottilia, as it was properly based on the return of Edward, whose absence in this, and in many other cases, was necessarily considered daily more injurious.

While the plants went on striking root, and putting forth branches, Ottilia felt more and more rivetted to the spot. Exactly a year before she had entered as a stranger, as an unimportant being. How much had she acquired since that time! But, alas, since that time how much had she also lost! She had never been so rich and so poor. The feelings of both conditions were interchanged in the same moment, nay, intimately crossed each other, so that she knew no other resource than to seize upon what was close at hand with interest, and even with passion.

All that Edward especially liked, it may be imagined, most strongly attracted her care; nay, why should she not hope that he himself would soon return, that he would, when present, remark with gratitude the careful attention which had been paid him while absent,

But she was made also to act for him in a very different way. She had especially undertaken the care of the child, which she could so much the more immediately attend, as they had resolved not to give it to any nurse, but to rear it with milk and water. In this fine time of year, it was to enjoy the open air, and then she herself liked but to take it out, carrying the sleeping unconscious being between the flowers and blossoms, which would in future smile kindly upon its childhood; between young shrubs and plants, which by their youth seemed destined to grow up with it. When she looked around her, she did not conceal from herself to what a wealthy condition the child was born, for almost all that the eye could perceive in any direction was once to belong to it. Hence how desirable it was that it should grow up before the eyes of its father and mother, and confirm a renewed happy union.

Ottilia felt all this so purely, that she thought of it as decidedly real, and at the same time was not sensible for herself. Beneath this clear sky, in this bright sunshine, it became at once plain to her that her love to perfect itself must become completely unselfish. She only desired the good of her friend; she believed herself capable of renouncing him, even of never seeing him again, if she only knew that he was happy. But she was quite resolved that she would never belong to another.

Care was taken that the autumn should be as magnificent as the spring. All the so-called summer plants, all that do not cease blooming in autumn, and that boldly unfold themselves in spite of the cold—especially china-asters—were sown in the greatest variety, and now transplanted in all directions, were to form a starry heaven on the earth.

FROM OTTILIA'S DIARY.

A good thought which we have read, something striking which we have heard, we put down in our diary. But if, at the same time, we take the trouble to extract from the letter of a friend peculiar remarks, original views, passing ingenious expressions, we should become very rich. We put away letters never to read them again, destroy them at last from motives of discretion, and thus the purest and most immediate breath of life vanishes irreparably for us and for others. I propose to supply this omission.

So then the story of the year is again repeated from the beginning. Again, thank God, we are in the prettiest chapter. Violets and mayflowers are like the superscriptions or vignettes; they always make a pleasing impression upon us, when we open them again in the book of life.

We blame the poor, especially those under age, when they lie about the streets and beg. Do we not remark that they are active as soon as something is given them to do? Scarcely does Nature unfold her friendly stores, than the children are at hand to commence a trade. None of them beg; every one offers you a nosegay, which he plucked while you were yet asleep, and the suppliant looks as kindly at you as the gift. No one looks pitiable who feels that he has some right to demand.

Why is the year often so short, often so long? why does it appear so short and so long in the memory? Thus I feel with respect to the past, and nowhere more strikingly than in the garden, where the transient and durable are blended one with another. And yet there is nothing so transient that it does not leave a trace—something of its kind.

We can take pleasure in winter. We fancy we can extend ourselves more freely when the trees stand before us so spirit-like, so transparent. They are nothing, but then they cover nothing. When once buds and blossoms come, we are impatient until the full leaf is put forth, until the landscape embodies itself, and the tree presses towards us as a form.

Everything perfect in its kind must go beyond its kind, must be something else which is incomparable. In many tones the nightingale is still a bird; then it rises above its species, and seems as though it would indicate to the feathered tribe what singing properly is.

A life without love, without the presence of the beloved one, is only a comédie à tiroir—a miserable collection of disjointed scenes. We pull them out and push them in again, one after the other, and hasten on to the next. All that appears good and important is but slightly connected. We must always begin anew, and might end anywhere.

(To be continued.)

. To prevent misunderstanding, it may be stated that the copyright of this translation belongs solely to the translator.

SONNET.

NO. XXIX.

When I was absent from thee, love, my mind
Form'd for itself strange visions of alarm;
Now trembling, lest some unexpected harm
Had smitten the dear treasure left behind;
In dread now, lest returning, I should find
The smile that used to welcome me less warm;
Or, that those eyes had put aside the charm
Which with such magic all my soul could bind.
That fear is gone—it was a childish fear;
And I will e'en confess it was a sin
To doubt the heart thou hast bestowed on me.
But still I know thou wilt forgive me, dear,
Learning that ev'ry anxious thought has been
Of thee alone, although unjust to thee.

N. D.

LOLA MONTEZ AND THE TIMES.

The following letter appeared in The Times of Thursday, which we take the liberty of transferring to the columns of our journal, as we have no doubt it will amuse sundry of our readers:—

To the Editor of The Times.

"Sir—In consequence of the numerous reports circulated in various papers regarding myself and family, utterly void of foundation or truth, I beg of you, through the medium of your widely circulated journal, to insert the following:—

I was born at Seville in the year 1823; my father was a Spanish officer in the service of Don Carlos; my mother, a lady of Irish extraction, born at the Havannah, and married for the second time to an Irish gentleman, which I suppose is the cause of my being called Irish, and sometimes English, "Betsy Watson," "Mrs. James," &c.

I beg leave to say that my name is Maria Dolores Porris Montez, and I have not now changed that name.

As for my theatrical qualifications, I never had the presumption to think I had any; circumstances obliged me to adopt the stage as a profession, which profession I have now renounced for ever, having become a naturalized Bavarian, and intending in future making Munich my residence.

Trusting that you will give this insertion, I have the honor to remain, sir, your obedient servant,
Munich, March 31.
LOLA MONTEZ."

This, if the letter be authentic, seems to set at rest all doubts concerning the famous dancer's birth-place, and poor Ireland must resign all claims to the honor of her natal corner. There is a chance, however, that the letter is a hoax, and that Lola Montez is in reality thorough-bred Irish, "kin to the Callaghans, Brallaghans, Nowlans and Dowlans likewise." If it be so, we trust she may send over some of her Bavarian profits to her starving countrypeople.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

(From the Family Times.)

A PORTION of our article on Saturday week, reprinted in a publication distributed in her Majesty's Theatre and to the subscribers, has given dire offence to the Morning Chronicle. This "champion in brass" takes up the quarrel with a smarting sense that his own weapons have been turned against him; and no greater or more pleasing proof of the efficacy of some of our wholesome hints on that occasion could be afforded, than by the restless readiness with which the Chronicle "hastens to the rescue." On Thursday last a whole column was devoted to counter explanation—if explanation were possible, or if not better left alone for the interests of the faction for which the Chronicle so energetically contends. Some playful sarcasms which we threw out, as to that gratuitous stringency in disbelief in which the morning print alluded to has indulged ever since Lind was threatened, have told. The shot has evidently gone right through its mark. There is a clean gap through the Chronicle sheet—as nearly spherical as the shot-hole of a long eighteen, (if the Chronicle be nautical he will understand the allusion), in comparison with the splintering irregularity of a bulky and elephantine carronade. If the champion be hurt, he must thank himself for his over-officiousness in making himself so prominent in upholding the impossibility of that which he had determined should not be true. Truth is powerful; but surpassing must that power be which controuls Truth!

"Magna est veritas, et prevalebit."

everywhere (except through the spectacles of smoked glass with which official duty compels that the sun of truth should be viewed) at the headquarters of the Chronicle. Truth is conquered in the person of the magnificent Lind—bound in chains, and fastened up to the chariot wheels of the grim Morning Chronicle, to be paraded before an indiscreetly tasteful public, to show that no such being is there. Rather Irish this, we will acknowledge; but "They stumble that run fast."

and the disbelievers have proved too much—too many negatives have from time immemorial, in English, proved the affirmative. The pertinacity with which the Chronicle "clave to the evil thing," and now endeavour to lay the blame of, upon the poor, unoffending, ill-treated innocent Jenny, may be fine and devoted; but the world, unfortunately, seems to think it was melo-dramatically mistaken. Zeal is glorious, but "discretion tempereth these things." Hath the Chronicle critic ever read Barrow, or Tillotson, or any of our old divines? If not, he may, we opine, do so with some profit. Lind, however, will soon be in London, and we can fancy the puzzled air with which these sapient old gentlemen (be they few or many, or, like Mrs. Malaprop's notions of Cerberus, three gentlemen in one) will examine, and re-examine her, to see if there really be not something diaphanous in the phenomenon—something to fade away—something supernatural conjured up by the dark wit of that wizard, Lumley! We never heard Mr. Lumley called a magician before; but we should not be startled if some of our Chronicle philosophers, like the sceptic disputants in the fable, in "viewing" this Swedish "chameleon" (not nightingale) "o'er by candlelight," were with a shudder to announce that Mr. Lumley

"Had call'd spirits from the vasty deep," and imposed upon the public—a spiritual Lind! not the Lind of flesh and blood—the nightingale of nightingales—the followed, the admired—she who has performed wonders greater than Donna Lolah, and caused the hair of the Morning Chronicle

"To grow white
In a single night,
As men's will do with sudden fears."

but a visionary cantatrice, exhaling after performance, and condensing at summons before, like a musical mist, if there could be such a thing! If Jenny Lind be the Kgeria visiting the rapt dreams of Mr. Lumley, the critic of the Chronicle is the jealous Faun behind the bush, determined to make her out to the populace a visitant from the devil.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

MILAN, MARCH 26th.—The new opera of Don Carlos, composed by il Maestro Bona (the libretto written by Signor Giacchetti) was performed on the 23rd. instant, and pleased very much. The Maestro being called before the curtain seven or eight times to receive the approbation of the audience. The singers were Marini, Steffenone, Caligolari, Soulerga, and Colmenghi. Miss Haycs has been singing in a new opera of Ricco's at Venezia, which by the bye, has made quite a furore; she finishes her engagement with Merelli this autumn, and is afterwards engaged to sing at Rome, Naples, and Florence; I can safely say there has been no English singer who has made so great a sensation in Italy as Miss Haycs. We have had a new ballet at the Scala by Terrot it has pleased immensely, it is called Odella; I think it is the best ballet that Terrot has yet produced; no doubt it will be brought out at your old Opera House this season.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—I am now going to speak on the final emancipation of the violin bow which has hitherto been in fettered bondage. The unsteadiness of the violin bow is found, by all, a task difficult to overcome, to remedy which many contrivances have been attempted and the best of timber selected, and even, at last, the steel bow made trial of, but all of these have failed to produce the desired effect. The bow is still, like the wild colt, hard to manage. There appeared one man, a few years ago, (Paganini) who was generally acknowledged as a famous artist and controller of the bow, but, I believe, there is still room to pass him, though the thing has not yet been done, nor by some thought possible to ever take place. I have heard a few of the first provincial leaders of concerts who were considered first-rate violinists, but I never much admired any of them, for I have not found any who were capable of giving the fine graceful adagio in such a style as I have read of Viotti, and a few others, giving that sort of movement. A few years ago I had the pleasure of being present at a concert given by a Gerni; he came nearest my expectation of any one I ever heard. It was at the very time when Paganini was in this country. This said German had heard Paganini several times and profited much by it; he declared that every time he heard him he appeared to play better and better, and that all that ever he heard besides were fiddlers, himself included, but that Paganini was the violinist. I have had a violin in my use about thirty-five years, and have, in course of that time, played country dances, quadrilles, &c., and likewise a second in the orchestra, also sometimes a first. The master who taught me was aware that this was as far as I could go, because of the unsteadiness of my bow. I now wish to inform you that I have, within the last eight days, made such an improvement in the bow that I could, by a little perseverance, play as delicately, forcibly, brilliantly, &c., as any one I ever heard, and all this may be done by good players in one hour's use of this bow; in fact the effort has only to be made and the thing is done. I am myself astonished at the result of the improvement. Should this bow be introduced to general use, what a revolution would take place in violin music, and what a field would it open for new unthought-of and endless varieties of most exquisite compositions. We should soon have a host of Paganinis. I have not let any one see the bow, and have but named it to one, a French gentleman who would feel great pleasure in making it known to his friends at Paris, whom he considers excellent violinists; however, I wish, in the first instance, to name it to you and to have your advice respecting what use might be made of this improvement. A bow on the old principle would admit of the improvement, only that it is too short from the nut downwards by an inch or two. I am, sir, yours most respectfully, Macclesfield, April 2, 1847.

J. STEWARD, Music Dealer.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

GRAND MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

SIR,—As an amateur in music, I have latterly wondered that among the many kindly schemes and efforts made to raise funds in the benevolent attempt to alleviate the distress and misery which abound among our fellow creatures in Ireland and Scotland, but especially the former, that it has not occurred to any of the charitable élite of the musical world, to put in return measures for "A Grand Musical Festival," on a large and extended scale,—such festival to be held in Westminster Abbey—that edifice being best adapted for the assemblage of a considerable audience such as would patronise a reunion of this kind, if got up in a proper style and with spirit, as also the character of the building itself would add weight and importance to the affair, which would tell considerably in favour of the receipts at the close of such festival; or, if the abbey should be inaccessible, some other large building. I would suggest one of our principal churches for such an object, the performance to be of course suitable to the sanctity of the edifice.

I think that if a festival could be got up consisting of two or more days performances, the music to be selections from the works of our great masters, and assisted by the splendid talent both native and foreign, with which the town is replete at the present time, and which offers such fair opportunity, I think that a meeting of this kind would go off with the greatest éclat, if managed properly, affording the greatest delight in our musical circles, and what is more, furthering the objects of a charity, which in claiming our sympathy and benevolence has no parallel.

Trusting you will publish as widely as possible the hint of a philanthropist, and that it may have the desired effect.

I remain, yours obediently,
Geo. F.

April 7th, 1847.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

ODDS AND ENDS.

MY DEAR SIR,—One of your subscribers asks this question "Has Corelli, in any passage known, violated in the slightest degree, or departed from, the prescribed laws of harmony?" Surely little experience in musical science is required to answer this question; but as "etc." depends upon your sound musical judgment, I will not presume to answer it. Is any composer free from errors? No, not one. Now as to violating the "prescribed" laws of harmony, I for one, should regret exceedingly if great masters had not, because some of them violate common sense, whilst others are so "prescribed," as to impede the progress of classical instruction.

As I am sure, Mr. Editor, you wish to do full justice to art and artists, permit me to ask whether the conclusion you come to respecting Mr. Costa is not violating the prescribed laws of logic, by inferring that that gentleman's knowledge and appreciation of Beethoven is "unworthy a musician of his standing and pretensions," merely, because he apprehended that repeating both the "scherzo and trio," in Beethoven's choral symphony would tire the audience. You say "during the choral movement there was incessant moving towards the door." Mr. Costa has a keen eye, and doubtless observed the uneasiness of the Philharmonic audience, who, now, seem to prefer the sound of a loud solo instrument in the midst of violins, to the flowing thoughts of either a Haydn, Mozart or Beethoven! I may be mistaken, but I conceive it natural to a disposition like Mr. Costa's, added to his knowledge and experience, to be more capable of conducting the works of the great masters than a man of sombre disposition, or the most egregious master of counterpoint. I conclude by correcting the errors of my last letter. I always lament to read of the extravagant praise awarded to some musicians, &c." "A Passacaglia need not be written in three-four (not fourths) time." It would puzzle even Taglioni, Cerito, &c., to invent dance (not chance) figures, &c." But the writers of the press being more eloquent on the subject of dancing than (not those) profound in their observations on music." Hoping you will pardon me for expressing any opinion adverse to your own,

I remain, my dear sir, your's very truly
FRENCH FLOWERS.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SONS OF APOLLO FRIENDLY SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.

DEAR SIR,—Having had the pleasure last Friday of dining with the members of the Musical Society, entitled the Sons of Apollo Friendly Society of Musicians, held at the Black Horse Tavern 400 Oxford Street, when sixty gentlemen met to spend their twenty-fourth anniversary, I think this Society only requires to be better known among the Musical Profession to be in a much more flourishing state than it now is, although, it is improving and has been ever since its formation. The worthy Secretary Mr. Baird, stated, although but eighty members, we had a stock in hand of £1700. The object of the Society is to relieve its members in case of sickness or distress. The greatest praise is due to Mr. Rippin the host, for the superior manner in which the dinner and wines were served. By your noticing this in your publication, you will oblige—Yours respectfully, A SUBSCRIBER, AND A MEMBER OF THE SONS OF APOLLO.

OPENING OF THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

THE long pending question has at length been solved; the practicability of establishing a second Italian Opera in London has been guaranteed by the public fiat. Covent Garden, the ancient temple of Shakspeare and his interpreters, re-opened its portals on Tuesday night, after a cessation of some years from the practice of its legitimate vocation.

Our old friend has got a new face, but he wears it bravely. He has grown bigger and taller. The hand of the mason has been upon him. Those parts of him that were diseased and worn out have been lopped off and renovated. He has been washed from head to foot, and newly arrayed in a coat of many colours. His garment is of gold and silver and blue. Quaint and costly are the devices thereof. It was murmured that he would die of the operation, like a patient under the knife of some unskilful surgeon. It was stated that an injunction would be crammed down his throat and choke him. But these were fables. Master-mason Beale knew his craft. He surveyed our old friend from head to foot, and found that he was dirty and ill-favored; that parts of him were crumbling into dust; that other parts of him were maimed and impotent; that other parts of him were inflicted with a leprosy. And Beale said "Thou shalt be cured, Oh, Convent-Garden! I will cleanse thee of the filth that defiles thee. I will lave thy aged limbs in clear water, and thou shalt arise fresh and whole, and shalt leap for main joy. The market hard by shall offer thee its fruits, and thou shalt eat thereof and be glad. I will dress thee in a fine garment; and the men shall wonder at thy dignity, and the women shall exult in thy comeliness. No more shall thy cheeks be drenched in tears by the arts of the sad Melpomene; no more shall thy sides be shook by the frolics of the laughing Thalia. Costa shall play thee an overture, and Grisi delight with a song. Apollo shall henceforth be thy deity, and Handel shall stand erect in thy corridors, where Shakspeare towered of yore. Tragedy, and comedy, and pantomime, and farce, shalt thou henceforth abandon. Jullien shall no more disturb thee with the 'sherry cobbler' of his promenades, or the midnight revels of his masquers. Opera shall be thy bride—Italian opera. Thou shalt take her to thine arms, and thy progeny shall be as the sands of the sea. Rossini, Donizetti, Bellini, and Mozart shall be thine adopted, until issue shall arise from thy loins, born in the land of thy birth. Then shalt thou be again changed, and thy name shall be called ENGLISH OPERA!! Costa shall play thee an overture, and Grisi delight thee with a song." And so Master-mason Beale set to work, and hammered, and sawed, and whitewashed, and plastered, and gilded, and painted, and fringed, and hung curtains, and suspended candelabras, and what not. He sent for men cunning in these matters—Albano, and Ferri, and Verardi, et cetera. And Costa agreed to play the overture, and Grisi consented to sing the song; and thus, one half of Beale's prophecy was fulfilled. The other half is in the womb of Time, which will bear it in due season.

On Tuesday evening, at half-past six of the clock, we presented ourselves at the portals of the renovated temple. Our credentials were recognised, and the Chronicle, arrayed in his holiday dress, signified the path that we should take. We entered, and found our way to a row of seats in the centre of the pit, amidst the glories of metropolitan periodical literature. Avoiding the precise milieu, we resigned the seat under the chandelier (for special reasons) to the Editor of the Man in the Moon, whose jibes and pleasantries made the half hours glide jocosely along. The curtain was raised and the stage was dark; bands of carpenters and henchmen were employed with hammers and nails and saws, hammering, nailing, and sawing. Sturdy decorators were carrying caryatides to their destinations, and explaining to them their position as supporters of the first tier of boxes. The aspect was dreary on the whole. A couple of rows of candelabras, with wax lights attached to the first and second tiers of boxes, but half illuminated the vast area—and a couple of rows of pit seats, occupied by the men of letters who had been favoured with an injunction to be an hour in advance of the public, in order that their seats and necks might be secured, gave a dreary first prospect of the audience that should fill the theatre. After a space, however, the carpenters ceased carpentering, the caryatides were firmly established in their places, and the curtain went down. The house was built.

Shortly before half-past seven, indications of the public's arrival were manifested visibly and audibly. Persons were shot in through the pit entrance as though they were expelled from the mouth of a cannon. They seemed to leap into their places at one bound. At half-past seven the pit was crammed full, the stalls three-parts full, the boxes half full, the amphitheatres and gallery gorged to repletion. Then arose a murmur, low but audible, against the inefficient manner in which the theatre was lighted. All admired the work of M. Albano and his brethren, but they said they should admire it the more for seeing it the plainer. On the other hand there were some who defended the obscurity, on the ground that it was the continental principle of lighting, and tended to give ten-fold vividness to the scenic illusion. In the midst of this jar of opinions a sudden burst of light flooded the whole interior, the huge chandelier suspended from the roof had been fed with its nourishment of gas, and the effect was as of the broad light of day coming immediately after an eclipse. It was impossible for anything to be more striking. The crowd, dazzled and astonished, bellowed and vociferated "like wood men." Shortly after the members of the orchestra came in, one by one, until the whole "eighty" appeared in the fulness of their glory. Of these, regardless of the influence they had exercised in the establishment of the new Opera, the public, strange to say, took no kind of notice. But when Costa, the conductor, entered, the cheers beat the roof for egress, and finding none, populated the entire space with echoes, which begetting the likes of themselves, there was, as it were, a chaos of unutterable noises. Costa bowed courteously and contentedly in acknowledgment of his reception, and again applauded more vehemently, again bowed more courteously than before.

The awful moment had arrived. Costa raised his baton, the overture to Semiramide began. The power of the band was soon felt. Excepting—excepting nothing whatever—the overture was played to absolute perfection. There was a torrent of applause but no encore, at least none that Costa would accept, for the last chord of the overture was to the pulling up of the curtain, as the flash of lightning to the clap of thunder—only to make the simile hold, the parts must be reversed.

The first tableau showed us the intentions of the Covent Garden Company in respect to scenery and decorations. The coup d'œil realised the conception of the poet of Semiramide, who has indicated "a magnificent temple in honour of Belus," in his stage directions. It was superb. But we recognised here, and in the after tableaux, the ancient mise en scene belonging to the short but memorable dynasty of the Kembles, when Semiramide was got up for the gracious Adelaide.

It is not our business here to speak of Semiramide. The event we are recording is the opening of the Royal Italian Opera, not the representation of a new work. For those who are unacquainted with the plot, we let these few words suffice to explain it:—After the unnatural death of Ninus, King of Assyria, his widow, the famous Semiramis, in order to satisfy the people, who are impatiently waiting the choice of a successor, tenders her hand in marriage to Arsaces, in the hopes of retaining the crown through her nuptials with the young warrior; but as the event is on the point of being accomplished, the shade of Ninus appears in the vestibules of the palace, and, like the Dane of Shakspeare, calls for vengeance on his murderer, delegating Arsaces as his avenger.

The sequel we borrow from the Royal Italian Opera programme, a brochure by no means so elegant as that issued at Her Majesty's Theatre, but preferable on account of its abstaining from controversy and criticism.

"The appearance of the Royal Spectre freezes with terror the soul of the guilty Semiramide, and the perfidious Assur, who, at the instigation of the beautiful Queen, and in the hope of eventually ascending the throne of Assyria, had nefariously taken his Sovereign's life. Remorse seizes on the soul of the guilty wife, and in hope of expiating her crime, she resolves on repudiating Assur, and making choice of Arsace; but she knows not that the Arsace, whom she so passionately loves, is her son. Arsace, to whom the high priest has confided the secret of his birth, swears to avenge his father's death—he seeks out Assur to immolate him to the shade of Ninus. In lieu of Assur, however, he meets Semiramide, and kills her in mistake."

The opera is in two acts. It was Rossini's first essay at opera seria on a grand scale, and if it may not rank among his chiefest master-pieces, it certainly contains some of his best music. Its faults lie in the redundancy of its style, exemplified in the length and frequency of uninteresting recitatives, and the constant occurrence of pieces of a trivial character, spun out to inordinate length, and utterly at variance with the sentiment of the scene. Of these the overture, many of the airs, and the majority of the duets, are instances. And yet, being written in the ad captandum style, the popularity of the opera holds by these pieces as an expiring swimmer by the straws that lie on the surface of the water. But the finest and most musical portions of Semiramide are the choruses, concerted pieces, and finales, which are conceived and executed in Rossini's highest manner. In the finale to the first act, there are parts to which the name of Mozart might have been affixed without danger of suspicion, and many of the orchestral effects are brilliant and magnificent. It is quite a mistake to suppose that the heaviness of which Semiramide has been accused, not unreasonably, derives from the serious portions of the music. On the contrary, it is the abundance of the lighter pieces, and their dramatic impropriety, which induces a tedium that seldom fails to arise from the ineffective and unnatural intermixture of conflicting elements. Be that as it may, Semiramide is now so well known as to be beyond the pale of criticism—that is, of periodical criticism, for we have strong doubts whether it will survive long enough to undergo the examination of posterity.

In the first scene, Oroë, chief of the Magi, and Idreno, King of India, introduced us to two of the Royal Italian Opera troupe, new to this country—Signor Lavia and Signor Tagliafico, the first a tenor, the second a bass. They are neither of them sufficiently remarkable to warrant a detailed notice, though both of them, and especially the latter, are likely to prove useful in the subordinate parts. It is enough to say that the tenor is a tenor, and the bass a bass.

The part of Assur devolved upon Signor Tamburini, its admirable representative at Her Majesty's Theatre in the olden time. The appearance of this great dramatic singer, after four years absence from the country, was the signal for cheers, loud, unanimous, and long lasting—so generous and warm, indeed, that the artist was sensibly affected, and trembled with emotion as he bowed his acknowledgments. As by this time the stalls and boxes were all filled, and not a vacant corner was to be seen in the house, a very impressive effect was involved in this hearty recognition of an old and deserving favourite. Tamburini's voice and style have very slightly changed. Perhaps the extreme upper notes of his register, the E flat, E natural, and F, are obtained with less ease than of old, and are less clear and full; but all that facility of vocalising for which he was remarkable before, is as remarkable now as ever, and in his acting we cannot see the slightest falling off. The Morning Post, looking at the great artist through its opera glass, may take a different view from ours—but opinions, delivered through the medium of such a criticism as that on the Royal Italian Opera, on Wednesday morning, will have small weight with the public, and will do small good to the journal. It is enough for us to state, and the public will believe us, that throughout his performance on Tuesday evening, Signor Tamburini sang and acted like himself—and we cannot pay him a higher compliment. We must also tender him our acknowledgments for restoring one of the finest scenes in the opera (the last but one of the second act)—that in which Assur, attempting to enter the tomb of Ninus, is terrified and dissuaded by the appearance of the ghost of the murdered monarch. This scene offers a very fine opportunity for the display of the united qualities of the actor and singer, of which Signor Tamburini admirably availed himself. His portrayal of terror, despair, and a stricken conscience, was as fine as consummate dramatic art could make it. It told immensely with the audience, who recalled him on the stage with one voice.

It were a hopeless taste to attempt a verbal description of the enthusiastic acclamations that greeted the entrée of the Semiramide, the Diva, the admirable Grisi. Words cannot paint it, and the pen drops from the hand in despair. Looking young, beautiful, commanding and attractive as ever—full of health and energy, and spirits—Grisi, the inimitable Grisi, who may well disdain all rivalry, while she is her gracious and incomparable self—sang and acted the part of the imperious queen of Babylon, with the grandeur, animation, vivacity, and consummate art which have won for her the undisputed and undisputable title of the Queen of Dramatic Song. Her great points in this, one of her greatest parts, are well known, and we have but to say that she lost not one, but rather endowed them all with threefold force and expression. She was rapturously applauded throughout, and recalled by the audience on several occasions. In a word, Grisi was Grisi. Can we say more? No!

We have now to speak of Mademoiselle Alboni, the great novelty of the night. The debut of this lady was as brilliant as that of Rubini in the Pirata, many years ago, which we always count as one of the most exciting scenes our memory has packed up to be recalled when required. Mdlle. Alboni is a legitimate contralto. Her voice, which extends in compass from G below the stave to B flat in alt., has the honeyed mellowness of quality that appertains to the contralto character to an extraordinary degree. Her tones are ripe, full, and sonorous. A group of notes falling from her throat has upon the ear much the effect that a bunch of heavy, drooping, juicy grapes would have upon the eye. The mouth waters for their very lusciousness. Her execution is marvellous for a contralto, and her command of the upper notes, which have the same effect as the false alto of a tenor, is really astonishing. Her style is overflowing with passionate expression, which, in the cantabile, sometimes leads her into exaggeration—particularly exemplified by her excessive use of the legato and the glissando (a term we use for the want of a better) method of taking the more distant intervals—but in the cabaletta, where she has no time to hyperbolize, her correct expression, energetic manner, and faultless execution, her chaste and exquisite use of ornament, her finished method of rounding and completing the cadences, are worthy of the highest admiration. In her air, "In sì barbara sciagura," we observed the redundancy of expression we have noted; but in the famous duet, "Giorno d'orrore," with Grisi, we never heard more perfect vocalisation, or more irreproachable taste. The former was encored tumultuously, and the cabaletta of the latter, in which Grisi's inimitable mezza voce singing was worth a whole opera in itself, received a similar compliment. Mdlle. Alboni was recalled after both pieces, amidst deafening applause. No hit could have been more decided. The first few notes that commence the recitative, "Eccomi alfine in Babilonia," on her entry, gave indications of her rare physical qualities, and before the end of the recitative, the grandeur and finish of her style were made manifest. That at the end of the opera she had established her right to a place among the first mistresses of Italian song, was the unanimous opinion of all present.

Our general impression of the performance of Semiramide was highly favorable. The band was in almost all respects admirable. Signor Costa, here in his proper element, proved his supremacy by the absolute control he exercised over his forces, ensuring every nuance of expression from fortissimo to pianissimo, in crescendo or in rallentando, in affretando or in diminuendo, as though the entire orchestra were but one instrument on which he performed himself alone. The chorus, too, which was powerful, numerous and efficient, was equally under his control, and conjoined its efforts to those of the band, as though there were not two parties, but one. The accompaniments to the vocal solos were distinguished alike for their delicacy and decisive accentuation. Another thing to be eulogised, and for this Signor Costa is entitled to the credit, is the restoration of almost all that belongs to Rossini's score, there being nothing omitted except some scenes in which Azema, a third female character (the mistress of Arsace) of very subordinate interest, is conspicuous. The curtailment of all that relates to Azema, has, by custom, become traditional, and the interest attached to her share of the music is so small, that few will complain of the loss of it. In conclusion, we have seldom witnessed, perhaps never, a more satisfactory musical and dramatic performance than that of Semiramide on Tuesday night—satisfactory no less on account of its completeness than of its minute attention to detail. The opera concluded, the three great artists, Alboni, Tamburini, and Grisi, were re-called before the curtain and enthusiastically cheered, a profusion of bouquets being administered to the ladies.

After the opera, which was not over till nearly twelve o'clock, a ballet in two tableaux, the composition of M. Albert, a gentleman of high repute in his profession, was produced, but did not make so great a hit as the opera. The materials are slender enough. The caprices of Cora, the favourite slave of Prince Mirkan, who, like all oriental potentates, keeps a harem—her infringement upon the etiquette of the harem, going so far as to break the meerschum pipe of the Prince—the anger of the latter—the disdain of Cora—the pretended infidelity of Prince Mirkan—the purchase of four new slaves for his harem—the dancing of these for his delight—his undelight at their dancing—the appearance of a fifth, veiled—the dancing of the fifth for his delight—his delight at her dancing—the unveiling of the unknown dancer—the discovery that it is Cora—the reconciliation of the Prince and his favourite—the purchase by Cora, and liberation by Cora of the four slaves—and the usual end of such matters. This ballet has no pretensions, but it is elegantly put upon the stage, and the dancing of Madlle. Fleury, in Cora, is exquisitely graceful and characteristic. Madlle. Fleury does not please so much by the wonders of agility as by elegance of manner and charming unaffectedness of deportment. She was greatly applauded, and with reason. Madlle. Neodot, who, like Madlle. Fleury, is already known to this country through the enterprise of Mr. Bunn, also distinguished herself highly in a pas de deux with Madlle. Bertin (we believe), and the corps of odalisques. A pas de quatre, by Madlles. Auriol, Delechaux, Stephan, and Demelisse, attracted some attention. But the gem of the ballet was Madlle. Fleury's Sévilana, a spirited national dance, performed with the utmost naïveté and abandon.

M. M. Gontier and Mobile, dancers of some pretension, also added to the attractions of the evening. M. O'Bryan, as Caléh the pirate and slave merchant, acted with great truth and intelligence, and showed himself a thorough master of the exigencies of the scene. The music, by M. Curmi, is light and sparkling enough, and the scenery, by Messrs. Grieve and Telbin, is worthy of their experienced brushes. On the whole, however, the ballet was not on a par with the musical department; but we expect much from a new one, announced for the debut of Dumilatre, who is well-known to us, and will receive a hearty welcome.

It was long past one before the performances had concluded, and half the audience had departed ere the termination of the ballet. But all exceptions made that can possibly be made, the opening of the Royal Italian Opera was an event that will long be fresh in the memory of the public. The novelty and splendour of the theatre itself, designed and completed in so short a space of time, and the perfection of the operatic representation in almost every respect constituted a theme for comment which is likely to endure for the life time of each individual member of the mighty crowd assembled.

On Thursday the same performances were repeated, with increased effect, the same reception and the same applause being awarded to the artists. To-night there will be no change, but on Tuesday the Lucia di Lammermoor, with Persiani, Salvi, and Ronconi, will be given, and a second batch of the company will be tested. The Italiana of Rossini is announced, a piece of news that will gratify every lover of the early compositions of the "Swan of Pesaro." Mario will make his first appearance in Puritani on Saturday next, with Grisi, Ronconi, and Tamburini.

Ere concluding, we may state, that the death of Mr. Moralt has raised Mr. Hill, our best tenor-player, to the part of first tenor in the orchestra, Mr. Hill's place being taken by Mr. Thomas.

CONCERTS.

MADAME DULCKEN'S MATINEE MUSICALE.—The third of these entertainments took place on Wednesday last, when Madame Dulcken performed a selection of pieces remarkable for their variety and their excellence. There was a Quartet of Ries, Hummel's Quintet in E flat minor, Weber's Invitation pour la Valse, a study of Thalberg, and Beethoven's Sonata in B flat, one of the least generally known, but one of the most melodious and beautiful he ever wrote. In all of these she displayed her great command of the instrument to advantage, and her playing wanted on this occasion none of that finish for which it has often been so justly praised, while it had enough of style to prove her a first rate artist. In the concerted pieces, Mr. Blagrove on the violin, Mr. Westlake on the tenor, Mr. Hausmann on the violoncello, and Mr. C Severn on the double-bass played with their accustomed success. Mr. L Schulz executed a fantasia on the guitar, as only he could execute it, and it is happy for the art that he stands thus unrivalled, for were there many who could do on the guitar what he does, we fear it would be before long forced into the bit of musical instruments to which we cannot at present think it legitimately belongs. The vocal music was supported by Mr. Manvers, Mr. Kneipel, and Madame G. A. Macfarren, and was all accompanied by Mr. Kuhe, with the exception of a "Winterlied" of Mendelssohn, in which Madame Macfarren accompanied herself. This was a perfect gem, brimful of character, and to us quite a novelty: this fair vocalist deserves our thanks for bringing it to light, and she owes no less to the song than we owe to her, for it gave her a great opportunity for the display of her beautiful voice and true musical feeling. We must not omit to mention one of Mr. Macfarren's MS. German canzonets, which produced more effect than any other vocal piece of the morning, which was chiefly attributed to his wife's excellent singing. The matinée was most fashionably attended.

CLASSICAL CONCERTS, GREENWICH.—The fourth meeting of the third annual series of these entertainments, took place at the Lecture Hall on Wednesday evening, under the direction of Mr. Carte. The concert consisted of a selection from the works of Sir Henry Bishop, and was conducted by the composer. The principal vocalists were Miss Birch, Miss M. B. Hawes, Miss Thornton; and the Messrs. Lockey, Machin, Barnby, Wetherbee and Soubridge. Between the parts, Mr. Rockstro performed a fantasia on the pianoforte, and Mr. Henry Blagrove a solo on the violin. Mr. Carte, who is the head and front of these entertainments, is deserving of much commendation for the care and time he has expended on them.

MR. FREDERICK CHATTERTON'S "First Grand Concert this season,"—so entitled in the bills—was given at the Sadler's Wells Theatre last week. The Concert was certainly a Grand Concert for that neighbourhood, and must have startled the unaccustomed communities of the Islington wherrabouts by the novelty of the entertainment, as well as by the importation of so many vocal celebrities. Verily Sadler's Wells is treading closely on the steps of the aristocratic districts, and if it goes on progressing in the same ratio, we may augur of its galling the kibes of May Fair or St. James's before many seasons have run their rounds. The Concert was divided into three parts. This seems to have settled down into the proper allotment of portions in a concert by the modern beneficiaires, and certainly the extent of most programmes warrants or rather necessitates such a division. Formerly quality was the moving power of all entertainments, both musical and theatrical: now it would seem that quantity rather than quality is the requisite, or desideratum, especially in entertainments of music. Her Majesty's Theatre first set the example, having the first necessity, and with so infallible an authority staring us in the face, we do not feel ourselves inclined to quarrel with the introduction of LONG NIGHTS. Well, then, Mr. Frederick Chatterton's Concert was a very long one, and was very properly apportioned into three sections; but it was also a very good concert; though so long, it did not weary the audience. The chief vocalists as Miss Birch, Madame F. Lablache, The Braham, Mr. Harrison, Signor F. Lablache and John Parry, to which we may add the lesser lights, though not unshining, of the Misses. Allen, Steele, Moriatt O'Connor, and Mary Rose; with Messrs. Henry Smith, Genge, N. J. Sporie, and Furtado. The solo instrumentalists were Herr Koenig, (Cornet); Miss Kate Loder, (piano); Miss Day, (piano); Mr. Carte (Flute); Mr. Willy, (violin); Mr. Sedgwick, (concertina); and Mr. Frederick Chatterton, (harp). The conductors were Mr. Louis Leo and Mr. J. H. Willy. The Concert containing upwards of forty morceaux, our readers will perceive at once the inutility of giving more than a few selections from the performances. In the first part, we admired most the fantasia on the Gothic harp, very finely played by Mr. Chatterton; the "Casta Diva" of Miss Birch;

Rossini's Tarentella, an admirable performance by F. Lablache, and a Scotch Ballad by Madame F. Lablache. We must not omit recording our gratification on hearing Miss Mary Rose a second time in Meyerbeer's very difficult cavatina, "Robert toi que j'aime." We, however, cannot help feeling that the choice of this aria for a debutante is somewhat venturesome; nevertheless, we would not presume to dictate to so good a supervisor as Mr. Louis Leo. In part second, a duet of Donizetti's by Madame and Signor F. Lablache, a solo on the Boehm Flute, "The Return" from Roch-Albert's Maritime Melodies, for voice and cornet, performed by Miss Birch and Herr Koenig; a grand duet for two pianofortes, by the Misses Kate Loder and Day, and an aria buffa from Cenerentola, by F. Lablache, were among the performances most favorably received. We must not forget the patriarch Braham, who was received with thunders of applause in "The Bay of Biscay," and a duet with Miss Birch. The third part, consisting entirely of performances by the Lantum Ethiopian Serenaders, calls for no particular notice.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

DRURY LANE.—This theatre was crowded to excess in every part on Monday night, the attraction being Wallace's favourite opera, Martina, and the new grand oriental spectacle, The Desert; or, the Imaun's Daughter. The extraordinary preparation for the spectacle, so widely circulated and made known through various channels to the public, excited great expectation among the spectators. Although great attention was paid to the opera and several encores honoured the singers, it was apparent each anxious eye looked for the great event of the evening. Accordingly, when the curtain rose on the first scene, the feelings of anxiety and suspense, so long circumscribed, found a vent for their escape in tumultuous cheers for a very splendid scenic representation of the exterior of the Grand Temple of Mecca, illuminated by hundreds of lamps. The next scene, the Ruins of an Ancient Egyptian Tower, was equally applauded. The Desert scene was the grand coup of the first act. Here was observed the arrival of the caravan, escorted by troops of mounted guards, with twelve camels, conducting the litter of Princess Ipomaye, (Miss Messent) and other attendants and followers, till the stage was literally covered. The effect of this scene was brilliant and imposing, and was received with tremendous applause by the audience. The caravan halts and is attacked by Bedouin Arabs, the troops resist, and in the midst of the mélée the Simoon, or Wind of Fire, rises, and threatens all with destruction. The rising of the sand was managed with extraordinary effect. In the second act, the Desert (by star-light) presented one of the most beautiful scenes we have ever witnessed at old Drury, and is entirely worthy of this great establishment. A dance, of an Arabian character, called "La Fantasia Araba and Danza delle Almee," was introduced here, the music being selected from Felicien David's Le Desert. The executants comprised nearly the whole female department of the Drury Lane ballet company, including the Mesdemoiselles Louise, Adele, Giubilei, Les Soeurs St. Louin, &c. &c. The dance was greatly applauded. Last scene of all represented the Arch of Triumph conducting to the Euphrates, through which passed a grand procession, accompanied by a brass band, escorting the Prince of Persia, (Mr. Rafter) in a gorgeous nuptial chariot, drawn by two elephants, and attended by more than fifty horses, in conjunction with all the camels, forming altogether, as the bills truthfully indicated, one of the most magnificent cavalcades ever presented to the public. The principal portion of the music was taken from Le Desert, the chief vocalists being Miss Messent, Mr. Rafter, and Miss Rebecca Isaacs. Miss Messent was very happy in the cavatina, "Sweet Charity," which she delivered with much taste and feeling. She was also excellent in the aria, "Nearer as we approach." Mr. Rafter deserves honourable mention for his share in the vocal department. We must not forget Miss Rebecca Isaacs, who sang a "Lament" very charmingly. The chorus was numerous and efficient. The story to which Monsieur David's music is wedded, and to which all the horses, the twelve camels, the two gigantic elephants, (by the way, two small elephants would be a greater curiosity) and the retinue, ad infinitum, have been appended, is taken from Lalla Rookh, Miss Messent performing the tulip-cheek princess under another appellation, and Mr. Rafter taking the prince minstrel, Feramorz, with merely a different cognomen, while Harley's Fuzzel Oola is no less a personage than our dearly beloved Fadladeen in disguise. We must not forget to name the inimitable acting of Harley in the old tom-fool courtier. The audience roared with laughter every time he appeared. His self-important look and swagger were exquisitely comic. We do not remember any production of this kind involving such complication of scenery, machinery, and so many intricacies of stage tactics, which went so smoothly on its first representation. Every credit is due to the manager for the care and money he has expended in getting up this really Elephantine Spectacle. We hope such liberality will meet with all the favour it deserves from the public.

HAYMARKET.—The Easter entertainment of this theatre is an entirely new and original, classical, astronomical, quizzical, polytechnical, experimental, operatical and pantomimical extravaganza, rejoicing in the title of The New Planet, or Harlequin out of Place. It was produced on Monday night with great splendour in the scenery, decorations, and appointments, and was very successful. The New Planet is indited by Mr. Planché, author of Fortunio and The Invisible Prince. The entire fable of the piece is grounded on an invitation given by the New Planet to all her brotherhood and sisterhood of the Solar System, and when they arrive, instead of partaking of refreshment, or amusement, Mother Earth invites them to see her territories, which, without any reason, they all accept, omitting Jupiter and Juno for classical reasons assigned, and Vesta for an obvious one. They all depart, and Mercury, transformed into Harlequin, shows them the London sights. This is the whole construction and interest of the New Planet. It is interspersed with considerably too great a quantity of music. In regard to the writing, we remember no production of Mr. Planché's more full of good things. It is quite overstocked with new and happy hits, which told very well with the audience. Several of the scenes received great applause, especially the view of London by moonlight at the Colosseum, which was an admirable specimen of scenic painting. The introduction of the Spirits of the two rival Opera houses was a happy idea, but much of its point was lost by being put to music. Miss Reynolds is much improved, sung with great taste, and was deservedly encored in her scena from Norma. Miss P. Horton introduced a ballad, a burlesque on "Molly Bawn," "O, Jenny Lind! why lave me pinin?" which this lady gave with careful enunciation, though we hardly say so much for her in all her music. This ballad was deservedly encored, being exceedingly well sung, and having so nicely seized on one of the noisiest topics of the day. We must not forget to name Miss P. Horton's capital singing in a travestie on "Una Voce," which was given with great effect, and in a manner that told us of great improvement in the fair artist. Mr. Buckstone was extremely amusing as Harlequin. Mr. Bland's Mars was a small part, but he made much of it. If the music was abridged, the New Planet would be considerably improved. The house was very full.

FRENCH PLAYS.—On Monday, we hailed with delight the return of Mademoiselle Rose Chéri. Few actresses have succeeded in gaining popularity so suddenly, and very few have known how to draw so closely the tie which unites the artist to the public. It needs but little judgment to discover the reason of this sympathy, of this entente cordiale between the parties; the actress, on the one hand, is intelligent, pretty, and natural; and on the other, the public, although occasionally apt to be led away by false pathos and brilliant declamation, feels its error when the real thing is set before it, and appreciates so much the more highly what is true and unaffected. Mademoiselle Rose Chéri is not a dramatic actress, yet her efforts are decidedly dramatic; for she can draw tears from the eyes, and cause the heart to heave, without any of the straining of our ordinary melo-dramatic queens. She has all the vivacity of a Déjazet, all her humour and naturel, but is decidedly more lady-like in her manners. After Le Secret du Ménage, a three-act piece, in verse, an importation from the Théâtre Français, in which Madame Duluc, Mademoiselle Angèle, and Monsieur Langeval played in the most satisfactory manner, we had Un Changement de Main, brought out at this theatre last year, and a new piece, written expressly for Mademoiselle Rose Chéri, by M. Scribe. Both pieces are clever, the dialogue is smart, and the allusions witty and judicious. The first is an episode in the history of Elizabeth, empress of Russia, and turns upon the sudden elevation to power and favour of the unfortunate Alexis Romanouski. A slight outline of the plot may prove acceptable to our readers. Alexis has had an intrigue with the wife of a certain Count Schvaloff, minister of the police, and through the influence of the latter, is sent to a fortress; here he gains the affections of all the inmates, and is on excellent terms with the governor and his daughter, who give him an opportunity to effect his escape. He profits by it to deliver a prisoner brought into the fortress on the previous night, and who is no other than the natural son of Peter the Great, whom the zealous Elizabeth had confined in a dungeon for more than ten years. On the discovery of the prisoner's escape, the governor gives himself up for lost, but the generous Alexis steps forward and impersonates the prince; for some time the secret remains undiscovered, the false prince finds favour in the eyes of the empress, and profits by the opportunity to advance his own private affairs, by relating the intrigue of the minister's wife, and obtaining his own release from prison; but the storm at last bursts, and he is condemned to death, not so much on account of his crime, as of the jealousy which the empress had conceived against Foedora, the governor's daughter. Luckily the tables are again turned, he proves his attachment to have been nothing more than brotherly affection, and he obtains his pardon; and here the Changement de Main takes place. We shall not venture to explain in what the change consists, such things had better be touched with a light hand; and our neighbours are judicious enough to convey their meaning without entering into detail, still more difficult to render in English. The piece was excellently played. Mademoiselle Rose Chéri's Elizabeth was a chef d'œuvre of dramatic art—overflowing with humour at once—unctuous and quiet. Mademoiselle Vallée was in the highest degree graceful and attractive in the part of Foedora. M.M. Duméry and Langeval, the former especially, contributed much to the success of the piece. M. Rhozevil is decidedly one of the most useful actors attached to this theatre and there is a distinction in all he does that raises him far above the common. La Protégée Sans le Savoir, is decidedly an acquisition to the repertoire of the French plays. It is written with all the neatness and elegance of M. Scribe's versatile and ready pen, and abounds in wit of the most refined and delicate order. Hélène is an orphan, left with no resource but her pencil, her position has been considerably ameliorated through the generosity of a benevolent nobleman, Lord Albert Clavering, who buys up all her pictures, unknown to her, at very high prices. This excites the astonishment of Durocher, her former master, and he conceives suspicion against the innocence of his pupil. He soon discovers how matters stand, and insists upon their prompt termination. This brings the parties to their senses and they now find that gratitude on one side and benevolence on the other had gradually ripened into love. Lord Albert, although engaged to another lady, offers his hand to Hélène and is accepted with joy. At this juncture he receives a letter, which reveals the ruin of the lady's father, and he finds himself bound in honour not to break his contract at such a moment, and in this he is seconded by Hélène, although she is almost broken-hearted. A certain Lord Tressilyan, who figures in the piece as an amusing English fop, had gained the affection of the lady in question and elopes with her, leaving a letter in which he offers to give any satisfaction to Lord Albert; but Lord Albert could not be better satisfied than by the news which this letter discloses and the turn which matters have taken. The marriage of the peer and the poor orphan is newly covenanted and the piece ends. M. Cartigny was admirable as Durocher, the French painter, who is not over fond of the English, but who still finds much to admire and esteem in them. The allusions were well taken by the English part of the audience and although, at times very severe, excited no feelings but those of good-humoured hilarity. Nothing could have been more exquisitely natural than Mademoiselle Rose Chéri's impersonation of Hélène, it is decidedly one of her most charming performances and embodies to the life the graceful creation of M. Scribe. In pathos and in gaiety Mademoiselle Chéri is equally effective, and her acting altogether betrays an absence of all effort which is of itself a wonderful charm. M. Rhozevil played the part of Clavering with true sentiment and gentlemanly bearing, to which M. Pascal's pleasant effrontery in Tressilyan formed a very happy contrast. Both these pieces were repeated on Wednesday to a crowded house. Among Mademoiselle Chéri's next performances will be the celebrated Clarisse (founded on Jules Janin's version of Clarissa Harlowe) which was so very successful in Paris. We are most anxious to see this charming and intelligent actress in this part. J. de C——x.

ADELPHI.—The management of this house had recourse to no novelties to uphold the festive time of Easter. It has thought it more prudent, or more politic, to adhere to the Flowers of the Forest, and the Phantom Dancers. Certain the last piece has had a long run, but nevertheless, it is still fresh as a two year old, and will rattle along for many a night yet. The splendour of its scenery, and the captivating acting of Madame Celeste, independent of its written merits, must insure frequent repetition of the Phantom Dancers. The Flowers of the Forest is one of Mr. Buckstone's best dramas, and has obtained great success for the Adelphi. The house has been crammed in every part during the week, and the two performances were visited with vociferous applause.

PRINCESS'S.—Auber's opera of the Barcarole was produced on Monday night at this theatre for the first time in England. Our crowded columns this week preclude us from noticing the opera at any length. We have therefore determined to postpone our review until the ensuing number.

After the Barcarole, the Midsummer Night's Dream was produced with considerable splendour, and in a style of completeness, that would reflect credit on any management. All the resources of the theatre were made available, and the operatic, serious, comic, and ballet bands conjoined their forces to make one great whole. The cast of characters was excellent. Compton played Bottom with inimitable humour, making the part ridiculous and laughable in the extreme, without having recourse to the slightest tinge of exaggeration. We have seen nothing of the kind more exquisite than his death scene as Pyramus. Mr. S. Cowell's Flute was almost equally good. Nothing could be better than his performance of Thisbe in the play. Indeed all the "hard-handed artizans" were as well supported as could be desired. The cast of, what may be termed the serious portion of the Midsummer Night's Dream, if not so good as the comic, was meritorious. Mr. Henry Hughes played Theseus very cleverly, though inclining a little servilely to mimic a modern actor. He read the part with correct emphasis and nice enunciation. Mr. James Vining was good as Lysander, as was also Mr. C. Fisher as Demetrius. Of the ladies, our award of prior excellence must needs go to Mrs. Stirling, who performed the charming Hermia most charmingly, and left but little to be desired. If this lady would endeavour to eschew a certain familiarity of tone and manner that pervades all her serious performances, she would, if she succeeded, find herself considerably elevated in public estimation. Mrs. Stirling is one of our especial favourites, but still there is too much of the free and easy tone in her voice and manner, to make her all we could desire, or all she might be, in the higher walks of acting. Mrs. H. Hughes, who obtained a great reception, has apparently talent, but was a deal too lachrymose in Helena. She had a tear for nearly every word, and a piteous moan for every look. This style of acting is, to us, intolerable. Mrs. H. Hughes was dressed in a style that by no means commanded our admiration. Miss Winstanley, from the provinces, made her first appearance in Hippolyta. She has a fine person, and rather an expressive countenance. She seemed natural and easy, and delivered the little she had to speak—the chief portion of this character being omitted—with point and clearness. The mythological parts were very strongly cast. Miss Sara Flower was the Oberon, Miss Anne Romer, Titania, Miss Marshall, Puck, and the Misses Georgiana Smithson, E. Honner, and L. Marshall, principal Fairies. The music was selected from Mendelssohn, T. Cooke, C. Horn, and Edward Loder. Mendelssohn's overture was performed previous to the play. The vocal music, on the whole, did not go well. Some of the morceaux were insipid in the extreme; some only bad, some indifferent, and some good. An aria, by Miss Anne Romer, "Come, wait upon him," struck us as being the best vocal specimen of the piece. We did not hear it previously, but from the character of its melody, and its orchestral points, we ascribe it at once to Mr. Edward Loder. It is a pity that the manager, who must have expended a large sum in getting up the Midsummer Night's Dream, did not bring it out with all Mendelssohn's music. The music appended to the piece, at present, has very little claim on our interest, if we except the song alluded to above, and some petit morceaux of Mendelssohn, scattered throughout. The scenery was most excellent. One of the scenes, a lake beside a wood near Athens, was very beautiful, as is also Titania's bower, with the water-fall adjacent. The appointments and decorations were in keeping with the scenery, while the machinery and changes were managed with great effect. The double gauze curtain, let down while Puck was leading Lysander and Demetrius astray, gave a dreamy appearance to the scene that told well. Of the vocalists, we would select Miss Sara Flower and Miss Anne Romer as worthy of great commendation; nor can we conclude without a warm testimonial in praise of Miss Marshall's Puck. The house was very full, and the performance vehemently applauded throughout.

THE LYCEUM.—A new drama from the popular pen of Mr. Shirley Brooks, was on Thursday produced at this theatre. It was called The Creole, and was principally founded upon those prejudices of blood and colour which exercised such a striking influence over the local passions of the Mauritius at the time that island belonged to the French government. The play touched more upon the serious than has generally been the custom with the productions of this author. The plot was carefully and neatly constructed, and what farce was introduced was in good and subdued taste. Mrs. Keeley had an eccentric serious character, which she played as Mrs. Keeley alone can play, and was admirably supported by Keeley himself, Frank Matthews, Emery, Leigh Murray, and little Mary Keeley, who sang a charming song of Alexander Lee's, called "Waves of Gold in Music breaking," with great feeling. The scenery was beautiful and did that very clever artist, Phillips, and his coadjutors great credit. The piece, which was preceded by a pleasant overture by the composer of the song, met with deserved success.

PROVINCIAL.

MISS EMILY GRANT.—We are glad to see this young lady's debut at the Manchester Harmonic Society, in Haydn's "Seasons," performed on Wednesday last, at the Free Trade Hall, on the Society's last free dress concert of the season, to an audience of upwards of 2000 persons. She was most successful, and loud and enthusiastic was the encore which she unanimously received in the song "There was a Squire," though coming at the conclusion of the performances.—Sheffield Iris.

A NEW CHORAL SOCIETY has been organised out of the dispersed materials of the former Philharmonic (?) which, as most of our readers are aware, expired with the effort made to get out of debt by a grand performance last Summer, and from a want of harmony and unity of purpose among many of its professional members. The new society we believe, is established upon a different basis, and we hope will attain to more fortunate results. The members are to meet for practice every Thursday evening, and it is proposed to give four public concerts during the year, should there appear any disposition on the part of our resident gentry to encourage such a design. Mr. Packwood has undertaken the laborious and troublesome office of Honorary Secretary, and Mr. R. Butt that of leader.—The Cheltenham Looker-on.

MANCHESTER.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The eighth and last ordinary meeting of the Gentlemen's Glee Club, for its 16th season, was held on Thursday the 1st instant, when a very good selection of glees and chorusses, from the works of Atwood, Sir H. R. Bishop, T. Cooke, Clifton, Spohr, were performed by our resident vocalists; the club-room was not so full as usual, which may be attributed to the meeting occurring in Passion Week, and the unwonted severity of the weather, which was as bitter a night of snow and frost as any we had in the depth of winter. The Ladies night, or dress concert is fixed for Thursday the 22nd, for which Mrs. Sunderland is engaged.

FARNHAM.—The organ of the Church has been closed for several weeks, to admit of its undergoing thorough repair. New stops are added, and other improvements have taken place materially to the advantage of the instrument. Mr. Walker, of Francis Street, Tottenham Court Road, was employed as renovator. The Farnham organ now contains great organ stop, diapason, 2 open ditto, principal flute twelfth, fifteenth, sesquialtra, mixture and trumpet. In the swell double diapason, stop D, open ditto, principal, fifteenth sesquialtra, trumpet, and hautboy. In the choir, stop, diapason, open ditto, dulciana, principal fifteenth, cremona and flute, it has also 1½ octave pedal pipes, composition pedals, couplers, &c. and is now a very fine instrument. Mr. Thomas Baynham, the organist, re-opened the instrument on Sunday, when there was a very large congregation, who were greatly pleased and much surprised at the improvements. Mr. Thomas Baynham played some voluntaries in a masterly style, which tended in no small degree to exhibit the excellencies of the instrument.

EXETER.—(From a Correspondent.)—The Messrs. Smith, music sellers of this city, gave a grand concert on Monday evening at the Subscription Rooms, which brought together a large concourse of people. The principal attraction of the evening was Madame Bishop, whose coming was looked upon by the Exeter folk as a great treat. Our old friend, John Parry, was also engaged, and added no little to the interest of the evening's entertainment. The other singers were the Messrs. Callway, Avent, Carpenter, and Branscombe, all good men and true, and who only require their names to be more widely disseminated to be better known. Madame Bishop, on entering the orchestra, was most warmly applauded. She looked extremely well, and was most magnificently dressed, wearing a profusion of jewels, which, we understood, were presented to her by various continental Potentates. Madame Bishop's singing is highly dramatic. Her voice has a silvery quality, and is extremely clear. She executes passages with surprising facility, and is altogether a most highly finished artist. Her singing produced a great effect. She was encored three times. Madame Bishop's last performance of the evening was the grand scena from Tancredi, which she sang in costume, and delivered in such a manner as to call forth vehement cheering. John was of course encored in all he sung, and made the audience scream with laughter. He is a great favorite everywhere. On Tuesday the Ball, rendered memorable by the controversy between the Bishop of Exeter and the Mayor, was held in the Subscription Rooms, and was exceedingly well supported.

MEASHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—The annual concert at this village took place on Monday last, when the Messiah was performed by a band and chorus of about seventy musicians. Mr. Webb, of Aston, led, and Mr. H. Dennis, of Measham, conducted on the occasion, and both ably filled the difficult positions assigned them. The latter deserves especial notice for the firmness and excellent superintendence he displayed, which added much to the successful performance of the oratorio. The principal vocalists were Messrs. Gough and Pursall, of Birmingham, and Mr. Branstom and Miss Waldrom, of Leicester. Miss Waldrom had, consequently, to undertake the whole, and was deservedly applauded throughout by the audience. Mr. Gough's bass songs also met with a similar reception. He possesses a fine voice. In the alto song, "O thou that tellest," Mr. C. Smith, of Leicester, was unexpectedly called upon to sing, and acquitted himself very creditably. The choruses went off with great force and precision. The attendance was very good, every place being filled up where a view of the orchestra could be obtained. Every one appeared to be well satisfied, and the projectors deserve great praise for the excellent arrangements in every department.—Leicester Journal.

MISCELLANEOUS.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. D'ALMAINE.—Last week Mr. Mackinlay gave a dinner in Soho-square to a number of gentlemen connected with the musical profession, who had subscribed towards a testimonial which was presented on the occasion to Mr. D'Almaine, the eminent music publisher, on his retirement from business after a period of fifty years. The testimonial, which consisted of a very elegant candelabra, was presented by Sir George Smart, in a very neat address to Mr. D'Almaine, who acknowledged the honour and kindness conferred on him, in a very feeling manner. In returning thanks, after his health had been proposed, Sir Henry Bishop spoke in the warmest terms of Mr. D'Almaine's kindness to him from his earliest musical career; and he gave instances of the little acquaintance theatrical managers, in general, had with music; for his "Tramp Chorus," in the Knight of Snowden, the "Chough and Crow" in Guy Rammering, and "Mynheer Van Dunck" in the Law of Java, were cut out at the rehearsals; but on strong remonstrances being made, they were, at the eleventh hour, allowed to be sung. Need we add how universally popular these three fine compositions became. Professor Taylor, in proposing Mr. Mackinlay's health, paid him many compliments for his taste and talent, and wished him prosperity as the worthy nephew of a worthy uncle. In the course of the evening the following compositions, by Sir H. Bishop, were sung, accompanied by the composer, "Sleep, gentle lady," "Come, thou monarch of the vine," and "Mynheer Van Dunck," by Messrs. Barnby, Handel Gear, Parry, J. C. Addison, Milson, E. Taylor, and Machin; the latter sung a couple of songs extremely well, accompanied by George Kailmark, and the evening passed off most delightfully; and, to Mr. D'Almaine, it must have been highly gratifying to receive, at the hands of so many old friends and associates, such a memento of their respect and esteem.

MR. BRAHAM, Signor F. Lablache, Sterndale Bennett, Signor Emiliani, Miss Rainforth, the Misses Williams, Miss M. B. Hawes, and several vocalists will attend the festival of the Royal Society of Musicians, on the 19th inst., at which the gallant Lord Saltoun will preside.

ANCIENT CONCERTS.—We have heard that Madame Castellan, Madame Caradori, Miss Dolby, Gardoni, and Staudigl, will sing at the Ancient Concert, on the 21st inst., which will be under the direction of the Duke of Wellington.

It is more than probable that H. R. H. Prince Albert will be installed at Cambridge early in July; the commencement will begin on the 3rd, and the ode will be performed on the 6th, should the ceremony take place.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.—The first performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" is fixed for Friday next. The composer will direct the orchestra on the occasion.

MR. BUNN.—We are delighted to inform our readers that the enterprising manager of Drury Lane is still to govern the fortunes of the temple in Russell-street. Mr. Bunn continues the lease-ship of the theatre for a term, the length of which has not transpired. The longer the better.

MADemoiselle RACHEL.—After all the rumours industriously spread about the impossibility of the great French Tragedian coming to London this season, we are happy to state that such reports are entirely unfounded, and to announce that Madlle. Rachel will come to the St. James's theatre to fulfil her stipulated engagement with Mr. Mitchell.

MR. WILSON.—Has been giving his entertainments with his usual success in Scotland, since his return from Paris, and during the past week has been singing in Berwick, Newcastle, Sheffield, and Derby, on his way to London, where he is to commence his entertainments next Monday in his old quarters in the Music Hall, Store Street.

MRS. NISBETT will re-appear at the Haymarket Theatre 'on Monday next in Sheridan Knowles's comedy of the Love Chase.

HERR STAUDIGL has arrived in London.

MADemoiselle CERITO and M. St. LEON are hourly expected.

ADELPHI.—A new opera buffa, or local sketch called Jenny Lind, will be produced at this theatre on Monday next, in which Messrs. Wright, Paul Bedford, and Miss Woolgar will perform.

MADAME PLEYEL.—This celebrated pianist will arrive in England in the middle of the present month. She has been playing at the Court, and the Conservatoire, at Brussels, with her usual brilliant success.

MUSICAL CRITICISMS.—(From Punch.)—We attended on Monday evening last, one of those cheering reunions in Coventry-street which owe their existence to the energy of the celebrated virtuoso Blowaway, whose fame on the trombone is quite metropolitan. These meetings may be considered as now firmly established; and there is an indescribable charm about them, for they combine the graces of a fête champêtre with the most delicious banquet of harmony. The executants stand in a line, the audience forming a sort of social circle round them, so that there is none of the stiffness complained of in those great musical meetings at the Hanover Square, and other rooms hitherto confined to concert purposes. The programme of Monday was not merely promising, but it was positively luscious. It offered a rich treat to the scholar and the more dilettante, for this has been the happy medium always hit by Blowaway. The first piece was a Polka in A, B, C, from the Hop 82 of Jullien. Every note of this was deliciously rendered by the executants. Every virtuoso knows what an ophycleide is in the mouth of Brown, and on this occasion it was more remarkable than ever for breadth and largeness. Tunks on the triangle exhibited all the wonderful scholarship with which he invariably touches the tender instrument. We rather trembled for him in the magnificent scherzo, but he came out gloriously, and his fellow executants winked their approbation, in the true spirit of artists who are beyond all professional jealousy.

Blowaway's trombone passages were almost appalling from their intensity. He threw out his instrument to its fullest extent in the stupendous largo, until we fancied we were in the presence of some mighty magician, who was overwhelming us with some potent spell, which it was impossible to stand against. Rumble was a little uncertain on the drum, as if he were nervous at the outset in attacking such a work as Jullien's Hop 82; but he soon warmed up, and made the parchment tell gloriously in the tretta, though his drum-stuck became a little flat towards the end, from excess of energy. Tweedle took the piccolo in the absence of Bopham, whose neatness was much wanted in the gush of learning which opens the ninth bar, and continues till near the end of the morceau, when a perfect shower of semiquavers prepare us for the grand effect of six consecutive appoggiature, terminating in two triplets, ten arpeggios, and a bar of minims. Those only who know what Tweedle can do with the wood, when seconded by Blowaway on the brass, will be able to form a conception of this wondrous passage in the mouths of two such executants. The virtuoso were enraptured, when—Here we regret to say our criticism is brought to a close by the abrupt termination of the concert. A sudden movement in A, of the police, conducted by Sergeant Strapper, with his bâton in hand as chef d'attaque, dispersed the executants at once, to the great disappointment of the dilettanti, who were reluctantly compelled to separate.

MADAME BOURDIN has been appointed teacher of dancing to the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal. This lady was formerly instructress to her Majesty in this elegant accomplishment.

Mr. JOHN PARRY has been singing during the week, at Exeter, Salisbury, Wigan, and Manchester, and he is engaged to sing at Leicester, Liverpool, Bath and other places, next week.

Mr. JAMES M'CALLA died on Saturday last; he was a member of the Royal Society of Musicians, and has left five orphan children, whose mother died last year.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A letter addressed to Professor Walmisley, Trinity College, Cambridge, will be the best mode of ascertaining the regulations to be observed in regard to Musical degrees.

A SUBSCRIBER, (Lincoln).—A composer has a right to a song, published on his own account, for forty-two years; and should he die before that period expires, his family will have the same right up to that time, from its first publication. Persons purchasing books or music from authors or composers, possess the same right, provided they have been published since the recent new act respecting copyright.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Warren's 20 Guinea Cottage Piano-Fortes

ARE NOW SELLING AT THE
Manufactory, 71, Leadenhall Street

(Removed from 1 and 2, Liverpool Street, Bishopsgate Street.)

These Instruments are well manufactured of the best seasoned wood, FINE FULL TONE AND GOOD TOUCH. A two years warranty given with each instrument. ESTABLISHED TWENTY-ONE YEARS. The only house in London where a good sound instrument can be obtained at the above low price, (for cash only). SMALL PROFIT AND QUICK RETURNS!

JOHN WARREN, 71, Leadenhall St., opposite Aldgate Pump.

TO THE MUSIC PROFESSION.

"NASSAU STEAM PRESS,"

AND

PUBLISHING OFFICE,

60, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, CHARING CROSS.

Every description of CONCERT PRINTING, (Public or Private,) consisting of PROGRAMMES, NOTES, TICKETS, POSTING BILLS, MUSIC AND MUSICAL WORKS, &c., are neatly and expeditiously executed with economy and taste by

W. S. JOHNSON,

PRINTER TO HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE 21 YEARS!

Where also may be had "The Musical World," and all Operas, Comedies, Plays, Farces, Burlesques, and the whole of Webster's unique Acting Drama.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE

Is acknowledged as the best specific after three years' trial, for improving the voice and removing all affections of the throat, strongly recommended to clergymen, singers, actors, public speakers, and all persons subject to relaxed throats.

The Proprietors have just received the following Testimonial, amongst many others, from MADAME ANNA BISHOP:—

"DEAR SIR,—I am happy to say that all I have heard respecting the efficacy of DR. STOLBERG'S celebrated LOZENGE is perfectly true, as yesterday, feeling myself very fatigued (singing nightly at the Theatre), I took several of the Lozenges, and my voice was very clear, and my throat quite free from relaxation. I am, Dear Sir, Yours truly, ANNA BISHOP."

Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Churchyard; W. Edwards and Newbery and Sons, St. Paul's Churchyard; Sanger, and Dietrichsen and Hannay, Oxford-street; and retail by all respectable Chemists in the Kingdom.

COLLECTION OF MUSIC

Of the late PHILIP HURLOCK, Esq.

MESSRS. WINSTANLEY

WILL SELL BY AUCTION AT THE MART.

ON FRIDAY NEXT, the 16th instant,

By order of the Executors, the valuable Collection of Music, including the Works of Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Purcell, and La Frobe.

A fine assemblage of Glees and Madrigals; an excellent copy of Marcello's Psalms, &c. &c.; the whole neatly bound, and in perfect condition. The LIBRARY, WINE, and ENGRAVINGS will follow on the same day. To be viewed on Thursday preceding, and Catalogues had of Messrs. WINSTANLEY, Paternoster Row, and at the place of sale.

BEETHOVEN ROOMS,

76, HARLEY STREET.

This suite of Rooms have just been superbly decorated, arranged, ventilated, and adapted for chamber music and musical soirées of a high order, with an elegance and comfort not to be obtained in any other suite of rooms in London. They have been chosen during the last two seasons by the Beethoven Quartett Society, for the great advantage they possess over all concert rooms in London, in consequence of the music room being so situated that the noise of the street can in no way reach it, which has always been so great an objection in other places.

For terms apply to

M. JULLIEN, 214, REGENT STREET.

N.B.—These rooms having been arranged expressly for musical purposes, will only be let for soirées musicales, music classes, private soirées, lectures, &c., being unsuitable for soirées dansantes, or dancing academy.

TO AMATEURS AND PROFESSORS OF THE VIOLIN AND TENOR.

J. STEWART'S
REGISTERED VIOLIN AND TENOR HOLDER.

J. HART

Respectfully informs Amateurs and Professors of the Violin and Tenor, that he is now prepared to supply them with the above INSTRUMENT, which, for ease of application and efficiency, surpasses anything of the kind that has yet been offered to the public. J. H. is borne out in this assertion by the opinion of some of the first violinists of the country, who have acknowledged its superiority by adopting the same, conceiving it to be the grand desideratum to the above instruments.

JUST IMPORTED, A CASE OF

FINE ROMAN STRINGS,

Of which a fresh supply will be received every three months.

J. HART'S

Musical Instrument Warehouse, 14, Princes-street, Soho, Where may be seen a fine collection of Cremona and other Instruments, comprising Stradivarius, Guarnerius, Amati, and other celebrated makers.

MONS. VIEUXTEMPS

Has the honor to announce that he

WILL ARRIVE IN LONDON,

For the concert season, from St. Petersburg, on MONDAY, APRIL 19.

All letters addressed to him at M. JULLIEN'S, 214, Regent Street, will be attended to.

FAIR COMPLEXION.

Under the Patronage of the Nobility and Gentry.

TO THE LADIES.—Wonderful and Important Discovery.

COCKBURN'S

ORIENTAL BOTANICAL PREPARATION,

For removing almost instantaneously cutaneous eruptions, freckles, pimples, spots, and other discolorations of the skin. After one application of the Botanic Extract, which must be used twice a day, a wonderful change will be perceived, and in the course of a few days the complexion will assume a beautiful transparent roseate hue appearance. The extract to apply is of the most agreeable nature, and the first application will prove its wonderful efficacy. Prepared only, and sold wholesale and retail, by the sole proprietor,

GEORGE H. J. COCKBURN, 9, Aldgate, London;

And Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street, London; in bottles at 2s. 9d. and 4s. 6d. each; also by Sanger, 150, Oxford-street; Keating, St. Paul's Church Yard; Johnson, 66, Cornhill; Hannay and Co., 68, Oxford-street; Butler and Co., 4, Cheapside; Edwards, St. Paul's Churchyard; Frost, 230, Strand; and of all other Chemists and Perfumers in the Kingdom.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

The Nobility, Gentry, and Subscribers, are respectfully informed that Rossini's Grand Opera Series

SEMIRAMIDE,

Will be repeated this evening.

SEMIRAMIDE MADAME GRISI,

(Her third appearance this season).

ARSACE Mlle. ALBONI,

(Of the Theatre La Scala, Milan, and of the Imperial Theatre in Vienna, her third appearance in this country).

IDRENO SIGNOR LAVIA,

(Of the Theatre San Carlo, Naples, his third appearance in this country).

OROE SIGNOR TAGLIAFICO,

(Of the Italian Opera, Paris, his third appearance in this country); and

ASSUR SIGNOR TAMBURINI,

(His third appearance in this country these four years).

Composer, Director of the Music, and Conductor, M. COSTA.

To conclude with a new Ballet, in two Tableaux, entitled

L'ODALISQUE.

Composed by M. Albert. The Music by Signor Curmi.

PREMIERE TABLEAU—

Les Odalisques Pas de Deux Nouveau . . . MADLLE. DE MELISSE,

(Of the Imperial Theatre, Vienna).

MLLE. NEODOT, (of the Theatre Royal, Madrid).

Pas Seul Nouveau . . . MLLE. FLEURY,

SECOND TABLEAU—Grand Pas de Quatre des Esclaves Violes,—MESDILLES DELACHAUX, STEPHAN, DEMELISSE AND F. AURIOL.

Pas de Deux Nouveau . . M. A. MOBILE, AND MDLLE. BADERNA.

Pas Espagnol, La Servillano . . MDLLE. FLEURY.

Pas de Deux Nouveau . . M. GONTIE AND MDLLE. NEODOT.

Director of the Ballet, M. ALBERT.

Tickets, Stalls, and Boxes, for the night or season, to be obtained at the Box-office; and at Messrs. Cramer, Beale, and Co.'s, 201, Regent-street. The doors will be opened at half-past Seven o'clock, and the performance to commence at Eight.

HISTORICAL CONCERTS.

EXETER HALL.

THE CONCLUDING CONCERT

(Of a Series of Four)

Illustrative of the History of English Vocal Music,

Will be held at EXETER HALL,

ON MONDAY EVENING, APRIL 10th.

The Programme will consist of specimens of the music of Attwood, Bishop, Calcott, Crotch, Dibdin, Horsley, Russell, Stevens, Shield, Smith, Storace, and Webbe. Principal Vocal Performers:—Mrs. W. H. Weiss, Miss Dolby, Mr. Manvers, Mr. G. Clifford, Mr. W. H. Seguin, and Mr. J. A. Novello. The Chorus will consist of upwards of 500 members of Mr. Hullah's Upper Singing School, and the Orchestra of Mr. Wilby's Concert Band. Tickets—Area, 2s.;
Western Gallery, 3s. 6d.; Reserved Seats, 7s.—may be had of Mr. Parker, Publisher, 445, West Strand; and of the principal musicsellers.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

ON FRIDAY EVENINGS, April 10th and 23rd, 1847,

WILL BE PERFORMED

DR. MENDELSSOHN'S ORATORIO ELIJAH,

TO BE CONDUCTED BY THE COMPOSER.

Tickets 2s. each; Reserved Seats in the Gallery, 5s.; in the Area, 10s. 6d.
may be obtained of the principal Music Sellers; of Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing Cross; Mr. Rles, 102, Strand. THOMAS BREWER, Hon. Sec.

Persons desirous of becoming Subscribers prior to the above performances, are requested to apply at Exeter Hall, during the Rehearsal on Tuesday evening, between eight and ten o'clock.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

NOTICE.—It is expected that every Visitor will appear in Evening Dress; this regulation will be strictly enforced in all parts of the house, excepting the Second Amphitheatre and Gallery.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

THE Subscribers are respectfully informed, that the Opera of SEMIRAMIDE will be repeated this Evening.

On Tuesday, April 13th, will be performed the Opera of

LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR,

when Madame PERSIANI, Signor SALVI, & Signor RONCONI will make their debüt.

Signor MARIO will make his debüt on Saturday, April 17th, in the Opera of

I PURITANI,

in which Madame GRISI, Signor RONCONI, and Signor TAMBURINI will perform.

In rehearsal, Rossini's Opera of

L'ITALIANA IN ALGERI,

in which Signor ROVERE and Signor MARINI will make their debüt. and in which Madlle. ALBONI and Signor SALVI will also perform.—The debüt of Madlle.

STEFFANONI and Madame RONCONI will be forthwith arranged.

A new BALLET is in active preparation, in which Madlle. DUMILATRE will make her first appearance this season.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

The Nobility, Gentry, and Subscribers are respectfully informed, that on TUESDAY, APRIL 13th, will be performed the Opera of

LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR.

Principal Characters by

MADAME PERSIANI,

(Her first appearance these three years).

SIGNOR SALVI,

(Of the Theatre La Scala in Milan, and of the Imperial Theatres in Vienna and St. Petersburg, his first appearance on the Italian Stage in England.)

SIGNOR POLININI,

(Of the Imperial Theatre, Vienna, his first appearance in this Country.)

AND

SIGNOR RONCONI

Director of the Music, Composer, and Conductor . . . M. COSTA.

To conclude with the new Ballet of

L'ODALISQUE.

Composed by M. ALBERT. The Music by Signor CURMI.

Principal Characters by

Madlle. BADERNA, Madlle. FLEURY, and Madlle. NEODOT.

Mesdiles. DE MELISSE, DELACHAUX, STEPHAN, F. AURIOL, &c.

M. GONTIE, M. MABILLE, M. ALBERT, M. O'BRYAN.

Tickets, Stalls, and Boxes, for the night or season, to be obtained at the Box-Office, and at Messrs. Cramer, Beale, & Co., 201, Regent-street.

On Saturday, April 17th, will be performed the Opera of

I PURITANI.

The principal characters by Madame GRISI, Signor MARIO (his first appearance this season), Signor RONCONI, and Signor TAMBURINI.

WILSON'S SCOTTISH ENTERTAINMENTS.

MR. WILSON

will give his FIRST ENTERTAINMENT on the

SONGS OF SCOTLAND

for the season, at the MUSIC HALL, STORE STREET,

ON MONDAY EVENING, APRIL 12, AT 8 O'CLOCK,

when, besides several old favorites, he will sing, for the first time in London,
O Jeanie, there! to naething to fear ye—Go fetch to me a pint o' wine—The Irish Mother's Lament—Won't you leave us a lock of your hair?—The Stuarts of Appin, &c. Pianoforte Mr. Land. Private boxes for six, 15s.; for eight, 21s.

Mr. LOCKEY

Begs to inform his Friends and the Public, that he has Removed from

24, PRYCE STREET, to 40, King Street, Bloomsbury Square.

MR. BOCHSA

BEGS TO INFORM THE AMATEURS OF THE HARP THAT HE

Will Arrive in London

On the 10th of May. Applications to be made at Messrs. D'ALMAINE and Co.'s, 20, Soho Square.

BY ROYAL LETTERS PATENT.

THE NEW DIATONIC FLUTE

Can be procured only of the Patentee, at his Manufactory,

No. 3, BELL YARD, GRACECHURCH STREET.

This Instrument is fingered in the same manner as the old eight keyed Flute.
Its superiority of tone and correctness of tune are acknowledged by all who have adopted it.

In the Press—"THEORY OF THE PATENT DIATONIC FLUTE."
A. SIGGARD, B.A., Patentee.

THOMAS BAKER'S MODERN PIANOFORTE TUTOR.

M. JULLIEN

Has the honor to announce, that he has just published the above work, which he flatters himself will be found the desideratum so long sought after by the profession. Notwithstanding the improvements that have taken place in Pianoforte Playing within the last ten years, no deviation has been made in the system of teaching from Tutors of the Old School; in consequence, many gifted with brilliant talents have been unable to execute the music of the present day. For this reason the

MODERN PIANOFORTE TUTOR

Has been introduced, and met with the greatest success from the elite of the profession, who have universally adopted it. The work is divided into two parts: the first being a complete Tutor in itself, containing the

RUDIMENTS OF MUSIC,

Rules for the Formation of the Hand, Scales,

FINGER EXERCISES, &c.

Interspersed with Morceaux from the works of

Beethoven, Mozart, Spohr, Weber, Meyerbeer, Roch-Albert, Rossini, Bellini, Donizetti, &c.—Price 8s.

The second part consists of a more advanced course of Study, proceeding to the most refined style of Modern Playing;

Illustrated with numerous Examples & Exercises,

On all the various Fingerings adopted by the most eminent Pianists of the MODERN SCHOOL: with Selections from the Pianoforte Compositions of HERZ, DOHLER, THALBERG, &c.; in fact, everything necessary to constitute a first-rate Pianist. Price 8s. or 15s. the entire work.

Published by M. JULLIEN & Co.,

AT THE ROYAL MUSICAL CONSERVATORY,

214, REGENT STREET, AND 45, KING STREET,

Where all the Compositions of the above Author may be had.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847.

M. JULLIEN has the honor to announce that the sixth edition of his

MUSICAL ANNUAL FOR 1847

Is now Published, and will be found by far the best work of the kind that has ever appeared; containing no less than

Thirty Pieces of Vocal and Fourteen of Instrumental Music,

The greater part of which have never before been published, the copyrights having been purchased expressly for this work, at an immense cost, with the view of rendering it immeasurably superior to any of its predecessors.

The portion which has already appeared comprise those pieces only whose decided success has induced M. JULLIEN, at the request of numerous influential patrons, to include them in this Selection.

The Illustrations, in addition to the elaborately executed Covers, Title, and Dedication pages, include two magnificent Views of the interior of Covent Garden Theatre. The one taken during the brilliant scene exhibited in that splendid arena of the occasion of M. JULLIEN'S GRAND BAL MASQUE; the other a VIEW OF THE THEATRE TAKEN DURING THE CONCERTS, the grouping of the Figures in both Views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant. To those who have visited the Theatre on either occasion, the ALBUM will form a delightful SOUVENIR, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of the gorgeous scene.

A splendidly-coloured PORTRAIT of the celebrated Danseuse, Madlle. FLORA FABBRI, in the admired Pas, La Castigliani. An original subject, "THE FORTUNE TELLER," illustrating Baker's beautiful ballad of that name.

The whole of this department of the ALBUM has been under the active superintendence of J. BRANDARD, Esq., whose pencil only has been employed in its production.

Nothing more need be said in favour of this Work, and in proof of its vast superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the Contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe.

It will also be perceived that in addition to the latest compositions of the best English Composers, the ALBUM contains some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany, France, Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting the attention of the Continental dilettanti. Price 18s. and £1 1s.

ROYAL CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC,

214, REGENT-STREET, AND 45, KING-STREET.

SOVEREIGN Life Assurance Company,

No. 5, ST. JAMES'S STREET, LONDON.

Trustees.
Sir A. Brydges Henniker, Bart. B. Bond Cabbell, Esq., M.P.	Henry Pownall, Esq. Claude Edward Scott, Esq.
Directors.
CHAIRMAN, Lieutenant Colonel Lord Arthur Lennox.	Henry Broadwood, Esq., M.P.
DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN, T. C. Granger, Esq., M.P.	Sir James Carmichael, Bart.
John Ashburner, Esq., M.D.	Charles Farebrother, Esq., Alderman.
T. M. B. Batard, Esq.	William Tulloh Fraser, Esq.
Philip P. Blyth, Esq.	John Gardiner, Esq.
	Aaron Asher Goldsmid, Esq.
	Henry William Pownall, Esq.
Bankers, Sir Claude Scott, Bart., and Co.
Solicitors, Messrs. Davies, Son, and Campbell.

Assurances on the lives of persons in every station of life and every part of the world, granted on a plan which combines the utmost amount of benefit to the families of the assured at death, with every attainable advantage during life, which the system of Life Assurance is capable of affording.

It affords perfect security in a subscribed Capital, which guarantees the prompt settlement of every claim, with participating and non-participating rates on the lowest scale, especially for terms of years.

The Assured can anticipate or obtain the advance of the full amount of the Policy, on giving approved available security for a certain number of annual payments, as explained by the Prospectus.

Every facility is afforded to persons assuring the lives of others, so as to render such Policies effectual securities.

A new plan of gradual or accumulative Assurance, particularly adapted for young lives, and for such as cannot, without inconvenience, undertake the payment of a fixed premium, securing at once provision in case of premature death, and an accumulating fund, available during life, should occasion require.

ANNUITIES, ENDOWMENTS, ADVANCES, and LOANS, on liberal terms.

Detailed Prospectuses, with forms of Proposal, and every information, may be had on application, either personally or by letter, at the Company's Offices. The usual commission to Solicitors and Agents.

H. D. DAVENPORT, Secretary.

THE PATENT HARMONIUM.

This beautiful Instrument possesses the softness of the voice with the variety of tone of every wind Instrument, as also the power of a large Organ. It is equally suitable for Sacred Music, or the Dance, and adapted for the Drawing Room, Concert Room, Church or Chapel. Printed particulars can be had of LUFF and SON, sole agents, where the PATENT HARMONIUM can be heard from 10 till 4, daily; and where can be inspected.

LUFF & SON'S

Elegant Assortment of PIANOFORTES,

Made by experienced workmen, and thoroughly seasoned wood, all of which is prepared on the premises. They are warranted to stand well in Tune, and are prepared for extreme climates: prices one-third less than usually charged.

Instruments taken in exchange, and a liberal allowance to dealers.

LUFF and SON, 103, Great Russell Street, Bloomsbury.

N.B.—The terms of Mr. JULIAN ADAMS, the celebrated performer upon the Patent Harmonium, can be had of LUFF and SON.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, at the "Nassau Steam Press," by WILLIAM SPENCER JOHNSON, 60, St. Martin's Lane, in the parish of St. Martin's in the Fields, in the County of Middlesex; where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed post paid. To be had of G. Purkess, Dean Street, Soho; Strange, Paternoster Row; Wiseheart, Dublin; and all Booksellers.—Saturday, April 10th, 1847.

The Musical World.

(PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT NOON.)

A RECORD OF THE THEATRES, MUSIC, LITERATURE, FINE ARTS,
FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE, &c.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s. Stamped; 12s. Unstamped; to be forwarded by Money Order or Postage Stamps to the Publisher, W. S. Johnson, "Nassau Steam Press," 60, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross.

Annual Subscribers only (whose names are registered at the Office) are entitled to an Admission to the Concert, and a Piece of Music, (regular Music size) Monthly.

No. 16.—VOL. XXII.

SATURDAY, APRIL 17, 1847.

{PRICE THREEPENCE
STAMPED, FOURPENCE.

TO OUR READERS.

Annual Subscribers whose names are entered in the Books at our Office, and whose Subscriptions are paid in advance to Christmas next, are alone entitled to an Admission to the forthcoming Annual Concert.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

THE season 1847 will be memorable in the annals of music. Events of big importance, such as a century does not see twice, have happened to separate it from seasons past and future. First, the establishment of the Royal Italian Opera has broken the neck of a monopoly that has not been always wielded, and might not have always been wielded, with the discretion and enterprise that have signalized the conduct of Mr. Lumley, since he has influenced the destinies of Her Majesty's Theatre. Monopoly in a free country is a decided anomaly. Its death-blow in a popular department of public amusement must therefore be memorialized as a great fact and a sign of the times. We are progressing, and nothing can stand against the avalanche of free opinion which sweeps away old prejudices, and customs merely sanctified by age; in whatever form they may obstruct its path. Still the question remains unsolved, whether two establishments, on a vast scale, devoted to an amusement of secondary import in art, is not also an anomaly and a monopoly—a monopoly of Italian opera instead of a monopoly of the Italian Opera. We think it is, and are persuaded that it cannot last. One must fall, and that shortly. It remains for the rival directors to outwit each other. The strongest and best will endure. Not merely the strongest in opera, as our anti-Terpsichorean co-labourer, Desmond Ryan, has urged, but the strongest in ballet also; for ballet is, by tradition, inseparable from Italian Opera; and the inventions of Perrot, interpreted by Carlotta, are every inch as worthy consideration, appeal as strongly to the intellectual faculties, and tend as much to refine and civilize, as the inventions of Verdi, interpreted by Fracchini and Castellan. All the fine writing in the world cannot raise the modern Italian opera above the modern French ballet. Even the eloquence of the Morning Chronicle must fail to establish a distinction.

On Saturday Semiramide was repeated for the third time. There was nothing to particularise the performance but the indisposition of Signor Tamburini, who was suffering from a cold and hoarseness that incapacitated him from doing full justice to the vocal part of his labours. An apology was made for him, which the public received with great good humour, and no discontent was manifested about the omission of certain portions of the music, which, under the circumstances, was unavoidable. The loss, however, was compensated by the increased energy displayed in the acting of the great artist, which was never finer than on this occasion. The ballet of the Odalisque followed. Madlle. Fléury danced very gracefully, and was received with high favour. A new pas de deux, for M. Mabilie and the clever and intelligent Madlle. Marietta Baderna, considerably enhanced the choregraphic attractions of the evening. Little Marietta danced with the prettiest abandon conceivable, and was warmly applauded. She will in all probability become as popular at the Royal Italian Opera as she was at Drury Lane, under the enterprising Mr. Bunn, who introduced her to the English public.

On Tuesday a second batch of the company was exhibited in Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor. We have recently had occasion to speak of this opera, and need not therefore enlarge upon the subject now. Suffice it, though much of the music is passionate and tender, most of it in a certain degree dramatic, and all of it vocal, fluent and agreeable, it is by no means, as the Chronicle insists, the master-piece of Donizetti. The full exhibition of the Italian composer's powers is only to be traced in the instrumentation, which is effective and splendid throughout. But except in the finale to the second act, and the mad scene of Lucia, there is nothing that can be compared to the best portions of La Favorita, a more equally balanced work, and finished and complete in all respects. The air for Edgardo "Tu che a dio," in the last scene, is melodious and touching, but we must insist that it is of too trifling a character for the situation. The opera was thus cast on Tuesday:—Lucia, Mad. Persiani; Sir Edgar Ravenswood, Signor Salvi; Lord Henry Ashton, Signor Ronconi; Bide-the-Bent, Signor Polonini; Lord Arthur, Signor Lavia; Norman, Signor Tulli; and Alise, Signora Bellini. The reception of Mad. Persiani, who had not appeared in England for three years, was uproarious; it lasted several minutes; it seemed as if the whole of the vast audience that crowded boxes, pit, and gallery, had but one pair of hands, so simultaneous and unanimous was the beating together of palms. Little moved, the fair cantatrice gave her "Perche non ho," and the preceding recitative, as calmly as though she were not the cynosure of universal gaze, and the present object of universal interest. In this air, and throughout the opera, Mad. Persiani displayed those marvellous peculiarities, that have placed her at the head of the florid school, with all the perfection of the olden time. If anything, her voice has improved; it sounded fuller and clearer to our ears. Mad. Persiani's faults of intonation remain unmodified. It would appear that perfect tune were incompatible with such astonishing flights of execution: but as we never yet heard the equal of Mad. Persiani, as a mistress of exuberant vocalisation—her fancy and facility being seemingly inexhaustible—we are not able to decide this question. The misfortune is that while fully acknowledging her amazing talent the one defect will always prevent the fair vocalist from being as great a favorite with musicians as she is with the general public. In her acting Mad. Persiani appears to have gained in energy and expression. Her mad scene was very impressive and natural. During the opera she was recalled and encored several times.

Signor Ronconi is one of the greatest dramatic vocalists of the age. This has never been disputed. It is therefore the more to be lamented that the uncertainty of his physical resources so continually exposes himself and the public to disappointment. We are compelled to urge this, while awarding due acknowledgment to his very generous behaviour on Tuesday. Though suffering, as he was, severely, from influenza, induced by the change of climate, sooner than sacrifice, or risk, the interests of the establishment, he consented to sing, "in spite of his throat." An apology was offered for him, and his splendid acting made up for those defects in his vocalising, that were inevitable under the circumstances. Signor Ronconi was received with immense favour.

The great hit of the evening was, however, the Edgar of Signor Salvi. This gentleman will be remembered as having made a considerable impression, some years ago, at the Philharmonic concerts, and at Drury Lane theatre, in the last act of this very opera, of Lucia. But though we admired him then, we only admired him as an excellent second-rate artist. He is now decidedly a "first-rate," in every respect. His voice is a pure and legitimate tenor, possessing all the necessary range and flexibility. It is, besides, a voice of rich and oily quality. In style, Signor Salvi reminds us more of Rubini than any tenor who has followed in the steps of that great artist. Still he has peculiarities of his own that save him from the charge of being a servile imitator. The only absolute fault we can specify, is a tendency to over-refine and over-express, which occasionally manifests itself too strongly, but at the same time ensures the careful and studied accuracy of his general performance. His "maledizione," in the finale to the second act, was excellent—not a bit the worse for steering clear of extravagant gesture and boisterous declamation. His "Fra Poco" was perfection; but he should avoid saluting the public in such a situation of deep anguish and despair; it helps to destroy the illusion altogether. The "Tu che a Dio" was very passionate, but a trifle overdone—after the style of Moriani. However, Signor Salvi's success was decided, and his re-call at the fall of the curtain was a signal for redoubled cheering and applause.

The subordinate parts were carefully done, but Bide-the-Bent gave no opportunity to Signor Polonini (or at least none of which he availed himself) to display any other qualification than that of a very sonorous voice, which told well in the concerted music. The orchestra and chorus were admirable, but not quite so irreproachable as on the first and second nights of Semiramide. Signor Costa must not relax his discipline an inch. But we are not in the humour to find fault, where so much was deserving of unqualified praise.

On Thursday Lucia was repeated. Ronconi continuing unwell, Tamburini was announced for the part; but fate still adverse, Tamburini fell a victim also to the influenza, and a Signor Pietro Ley was substituted, whose voice being a basso profundo, did not so well suit the music as might have been desirable. He got through it respectably however. Persiani and Salvi were again received with enthusiasm, and the success of the latter was established beyond a question. The ballet performances remain the same. To-night we are to have Semiramide again. The Puritan is deferred; so that we must wait till Thursday to hear the accomplished Mario, who will, on that evening (an extra night, which will make the fairer portion of the subscribers pout with vexation) appear in an act of the Sonnambula, with Mad. Persiani. We cannot afford space for the names of dukes and earls; but we may say, in a line, that the influx of aristocracy has been remarkable. The new ballet for Dumilatre is in preparation, and Fanny Ellsler has arrived.

DR. BAKER.

THOUGH the fame of this deceased musician never reached our ears, we presume that he must have been famous from the encomium which has been forwarded to us by our worthy correspondent at Wolverhampton, who introduces the subject to us in the following epistle:—

To the Editor of the Musical World.

Sir,—Being called upon by some of the relatives of the late Doctor Baker to furnish them with a brief memoir of his life, I drew up the sketch which appears in this day's Staffordshire Advertiser, having obtained what information I could from those relatives. It has occurred to me that this sketch may prove interesting to some of your numerous readers; I have therefore forwarded it to you; if you think it worthy of insertion. I will shortly forward to you one of the Doctor's morceaux for the pianoforte, as perhaps you may like to engrave it to present to your subscribers. I remain, Sir, your obedient servant,
Wolverhampton, March 20th, 1847.

G. E. H.

Hereafter follows the memoir, which our industrious and admirable correspondent took the pains to draw up. We give it verbatim. The responsibility of what it sets forth, of course, rests on the shoulders of the writer, who is well able, we are sure, to bear the burden. We cannot undertake to carry it ourselves, since, as we have said above, the fame of Dr. Baker never reached our ears:—

THE LATE DOCTOR BAKER.—In our obituary of this week we have recorded the death of Dr. Baker, the celebrated composer and organist, which event took place at the residence of his son, at Rugeley, on the 19th of last month. Dr. Baker was formerly organist of St. Mary's, Stafford, and to many of our readers, the following brief memoir will, perhaps, prove acceptable. George Baker was born in the city of Exeter, about the year 1752-3. From his mother's sister he received his first instructions, by which he was enabled at the juvenile age of seven, to perform with precision on the harpsicord Handel's and Scarlatti's lessons. His first masters were Hugh Bond and the late celebrated Jackson (at that time organist of the Cathedral at Exeter), and for the violin, Ward; which combined instructions enabled him very soon to lead the concerts in that neighbourhood. The celebrated singer, Charles Inledon, was an articulated pupil of Jackson's at the same time with Baker. At the age of seventeen, he left Exeter for London, and was patronised by the late Earl of Uxbridge (father of the present Marquis of Anglesey), and ultimately received into that nobleman's house, as director of his private concerts. The earl likewise provided him with further instructions in his art; for the violin, he had Cramer (father of the present J. B. Cramer), and Dussek, for the pianoforte. These great advantages, combined with a great natural genius, raised him at once to the highest position as regards his art, and formed that correctness and elegance of taste and execution, which he never lost in his old age. He performed his celebrated "Storm" at the Hanover Rooms, before a great number of artists and nobility, and received high commendation from Dr. Burney, the great musical writer of the day. He was appointed organist to St. Mary's Church, Stafford, on the occasion of the purchase of a very fine instrument, built by Geib, in the year 1785. It was during his residence at Stafford, that he took his degree at Oxford. In the year 1799 he married Elizabeth, eldest daughter of the Rev. Edward Knight, of Milwich, in this county, by whom he had seven children, four sons and three daughters. About the year 1810, he was appointed to the situation of organist to All Saint's Church, Derby; and, lastly, he obtained the situation at Rugeley in 1824, which he retained up to the time of his death, although the duties were performed by a deputy from 1839. Dr. Baker was the composer of a great diversity of music, which has been already published, and a vast quantity which rests only in manuscript. Amongst his published works we must enumerate "six anthems for 4, 5, and 6 voices," "Voluntaries for the organ," "Glees for 3, 4, and 5 voices, dedicated to the Earl of Uxbridge," "The storm at sea," and the whole of the music performed at his concert at the Hanover-square Rooms, "The overture and songs of the Caffres, a musical entertainment performed at Covent Garden theatre;" to which may be added a great number of songs, duets, &c., (many of the songs there sung by Incedon) concertos and solos for the violin, and airs with variations for the pianoforte. Dr. Baker was a person of eccentric manners, and of improvident habits, or he might have become exceedingly wealthy, having enjoyed a popularity as a teacher of music rarely paralleled. In his person he was remarkably handsome, and of an exceeding fair complexion, of which he was not a little vain. He was of a generous disposition, though of a highly irritable temper. As regarded his brother artistes, he was truly liberal, and ready to acknowledge talent wherever he found it. Like Beethoven, he lost his hearing some years before his death, which deprived him of one of the great pleasures of life; for he was enthusiastically fond of his art, and devoted the greatest portion of his time to composition. Some few months before his death, he told the writer of this sketch, "that he had devoted his time to composition entirely; and was engaged then on an oratorio, to be entitled "Jerusalem." He died on the 19th of February, 1847, and was buried at Rugeley, where he had resided for the last 25 years of his life. The precise date of his birth cannot be ascertained, but he considered that he was born in 1750. He had ever enjoyed most excellent health, and died from natural decay of nature. "Non moritur cujus fama vivit." We are indebted to a professional acquaintance of the late Dr. Baker for the foregoing sketch of his life.

The comparison with Beethoven will, no doubt, hold good with those who have revelled in the beauties of the Doctor's compositions, a distinction we have not enjoyed ourselves. At the same time we entertain the fullest belief in the whole of the historical part of the above memoir.

ANTICIPATORY CRITICISMS ON THE DEBUT OF SIGNORA VIETTI AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE IN TWO MORNING PAPERS.

(From the "Morning Chronicle.")

"THE unprecedented and overwhelming success of Signora Alboni at the Royal Italian Opera, doubtless urged on the management of Her Majesty's Theatre to procure a singer in that line that would compete with the great contralto of the other house, and supply the last year's vacuum of the establishment in the Haymarket. Who that has ears, or musical understanding, can forget the part of Arsace in Semiramide being transposed last year to suit a mezzo-soprano; and who can forget the mess that was made with Rossini's score and the discrepant modulation that were obliged to be had recourse to, in order to befit the music to the voice not adapted to sing it? Her Majesty's Theatre had no contralto last year. It has one this year. Signora Vietti has been trumpeted loudly in the columns of a cotemporary, whose praises, by this time, have become the very lucus a non lucendo of criticism, as far as all the good it does to those whom it upholds is concerned. The new contralto of Her Majesty's Theatre met with a great reception last night. She received three distinct rounds of applause, before she sung a single note. Rather suggestive that. In appearance Signora Vietti has some claims to personal attractions, and though by no means good-looking, she will find admirers in a certain class. She is rather masculine in shape, and though lean is not entirely bony.* Her attitudes are angular, and far from graceful, and though she possesses some energy, it wants fire and regulation. Her passion too often degenerates to rant, and in her attempts to be forcible she is sometimes ridiculous. The organ of the new contralto is limited in range, and unequal in its register. She sometimes sings passages effectively, but this is rather by art than nature. Signora Vietti is no artist. Her voice is managed with but little skill, and she has no idea of sotto voce singing. As a vocalist she has no pretensions to compare with the great contraltos that have been heard in England from Pisaroni down to Alboni. The debut of Signora Vietti, if applause be the criterion of judgment, may be styled successful, but if truth be allowed to pronounce a verdict, we must say without the least hesitation, that the new singer is a decided failure."

(From the "Morning Post.")

"In the economy of criticism truth and justice are the pillars that uphold belief, and those who found their notions of art on conjecture will find themselves deeply wronged in their opinions. Tertullian has a saying that admirably hits off this didactic sentiment:—

"Ingeminans gliglag medias sputavit in uadas."— which exposes those who would subvert reality at the expense of fortuity? Actualities are the safety valves that regulate men's minds, and by facts only can truth be indicated. The line of Tasso in the Jerusalem Delivered expresses this with great force:—

"Come raccendo il gusto il mutare esche."

The advent of a great singer to the grandest temple dedicated to the operatic muse in Europe is an event in itself. So many minds are on the stretch of impatience waiting the first appearance—so much amount of aristocratic feeling expended in hopes and suspense—so many boxes taken—not a seat was to be had a week previously. The moment she appeared the audience rose en masse and cheered her for ten minutes. Before she sang a single note the great artist was visible. There are three grand requisites for a female singer in England. The first is face, the second figure, and the third is dramatic and vocal desiderata. Signora Vietti is remarkably handsome, her features expressing every conflict of the tenderest and most violent passion with singular brilliancy and illumination. The form is perfect. She has beautiful rounded shoulders, low and drooping, dispensing with that tubbiness which so completely disfigures a modern contralto. The walk is splendid, and a certain natural grace follows her in all her movements. We never saw a more oval forehead, or hair of a more dazzling jetty hue. The eye is peculiar—of an oriental shade, reminding one of a Hindoo mother watching over her sleeping child. The dress is picturesque, and displayed the exquisite and classical proportions of her form to considerable advantage. The voice is perfect, compassing with ease every note a contralto ought to sing. Rossini called her the contralto di troppo cotto in compliment to her energy. She not only sings from her mouth but the voice seems to come from all parts of her countenance, scintillating from her brow, beaming from her eyes, breathing from her nose, and melting from her lips. Since the time of Pisaroni, the first of all contraltis,* the present excepted, no contralto has been in England who could stand a chance in competition with Signora Vietti. The effect she produced last night was electrical, and could not be described. The recitative is wonderful, the sostenuto and rallentando passages being given with thrilling effect. The freshness of the voice is apparent in every note. Signora Vietti completed her twenty-third year the day before she arrived in London. The voice is even and oleaginous and capable of distending itself to the evolvment of any passion, either withering you by its grasp, or dissolving you by its pathos. She is also a great dramatic singer, and seizes on the impulse of the moment to throw all her energies into one grand coup. The effect of this is

* Were it not that our sombre cotemporary but seldom indulges in a brisk saying, we should feel inclined to think that this sentence involved a hidden pun, and that the writer meant that Signora Vietti was not Al-boni.

* The critic forgets Pisaroni had not the two first requisites of a great singer, viz., face and figure.

astonishing. She carried away the whole house in one scene, the applause being tremendous. On the whole this has been the greatest triumph ever witnessed within the walls of Her Majesty's Theatre."

GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.

CONCERT AT SWINDON.

On Friday afternoon last a special train left the Paddington terminus, with Charles Russell, Esq., M.P., some of the directors and officers of the company, and a numerous party of friends, for the Swindon Station; where, after viewing the stupendous works erected by the company for the construction of their locomotive engines, the party was entertained in the evening by a concert performed entirely by the workmen connected with the establishment, some of whom, to the number of 60 (being supplied with music and instruments by the company), have formed themselves into an Amateur Musical Society, and have already succeeded in producing a most creditable result. The concert commenced with Rossini's overture "Italiana in Algeri," which was followed by "The Great Western Railway Waltz," composed by Mr. Patterson, the band master, who is employed by the company as an engine-driver; this composition, which is very pretty, was followed by a varied selection of entertainments and vocal music, amongst which was Bishop's glee the "Chough and Crow" which, in point of correctness and "ensemble," we have rarely heard better performed. The orchestra consists mainly of wind instruments, upon which the performers have obtained a considerable proficiency. The songs were well accompanied on the pianoforte by a carpenter of the establishment. In the course of the evening an address was read to Mr. Russell from the society, thanking him and the company for their liberality in encouraging their musical efforts, which was responded to by that gentleman in a very effective speech. The directors and their friends returned to London by a special train at 10 o'clock, highly gratified by their entertainment. It is with especial pleasure that we refer to this performance as reflecting the greatest credit on the habits of these workmen who, after their laborious work, prefer rational enjoyment in the noble study of music to the enervating pleasures of the public-house, and also as conferring no less honour on the directors and chairman of the Great Western Railway, in having applied some of the resources at their command in the fostering and encouraging a plan that has already had, and must continue to have, such beneficial results to all parties concerned.—From a Correspondent.

MR. ELLA'S MUSICAL UNION.

At the meetings of the above named society, the programme of the performances is comprised in a small half sheet of letter-press, containing the names of the pieces and executants, accompanied by preparatory eulogistic criticisms of every thing that is to be done, with anecdotes of the private life of the director, and confessions of his doctrines on musical and other matters. The preparatory criticisms leave the reporter nothing to say. He cannot be so unpolite as to run counter to the opinions placed in his hands so courteously and so conveniently by Mr. Ella; and yet if he give further publicity to them in paraphrase, or abridgement, he stands in imminent danger of promulgating a quantity, of outré, and not very sound notions of art and artists, which Mr. Ella is alone in entertaining. In the "record" of the last meeting (a record of a performance before it takes place is somewhat anomalous), Mr Ella lets the reins of his fancy loose, and his Pegasus ambles gracefully along in the region of female influence upon art. Mr. Ella utters a number of very pretty things about the ladies, and concludes with according them an "instinct" of a "poetical temperament," (only an instinct, mind), which he declares to be an indispensable element of excellence in all arts." As we were considering the quid pro quo of this, and were on the point of muttering "Apropos des bottes," we glanced farther down the paper, and by the next paragraph were instructed that the encomium fœminæ was merely submitted by Mr. Ella as a proem to a diatribe against his brother musicians of England. Read the following—

"It is the absence of this divine gift," (the instinct of a poetical temperament) "among" (the absence among) "English musicians in general, that so often proves a barrier" (an absence proves a barrier) "to the success of their laudable attainments, whilst many a foreigner of far less mechanical knowledge," (far less than how much, or whose?) "more favourably organized, at once engages the sympathies and carries off the prize."

Music has been made a profession in England too frequently as a means of easy existence" (would that we could find it so), "without sufficient regard being paid to a favourable organization in the student."

In consenting to this, the question presents itself whether the director of the "Musical Union," in choosing the musical profession, paid regard to the favourability of his organization, or solely reckoned upon the easy life of which he speaks, and which few musicians (less gifted than himself) are enabled to find. The indefatigable critic of the Morning Chronicle has evidently a sort of reverence for the director of the "Musical Union," which verges on idolatry. Next to Signor Costa, Mr. Ella gets better notices in the Chronicle than any other favourably organized professor. The critic thus calls attention to Mr. Ella's remarks, (above cited), dignifying them with the name of "reflections":—

"We commend these reflections to the Young England professors, whose antipathies to foreign genius, and cacoethes carpendi are so offensively expressed in their abusive attacks upon that gifted individual, Costa, whose delicate perceptions of the beautiful and sublime in art, and untiring energies, have tended to elevate the musical character of this country, and given that local habitation and name to musical England, which it now enjoys among foreigners. The success of the Musical Union, by its admirable management, also commands respectful opinions; and our supposed want of musical taste is no longer the jesting topic of foreign musicians. Of the latter, were many remarkable persons" (remarkable persons of foreign musicians) "in the room yesterday, highly delighted." &c. &c.

We own the above to be a magnificent piece of writing, but we consent to none of the opinions it hides in its independent flow of words. Signor Costa and Mr. Ella have had, have, and will have as much influence on the musical character of this country as the critic of the Chronicle himself—and no more. How much that is we leave to the modesty of our wordy contemporary to decide.

CHURCH MUSIC.—We have much pleasure in announcing that, Mr. Surman, the enterprising and indefatigable conductor of the Harmonic Society, at Exeter Hall, has affected a long-wished-for alteration in the evening service at Trinity Church, Gray's Inn Road. In place of having the whole service performed as previously by boys, Mr. Surman, who conducts the choir at the requisition of Dr. Worthington, engaged some of our first vocalists, by whom all the verse parts are now delivered. The Misses Williams, Mr. T. Young, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. H. Phillips, sung on Sunday evening last, and it is hardly necessary to say, that the service went beautifully, much to the delight and surprise of the uninitiated auditors, who could not account for the wonderful improvement in the singers. Mr. Surman not only merits the thanks of the congregation, but has a strong claim on the gratitude of the whole parish for his efforts to introduce into the church, music and interpreters which will not by grotesque performances distract the thoughts from meditation.

THE AFFINITIES,

from the German of Göthe.

Continued from page 232.

PART II.—CHAPTER X.

CHARLOTTE on her side finds herself cheerful and well. She is delighted with the fine boy, whose promising form occupies every hour both her eye and her mind. By him she acquires a new relation to the world and to her possessions; her old activity is again brought into play; wherever she looks she sees much that has been done in the preceding year and in that she rejoices. Animated by her own feelings she goes up to the moss cottage with Ottilia and the child, and while she places the latter on the little table, as a domestic altar, and sees two places still vacant, she thinks of former times, and a new hope arises both for herself and Ottilia.

Perhaps young ladies look about modestly after this or that young man, silently examining whether they should like him for a husband, but those who have to provide for daughters, or female words, survey a wider circle. Thus was it at this moment with Charlotte, to whom an union of the captain and Ottilia did not seem impossible and, indeed, they had already sat side by side in this very hut. It was not unknown to her that the captain's former prospect of an advantageous marriage had again vanished.

Charlotte ascended higher, and Ottilia carried the child, the former abandoning herself to various reflections. There are shipwrecks even upon dry land, and it is good and praiseworthy to recover and reinstate one's self as speedily as possible. Life is, after all, only reckoned by profit and loss. Who does not form some plan and is then disturbed in it? How often does one strike into a path to be afterwards led out of it! How often are we turned aside from a goal upon which we have firmly fixed our eyes to attain a higher one! The traveller, to his extreme annoyance, breaks a wheel on his way and, by this unpleasant accident gains the most delightful acquaintances and connections, which have an influence on his whole life. Fate grants us our wishes, but in its own way, that it may be able to grant us something beyond our wishes.

Amid these and similar reflections, Charlotte reached the building on the heights, where she was perfectly confirmed in her feelings, for the prospect was much finer than one could have expected. All that offered little interruptions had been removed in every direction; all that was good in the landscape, all that nature and time had done for it stood out in its purity and struck the eye, while the young plantations, which were destined to fill up some gaps, and to form a pleasant connection between the divided parts, were already in leaf.

The house itself was almost habitable; the prospect especially from the upper rooms, was extremely varied. The longer one looked around the more beauty did one discover. What effects would be produced by the different seasons and the sun and moon! It was highly desirable to remain here, and how speedily was the wish to build and create revived in Charlotte when she found all the coarser work done to her hands. A joiner, an upholsterer, a painter, who could get on with paste-board, and some easy gilding were alone required, and in a short time the building was finished. Cellar and kitchen were soon arranged, since, being at such a distance from the castle, they were obliged to collect all necessities around them. Thus the ladies lived above with the child, and from this abode, as from a new central point, unexpected walks were opened. In a higher region they pleasantly enjoyed the free fresh air during the finest weather.

Ottilia's most frequent walk, sometimes alone, sometimes with the child, was down towards the plane trees, upon a commodious foot-path which led to the point where one of the boats was fastened, in which people were in the habit of crossing. She often amused herself by going upon the water but without the child, as Charlotte displayed some anxiety with respect to it. However, she did not fail to visit the gardener daily in the castle-garden, and kindly to participate in his care for the many young plants, all of which now enjoyed the open air.

In this beautiful season, the visit of an Englishman came very opportunely for Charlotte. He had made the acquaintance of Edward upon his travels, and was now curious to see the beautiful laying out of the grounds in commendation of which he had heard so much. He brought with him a letter of introduction from the count, and, at the same time, introduced a taciturn, but courteous man, as his companion. While, sometimes with Charlotte and Ottilia, sometimes with gardeners and hunters, often with his companion, and frequently alone he wandered about the spot, it might be seen, by his remarks, that he was a lover and connoisseur of such plans, and that he himself had carried many into execution. Although advanced in years he took a cheerful interest in everything that conduced to the adornment of life or made it important.

In his presence the ladies first perfectly enjoyed the beauties by which they were surrounded. Every effect made a completely fresh impression on his practised eye, and he took the more delight in what had been created, because he had not known the place before, and could scarcely distinguish what had been done by man from that which had been effected by nature.

We may well say that the park grew and enriched itself through his remarks. He knew, beforehand, what was promised by the new rising plants. Not a spot was left unobserved by him where a beauty could be produced or added. There he pointed out a spring, which, if purified, promised to be the ornament of a whole thicket, here a cave, which, if cleared out and widened, might afford a desirable resting-place, from which, if a few trees were felled, noble masses of rocks, heaped one upon another, might be seen. He congratulated the residents that much was still left for them to do, and besought them not to hurry but to reserve the pleasure of making and arranging for the following year.

In the hours not devoted to social intercourse, he was by no means troublesome, for he employed himself, during the greater part of the day, in seizing and copying, in a portable camera obscura, the picturesque views of the park, that he might gain from his travels a beautiful result for himself and others. He had done this for many years in all places of importance, and had thus formed a most agreeable and interesting collection. He showed the ladies a large portfolio, which he carried with him, and entertained them partly with the picture, partly with the explanation. They were delighted, thus, while in their solitude, to travel through the world so commodiously, and to see pass before them banks and harbours, mountains, lakes, and rivers; cities, castles, and many other places which have a name in history.

Each of the ladies felt an interest peculiar to herself. Charlotte's interest was of a more general nature, and was felt for that which was remarkable for some historical reason, while Ottilia especially paused at those places of which Edward had been accustomed to speak much, where he had readily stayed and whither he had often returned, for every man has, near and far, certain local peculiarities which attract him, and which, according to his character, on account of first impressions, certain circumstances or habits are especially dear and exciting to him.

Hence she asked the English lord what place pleased him best, and where he would fix his abode if he had to choose. He was able, in answer to the first question, to show her more than one beautiful spot, and to tell her pleasantly in French (which he pronounced in a manner peculiar to himself) what had befallen him there to endear it to him and render it valuable.

But to the question, where he now usually resided, and whither he must readily return, his answer was indeed quite unembarrassed but unexpected by the ladies.

"I have now accustomed myself to be at home everywhere, and find, at last, nothing more convenient than that others should build, plant, and manage domestic affairs for me. I do not wish myself back in my own possessions, partly from political causes, but chiefly because my son, for whom I have really done and arranged everything, to whom I hoped to give it, and with whom I hoped to enjoy it, takes no interest in anything, but has gone to India, that like many others he may employ his life there in a higher manner, or rather squander it away.

"Assuredly we make far too much preparatory expenditure for life. Instead of beginning at once, by finding ourselves happy in a moderate condition, we go on pursuing something on a larger scale, that we may make it more and more inconvenient. Who now enjoys my building, my park, my gardens? Neither I, nor even mine; strange guests, curious people, restless travellers.

"Even when our means are numerous, we are always only hal at home, especially in the country, where much to which we have been accustomed in the town is wanting. The book which we most ardently desire is not at hand, and that of which we stand most in need is sure to be forgotten. We are constantly making domestic arrangements, that we may go out again, and if we do not this from our own free will, relations, passions, accidents, necessity, and—what not besides—come into play."

The lord did not suspect how much his friends were affected by these observations. How often do all run this risk, who make a mere general observation, even in a party, with the relations of which they are otherwise acquainted. To Charlotte such a casual offence, even by well-meaning people, was nothing new; and moreover the world lay so plainly before her eyes, that she felt no particular pain, if any one thoughtlessly and inconsiderately compelled her to turn her glances towards some spot connected with painful associations. Otilia, on the other hand, who in half-conscious youth, rather surmised than saw, and was able, nay forced, to turn away her eyes from that which she would not and could not see—Otilia, by this familiar discourse, was placed in the most dreadful position; for the pleasant veil was forcibly torn from her, and it seemed to her, as if all that had hitherto been done for the house, garden, park, and the whole surrounding country, had really been in vain; because he to whom all belonged did not enjoy it, because he also, like the guest now present, was forced to wander about the world in the most perilous manner, by those who were dearest and nearest to him. She had accustomed herself to hear and be silent, but this time she sat in the most painful situation, which was rather increased than diminished by the stranger's further discourse, which he continued deliberately, and with a cheerful sort of oddity.

"I now believe," he said "that I am in the right way, for I always look upon myself as a traveller, who renounces much that he may enjoy much. I am accustomed to change, nay, it becomes necessary to me, just as in the opera people are always expecting a new scene, precisely because there have been so many already. I know what I can expect from the best and the worst inn. However good or bad it may be, I never find that to which I have been used, and in the end it comes to the same thing, whether we depend altogether from a natural habit, or from a contingency entirely of our own choice. At any rate, I am not annoyed by anything being lost or misplaced, by my every-day room becoming uninhabitable, because I must have it repaired, or by a favorite cup being broken, so that for a long time I cannot relish any other. I am exalted above all this, and if the house begins to burn over my head, my people leisurely pack everything up, and we go off to court-yard and town. And with all these advantages, when I make an accurate calculation, I have at the end of the year expended no more than it would have cost me at home."

During this description Otilia, could see only Edward. Now amid privations and hardships he was travelling on unbeaten roads, now he was lying in the open air amid danger and want, and in this uncertain and perilous condition was inuring himself to be homeless and friendless—to reject all that he might not lose all. Fortunately the party separated itself for some time. Otilia found an opportunity of weeping in solitude. No dull pain had affected her more forcibly than this clearness, which she strove to render still clearer, just as we are in the habit of torturing ourselves when once we are in the way to be tortured.

Edward's situation appeared to her so sad, so wretched, that she resolved—cost what it might—to do everything towards reconciling him with Charlotte, to conceal her pain and her love in some quiet place and to baffle them by some kind of activity.

In the meanwhile the lord's companion, a quiet intelligent man, had remarked the mistake in the conversation and had revealed to his friend the similarity of the situations. The lord knew nothing of the position of the family, but the other, whom, indeed, nothing interested on his travels more than the strange events which are brought about by natural and artificial relations, by the conflict of the legal and the unconstrained, of the understanding and reason, of passion and prejudice—the other before their arrival, and still more in the house itself, had made himself acquainted with all that had passed and was still going on.

The lord was sorry but not embarrassed at the circumstance. One must be altogether silent in society, if one would not often fall into dilemmas of the sort, for not only may important remarks, but the most trifling expressions, accord disharmoniously with the interests of the persons present. "We will set it right again this evening," said the lord, "and avoid all general conversation. Let the party hear some of the many pleasant and significant tales and anecdotes, with which, upon our travels, you have enriched your portfolio and your memory."

But even with the best intentions the visitors did not, on this occasion, succeed in pleasing their friends with a completely harmless conversation; for, after the lord's companion had excited attention and strained the sympathy to the utmost by a number of stories, strange, important, lively, touching, and terrific, he thought to conclude with an incident which was indeed strange, but of a softer character, and little thought how closely it applied to his hearers.

(To be continued.)

. To prevent misunderstanding, it may be stated that the copyright of this translation belongs solely to the translator.

SONNET.

No. XXX.

I dream'd, sweet love, thou wert about to leave me,
When through me shot a sense of deadly pain,
Which fastened with such sharpness on my brain,
I call'd on Death a quick relief to give me:
For when I found that thou, love, couldst't deceive me,
And that thy promises were all in vain,
What could the rest of life be, but a bane
That ever with dull agony would grieve me?
When I awoke, how did my heart rejoice
To find that such deep misery was o'er—
That life could, as it were, begin anew.
And then I heard once more that gentle voice;
And then I saw thee smile on me once more.—
Promise me, sweet, that dream shall ne'er be true.

JULLIEN IN DUBLIN.

(From "Freeman's Journal," Sat., April 10.)

On last evening, a scene of uproar occurred in the Music Hall, such as is seldom witnessed in a place of public amusement. On this occasion, as on the previous night, boxes, body of the house, and gallery were thronged to overflowing. The first part of the concert went off with great clat, but in the second part, at the conclusion of Herr Pischek's celebrated martial song—"The Standard Bearer," (which he executed with a sweetness, power, and finish that enraptured the audience)—the cries of "encore, encore," were uttered most enthusiastically. The audience would not desist—neither would M. Jullien comply. Herr Pischek appeared at the door, and were we to pronounce our judgment, he was willing to comply, but M. Jullien beckoning him back, would not permit it, and the storm that ensued baffles description. Hissing, yelling, stamping, striking sticks against the floor—in short, every species of opposition was brought to bear against Jullien who was still inexorable. He came to the front of the orchestra, and was heard to say "Herr Pischek is shyck," and turning round, added—"it is all Mr. Mackintosh's fault letting in a sixpenny mob." This, as might be expected, dreadfully exasperated the audience, and the following observation reached us:—"Sir, you treated us the same way last season—our national theatre is deserted to patronise you, and such conduct as you have manifested does you for ever in Dublin. On the front of the dress circle, side boxes, and gallery, were in prominent letters—"Jullien's benefit to-morrow." These were severed from their fastenings, and flung at Jullien. Upwards of half an hour was thus exhausted while a waltz, a solo on the harp, and the English quadrilles were played in dumb show. At the termination still more resolute dissatisfaction was apparent. Some members of the band at the back of the orchestra used expressions which we did not hear, but the effect was, that a couple of them were roughly handled. A scuffle in the gallery was so furious that it could not be suppressed. The police were set at defiance and could do nothing. A few stentorian organs were untiring; those who rejoiced in their possession, to avoid the possibility of arrest, leaped into the pit. We finish this hasty sketch of the scene, and regret we have to record that some were so rash and excited as to pelt oranges at the porter while removing the music and instruments from the orchestra. The custom of encoring may be inconvenient, but it is not un-Irish, un-English, or disobeyed on the Continent. We therefore think that M. Jullien was in fault. We cannot, however, acquit the audience. After the provocation by Jullien's refusal, and by his observations about "a sixpenny mob," indignation might have been expected; but it was carried too far when it degenerated into unmeasured violence, riotousness, and destruction of property. The breaking of music stands, benches, &c., was disgraceful in the extreme, and such, as we are sure, would never have taken place if the audience were not born away by the impulse of the moment.

(From "Freeman's Journal," Monday, April 12.)

The row in the Music Hall on Friday night—a brief narrative of which we gave in our Journal of Saturday—caused quite a sensation. Jullien's benefit, closing his short engagement, took place on Saturday evening, and attracted an immense audience. Some minutes before the usual time the performers assembled in the orchestra; their reception was of an unfavourable character. But, Jullien's own appearance was a signal for a unanimous outburst of indignation and demands on him to account for his outrageous insolence on Friday evening, in daring to call a respectable audience a "sixpenny mob" for the simple cause of insisting on a reasonable demand—the repetition of Herr Pischek's song of the "Standard Bearer." Neither his bows of submission nor the magic of his baton could procure silence, and he at length had recourse to words. He assured the audience solemnly "Herr Pischek" was really very shy, and could not undergo the fatigue of an encore. That for eight years he had been in the habit of visiting Dublin—and during that period he had always received the greatest kindness, for which he begged to express his gratitude, nothing awkward had ever occurred before; and his anxiety was, and would be, to please his Irish friends. He trusted this explanation would be satisfactory" (hisses and cheers). The concert then began with the overture to Der Frieschutz, which was well executed. A quadrille succeeded, and then Herr Pischek entered the orchestra. Much opposition was exhibited; he smiled, he bowed, he sang his song, and most promptly responded to an encore, substituting a Bohemian melody. This restored him to popular favour. At intervals a renewal of disapprobation was directed towards Jullien; but when the concluding piece in the concert, The Royal Irish Quadrille, commenced, the storm was tremendous, and we regret to add that in the fury of the moment a couple of eggs, and several oranges were pelted at Jullien. Some of the missiles took effect, one of the eggs hit Jullien on the forehead and splashed over his dress; he bore the punishment with great good humour—half the amount of self-command exhibited on the former evening would have carried him through with éclat—but his smiles produced no effect on his enraged assailants—the pelting continued, and after a bow M. Jullien deemed it both safe and prudent to withdraw. Each member of the band hastily followed; and the orchestra was taken possession of by a large concourse of persons who gave a loud huzza for "the sixpenny mob." We hardly remember to have witnessed such strange scenes as the proceedings of Friday and Saturday at the Music Hall gave rise to. M. Jullien seemed most desirous on Saturday to be restored to favour with the Dublin audience—but they were most obdurately resolved not to believe him sincere. The practical evidences of a desire to please given in the cheerful response to the encores (and everything was encored on Saturday) was as ineffective as M. Jullien's words. The language of Friday would not be forgotten; and in a desire to maintain their dignity the audience did not see when they had really conquered, but most unhesitatingly pressed on till they become the slaves of their own excitement, and put themselves as much in the wrong as Jullien. A numerous muster of the police was in attendance, whose conciliatory conduct was meritorious. They sought the parties who pelted the eggs and oranges, and captured some dozen or more "on suspicion." Three young gentlemen figure on the police charge sheet—one, a limb of the law—the second, a student of medicine—the third, a college—doubtless a divinity—student; and will, probably, have to appear before their worship, to account for belonging to the "sixpenny mob." Monsieur Jullien and his band, with Herr Pischek, took their departure for Liverpool yesterday morning.

MUSIC AT MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

JULLIEN'S SECOND CONCERT with Herr Pischek, on Tuesday evening last, was not near so successful as the one on Easter Monday, in spite of the additional attraction of the band of the first Royals, still we believe it was well attended.—The east winds and their usual concomitant, a severe cold, confined your correspondent at home, or, we should have dearly liked to have heard Pischek's rendering of Beethoven's 'Adelaide', although it was written for a tenor voice, and although we have heard it given by a beautiful tenor voice in a style as near perfection as possible, that of Signor Mario. The Musical World is read with no little interest now by your subscribers in Manchester, (as well as by all your provincial readers no doubt), the long and admirably written articles on the rival Italian Operas, and the just and impartial criticisms therein are eagerly looked for each week. By the light afforded in your elegant critiques, we may avoid running our heads against a Post on the one hand, or getting mystified by a Chronicle on the other. On reading your excellent article on the opening of the Royal Italian Opera, we could not help a longing lingering wish, that we could have been on the next bench in the pit to your D. R. and his collaborateurs of the press; however, time and space are something, in these days of rail-roads and express trains even, so we had to content ourselves with the vivid description of the scene presented on that memorable occasion in matters operatical, in your last number. The great topic amongst musical folks here is the coming concert of the Hargreave's Choral Society, on Tuesday next, when the great work of the greatest living composer, the 'Elijah' of Mendelssohn, is to be performed, conducted by himself. Tickets are at a premium, that is, they would be if they were to be bought at all, but they are only issued to the subscribers, who are literally besieged with applicants for them. The rehearsals are progressing most satisfactorily, and the chorusses are spoken of in the highest terms by the privileged few who have heard them, as being of extreme beauty, and striking originality yet, in admirable keeping with the sacred character of the subject. Mendelssohn, not content with the complete success of the work, at its first and only production at the last Birmingham festival when no less than seven pieces were encored, has since been striving if possible to render it more and more perfect, so that it would at its second performance to-morrow night at Exeter Hall, no doubt be pronounced faultless. I will render you as usual a faithful account of its production here next week. It is quite expected that the successful performance of 'Elijah,' will do more to raise the character of the Hargreave's Choral Society, than any work it has yet attempted, and it already ranks first of choral societies out of the Metropolis.

Macready attracted a brilliant and crowded audience to our Theatre Royal on Saturday last, who warmly greeted his first appearance for some years in Manchester, on a stage worthy his great talents. Macbeth was the character, delineated in such a manner as it could not be by any tragedian now on the boards, the audience manifested their deep appreciation of his effort by the most breathless and rivetted attention to his acting, and by their hearty applause. This week he is at Liverpool, until Saturday the 17th when he appears in Richelleu, and comes again for five nights on Monday, the 20th instant.

The Madrigalians hold their annual concert or Ladies' night, at the Town Hall, here this evening, but we shall not be well enough to attend.

Manchester, April 15th, 1847.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

HAYMARKET.—We have seldom witnessed a scene of greater excitement and enthusiasm, than we did on Monday evening, on the occasion of Mrs. Nisbett's return to the stage, after an interval of some years. The high degree of favour in which this most charming actress stood with the public, was not the only cause that gave intense interest to her re-appearance; the misfortunes that followed her into domestic retirement, when she left the stage, and ultimately forced her again to have recourse to the old profession, threw a halo around her that awakened sympathy and respect in no ordinary degree. The reception of Mrs. Nisbett, on Monday night, was one of the heartiest and most vehement that could possibly be imagined. The applause must have endured for full three minutes. The moment she appeared, nay before she appeared, for her merry, ringing laugh was heard just before her entrance, the audience recognising it as well as her countenance, the universal peal broke forth, "louder than the loud ocean," and the "house rose at her," as Kean said of himself on one occasion, substituting "me" for "her," and hats waved, and handkerchiefs floated wide, looking like the foam of the tumultuous sea, and hands, and voices, and sticks, and feet, and umbrellas, all were amalgamated into a roaring concert, more energetic than agreeable. Mrs. Nisbett meanwhile responded graciously to these manifestations of favouritism, and curtsied, and bent her head, and placed her hand on her heart, and went through the usual ceremony expected at the hand of those on whom the public condescend to bestow their approval. Mrs. Nisbett we are inclined to think, looked better on Monday night, than we ever saw her. Her countenance, albeit sorrow's clouds have been dimming it of late, is still lovely, arch, and expressive. Her figure appears to us to have grown somewhat fuller than when we saw her last, and this by no means disimproves her. But how shall we find words to do full justice to her acting? It is impossible to speak of it calmly—"it forestalls criticism." We shall, nevertheless, endeavour to keep within bounds, and if we cannot, we are sure our readers will forgive us this once, seeing the great temptation that wins us from the journalist's required frigidity—vide—(lucet e non lucendo) the Morning Post and the Chronicle. The play selected for Mrs. Nisbett's re-appearance was Sheridan Knowles's Love Chase, to bring out the actress in her original character, Constance. The choice could not be better, as the part of Constance is greatly interesting, and exhibits to perfection the versatile powers of the artist. The comedy of The Love Chase, is perhaps the best drama written in our own immediate times. The female characters are drawn with great vigour and discrimination. The character of Constance is entirely new, nor do we remember any part in the drama which might be adduced as conveying a resemblance. Lydia is a beautiful picture, but may be found in numerous novels and sundry plays. The part, however, is written with taste and feeling, and acts as a powerful ingredient in the interest of the piece. We object altogether to that restricted morale, to which Mr. Sheridan Knowles invariably pays deferential homage in his dramatic works, which would seem to confine gentle blood and worth to a particular class, make Love himself an aristocrat, and render hearts incompatible in affection unsanctioned by equality of rank and birth. Our readers will call to mind the incident in the Love Chase, where Lydia, a poor dependent, is beloved by Master Waller, a scion of blood, who seeks at first her heart by dishonourable means, and being spurned by her with indignation, and discovering her superior worth, offers her his hand. Here is a beautiful incident, conveying an exquisite and pointed moral. But, says Mr. Sheridan Knowles, it will violate the aristocratic decencies of the drama to permit a nobleman to marry a serving-woman—and what will the boxes say, and the ladies who will purchase my play at five shillings. Presto, says Sheridan Knowles, and straight the serving-woman, Lydia, turns up as noble as the young nobleman, and the boxes are pleased, and the ladies like-wise who purchase the play at five shillings, and the author fancies himself a dramatic magician. Now is not this morality something akin to that which induced Nahum Tate, and Colley Cibber, to resuscitate King Lear—by the way we shall not finish the parallel, for, on second thoughts, we can perceive no analogy at all between the two cases. Well—let that pass. The character of the Widow Green is well drawn, but it owes all its colouring to Congreve. Lady Wishfort in the Way of the World furnishes the type of the wooing widow in the Love Chase. The comic portions of this play are superior to the author's previous or subsequent attempts in that line. They abound in point and touches of humour, and occasionally exhibit the liveliest sallies of wit. But we must return to Constance, whom, some lines above we delivered to the vociferations of the spectators. We never had a briefer, or easier task to accomplish than that of criticising Mrs. Nisbett's performance of Constance in Sheridan Knowles's play, or comedy of The Love Chase; and to show the estimation in which we hold our criticism, brief though it will be, we shall print it in capitals. Here it is. Read and believe. MRS. NISBETT'S PERFORMANCE OF CONSTANCE FROM BEGINNING TO END WAS ABSOLUTE PERFECTION. Another critical word after that would injure our notice. Mrs. Nisbett was cheered tumultuously after the first scene—was called for after the first act, but did not come—was cheered in every part of her performance; and at the end when she did come on, obtained an ovation equal to that consequent on her entree. A greater amount of excitement we never knew pervade a theatre before. It seemed the unanimous opinion of all present that Mrs. Nisbett never acted Constance with more exquisite grace, ease, point, and finish. In some instances it was even held that the performance was superior to any former effort of the actress; to which latter opinion we should unhesitatingly offer our assent, did we not preclude ourselves by what we said above, from all further remarks of our own. Mrs. Glover's Widow Green is a consummate piece of acting. We need hardly say it was applauded tumultuously. The last scene is one of the greatest efforts of this great artist's, and must live in the memory of all who have seen it. Mrs. Edwin Yarnold played Lydia with much grace and feeling, indeed nothing could be better in its way, the part was conceived and evolved in the true artistic spirit. Mr. Stuart was excellent in the small, but pertinent part of Truworth, and Mr. Webster was admirable as Wildrake. This is one of Mr. Webster's best characters. He was extremely effective in all his scenes with Constance. Mr. Tilbury was better than usual in Sir William Fondlove. The return of Mrs. Nisbett to the stage will form in future dramatic annals one of the great events of the present century.

FRENCH PLAYS.—A continuous succession of novelties and new actors distinguishes this theatre from all our metropolitan places of amusement. The system seems to be never to allow the frequenters of the St. James's to grow tired of any actor or actress, and whether good, indifferent, or bad, (and thanks to the excellence of the management we have but little, very little of the second and none of the last), stars disappear and charming faces are removed when we love them most and fresh ones are brought forward which gradually efface the regret due to their predecessors, until they, in their turn, give way to a fresh arrival. Since our last we have to record the débüt of Mademoiselle Duverger, of the Palais Royal, in L'Image, a most clever and amusing trifle, brought out last year at the Princess's, and in which Madame Vestris played the heroine, now impersonated by the new actress at the St. James's. The title of the English version, if we remember rightly, was 'A Speaking Likeness.' Mademoiselle Duverger was eminently successful in her representation of the young lady disguised as a country girl, and without laying aside aught of her own native elegance and grace, she completely identified herself with the simplicity and rusticity of the part she had undertaken to play, and entirely won us over by some natural touches of feeling and by her easy, unassuming manners. We have also had Un Roman Intime, ou, Les Lettres d'un Mari, played for the first time in this country, in which Mademoiselle Rose Chéri and M. Rhozevil played together. It is in one act and consists of a few scenes between a young married couple, the wife of a somewhat flighty and romantic turn, the husband much attached to his wife, but of a more positive character, who aware of his wife's foible endeavours to work a reform by writing several romantic love-letters purporting to come from an anonymous admirer. This expedient produces several mystifications and is followed by the desired effect. We were pleased with both the actress and actor but confess they both have talents which merit a better field in which to display them. On Monday Her Majesty the Queen and the Prince Albert visited the theatre and Clarisse Harlowe was postponed to give way to Un Changement de Main and La Protégée sans le Savoir, noticed in our last. Genevieve, ou la Jalousie Paternelle, is more sentimental than interesting, and turns entirely upon the love of a father for his daughter, so excessive that he fears every man who shows any pretensions to her hand. This leads to a variety of plotting on his part to counteract the pretensions of her lovers and more particularly a certain colonel to whom she shows a certain amount of affection, and in proposing in his room a creature of his own, Adrien, his first clerk. Everything succeeds according to his wish, and the marriage takes place. In this piece there is but little room for any great display of feeling but Mademoiselle Rose Chéri made the best of the part and earned applause by her quiet and interesting demeanour. Cartigny was excellent as the father.

CONCERTS.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—The third concert took place on Monday night, in the Hanover-square Rooms. The attendance was very full, and the old form of programme was restored on this occasion, to the great satisfaction of the majority of the audience. The selection was as follows:—

PART I.

Sinfonia in D, Op. 88 (never performed at these concert)	Mozart
Duetto, "Dove vai," Mr. Manvers, and Signor F. Lablache, (Guillaume Tell)	Rossini.
Concerto, F minor, Op. 19, Pianoforte, Mr. W. S. Bennett	Bennett.
Terzetto, "Tremate," Madam Caradori Allan, Mr. Manvers, and Signor F. Lablache	Beethoven.
Overture, Preciosa	C. M. von Weber.

PART II.

Sinfonia in C minor	Beethoven.
Recit. "Plaisirs du rang suprême"
Air "Celui que j'aimais" (La Muette de Portici), Mad. Caradori Allan	Auber.
Concertante, in A, Op. 48, two violins, Mr. Blagrove, and Mr. Willy	Spohr.
Overture, Lodoiska	Cherubini.

Conductor, Mr. Costa.

Mozart's symphony bears all the evidence of having been an early work of the composer. The Op. 88 merely refers to the order of its publication, which occurred subsequent to the death of the author. It was, nevertheless, new to the subscribers—a fact which is by no means creditable to the policy pursued by the various mis-directors, who have, from time to time, been elected to sway the destinies of the society. The score is by no means a rarity, being printed in the same form as the six great symphonies which are acknowledged out of the thirty-three that the composer produced. The symphony is in three movements, without a scherzo. It was most probably written for some small band in one of the obscurer German towns, and was very probably produced in a hurry by Mozart to satisfy the exigencies of life. The first movement, allegro assai, in D, is very simple; but there is a great charm in the transparent clearness with which it is instrumented. The first part is very long; the second part very short; the coda animated and effective. The subjects are pleasing, but not striking. The andante in F is very short and unaffected, presenting few characteristics that call for special observation. The finale is the most elaborate movement of the three, and is further interesting from the fact, that two passages—one from the trio in the second act of the composer's Don Juan, the other from the splendid cantata "Resta o Cora," are contained in it. The symphony was well played throughout. The finale was encored, but Signor Costa declined repeating it. The andante was not encored, but Signor Costa repeated it, we presume for his own amusement and the exercise of the band. We remarked, however, in the performance of the slow movement, the absurd exaggerations of the rinforzando, of which we have frequently complained, and which is one of the crying defects of Signor Costa's conducting. The duet "Dove vai," one of the finest things in Guillaume Tell, was spoiled by being transposed from E to E flat; but was otherwise well given by the vocalists. Why do our orchestras persist in sharpening the pitch to such an unwarranted extent? A piece written by Handel in E, is now in F at least, and must consequently lose its character; not to mention the diminution of the brilliancy resulting from the extreme tension of the strings. Sterndale Bennett's fourth concerto is, perhaps, his best. Few better have been written for the instrument. It is full of genius, and finished with elaborate perfection. It was altogether a great treat, and the author performed it in that masterly and impressive style that has long placed him in the first rank of modern pianists. The applause was enthusiastic throughout. The light, catching overture to Preciosa was well played. The C minor of Beethoven, which has been terribly hacknied at these concerts, was the least satisfactory performance of the evening. There were many errors in the times of the movements, many exaggerations of expression, and not a few blunders on the part of the principal wind instruments. With all the infallibility that some critics attempts to fasten upon Signor Costa, we have heard this great symphony much better performed, not only at the Philharmonic, but elsewhere. Messrs. Blagrove and Willy played Spohr's concertante, a clever, but dry composition, capitally, and the overture to Lodoiska, one of the best of Cherubini's second-rates, was excellently rendered. Of the rest of the vocal music we have little more to say. The trio by Beethoven was rendered ineffective by the boisterous loudness of the accompaniments: and the air from Auber's La Muette had much better have been omitted, since it neither suited the singer nor the locale; out of a theatre it loses nearly all its charm. By the way, is there no such thing to be obtained as a contra fagotto? The ophicleide, which was substituted, half ruined the finale of the C minor, and was a positive nuisance. The audience commenced taking their departure at the beginning of Spohr's concertante, and continued annoying and inconveniencing those who were desirous of hearing what remained to be performed, until the whole was over. Some remedy might surely be found for these rude and barbarous demonstrations of egotism, which of late have become too frequent.

THE MUSICAL UNION.—Mr. Ella's second meeting was honored by a more numerous attendance of nobility and fashion than his first. There were also many artists and amateurs of note present. There was nothing very new in the selection, as the following will show:—

Quintet in D, No. 5, two violins, viola, and two violoncellos	Onslow.
Trio in E. flat Op. 70, pianoforte, violin, and violoncello	Beethoven.
Quartet in D, No. 10, two violins, viola, and violoncello	Mozart.
Executants. First Violin, Mr. Deloffre. Second Violin, Mr. Goffrie. Tenor, Mr. Hill. Violoncello, Signor Piatti. Viola, Mr. Pilet. Pianoforte, Mr. Lindsay.	Oper.

The quintet of Onslow, a very ingenious and equally uninteresting composition, was well played on the whole, but produced no great impression. The point of interest was Piatti's beautiful delivery of a cantando phrase in the slow movement, and this was well entitled to the applause it received. The trio of Beethoven is a composition of such originality and intricacy as demands absolutely three first rate players to do it justice. Mr. Lindsay Sloper is a first-rate pianist, and played his share of the trio as finely as the most fastidious connoisseur could have desired. Nothing could be more charming and unaffected than his expression, and nothing more brilliant, certain and polished than his execution. But we cannot award equal praise to his coadjutors, who, in tone, decision, style and mechanism, are somewhat in the rear of what is desirable for a composition of such elaboration, variety and energy. They are good artists, nevertheless, and it is always a pleasure to us when we can conscientiously award them that praise which justice compels us at least to qualify on this occasion. The quartet of Mozart was a performance of average quality. With such an excellent second violin as Goffrie, and such a perfect tenor as Hill, there was not likely to be much fault to find; but there seemed to us a want of that grandeur of style and irreproachable execution which the lavish encomiums bestowed by Mr. Ella (beforehand) in his "Record," would have led us to expect, had we been simple amateurs, like our excellent friend of The Chronicle, ready to swallow, without wincing, the tremendous doses of eulogy which the director of the Musical Union administers through the medium of that sheet. We have elsewhere discussed what we take the liberty to think a demonstration of equivocal taste on the part of that worthy and enterprising gentleman, and so shall drop the subject here. On the whole the performance gave pleasure. One of its greatest recommendations was its brevity.

THE GREENWICH AND BLACKHEATH AMATEUR MUSICAL SOCIETY gave their third concert in the Railway Station Room, on Friday evening, the 9th inst, providing a capital band, an admirable selection of music, and excellent interpreters. Miss Dolby and Mr. Kench were the vocalists; Mr. Benedict performed on the piano, and M. Barret on the oboe. Mr. Dando acted as leader, and Mr. Benedict conducted all the vocal music. The instrumental performances comprised three overtures, "Der Freyschutz," "Semiramide," and "Zampa," and the C minor (No. 5) symphony of Beethoven. Miss Dolby sung three songs, and Mr. Kench four; but the lady, notwithstanding, sang oftener than the gentleman, she was encored twice. The performance gave very great satisfaction. We trust this society will succeed in its endeavours to disseminate music of the best kind among the intermediate classes. By providing such entertainments as the one we have just noticed, worthy of commendation in every respect, they must progress; and we shall lend them all the assistance in our power to further the interests of their society.

WILSON'S SCOTTISH ENTERTAINMENTS—Mr. Wilson commenced a new series of his vocal illustrations of Scottish manners and character on Monday evening, in the Music Hall, Store-street. The entertainments comprised several new features, among which we may name two Irish songs, one of great pathos, and the other of great humour. Nearly every song in the first part was encored. Burns's exquisite lyric, "Go fetch to me a pint o' wine," was given with immense effect by Mr. Wilson. It was impossible to render it with more feeling and expression. The singer was most deservedly encored twice. We were much pleased with the humorous old song, "My Joe Janet," in the form of a dialogue, which was sung by Mr. Wilson with great point and vivacity. Several old friends, not the less welcome for being old, were also given during the performance, and the entertainment finished with "Green grow the rushes, O." Mr. Land attended at the pianoforte.

Mr. A. SEDGWICK, the performer on the concertina, gave a concert, in conjunction with the Apollonic Society, at the Institution, John Street, Fitzroy Square, on Monday evening, the 12th instant, when he was ably assisted by Misses Cubitt, Ellen Lyon, Sara Flower, Mrs. Ellis, Messrs. Allen, Sporie, Giubelei, Shoubridge, Robinson, G. and H. Buckland, Julian, Reach, &c. The instrumentalists being Messrs. Frederick Chatterton, Zerbini, Wells, Davies, Stæssel, and Sedgwick, on the harp, violin, flute, cornet, xylorcordeon, and concertina, all of whom acquitted themselves in their best manner. The great fault was the immense length of the programme, which the enthusiasm of a crowded audience much increased by their anxiety to encore their especial favorites. Miss Ellen Lyon, who is fast rising in public estimation, gained a most deserved and hearty encore in "Even as the sun," with concertina accompaniment obligato, by Mr. Beneficiario, who received a similar compliment in his solo on Paganini's "Witches' Dance," which he answered, according to the present fashion, by substituting the serenade from "Don Pasquale." The other encores were Miss Sara Flower, Mr. Sporie, Mr. Allen, Mr. J. Kench, Herr Stæssel, and, lastly, Mr. George Buckland, in John Parry's song of "Matrimony," who responded to it by singing "Jack and the Beanstalk," a very clever song of his own arrangement. Mr. A. Sedgwick presided at the piano-forte.—From a Correspondent.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

ON Saturday this establishment re-opened its doors to the public, after a fortnight's holiday. But, though the doors were closed during Passion week and its Easter successor, there was no cessation from labour within the walls of the theatre, as the result will show.

ON Saturday we were exulting in the expectation of the pleasure we were going to derive from Donizetti's comic masterpiece, L'Elisir D'Amore, with Gardoni's Nemorino and Lablache's Dulcamara; but, alas! we were doomed to disappointment, the great Lablache was hoarse and the Elisir could not be played. In its place was substituted I Due Foscari, an opera by Verdi, which had never been performed. Thought we, as we wended our way to the theatre, gloomy with anticipations of Verdi—"Surely there will be an intolerable mess—the Foscari can never be in a fit state for public performance—twenty-four hours is not enough to paint the scenes, make the dresses, rehearse the music, and teach the principals—the band and chorus will be sadly at variance—Balfé will be in a rage and throw his baton at some unlucky chorister, or some miserable trumpeter, who shall come in a bar too soon or late—there will be confusion worse confounded." But we were out in our reckoning. The instant Balfé entered the orchestra, it was evident from the air of confidence that played upon his good-humoured countenance that all was right, and that he and his new-formed band of Huns and Vandals were ripe for mischief. So it turned out. The opera was played from beginning to end better than anything that has preceded it during the season, and the success was great, in spite of the music.

We shall say nothing of the plot of I Due Foscari. Everybody has read, or should have read, Byron's The Two Foscari. Those who have read it will know as much as we can tell them. Those who have not read it are well recompensed for their shameful indifference to one of our great poet's finest works by being left in the dark. We shall tell them nothing about it—not a syllable. We hate more trouble than is necessary, and above all abominate the task of recounting a plot; it is an intolerable bore—and, what is worse, no one reads it when it is done. (No offence to our excellent co-labourer J. de C—e, whose relations of plots are models of writing, and will be read, for reasons, independent of the subject involved in their discourse).

The principal characters in the opera were thus distributed:—Lucretia, Madame Montenegro; Jacopo Foscari, Signor Fraschini; Francesco Foscari, Signor Coletti; and Loredano, Signor Bouché.

Madame Montenegro, who paid a flitting visit to this country last year, produced a highly favourable sensation in the character of Lucretia, for which her handsome person, dignified carriage, and fervid manner admirably fit her. This lady's voice is a soprano, rather of sweet than powerful quality, of extensive range and considerable flexibility. She vocalises easily and neatly, and her style, animated and expressive, is devoid of all affectation and redundancy. In short, her Lucretia was, throughout, an unpretending and charming performance, which pleased as much by natural grace and the absence of effort, as by its truthful experience and vocal faultlessness. Madame Montenegro will always be welcome to the habitués of Her Majesty's Theatre. Her talent is of that pleasing and winning kind that is sure to attract a host of admirers, who from pure sympathy will be warm in her cause. Being, also, a lady by birth, and enjoying the advantages of education and society, there is a refined taste in all she does which is of itself a great recommendation.

Signor Bouché's sonorous voice and manly style were precisely suited to the part of the stern and uncompromising Loredano, and his performance gained him another laurel to add to those he has already won so well.

Fraschini came out in Jacopo Foscari in a style that completely won the admiration and applause of the audience. His acting was sensible and effective. His singing was entirely devoid of that exaggerated declamation that we have had occasion, hitherto, to discommend. Fraschini has found out the secret that the vociferous shouting which raises the enthusiasm of the Neapolitans will not do for the Londoners, whose more refined and severer taste asks for higher qualities of style than the mere ad captandum exhibitions of strength of lungs. His singing gains one hundred per cent by the change. He has proved his ability to execute the softer passages mezza voce—and that is a quality which was denied to his talent—unjustly, as the sequel shows.

But the triumph of the evening was for Coletti, who, in the character of the Doge, evinced the highest vocal and histrionic capabilities. Half his continental celebrity traces from his masterly delineation of this character, which would seem to have been written with an express view to display the quality and register of his magnificent baritone. There can now be no dispute about the capabilities of this artist, whose merits are so evident that even the Morning Chronicle is compelled to acknowledge them in warm terms. In the first two acts of the opera the dignity of the Venetian noble was finely preserved in all its unbending sternness, which made the gush of anguish and passionate tenderness in the last scene all the more effective. The air, "Questa é d'unque," was deservedly encored; it was very finely sung, and, indeed, the whole scene was a triumph of vocal and dramatic art. We have seldom witnessed more enthusiastic and unanimous demonstrations of approval. Signor Coletti appeared thrice before the curtain at the end; the audience seemed never tired of calling for him. The opera was applauded throughout. Not only was Coletti honoured by re-calls and encores, but similar honours were lavishly conferred upon the other artists—Fraschini, Bouché, and Madamé Montenegro. The success of I due Foscari must be attributed entirely to the principal singers, and to the complete efficiency of Balfe, his band, and his chorus, which came out with unwonted power. The music of Signor Verdi is trash of the flimsiest description—beneath criticism—it offers no one point of musicianship, no one gleam of fancy. To talk of genius in reference to such worthless rubbish would be downright impiety. It is utterly destitute of claims to any kind of notice.

On Thursday we had one of those varied and lengthy performances of opera and ballet commingled, for which Her Majesty's Theatre is famous. The house was immensely crowded. The performances included the opera of I Puritani, a new ballet for Lucile Grahn, called Orithia, and a Diversissement of sundry dances between the second and third acts of the opera. The events that signalized the performance of I Puritani (on the whole the least perfect representation of the present season) were the return of the inimitable Lablache in the character of Sir George, and Gardoni's first appearance in the character of Lord Talbot. Lablache's reception was tremendous, the cheering lasted for several minutes. He was in fine voice, and having quite recovered from his hoarseness, sang and acted as magnificently as ever. Poor Gardoni was suffering from indisposition. The unexpected change of the weather seems to have afflicted the Italian vocalists with an epidemic. Gardoni is not infallible, and like Ronconi and Tamburini fell a victim to the hostile temperature. Nevertheless though his power was impaired and his certainty of vocalising slightly perilled, no one could fail to be enchanted by that graceful tenderness of expression which gives so great a charm to his singing. This was exerted to eminent advantage in the "A te o cara," which was unanimously encored, in the duet of the last act, and best of all in the pleasing aria, "Ella e tremanté," which Gardoni delivered with exquisite purity and taste. Madame Castellan and Coletti, in Elvira and Sir Richard Forth, were satisfactory in all respects. That the lady should fail to make a great effect in one of the favourite parts of Grisi is nothing to her discredit. Madame Castellan is a careful and zealous artist, and whatever she does is marked by sensibility and intelligence. Coletti's greatest point was the noisy duet, "Suono la tromba," with Lablache, the cabaletta of which obtained its customary encore. The subordinate parts of the opera were respectably sustained, and the band and chorus were energetic and untiring. The four principals were re-called at the fall of the curtain amidst loud cheers.

The divertissement between the second and third acts consisted of a danse d'ensemble for the corps de ballet, oddly designated Deutschen Rhain, an impossible application of the German tongue; the brilliant pas de deux from Coralia, by Rosati and Paul Taglioni, in which Rosati was encored in one of her variations, and a new version of the Cracovienne, by Marie Taglioni, called "Posnania." This was a great attraction. To see quaint little unconscious Marie in a new dress was worth a whole ballet of itself. Her hair too, platted, and hanging behind in two long tails, gave a new reading to her charmingly original physiognomy. And then, how coquettishly, without having a notion of what is coquetry, she wore the Polish peasant's hat, picturesque in itself, but ravishing on such a pretty little head, so odd, so unlike heads in general, and yet so thoroughly bewitching. Her dancing was quite in her own style, distinct from all other dancing, but yielding to none other in merit. It was simple, unaffected and natural, and withal a thing by itself for which it were vain to seek a comparison. What wonder, then, that the audience should re-call her as the curtain fell and applaud her vehemently as she was led on the stage by her excellent progenitor, M. Paul Taglioni, who composed "Posnania" expressly for her? It was no wonder at all, but inevitable.

The new ballet is entitled Orithia. The subject and its development may be gathered from the following, which we have extracted from the elegant brochure that is nightly distributed in the boxes and pit of Her Majesty's Theatre, and of which we have already spoken.

"It is night. We are in the camp of the Amazons and of their Queen, Marthesia. As a distant sound of the horn is heard, the warriors awake; day appears, and they salute the sun. The horn approaches; it announces the arrival of Orithia, the Queen's niece, who returns triumphant from her combats with the Massagetes, bearing on her arm the buckler of their chief Alceis, whom she brings a prisoner. The Queen celebrates this victory by dances, and ordains a royal chase, to the conqueror in which the buckler of Alceis is decreed. The Amazons hasten with delight towards the forest. Silence reigns once more within the camp, when the Prince Alceis enters it at the peril of his life. He loves Orithia, and what is peril to him if it bring him near the object of his love! His buckler, raised as a trophy, strikes his sight; he seizes it, and is about to destroy it, when the Amazons, carried by the chase towards the camp, appear. He hides himself behind a rock whence he can see without being seen. The huntresses depart. Orithia, still haunted by the recollection of the Prince, then arrives and contemplates the trophy, which reminds her of Alceis. She shudders at the idea that this token may become the prize of another. She is about to return into the forest, when the prince appears. The Amazon recoils affrighted. Alceis then declares his love, and to what it has impelled him. Orithia entreats her lover to fly from the implacable law which condemns to death every man who dares to enter the camp. Alceis refuses. Isipathe, the Queen's favorite, has remarked the trouble of her mistress, and, having followed her, has been a witness of this scene. At a signal, the Amazons hasten with Marthesia, who bitterly reproaches her niece for having betrayed her oath. She then orders the punishment of the captive at the tomb raised to the memory of Argapessa, her husband, killed by the King of the Scythians. Orithia supplicates; her companions join in her prayers, but the Queen is obdurate. Alceis then is doomed; but on approaching the mausoleum where he is to be sacrificed, he sees the name of his father inscribed thereon. Seizing his buckler, he pushes a spring, and the following inscription appears:—"Argapessa to his son Alceis." Marthesia is, then, his mother! The coldness of the Queen and the sternness of the Amazon give place to the warm gush of maternal love. Marthesia pardons, and Alceis becomes the happy captive of his Orithia.

How well this character of Orithia, the Amazon, is suited to the daring impetuous Lucile Grahn, may be readily imagined. Her dancing was first-rate, and in one of her most surprising steps she was encored with acclamations. Paul Taglioni acted and danced capitally, in the character of the Prince. There was only one scene, the camp of the Amazons, but this was well worthy the graphic and masterly brush of Marshall. The dresses and decorations were superb. The fault in this ballet-divertissement is that there is too much uninteresting grouping, profitless walking about, and concerted posture-making. Half of it might be cut out with advantage. The ballet would gain by it, and the superb dancing of Lucile Grahn would be doubly appreciated. As it was, however, the success was unquestionable, and M. Paul Taglioni reversed the maxim "the third time is never like the rest," having achieved three triumphs in succession.

PROVINCIAL.

BELEST.—(From our Correspondent).—The legitimate drama is in the ascendant. We have the Misses Cushman here, whose exquisite performances afford us rich and rare treats. There are many actors on the stage who do not give so gentlemanly performances (no joking intended) as Miss Cushman in the male parts, with such of feeling, such passion, and yet no ranting. Miss Susan Cushman need only follow (as she bids fair to do) in her sister's footsteps, to become one of the brightest ornaments of the English stage. Miss C.'s performance of Meg Merillies was a most decided hit, and created quite a furore. Not too much praise can be given to our intelligent manager, Mr. Cunningham, who, though not always sufficiently rewarded by our good Belfast citizens, lets no opportunity pass to engage the London stars, and to make the performances here worthy of the best provincial theatre.—T. P.

DUBLIN.—(Saunders' News Letter, April 7).—The concert given last evening by the members of the University Choral Society, was a most interesting one; the selection good, the execution truly effective, and the attention of the audience continued engaged until the close of the concert. The first part consisted of Andreas Romberg's music to Schiller's "Lay of the Bell." The casting of a bell is, in Germany, an event of solemnity and rejoicing. In the neighbourhood of the Hartz and other mine districts, you read formal announcements in the newspapers, from bell-founders, that at a given time and spot a casting is to take place, to which they invite all their friends. An entertainment out of doors is prepared and held with much festivity. Schiller, in a few short stanzas, forming a sort of chorus, describes the whole process of the melting, the casting, and cooling of the bell, with a technical truth and felicity of expression in which the sound of the sharp sonorous rhymes and expressive epithets constantly form an echo to the sense. Between these technical processes he breaks forth into the most beautiful episodic pictures of the various scenes of life with which the sounds of the bell are connected. The connecting links of the chant are taken up by the "master bell-founder," which part was well sustained by the amateur who sang on the occasion, and who possesses a voice of good quality. The solo for the treble, "Hark, 'tis some birthday's joyful meeting," was sung with judgment and fervor by Master Shepperd of the College choir, and met with an encore. The tenor solo that followed fell rather listless on the ear, the vocalist who sang it scarcely making his voice audible above the accompaniment. He was more successful in the solo "Though passion may fly," The chorus "In fertile womb of earth confiding," was rendered with ability. Another chorus "The Master when the mould destroying," was rendered with fidelity and spirit. The second part of the concert opened with a chorus of pilgrims from Verdi's opera I Lombardi, a novelty here, and admirably rendered both by the vocalists and the orchestra, received a warm encore. In the fantasia for the violoncello, the subjects of which were selected from the opera of Lucia di Lammermoor, Mr. Pigott displayed a facile execution and beauty of style that elicited repeated bursts of applause. One of the novelties was the appearance of Mr. Glover, a pupil of Mr. Magrath's; his voice is charming and of extensive range. His solo, "Una voce," was effective, but in the air of Sir John Stevenson's, harmonized by Mr. Magrath, "Oh, green are the groves," he was heard with greater advantage. The other parts were sustained with judgment. The orchestra was efficient, and the whole concert passed off satisfactorily.

LIVERPOOL.—Jullien's concerts have attracted as great audiences as at Manchester last week. The addition of Pischek, the German vocalist, to the regular instrumental forces, has greatly enhanced the interest of the performances. It is expected that Jullien will clear an immense sum by his trip.

LEICESTER.—(From a Correspondent).—The Musical Public are indebted to Mr. H. Nicholson the Flautist of this town, for a great treat on Monday evening last, in the engagement of the inimitable and unrivalled "John Parry," who sang his favourite songs with the greatest success. He also with his accustomed kindness sang an extra song not announced in the programme, in lieu of one which the principal female vocalist (Mrs. Millar, who was unaccountably absent) was put down for. An orchestra of about thirty played with great spirit, the overtures to Men of Prometheus, Auber's Lac des Fees, and a grand selection from "I Lombardi." The other performers were (vocal) Miss Deacon, Mrs. Rowlett Messrs. Weykes, Banister, &c. (instrumental) Messrs. Nicholson, Gill, Adcock &c. &c. We were glad to see the room crowded.

THE HARMONIUM.—Under this name a New Musical Instrument has been introduced to the public of this city, by Mr. Julian Adams (the pianist) who has been performing on it with great success, and will continue to play during the week. The chief excellence of this instrument, consists in its sweetness of tone and remarkable power of expression, we may compare it, as to volume and richness of sound, to the organ, while in purity and delicacy, it rivals the strains of the cremona. Mr. Julian Adams evinced extraordinary ability in his performances, and was heartily applauded.—Bath and Cheltenham Gazette.

BATH.—Messrs. Green and Simms of the Pump Room, engaged Mr. Julian Adams on Saturday last, to perform in the Promenade Concerts on the patent Harmonium. Mr. Julian Adams' performances were received with great applause, as well on account of the excellence of the performance, as the novelty of the instrument on which he played. Mr. Adams played a grand fantasia or airs from Norma and an Austrian air and brilliant variations with orchestral accompaniments. Both the pieces were highly effective, and exhibited the qualities and peculiarities of the new instrument, (the patent harmonium) admirably. Mr. Julian Adams also performs at the Promenade Concerts on Tuesday, Thursday, and concludes this evening his engagement at Bath.

BRISTOL.—(From our Correspondent).—Mr. H. C. Cooper's annual concert was held on Monday evening, at the Victoria Rooms, which was thronged with all the rank and fashion of Bristol and the surrounding neighbourhood. The entertainment was excellent in every respect, comprising compositions by the great masters, with morceaux of a more popular kind, while the executants, vocal and instrumental, numbered some of the choicest in the metropolis. The principal vocalists were Miss Bassano, Miss M. B. Hawes, Mr. Novello, and Mr. Locket. Mr. Vincent Wallace was the pianist and conductor. Mr. Julian Adams performed on the patent harmonium. The orchestra was principally composed of the same artists and amateurs who performed with so much success at the concerts lately given by the Bristol and Clifton "Conservatoire Musique" society. Mr. Cooper's concert was held under the most distinguished patronage, including among its supporters the names of the Duke of Beaufort, the Hon. F. H. F. Berkeley, M. P., W. Miles, Esq., M. P., the High Sheriff and the Mayor, together with upwards of one hundred influential residents of Bristol, and Bath, and adjoining places. The concert opened with Beethoven's overture to Fidelio, well played by the band, though not altogether faultlessly. The performances must be noticed briefly. Miss Bassano, Miss Hawes, and Mr. Locket gave a very pretty trio, by Curschmann, with great applause. Mr. Locket sang deliciously. He has a charming tenor voice, and is in immense favour with us here, as well as at Bath. We have not forgotten the impression he made at the Birmingham Festival. The chief feature of the entertainment was undoubtedly Mr. Vincent Wallace's performance on the pianoforte. He excited great interest among the audience, which his personal appearance enhanced in a high degree. His playing was uproariously applauded. His execution is very brilliant and precise, and he possesses a style at once bold and dashing, which is very attractive. The "forte" passages exhibited great power in the executant, while the "pianos" were managed with singular grace and delicacy. Mr. Wallace played two "fantasias of his own composition both of which have great merit as works for the pianoforte. The "Cracoriene" fantasia is certainly one of the most striking morceaux we ever heard performed in a concert room. Mr. Julian Adams bore away immense applause by his performance of an air with brilliant variations. Mr. H. C. Cooper was very effective in his violin performances, and was tremendously cheered in a solo of De Beriot's. We have not much room for more. The singers acquitted themselves in their usual mode of excellence, and the concert terminated with Weber's "Jubilee" overture. Mr. Vincent Wallace conducted all the music, and Mr. H. C. Cooper officiated as leader.

DR. MENDELSSOHN'S ORATORIO ELIJAH.

It is not likely that our readers have forgotten the triumph of this greatest work of the greatest composer now living, at the Birmingham Festival, last August. Since the production of "St. Paul," the composer's first oratorio, in 1836, at the Rhenish Triennial Festival, held at Dusseldorf, no single work of any modern author, has been known to excite so much curiosity and interest as "Elijah." That "St. Paul" was a great work, the opinion of the opinion of the whole musical community' had long before testified. The lapse of ten years, however, was likely to have produced a considerable change in the style of the composer, who, when "St. Paul," was produced, was only twenty-six years of age, and could hardly be presumed to have arrived at the meridian of his intellect. This was reasonable, and "Elijah" has proved it to be true. Though not longer than "St. Paul," the new oratorio is on a larger and a grander scale. The movements are more important and more carefully developed. To outdo "St. Paul" in loveliness of melody and freshness of idea were impossible, and in "Elijah" there is nothing impossible. But it is as the offspring of ripe maturity compared with the issue of burning and aspiring youth. Wisdom has perfected what Genius had long ago conceived. Genius is ever young, but it is not in the exercise of all its functions until Experience takes it by the hand, and points out the path that it should go.

In despite of the immense success which "Elijah" achieved at Birmingham last Autumn, Mendelssohn, not easily pleased, was unsatisfied with his work, and has employed the whole of his time from that period up to the present moment, in revising and perfecting the score. A short survey of the pieces that have been retouched, in a more or less degree, may not prove uninteresting to our readers.

The opening recitative of "Elijah," "As God the Lord," and the overture which immediately follows it, remain in their original form. The latter part of the chorus of the people, "Help, Lord!" has been re-written. The recitative chorus, "The deeps afford no water," has received some slight alterations at the close. The duet and chorus, "Lord, bow down thine ear to our prayer," remains as before. The recitative, "Ye people," and the air, "If with all your hearts," has received some trifling emendations. The chorus, "Yet doth the Lord see it not;" and the recitative of the angel, "Elijah, get thee hence," remain as they were originally. The latter part of the double quartet, "For He shall give his angels charge over thee," has been re-written entirely. The recitative of the angel, "Now Cherith's brook is dried up," has been slightly altered. The scene between the widow and Elijah, in which the woman prays the prophet to cure her sick son, and the prophet consents, has been entirely recomposed, although the prominent features of the original version may be traced throughout. A short duet, for the widow and Elijah, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God," has been added to this scene, and the improvement is manifest. The general character of the chorus "Blessed are the men who fear him," remains the same, but it has been rescored, and there are several important emendations. The recitatives and choral responses which constitute the scene between Elijah, Ahab, and the people have been altered in some particulars, and in one point, the preparation for the King's entry, we think, with deference not for the better. In the superb choruses of the Baalite priests and the intervening recitatives of Elijah, there are few if any changes—at least none that we could observe. Elijah's recitative and air, "Draw near all ye people" has been altered slightly. The quartet Corale of angels "Cast thy burden upon the Lord" has also been mended in several points, and the words, by Mr. Bartholomew, are entirely new. Elijah's recitative, "O Thou, who makest thine angels," is slightly altered, and the chorus of the people, "The fire descends from heaven," has been modified in detail, though none of the leading points are changed. Elijah's recitative "Take all the prophets of Baal," and the chorus of the people to the same words remain unchanged. Elijah's air, "Are not His words like a fire?" and the contralto air which follows, "Woe unto them," have both been re-touched. A recitative for Obadiah, "O man of God," is new. The scene for Elijah, the people, and the youth who goes to look for rain, with the stupendous chorus at the end, "Thanks be to God," is left precisely as it was before, Mendelssohn having found it impossible to improve perfection.

In the air for soprano, "Hear ye Israel," and the chorus which follows, "Be not afraid," the general ideas remain as before, but several parts are reconstructed and some are wholly new. Elijah's recitative, "The Lord hath exalted thee," has also received some slight emendations. The scene of the Queen (Jezabel) and the people, consisting of recitatives and choral responses has been re-written throughout, and much improved. The same may be said of the chorus. "Woe to him," which follows. Obadiah's recitative, "Man of God," is entirely new, while the response of Elijah, "Though stricken," remains unaltered. Elijah's air, "It is enough," has been re-composed on its original plan, and the recitative, "See now he sleepeth," has also been reconstructed. The trio for angels, "Lift thine eyes," was originally a duet; in its present form it may be regarded as quite new. The chorus of angels, "He, watching over Israel," has been slightly retouched. The recitative for the angel and Elijah, commencing with the words, "Arise Elijah," has been re-written entirely. The contralto air, "O rest in the Lord," remains as before. The chorus "He that shall endure," ditto, ditto. The recitative for Elijah and the angel, beginning "Night falleth round me," has been altered, and the awful chorus, "Behold, God the Lord passed by" has been carefully retouched. A recitative, "Above him stood the seraphim," which follows, is quite new, and produces a very fine effect. The quartet and chorus of angels, "Holy, holy, holy," is as before. A recitative chorus, "Go return upon thy way," and Elijah's response, "I go on my way," are both new. Elijah's air, with oboe obligato, "For the mountains shall depart," has been very slightly changed. The chorus, "Thus did Elijah," has been retouched in several places. The air "Then shall the righteous" has not been altered. The recitative, "Behold God hath sent Elijah," and the subsequent chorus, "But the Lord from the north," have both been retouched in several places. The quartet "O come every one that thirsteth" remains as before. The final chorus, "And then shall your light break forth," consisting of an introduction and fugue, are entirely new, both in words and music, the first version having been discarded. We shall give a full and succinct account of the performance next week.

MISCELLANEOUS.

JOSEPH JOACHIM.—After all, we have got this great violinist for this season. He arrived on Tuesday, in company with Dr. Mendelssohn, his friend and master. We trust the Philharmonic will not let him go without hearing him once more.

CERITO, ST. LEON, AND PERROT.—The choregraphic stars of Her Majesty's Theatre are beginning to shine in great number. The above three celebrities arrived in London on Tuesday.

VIEUXTEMPS, whose recent triumphs at St. Petersburg were recorded two numbers back, is expected in London to-day.

BALFE.—In eulogizing the readiness with which, "I due Foscari," was produced at Her Majesty's Theatre, when L'Elisir d'Amore, was compelled to be delayed, owing to the indisposition of Lablache, The Times of Monday, in an admirably written article, pays a just tribute to the merits of Mr. Balfe, the indefatigable conductor. The writer says, that "To be in such a state of forwardness with one work as to produce it directly the chance of another fails, is an instance of good generalship that might everywhere be imitated with advantage. Let a special meed of praise be awarded to Mr. Balfe, who, at the shortest notice, was able to summon round him all the persons under his direction. From the commencement of the present season, the conduct of Mr. Balfe amid circumstances of unprecedented difficulty, has been distinguished by an ability and indefatigable zeal, perhaps without parallel. His band is not only under his conduct, but may be almost said, to be of his tuition." This is nothing more than true, and nothing less than just.

STAUDIGL.—This great basso has arrived, and will shortly appear at Her Majesty's Theatre, with Jenny Lind.

MADAME CLARE HENNELLE.—This clever and popular vocalist will arrive in London, for the season, on the 25th inst. Her success in Paris during the winter has been unusually brilliant. She has frequently sung at the court in presence of the royal family, and at the best of the benefit concerts her name has figured conspicuously. Her friends here will be delighted to welcome her back, for few in her calling are more privately respected, and probably esteemed, than Madame Cläre Hennelle. She will be accompanied by her charming daughter, Mdlle. Blanche Hennelle, who is also, we believe, destined for the musical profession—in which case she is sure of success, since nature has been prodigal in her favour.

MDLLE. FANNY ELLSLER AND MDLLE. DUMILATRE, the celebrated danseuses, both engaged at the Royal Italian Opera, arrived in London on Wednesday.

WILMERS.—Another pianist of this name, who, if report speak not false, is a second Leopold de Meyer, is going to pay London a visit during the present season.

THALBERG.—This popular gentleman has decided upon favoring London with his presence during this most eventful season. What all the pianists that are coming expect to achieve in the pecuniary department it puzzles us to guess. One only can be "lion at a time."

M. BEZETH, a talented violinist, and pupil of David, has arrived in London for the season.

MR. JONES.—The vocalist, whose successful career, in most of the first theatres in the North of Italy, we have from time to time recorded, has returned to England, after an absence of nearly three years.

JULES SCHULOFF.—This pianist, a new star in the horizon of pianism, will shortly arrive in London. He gave his last concert in Paris on the 20th. M. Schuloff is known as a composer of brilliant morceaux, which have achieved very considerable popularity.

MADAME BISHOP terminated her second engagement with Mrs. Macready, at Bath, on Saturday last. The success attendant on her second engagement surpassed, if possible, that of her first. Madame Bishop left Bath on Thursday, for Dublin, where she is engaged by Mr. Calcraft, to re-appear for a certain number of nights. The fair artiste opens on Monday in Norma, and repeats afterwards, Sonnambula, The Love Spell, and Anne Bolena, and will also perform in Donizetti's celebrated opera, Linda di Chamouni, translated expressly for her. This opera, one of the author's best, has never been performed on the English stage.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Warren's 20 Guinea Cottage Piano-Fortes

ARE NOW SELLING AT THE
Manufactory, 71, Leadenhall Street

(Removed from 1 and 2, Liverpool Street, Bishopsgate Street.)

These Instruments are well manufactured of the best seasoned wood, FINE FULL TONE AND GOOD TOUCH. A two years warranty given with each instrument. ESTABLISHED TWENTY-ONE YEARS. The only house in London where a good sound instrument can be obtained at the above low price, (for cash only). SMALL PROFIT AND QUICK RETURNS!

JOHN WARREN, 71, Leadenhall St., opposite Aldgate Pump.

TO AMATEURS AND PROFESSORS OF THE VIOLIN.

J. STEWART'S
REGISTERED VIOLIN AND TENOR HOLDER.

J. HART

Respectfully informs Amateurs and Professors of the Violin and Tenor, that he is now prepared to supply them with the above INSTRUMENT, which, for ease of application and efficiency, surpasses anything of the kind that has yet been offered to the public. J. H. is borne out in this assertion by the opinion of some of the first violinists of the country, who have acknowledged its superiority by adopting the same, conceiving it to be the grand desideratum to the above instruments.

JUST IMPORTED, A CASE OF
FINE ROMAN STRINGS,
Of which a fresh supply will be received every three months.

J. HART'S

Musical Instrument Warehouse, 14, Princes-street, Soho,
Where may be seen a fine collection of Cremona and other Instruments, comprising Stradivarius, Guarnerius, Amati, and other celebrated makers.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE

Is acknowledged as the best specific after three years' trial, for improving the voice and removing all affections of the throat, strongly recommended to clergymen, singers, actors, public speakers, and all persons subject to relaxed throats.

The Proprietors have just received the following Testimonial, amongst many others, from MADAME ANNA BISHOP:—

"DEAR SIR,—I am happy to say that all I have heard respecting the efficacy of DR. STOLBERG'S celebrated LOZENGE is perfectly true, as yesterday, feeling myself very fatigued (singing nightly at the Theatre), I took several of the Lozenges, and my voice was very clear, and my throat quite free from relaxation. I am, Dear Sir, Yours truly, ANNA BISHOP."

Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Churchyard; W. Edwards and Newbery and Sons, St. Paul's Churchyard; Sanger, and Dietrichsen and Hannay, Oxford-street; and retail by all respectable Chymists in the Kingdom.

FEMALE

AMERICAN SERENADERS.

ST. JAMES'S ASSEMBLY ROOMS,

(Late Crookford's), St. JAMES'S STREET,

Messdames CORA, JUMBA, WUSKI, MIAMI, YARICO, WOMBA, and ROSA,

The young ladies whose immense success in Manchester has been made a theme of eulogy by the Provincial and London Press, will have the honour of appearing for the

FIRST TIME IN LONDON,

At the above-named fashionable and aristocratic Establishment,

Wednesday, April 21, 1847.

It is the intention of these accomplished Dark Ones to give a Series of Soirées Musicales, Morning and Evening; Morning Performances at half-past Two o'clock, Evening at half-past Eight o'clock. Admission Half a-Crown.

THE FEMALE

AMERICAN SERENADERS,

St. James's Assembly Rooms, St. James's Street.

Messrs. D'ALMAINE and Co.,

SOHO SQUARE,

Have the honour to announce that they are the Proprietors of all the

MUSIC

Sung by the Female American Serenaders,

The whole being their Copyright. The Songs are illustrated by exquisitely illuminated portraits of the Ladies in Gold and Colours, by Mr. Brandard, to be had of all respectable Music-sellers in the United Kingdom. Family Tickets to admit Six Half-a-Guinea, to be had of Messrs. D'ALMAINE. The single admissions are Half-a-Crown.

BEETHOVEN ROOMS,

76, HARLEY STREET.

This suite of Rooms have just been superbly decorated, arranged, ventilated, and adapted for chamber music and musical soirées of a high order, with an elegance and comfort not to be obtained in any other suite of rooms in London. They have been chosen during the last two seasons by the Beethoven Quartett Society, for the great advantage they possess over all concert rooms in London, in consequence of the music room being so situated that the noise of the street can in no way reach it, which has always been so great an objection in other places.

For terms apply to

M. JULLIEN, 214, REGENT STREET.

N.B.—These rooms having been arranged expressly for musical purposes, will only be let for soirées musicales, music classes, private soirées, lectures, &c., being unsuitable for soirées dansantes, or dancing academy.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

The Nobility, Gentry, and Subscribers, are respectfully informed that

On TUESDAY NEXT, APRIL 20th,

Will be performed the Opera of

LA SONNAMBULA,

The principal Characters by

MADAME PERSIANI, MDLLE. CORBARI,

(Her first appearance this season).

SIGNOR MARIO,

(His first appearance this season), and

SIGNOR TAMBURINI.

To conclude with a new Ballet, entitled

LA REINE DES FEES,

In which

MDLLE. DUMILATRE

(Her first appearance this season),

MDLLE. BADERNA & M. PETIPA

WILL PERFORM.

Tickets, Stalls, and Boxes, to be obtained at the Box office, Bow-street; and at Cramer, Beale, and Co.'s, 201, Regent-street. The doors will be opened at Eight, and the performance to commence at half-past Eight o'clock.

HISTORICAL CONCERTS. EXETER HALL.

THE CONCLUDING CONCERT

(Of a Series of Four)

Illustrative of the History of English Vocal Music,

Will be held at EXETER HALL,

ON MONDAY EVENING, APRIL 19th.

The Programme will consist of specimens of the music of Attwood, Bishop, Callrot, Crotch, Dibdin, Horsley, Russell, Stevens, Shield, Smith, Storace, and Webbe. Principal Vocal Performers:—Mrs. W. H. Weiss, Miss Dolby, Mr. Manvers, Mr. G. Clifford, Mr. W. H. Seguin, and Mr. J. A. Novello. The Chorus will consist of upwards of 500 members of Mr. Hullah's Upper Singing School, and the Orchestra of Mr. Willy's Concert Band. Tickets—Area, 2s.; Western Gallery, 1s. 6d.; Reserved Seats, 7s.—may be had of Mr. Parker, Publisher, 445, West Strand; and of the principal music-sellers.

WILSON'S SCOTTISH ENTERTAINMENTS.

ON MONDAY EVENING, APRIL 19, at 8 o'clock,

MR. WILSON

will give his ENTERTAINMENT, entitled

"AN HOUR W' BURNS,"

AT THE

MUSIC HALL, STORE STREET,

in which he will sing a selection of the favourite songs of the poet and recite the humorous poem of Tam o'Shanter. In the second part, Mr. Wilson will sing—"Call'er harrin'—Come under my Plaidie—The first Blast of the Trumpet—We're a' noddin'—Tullochgorum. Private boxes for six persons, 15s.; for eight, 21l.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

On FRIDAY next, April the 23rd and 24th 1847,

Will be Performed

DR. MENDELSSOHN'S ORATORIO ELIJAH,

Tickets 2s., reserved seats in the Gallery 5s., in the area 10s. 6d.. All the Tickets being disposed of, except a limited number of those at 10s. 6d., for the 23rd and 24th, and at 2s. for the 24th, persons desirous of attending the performances are requested to make immediate application to the principal music-sellers; or to Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing-cross; Mr. Mitchell, 20, Charing-cross; and Mr. Rice, 102, Strand.
T. BREWER, Hon. Sec.

MUSICAL LIBRARY, ORGAN, AND PIANO

OF THE LATE

JOHN CAPEL, Esq.

MESSRS. WINSTANLEY

ARE INSTRUCTED TO SELL BY AUCTION,

At the Residence, No. 32, Russell Square,

ON

MONDAY, 26th of APRIL,

A FINE TONED ORGAN BY ALLEN,

Containing 10 Stops,

A 6½ Octave Horizontal GRAND PIANOFORTE, by Collard,

AND THE

VALUABLE COLLECTION OF MUSIC,

Including a fine Copy of Marcellos' Psalms, the Works of Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Latrobe, Dr. Boyce, and others, a choice selection of Glee and Madrigals, and about 50 complete Operas, all in good condition. To be viewed on Wednesday and Thursday, 23rd and 24th inst., and morning of Sale, when Catalogues may be obtained at the Residence, and of Messrs. WINSTANLEY, No. 10, Paternoster Row.

MADAME ANNA BISHOP,

Will return from the Provinces to London, for the whole season, the first week in May.—Professional applications, directed to

No. 28, GREAT QUEEN STREET, LINCOLN'S INN,
will be attended to.

PIANOFORTES CHEAP.

The Large and Valuable

STOCK OF PIANOFORTES,

Manufactured by

ZEITTER & CO.

Is now Selling off at

4, NEW CAVENDISH ST., PORTLAND PLACE, LONDON.

IN CONSEQUENCE OF A DISSOLUTION OF PARTNERSHIP.

The Instruments consisting of mahogany and rosewood grands, semi-grands, cabinet, cottage, and piccolos, are made with the patent sounding-board, metallic plate, check action, and all the latest improvements. The Pianofortes made by Zeitter and Co. have always enjoyed a preference among the nobility and gentry, having been honoured with the patronage of her Majesty the Queen, the Duchess of Sutherland, &c. The peculiar construction of the sounding-board insures their greater durability, and the firm tone is well known. Parties desirous of possessing one of these superior instruments may now purchase the same on very advantageous terms. Grands, heretofore from 120 to 145 guineas, are now selling at 50l. to 70l., and others in proportion. The premises, No. 5, have been recently closed.

FAIR COMPLEXION.

Under the Patronage of the Nobility and Gentry.

COCKBURN'S

ORIENTAL BOTANICAL PREPARATION,

For removing almost instantaneously cutaneous eruptions, freckles, pimples, spots, and other discolorations of the skin. After one application of the Botanic Extract, which must be used twice a day, a wonderful change will be perceived, and in the course of a few days the complexion will assume a beautiful transparent roseate hue appearance. The extract to apply is of the most agreeable nature, and the first application will prove its wonderful efficacy. Prepared only, and sold wholesale and retail, by the sole proprietor,

GEORGE H. J. COCKBURN, 9, Aldgate, London;

And Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street, London; in bottles at 2s. 9d. and 4s. 6d. each; also by Sanger, 150, Oxford-street; Keating, St. Paul's Church Yard; Johnson, 68, Cornhill; Hannay and Co., 63, Oxford street; Butler and Co., 4, Cheapside; Edwards, St. Paul's Churchyard; Prout, 229, Strand; and of all other Chemists and Perfumers in the kingdom.

PIANOFORTES.

Parties in want of a really good PIANOFORTE, at a moderate price, will do well to call at

J. C. JONES AND CO.'s,

2, Hanway-street, Oxford-street, a few doors on the right from Tottenham-court-road, who, from their intimate acquaintance with every kind of instrument made, have endeavoured to combine the separate good qualities of each with all the latest improvements, therefore for tone, touch, durability, and appearance these instruments are not to be surpassed at the price.

Instruments tuned, repaired, exchanged, and lent on hire.

Tuning by the year, one guinea. Second-hand Pianos, from 3 to 30 guineas.

THOMAS BAKER'S MODERN PIANOFORTE TUTOR.

M. JULLIEN

Has the honor to announce, that he has just published the above work, which he flatters himself will be found the desideratum so long sought after by the profession. Notwithstanding the improvements that have taken place in Pianoforte Playing within the last ten years, no deviation has been made in the system of teaching from Tutors of the Old School; in consequence, many gifted with brilliant talents have been unable to execute the music of the present day. For this reason the

MODERN PIANOFORTE TUTOR

Has been introduced, and met with the greatest success from the elite of the profession, who have universally adopted it. The work is divided into two parts: the first being a complete Tutor in itself, containing the

RUDIMENTS OF MUSIC,

Rules for the Formation of the Hand, Scales,

FINGER EXERCISES, &c.

Interspersed with Morceaux from the works of Beethoven, Mozart, Spohr, Weber, Meyerbeer, Bach-Albert, Rossini, Bellini, Donizetti, &c.—Price 8s.

The second part consists of a more advanced course of Study, proceeding to the most refined style of Modern Playing;

Illustrated with numerous Examples & Exercises,

On all the various Fingerings adopted by the most eminent Pianistes of the MODERN SCHOOL: with Selections from the Pianoforte Compositions of HERZ, DOHLER, THALBERG, &c.; in fact, everything necessary to constitute a first-rate Pianist. Price 8s., or 15s. the entire work.

Published by M. JULLIEN & Co.,

AT THE ROYAL MUSICAL CONSERVATORY,
214, REGENT STREET, AND 45, KING STREET,

Where all the Compositions of the above Author may be had.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847.

M. JULLIEN has the honor to announce that the sixth edition of his

MUSICAL ANNUAL FOR 1847

Is now Published, and will be found by far the best work of the kind that has ever appeared; containing no less than

Thirty Pieces of Vocal and Fourteen of Instrumental Music,

The greater part of which have never before been published, the copyrights having been purchased expressly for this work, at an immense cost, with the view of rendering it immeasurably superior to any of its predecessors.

The portion which has already appeared comprise those pieces only whose decided success has induced M. JULLIEN, at the request of numerous influential patrons, to include them in this Selection.

The Illustrations, in addition to the elaborately executed Covers, Title, and Dedication pages, include two magnificent Views of the interior of Covent Garden Theatre. The one taken during the brilliant scene exhibited in that splendid arena of the occasion of M. JULLIEN'S GRAND BAL MASQUE; the other a VIEW OF THE THEATRE TAKEN DURING THE CONCERTS, the grouping of the Figures in both Views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant. To those who have visited the Theatre on either occasion, the ALBUM will form a delightful SOUVENIR, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of the gorgeous scene.

A splendidly-coloured PORTRAIT of the celebrated Danseuse, Madlle. FLORA FABRI, in the admired Pas, La Castigliani. An original subject, "THE FORTUNE TELLER," illustrating Baker's beautiful ballad of that name.

The whole of this department of the ALBUM has been under the active superintendence of J. BRANDARD, Esq., whose pencil only has been employed in its production.

Nothing more need be said in favour of this Work, and in proof of its vast superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the Contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe.

It will also be perceived that in addition to the latest compositions of the best English Composers, the ALBUM contains some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany, France, Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting the attention of the Continental dilettanti. Price 18s. and £1 1s.

ROYAL CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC,
214, REGENT-STREET, AND 45, KING-STREET.

SOVEREIGN Life Assurance Company,

No. 5, ST. JAMES'S STREET, LONDON.

Trustees.
Sir A. Brydges Henniker, Bart.	Henry Pownall, Esq.
B. Bond Cabbell, Esq., M.P.	Claude Edward Scott, Esq.
Directors.
CHAIRMAN, Lieutenant Colonel Lord	Henry Broadwood, Esq., M.P.
Arthur Lennox.	Sir James Carmichael, Bart.
DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN, T. C. Granger,	Charles Farebrother, Esq., Alderman.
Esq., M.P.	William Tulloh Fraser, Esq.
John Ashburner, Esq., M.D.	John Gardiner, Esq.
T. M. B. Batard, Esq.	Aaron Asher Goldsmid, Esq.
Philip P. Blyth, Esq.	Henry William Pownall, Esq.
Bankers, Sir Claude Scott, Bart., and Co.
Solicitors, Messrs. Davies, Son, and Campbell.

Assurances on the lives of persons in every station of life and every part of the world, granted on a plan which combines the utmost amount of benefit to the families of the assured at death, with every attainable advantage during life, which the system of Life Assurance is capable of affording.

It affords perfect security in a subscribed Capital, which guarantees the prompt settlement of every claim, with participating and non-participating rates on the lowest scale, especially for terms of years.

The Assured can anticipate or obtain the advance of the full amount of the Policy, on giving approved available security for a certain number of annual payments, as explained by the Prospectus.

Every facility is afforded to persons assuring the lives of others, so as to render such Policies effectual securities.

A new plan of gradual or accumulative Assurance, particularly adapted for young lives, and for such as cannot, without inconvenience, undertake the payment of a fixed premium, securing at once provision in case of premature death, and an accumulating fund, available during life, should occasion require.

ANNUITIES, ENDOWMENTS, ADVANCES, and LOANS, on liberal terms.

Detailed Prospectuses, with forms of Proposal, and every information, may be had on application, either personally or by letter, at the Company's Offices.

The usual commission to Solicitors and Agents.

H. D. DAVENPORT, Secretary.

THE PATENT HARMONIUM.

This beautiful Instrument possesses the softness of the voice with the variety of tone of every wind Instrument, as also the power of a large Organ. It is equally suitable for Sacred Music, or the Dance, and adapted for the Drawing Room, Concert Room, Church or Chapel. Printed particulars can be had of LUFF and SON, sole agents, where the PATENT HARMONIUM can be heard from 10 till 4, daily; and where can be inspected.

LUFF & SON'S

Elegant Assortment of PIANOFORTES,

Made by experienced workmen, and thoroughly seasoned wood, all of which is prepared on the premises. They are warranted to stand well in Tune, and are prepared for extreme climates: prices one-third less than usually charged.

Instruments taken in exchange, and a liberal allowance to dealers.

LUFF and SON, 103, Great Russell Street, Bloomsbury.

N.B.—The terms of Mr. JULIAN ADAMS, the celebrated performer upon the Patent Harmonium, can be had of LUFF and SON.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, at the "Nassau Steam Press," by WILLIAM SPENCER JOHNSON, 60, St. Martin's Lane, in the parish of St. Martin's in the Fields, in the County of Middlesex; where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed post paid. To be had of G. Purkess, Dean Street, Soho; Strange, Paternoster Row; Wiseheart, Dublin; and all Booksellers.—Saturday, April 17th, 1847.

The Musical World.

(PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT NOON.)

A RECORD OF THE THEATRES, MUSIC, LITERATURE, FINE ARTS,
FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE, &c.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s. Stamped; 12s. Unstamped; to be forwarded by Money Order or Postage Stamps to the Publisher, W. S. Johnson, "Nassau Steam Press," 60, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross.

Annual Subscribers only (whose names are registered at the Office) are entitled to an Admission to the Concert, and a Piece of Music, (regular Music size) Monthly.

No. 17.—Vol. XXII.

SATURDAY, APRIL 24, 1847.

{PRICE THREEPENCE
STAMPED, FOURPENCE.

TO OUR READERS.

Annual Subscribers whose names are entered in the Book at our Office, and whose Subscriptions are paid in advance to Christmas next, are ALONE entitled to an Admission to the forthcoming Annual Concert.

A detailed and elaborate analysis of Mendelssohn's ELIJAH, from the pen of the Editor, is preparing, and will appear next week IN AN ENLARGED NUMBER of the "MUSICAL WORLD."

HARMONIA.

(HAP. I.)

THERE are many apostles of Falsehood, but Truth is in want of disciples. The lies that are begotten by the apostles of Falsehood upon the bodies of Sophistry and Corruption are so numerous that the heavens are darkened by them. But Truth shines behind, like the sun, and it is for her worshippers to make war against the locust host of lies, and dispersing them, let the world behold the full glory of the light they have for a while obscured. We, as the humblest of Truth's disciples shall draw sword in the cause, and fight her battles against her enemies. What we shall say will offend many and hurt some; but Truth is vital to the health of art, and the interests of private individuals are as dust in the balance.

Lord Bacon, the wisest of philosophers, in his golden book, exclaims against the idola that blind the eye of men's judgments and prevent their beholding Truth naked. The idola are the prejudices, which are born of various parents. It is for those who would behold the face of Truth, and make it glorious to mankind, to wage war against them and destroy them utterly. They are stubborn enemies of progress; the poisonous sophists that distort and vilify. Until they are swept away, the mind cannot comprehend a simple proposition. Let it be then our task to uproot them from the soil they render sterile; let it be for us to cast them into the fire, until they be consumed and stench the air no more. Like good husbandmen, we must weed the pastures, or they will not bear fruit.

The art of music is but a type of other arts. Its growth is fostered or stunted by favourable or adverse circumstances. But it is the youngest of the arts. There is yet time to save it from corruption. From examples in the history of other arts we may know what to do, and what to eschew. Let us then study them and profit.

First, the professors of music should be brought up in the eternal principles that apply to all art. Next, the taste of the laity should be educated. If an artist do well and yet be not appreciated, it is an injury to art. If he do not well and yet be favoured, it is an injury to art. But, if when he does well he be encouraged, and when he does ill he be admonished, it is a glory for art. To promote this end, for the sake of art, should be the aim of all criticism; but, to promote it requires certain learning and endowments that not many critics possess, and, indeed, at the present time, scarcely any. We shall not, by a process of logical ratiocination, endeavor to give the reason of this deficiency, but shall endeavour to make it appear as if it were an inevitable consequence of the facts that we adduce, and the observations we shall make upon them.

It will be said that we make over-much of music, and magnify its importance. But this will be an error; for, though music, like history, be not a matter of magnificence and memory, like poetry, it is a matter of refinement and aspiration. Shelley, the poet, has said, that "Poets are the unacknowledged legislators of the world." Translate his meaning largely, and he is right; he speaks of all poets, no matter what their medium of expression. Poetry and music address themselves to the intellect through the medium of the ear; painting, sculpture, architecture, through the medium of the eye. There is no art that addresses itself to the intellect through the organs of taste, or feeling, or smelling; therefore are the organs of hearing and seeing the greatest and most magnanimous of the senses; and the ear and the eye may be likened to carriers that bear the mind its food and riches; and, according to the manner of its nourishment and clothing is the health or sickness of the mind. The important office of these carriers cannot be over estimated; on them depend refinement and wisdom, and according to their burden is a man a barbarian or a civilian in the universal meaning. Therefore Shelley's apothegm should be written in gold, and inscribed upon the Temple of Truth:—"Poets are the unacknowledged legislators of the world." These are the words of an oracle.

Would the world be better, or worse had Mozart, Handel, Beethoven, never lived? This question has been often asked but never answered. I say the world would have been much worse for the want of them. For the mind, when contemplating sublime images, is admonished of its immortality. That which is body can corrupt and perish, but that which is ideal cannot be effaced; its style is not of earth but of heaven; not of the finite but of the infinite. In listening to the divine music of these mighty poets we are walking with them in the country of the infinite. Their inspiration is from God, and is a proof that man is not as the cattle; for, if man's mind can comprehend what is inspiration it can embrace the enigma of imperishability. And, surely, that which makes us feel and know we are immortal is of the highest consequence. Of how great import is it then that art should be rid of all that clogs its wings and prevents its flight upward, that it be not, as the soul in a weak body, or as the fingers on a defective instrument, unable to declare the hand that has enforced it.

The perfect accomplishments of art are the endeavours of the immortal spirit to fly up to the anima mundi of which it is a part. Spinoza, in forgetting art, left out what would have made his ethics perfect. He overlooked the link that binds the finite to the infinite. For, in so much as mathematics is tangible and finite, is it inferior to art which is intangible and infinite. Mathematics is the symbol for all that man can seemingly reduce to elements and know entirely, but art is the symbol of what he desires to know and cannot, being human. One is the earth we tread upon, the other the heaven we aspire to. In one we walk step by step, in the other we traverse boundless space in an instant. Reason has barriers, imagination none.

(To be continued.)

TAMBURINI.

We have seldom, if ever, experienced a feeling of deeper disappointment, than at the coldness evinced towards Tamburini by the press, in their criticisms on his first and second performances. Had this artist lost half his voice, he should still have lived in our memory as one of the greatest favorites that ever won praise from an English audience, and worthy of higher homage from our critics than that demi-eulogy which courtesy demands for the most ordinary first appearance. Tamburini left London four years ago, in the zenith of his reputation; he has since been engaged at St. Petersburg, and in other continental towns, where his successes have been great. In Berlin, the year before last, his performances caused an unusual sensation. During Fornasari's engagement at Her Majesty's Theatre, certain of the London journals, ourselves among others, perceiving the incompetency of that singer, called for Tamburini to supply his place. Fornasari was immovable, and the Morning Post, gave out that Tamburini had lost his voice, and was growing old. Did the Morning Post ever hint at Lablache growing old? No—but were the artists to change places to-morrow, Lablache, with the Morning Post, would be too old to play Methusalem, while Tamburini would be more youthful and powerful than ever, with his lungs purified and invigorated by the Scandinavian breezes, which did not injure Castellan. But facts are stubborn things, and here are a few which may perhaps make the critic look a little foolish. Tamburini was born in the year 1800. Donzelli was fifty the first year he came to London. Ambrogetti was older than Tamburini is now, when he appeared at the King's Theatre. Rubini was four years older than Tamburini when he left the stage, and who could say he had lost his voice? But whether Tamburini, born in 1800, be old or young, it matters little as long as a fact of more importance is before us, which simply is, that Tamburini has not lost his voice at all. We seldom remember having heard him sing better than on Thursday night, in the second representation of Semiramide. Assur is one of the most arduous parts, vocally speaking, that could be undertaken by a barytone. The music is high for this class of singers, and the part is long and trying; nevertheless, the artist was as capable and effective as ever; his intonation was faultless, and the manner in which he delivered his opening recitative, showed him equal to himself in his best days. Now, viewing all these things under one light, perceiving that no welcome could be accorded too heartily to so old and honored a favorite, that no too great leniency could be shown to the once supreme artist, even had all his power left him, witnessing his uproarious reception, witnessing the delight of the audience, we were not a little astonished to find the great artist, the great favorite, who, on the opera boards, should have been as welcome as an old friend at a feast, overlooked, or treated with no more consideration by some of our contemporaries than if he were a third-rate singer, who was making his debut. Verily this passeth understanding.

THE BEETHOVEN QUARTET SOCIETY.

THE third meeting on Monday night attracted a large audience to the Beethoven Rooms. The appearance of Joseph Joachim among the executants brought back old associations; and the odour of the lately applied white-wash having fled, on the wings of the wind, to its home among the tertiary deposits, everything felt more comfortable, looked more comfortable, and smelt more comfortable. And now for the programme, which friend Rousselot had provided for his guests. It was as under:—

Quartet in C minor, No. 4,	Op. 18.
Quartet in E flat, No. 10,	Op. 74.
Quartet in A minor, No. 12,	Op. 132.

Thus the three periods of the great composer's life, and the three phases of his style, were illustrated according to the excellent plan laid down by the originators of the society. The C minor quartet was composed in 1791, and dedicated to the Prince Lichnowsky, who was lucky in having his name perpetuated by association with so many master-pieces. It was played by Joseph Joachim, Sainton, Hill, and Rousselot. The E flat quartet was composed about 1813—the precise epoch not exactly known—and appears to have been dedicated to nobody, which was a great compliment to the world at large. This was performed by Sainton, Joseph Joachim, Hill, and Rousselot. The A minor quartet was composed in 1825-6, and dedicated to the Prince Gaitzin, who, as we have already hinted, was a zealous amateur, but a sorry patron. It was executed by Joseph Joachim, Sainton, Hill, and Rousselot. Whereby it will be perceived that Joachim led the first and third, and Sainton the second.

It was worth going twenty miles on foot to hear little Joachim play the first, and one hundred to hear him play the last quartet. All those qualities which we had to commend in his style and mechanism three years ago, have now ripened into maturity; and where before we had the precocious wonder we have now the accomplished master. Who knows if the diadem of Paganini be not endangered by this boy of seventeen summers? We see it, as it were in a vision, tottering on his brow!

Sainton was admirable in his quartet,—the second, in which Hill's tenor variation in the andante, and Rousselot's violoncello bit in the scherzo, were highly relished by the amateurs. The performance was altogether delightful. At the next meeting four quartets will be given:—Nos. 2, 6, 11, and 17. The zealous efforts of M. Rousselot are likely to preserve the status of the Beethoven Quartet Society in all its original dignity. Vieuxtemps, who has arrived in London, will doubtless be heard at the next meeting, or the one immediately following, in case that Joachim be engaged for two.

MUSIC AT MANCHESTER.

(From our Correspondent.)

HARGREAVES CHORAL SOCIETY.—MENDELSSOHN'S 'ELIJAH'.—Our Free Trade Hall, so recently the scene of Jullien's triumphs, with Herr Pischek, &c., was last night the scene of a much more brilliant triumph—the triumph of musical genius of the highest order—Jullien is a great man in his metier, but all his greatest achievements—all his elaborate conducting—great a star as he is amongst us when he comes to give the cheering influence of his musical light, that star pales before such as shone resplendent last night in the presiding genius of Mendelssohn! Never was Hargreaves Concert so attended before! every bench, every seat in that vast hall had its occupant long before seven o'clock, and numbers had to stand the whole evening. We never remember to have so many of our leading families present at any former concert of this Society; indeed we learn, that at the eleventh hour, many have paid a whole season's subscription for the sake of obtaining the usual number of three tickets, to which each subscriber is entitled, so eager were they to be present at the first performance, to a Manchester audience, of Mendelssohn's latest and greatest work, 'Elijah.' The Hall was literally crammed with beaming, yet eager and expectant faces, when Dr. Mendelssohn made his bow to them, precisely at seven o'clock, and his appearance was greeted with two distinct and hearty rounds of applause. We shall not attempt to give any analysis of the work, or to criticise every portion of the performance—you will have to review the composition in criticism on some of its performances at Exeter Hall—so that duty will be undertaken by more efficient and competent hands; suffice it if we give you a general idea of the style of its production here, and of its complete and satisfactory success. We must, before doing so, pay a tribute of gratitude to Mr. Surman, of Exeter Hall, to whose persevering kindness and assistance the committee of the Hargreaves are deeply indebted; and but for which, 'Elijah' would not have been produced in the way it has been, if indeed, its performance had not altogether broken down. We are told that the band parts had never been sent down to the publishers up to Friday last, and after the performance of the oratorio, on that evening, at Exeter Hall, Mr. Surman packed up the orchestral parts used on that occasion, and brought them himself to Manchester; thus enabling the band to have a first rehearsal on Saturday evening only; they had a second on Monday evening, conducted by Mendelssohn himself, when the overture and all the choruses were rehearsed; a further short rehearsal of band and principals took place on the morning of the concert. This was all the preparation the band had, or could have, for want of the music; the choir had been pretty well drilled twice a week, for the last three weeks, by our indefatigable conductor, Mr. John Waddington, the chorus part having by degrees been furnished by Messrs. Ewer & Co.

The principal singers were the same as at Exeter Hall, and were on that account, well up in their parts—they were all perfect—four better singers, or four voices better adapted to the music allotted to them, than Miss Birch, Miss Dolby, Mr. Lockey, and, tho' last not least, Mr. H. Phillips, could not have been secured. Mr. H. Phillips's fine conception, and dramatic delivery, of all the arduous part of the 'Prophet Elijah,' tended so little to the success and appreciation of the work; then Miss Birch's beautiful voice—clear, brilliant, and musical in its loftiest flight—was all that could be desired in the soprano solos. Miss Dolby delighted every body by her quiet, chaste style, and her deep tones were as heartfelt as any that have been heard here for some time. She has evidently never been done justice to before in Manchester. Mr. Lockey was already a favourite, and is vastly improved since he was here before—he gave all he had to do with good taste, and produced quite a sensation. After all, Mendelssohn was the great card, to have got up such a work—in the presence of its author—in the full zenith of his powers—and of his fame, which fills all Europe, is no slight honour to the Hargreaves Choral Society. For years to come, the concert of Tuesday night will be looked back upon with the most delightful reminiscences by hundreds. The opening recitative and overture were a most effective beginning, in fact all went smoothly; at times there were little bits of great beauty, that can be felt, but not described, too short to be specially distinguished in the usual way by a burst of applause or an encore, but dispersed through the entire work. Many of the gems would have been encored no doubt, but from the continuance of the nature of the performance, no sooner is the chorus or the air finished, which has so delighted you, than another has commenced and is going on with new beauties, before you have time to think about it, else how much should we have liked to have heard repeated the air by Mr. Lockey, "It with all your hearts," the beautiful double quartet, "For he shall give his angels," which was admirably done; five resident vocalists, Misses Kenneths, Messrs. Clough, Sheldrick, and James Lasserwood, taking part in it with Misses Birch and Dolby, and Mr. Lockey; but for their length we would have encored if we could, every one of the little episodes, the story in each is so closely adhered to, the music so dramatic and descriptive; the first betwixt the widow and Elijah, with the restoration of her son; the second, Elijah and the Barites, in which we must confess there was much apathy amongst the audience at the splendid chorus, "Baal we cry to thee," which was sung in a manner worthy of the composer—greater praise our chorus could not have or desire—in fact the choruses throughout were marvellously perfect and efficient, yet, strange to say, not one chorus was encored. The next scene, where Elijah sends the youth to look towards the sea—the response "There is nothing," by Miss Birch, with the descriptive holding high note for the above, produced great effect; and the grand chorus, "Thanks be to God," closed the first part very capitally. In the second part we had two encores, the lovely trio of angels, "Lift thine eyes to the mountain," by the two prime donne; and Miss Kenneth, and Miss Dolby's air, "O! rest in the Lord," as sweet a bit of pure devotional melody, and of vocalism too, as ever we listened to. The other great songs in the second part, Miss Birch's "Hear ye Israel," Mr. Phillips's "It is enough" and "For the mountains," were very finely sung. The fourth dramatic scene betwixt Elijah and Jezebel was quite as successful as the three in the first part; and the quartet and chorus, "Holy, holy, is God the Lord," and the quartet, "O! come every one that thirsteth," were most exquisitely sung, and both narrowly escaped encores. The composer was loudly cheered at the conclusion of the final chorus, and right well did he merit the applause. His Elijah will live for ages—we like it better than his Paulus—it is more complete and perfect as a whole—there is much greater variety and contrast, by its being of a more dramatic character;—and throughout there is such appropriateness—every thing one hears is as it seems just what one would wish to hear in connexion with the story—there are no startling efforts after novelty, no chromatic runs after difficulty—by simple and ordinary means, Mendelssohn has produced a work abounding in originality, yet eminently vocal and natural in what has to be sung. May he be spared to a good old age, and in the autumn of his life may his genius be as fertile of its greatest work as it was with his great predecessors, Handel, Haydn, and Beethoven! All honour to the Exeter Hall Society for bringing him to this country!—All honour to our Hargreaves Society for bringing him to Manchester, and for the production of his Elijah!—All honour to our Leader—Mr. Seymour, Conductor—Mr. Waddington, Band and Chorus, for their wonderful success in its performance, considering the paucity of preparation. Elijah will be wanted again next season, depend upon it, and although we can scarcely hope to have the same principals, or the composer with us, there is no doubt the music will be better liked as it becomes better known! How we should like to hear it again on Friday next in London!

THE AFFINITIES.

From the German of G. H. F.

Continued from page 250.

PART II.—CHAPTER XI.

THE WHIMICAL NEIGHBOURS' CHILDREN—A NOVEL.*

Two neighbours' children of good family, a boy and a girl, of such relative ages as would allow them afterwards to marry, were suffered to grow up together with this pleasant prospect, and the parents on both sides rejoiced at the thoughts of the future alliance. But it was soon observed that the project appeared to fail, inasmuch as a strange repugnance between these two excellent dispositions was manifested. Perhaps they were too similar to each other. Both of them were absorbed within themselves, clear in their wishes, firm in their designs; both of them singly were loved and honoured by their playmates. They were always opponents when together, always building up for themselves alone, always destroying one another's projects when they met, not emulating each other in endeavouring to reach one goal, but always battling about one object. They were thoroughly well-conditioned and amiable, and only felt hatred, nay, malice, in reference to each other.

This strange state of things had shown itself even in their childish sports, and still showed itself with increasing years; and, as boys are accustomed to play at war, to divide themselves into parties, and to give each other battle, so did this daring girl once put herself at the head of an army, and fight against the other with such force and spite, that the opposing army would have been disgracefully put to flight, had not her single adversary shown himself very brave, and at last disarmed his opponent, and taken her prisoner. But still she defended herself with such violence, that he, to save his eyes, and, at the same time, not to hurt his enemy, was forced to tear off his silk handkerchief, and with it to tie her hands behind her back.

This she never forgave him; nay, she made such private attempts to injure him, that the parents, who had long paid attention to these strange passions, came to a mutual understanding, and resolved to part the two hostile creatures, and to give up the fond hopes they had formed.

* This is the tale related by the lord's companion to Charlotte and Emma, as described in the preceding chapter.—Translator.

The boy, in his new position, soon distinguished himself. Every kind of instruction succeeded with him. His patrons and his own inclination both destined him for a soldier. Wherever he might be, he was loved and honoured. His excellent nature seemed only to work for the good and comfort of others, and without any distinct consciousness, he felt quite happy in himself at having lost the only adversary whom nature had provided for him.

The girl, on the other hand, went at once into an altered position. Her years, her increasing growth, and, still more, a certain inward feeling, caused her to withdraw from the violent sports which she had hitherto been accustomed to practice in company with the boys. On the whole, it seemed that something was wanting to her; there was nothing about her worthy to excite her hate. She had yet found no one whom she could love.

A young man, older than the former adversary, in her neighbourhood,—of rank, property, and importance, beloved in society, and sought after by ladies, bestowed on her all his affections. It was the first time that a friend, a lover, a servant, had troubled himself about her. The preference he gave her above others who were older, more accomplished, more brilliant, and had more claims than herself, pleased her much. His constant attention, without intrusiveness—his faithful adherence, on the occasion of many unpleasant contingencies—his suit, which though avowed to her parents, was calm, and only hoping, for indeed she was yet very young—all this prepossessed her in his favour, while habit and the external relations between them already assumed by the world, also did their part. She had so often been called a bride, that she at last considered herself one; and neither she nor any one else thought that any further ordeal was necessary, than for her to change the ring with one who had so long been reckoned her bridegroom.

The quiet course which the whole affair had taken, was not even hurried by the betrothed. On both sides, all was suffered to go on thus; they were pleased to live together, and wished yet thoroughly to enjoy the fine time of year as a spring of future and more serious life.

In the meanwhile the youth, now at a distance, cultivated himself to the highest degree, gained a well-merited step in his destined career, and came, with permission, to visit his friends. He was now again brought into contact with his fair neighbour, in a very natural, but, at the same time, very singular manner. She had, in latter times, fostered only kindly, family feelings, such as would belong to a bride, and was in harmony with everything which surrounded her. It was not worthy of hatred; and of hatred she was incapable—nay, the childish hatred, which had been but a dim acknowledgment of internal worth, now expressed itself in joyous astonishment, pleased contemplation, affable concessions, an approval half-willing, half-unwilling, and inevitable; and all this was mutual. A long separation gave occasion to longer conversations. Even their childish folly seemed as a comical reminiscence, now they were more enlightened, and it seemed as if that tantalizing hatred must at least be compensated by a kind, attentive demeanour—as if that violent mistake must not remain any longer without an express mutual acknowledgment.

On his side all remained within reasonable, desirable bounds. His rank, his position, his endeavours, his ambition so abundantly occupied him, that he received with pleasure the kindness of the fair bride as a thankworthy gift; without, on that account, considering her in any relation to himself, or grudging her bridegroom, with whom, moreover, he stood on the best of terms.

With her, on the other hand, appearances were quite different. She seemed to have awakened from a dream. The battle with her young neighbour had been her first passion; and yet this battle was, under the form of repugnance, only a violent, and, as it were, innate inclination. Even in her memory it never appeared otherwise than that she had always loved him. She smiled at that hostile pursuit, with arms in hand; she wished to recall his disarming her as the pleasantest reminiscence; she fancied that she had felt the greatest happiness when he had bound her; and all that she had planned for his injury and annoyance, seemed to her no more than an innocent means of attracting his attention. She cursed the separation—she lamented the sleep into which she had fallen—she execrated the lingering, dreamy habit by which she could get such an insignificant bridegroom. She was changed, doubly changed, backwards or forwards, as one may please to take it.

If any one could have unfolded and shared her feelings, which she kept secret, he would not have blamed her; for indeed the bridegroom would not bear a comparison with the neighbour, whenever they were seen side by side. If to the one a certain degree of reliance could not be denied, the other inspired the most implicit confidence. If the society of the one was liked, the other was desired as a companion; and if there was any thought of a higher sympathy, of extraordinary cases, doubts might have been entertained as to the one, while perfect security was felt in the other. For such peculiarities there is in women a certain inborn tact, and they have both cause and opportunity to cultivate it.

The more the fair bride quite secretly nurtured such feelings, the less any one was able to say what might be cited in favour of the bridegroom, what the position of the parties, and what their duty might seem to counsel and command—nay, what an unalterable necessity might seem irrevocably to require; so much the more did this beautiful heart favour its one-sidedness; and while, on the one hand, she was indissolubly bound by the world and her family, by the bridegroom and her own promise, and, on the other, the rising youth made no secret of his views, plans, and prospects, only acting to her as a faithful, and not over-tender brother—his immediate departure being one of the topics of conversation,—it seemed to her that her childish spirit of former days, with all its tricks and violence, was again reviving, and was now upon a higher step of life, indignantly arming itself, that it might act more importantly and destructively. She resolved to die, and thus to punish for his want of sympathy, the one formerly hated, and now beloved; and since she could not possess him, at least to unite herself for ever to his imagination—to his remorse. He should not get rid of her lifeless image—he should not cease to reproach himself for not having known, inquired into, appreciated her feelings.

This strange fancy accompanied her everywhere. She concealed it under all kinds of shapes; and though she appeared to people very singular, no one was attentive or clever enough to discover the true internal cause.

In the meanwhile, friends, relations, acquaintances, had exhausted themselves in preparing various festivities. Scarcely a day passed in which something new and unexpected was not contrived—scarcely was there a beautiful spot or landscape which was not adorned and arranged for the reception of many joyous faces. The new comer also wished to contribute his share before his departure, and invited the young couple, with a more select family circle, to a water party. They went on board a large, handsome, well-decorated ship; one of those yachts which contain a little saloon and some cabins, and endeavour to transfer to the water the convenience of the land.

They went along the great stream with music. During the greatest heat of the day, the party had assembled in the places below to amuse themselves with games of wit and chance. The young host, who could never remain inactive, had placed himself at the rudder to relieve the old captain, who had fallen asleep, and indeed the waking man had need of all his foresight, when he approached a spot where two islands narrowed the bed of the river, and while they extended their flat pebbly banks, now on one side, now on the other, formed a dangerous shallow. The careful and sharp seeing steersman was almost tempted to waken the master, but he took courage, and went towards the strait. At this moment his fair enemy appeared upon deck with a wreath of flowers in her hair. She took it off, and threw it upon the steersman. "Take this as a remembrance," she cried. "Do not disturb me!" he cried in return, while he picked up the wreath; "I have need of all my powers and my attention." "I will not disturb you any more," cried she; "you will not see me again." So saying, she hastened towards the fore part of the ship, from which she sprang into the water. Some voices cried, "Save her—save her—she is drowning!" He was in the most frightful perplexity. The old master wakened at the noise, and wished to take the rudder, which the young man wished to give him, but there was now no time to change the mastership. The ship was stranded; and at the same moment, casting off the heaviest articles of his dress, he leaped into the water, and swam after his fair enemy.

Water is a kindly element for him who is familiar with it, and knows how to treat it. It bore him, and the accomplished swimmer governed it. He had soon reached the fair one, who was borne on before him; he caught her, and managed to raise and carry her. Both were borne along forcibly by the stream, until they had the islets far behind them; and the river began to flow kindly and commodiously. It was not till now that he took courage, and recovered from the first pressing necessity, in which he had acted only mechanically, and without reflection; he looked round with lifted head, and according to the best of his ability, steered towards a flat, bushy spot, which pleasantly and opportunely extended into the river. Here he set his lovely prize upon dry land; but no breath of life was to be found in her. He was in despair, when a beaten path, which ran through the bushes, flashed upon his eyes. He loaded himself anew with his dear burden, soon saw a solitary dwelling, and reached it. There he found good people—a young married couple. The misfortune, the urgency of the case was speedily told. What, after some reflection, he required, was afforded. A bright fire was burning; woollen coverlets were spread over a couch; furs, skins, and other articles of warmth that were at hand, were speedily brought. Here the desire of saving surmounted every other consideration. Nothing was omitted that could recall to life the beautiful body, which was half-stiffened and naked. They succeeded. She opened her eyes, saw her friend, and embraced his neck with her heavenly arms. Thus she remained for a long time, a torrent of tears streamed from her eyes, and completed her recovery. "Wilt thou leave me," she cried, "when I find thee so again?" "Never!" cried he—"never!" and he did not know what he said, nor what he did. "Only take care of thyself," he added; "take care of thyself! Think of thyself, for thine own sake and mine."

She now thought of herself, and remarked, for the first time, the situation in which she was. She could not feel ashamed before her beloved—her preserver; but she willingly dismissed him, that he might attend to himself, for all that was about him was wet and dripping.

The young married pair held a consultation. The husband offered to the youth, and the wife offered to the maiden, the wedding-dresses which were hanging up, and were quite complete, so as to fit out a couple from head to foot. In a short time the two adventurers were not only dressed, but adorned. They looked charmingly, gazed at each other when they met, and fell with unbounded passion, though soon smiling at their disguise, into each other's arms. The strength of youth, and the excitement of love perfectly restored them in a few moments, and nothing was wanting but music to summon them to dance.

To have passed from water to earth, from death to life, from the family circle into a desert, from despair to rapture, from indifference to affection, nay, passion, all in one moment—this the head was not sufficient to bear; it would burst, or be perplexed. The heart must do its best, if such a mission was to be borne.

Quite absorbed in each other, it was not till after some time that they could think of the care and anxiety of those left behind; and, indeed, it was not without uneasiness that they thought how they should meet them again. "Shall we fly? Shall we conceal ourselves?" said the youth. "We will remain together," said she, as he hung from his neck.

The countryman who had heard from them the history of the stranded ship, hastened to the shore, without further enquiries. The vessel happily came sailing up; it had been set afloat with much trouble. They were sailing about with uncertainty, in the hope that the lost might be again found. Therefore, when the countryman, by shouts and signals drew the attention of the people in the ship, ran to a spot where an advantageous landing place appeared, and did not desist from his signals and shouts, the ship turned towards the shore—and what a spectacle there was when they landed! The parents of the betrothed couple first pressed to the bank—the enamoured bridegroom had almost lost his senses. They had scarcely learned that the dear children were saved, than the latter, in their singular costume, came out of the bush. They were not recognized till they came quite close. "Whom do I see?" cried the mothers—"Whom do I see?" cried the fathers. The rescued ones then threw themselves at their feet. "Your children," they cried—"one pair." "Forgive us!" cried the girl—

"Give us your blessing," cried the youth—"Give us your blessing," cried both, while every body gazed in silent wonder. "Your blessing!" was heard for a third time—and who could have refused it?

(To be continued.)

. To prevent misunderstanding, it may be stated that the copyright of this translation belongs solely to the translator.

SONNET.

No. XXXI.

When I recal the hist'ry of our love,
And bring its various incidents to mind,
Such times of bitter agony I find,
I wonder how against despair I strove.
Then I find other passages, which prove
That e'en when all around look'd most unkind,
Love some transporting rapture had design'd,
Which ev'ry thought of anguish could remove;
And plainly in that hist'ry can I see,
How by some secret pow'r our love was fated,
Binding us heart to heart with subtle charms.
I did not seek thee, and thou sought'st not me,
But suddenly we found our souls were mated.
And that our home was in each other's arms. N. D.

ANCIENT CONCERTS.

THE second took place on Wednesday night, in the Hanover Square Rooms. The attendance was good. The Concert was under the direction of the Duke of Wellington, who provided the following programme.

PART I.

Chorus, Domine Jean Christe, (Requiem in C minor,) solos by Miss Messent, Miss Dolby, and Mr. Lockey,	Cherubini.
Air, Where'er you walk, (Semele,) Mr. Lockey,	Handel.
Aria, Verdi Frati, (Alicina) Miss Messent	Handel.
Air, In infancy, (Artaxerxes) Miss Dolby,	Dr. Arne.
Aria, Guardami un poco, (La Scuola del Mariti) Madame Caradori,	Martini.
Air, In diesen heiligen Hallen, (Zauberflöte) Herr Staudigl,	Mozart.
Solo and Chorus, Non toccan campana, (national) Madame Caradori	Mozart.
Aria, Deh vieni, Dile. Jenny Lutzer,	Stradella A. D. 1690.
Paraphrasi Pietà, Signor Gardoni
Trio and Chorus, Sound the loud timbrel, Solos by Madame Caradori, Miss Dolby and Mr. Machin	Alston.
Chorus, Worthy is the Lamb, (Messiah,)	Handel.

PART II.

Overture (Henri Quatre),	G. P. Martini.
Air and Chorus, Charmante Gabrielle, (Henri Quatre) Madame Caradori,
Glee, Since first I saw your face, Miss Dolby, Messrs. Lockey, Barnby, and Machin,	Ford, A. D. 1690.
Solo and Semi-chorus, Lieti fiori, (Proserpina,) Madame Caradori,	Winter.
Recit., And God said,
Air, Now heaven in fullest glory shone, } Creation Herr Staudigl,	Haydn.
Aria, O cara immagine, (Il Flauto Magico,) Signor Gardoni,	Mozart.
Recit. Crudele, ah! no, } Dile. Jenny Lutzer,	Mozart.
Aria, Non mi dir
Chorus, Let their celestial concerts, (Samson)	Handel.

There was little or no novelty in the above, and the entire absence of instrumental music, with the exception of Martini's very poor overture, made the selection monotonous in the extreme. Among the best things in the first part was Mr. Lockey's air from Semele, which that rising vocalist gave with infinite taste. Miss Dolby's "In infancy" was also a charming and irreproachable specimen of quiet and expressive singing. Staudigl was splendid in the air from Zauberflöte. Signor Gardoni produced a most favourable impression in the quaint old air of Stradella, which he rendered with consummate taste and purity. Dile Jenny Lutzer, whose retirement from public life has been a matter of so much regret, and whose return will give so much pleasure to all who are moved by good singing, was heard to the greatest advantage in Mozart's beautiful "Deh vieni," in which she displays immense feeling, and a style that may truly be termed classical. This lady is a singer of the right school, and we trust, will be a frequent attraction at our concerts during the present season. In the second act we were much pleased with Ford's beautiful glee, "Since first I saw your face," which was excellently sung. Standigl's air from the Creation was a great treat; few songs are better suited to the voice of this great basso. Gardoni, in Mozart's beautiful "O cara imagine," showed the stuff that was in him. The oftener we hear this young and accomplished singer the more we like him, and our prejudice in his favour is not likely to be weakened by hearing him leave Bellini and Donizetti for a while in favor of the incomparable Mozart, whose most lovely song could not have been interpreted with more tenderness and truth than by the popular Italian tenor of Her Majesty's Theatre. Mdle. Lutzer also won golden opinions in the magnificent "Non mi dir," which she delivered with wonderful animation and skill; it was altogether a most charming and truly artistic performance. Of the rest of the concert we have nothing to say. On the whole it was a dull selection. Sir H. Bishop conducted, and Mr. Lucas presided at the organ. The chorusses were more noisy than correct, and the band was not so steady as it might have been. Among the auditors was Jenny Lind.

CONCERTS.

CHORAL HARMONISTS.—We attended the sixth meeting of this Society, at the London Tavern, on Monday. The selection consisted almost entirely of extracts from Beethoven and Mendelssohn, evincing the desire of the committee to maintain that pure taste for art which was originated some twenty years ago in the city, by the establishment of a Society entitled "The Classical Harmonists," and of which the Society whose performances we now record is the successor. The first part consisted of Beethoven's "Mount of Olives." There was no particular defect in its performance beyond a general want of finish which an efficient rehearsal would have obviated. After Converso's madrigal, "When all alone," 1575, which commenced the second part, and was encored, came a selection from Mendelssohn's music to the "Midsummer's Night Dream." The overture and scherzo were played by the band with less precision than we have been accustomed to. The duet and chorus of fairies, "Ye spotted snakes," was well sung; but the notturno and wedding march was remarkably deficient, out of time, out of tune, and altogether wrong. The last piece in the selection was the solo and chorus of fairies, "I thro' this house give glim'ring light," which was effectively rendered. Mr. Lockey sang next Mendelssohn's canzonet "The garland," with a chasteness of style, beauty, and pronunciation, which won for him an unanimous encore. Miss Williams sang an Italian song, by Rossi, "Ah verdimi," and then a cantata by Mendelssohn, translated by Mr. Bartholomew, called "O sons of art," was performed. This cantata was written expressly for one of the great open air German meetings, we believe the one at Bonn, some two or three years since. It consists of a movement in B flat major for chorus (male voices only throughout) and quartett in common time andante maestoso, an allegro in three-four time in F, concluding with a fine vivace allegro movement in the original key. It is a magnificent work, but not adapted for the concert room, all the accompaniments being written for the brass. These instruments, moreover, were horribly out of tune, and we don't know when we listened to a composition of Mendelssohn's so badly performed as this was. The selection from Beethoven's opera of "King Stephen," which closed the evening was not much better performed, and in concluding this account we are bound as impartial critics to record this meeting as having made a decided retrograde movement. However much we respect a society professing such good objects as does the Choral Harmonists, we cannot allow slovenliness in their performances to go unproved, especially when the materials are good and only require a little proper care and attention to be well developed. The Misses Williams, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. Machin were principal singers. Mr. Dundo led the band, and Mr. Westrop conducted as usual, both gentlemen using their endeavours to redeem the erratic disposition of their forces, but without effect.

EXETER HALL.—The fourth concert concluded the proposed series which Mr. Hullah's pupils have dignified by the epithet "Historical." The programme was selected from the works of Crotch, Attwood, W. Russell, Webbe, Shield, S. Smith, Dibdin, Calcott, Storace, Stevens, Horsley and Bishop. On the whole this selection suited the popular ear much better than the other three, as the numerous encores testified. It contained very little novelty, but we presume that novelty was not essential to the development of the intention of these performances. The execution of the choir was far more finished and far more energetic than at the preceding concerts. The glees, sung in full chorus, were more effective than glees are usually. The principal vocalists were Miss Dolby, Mrs. Weiss, Messrs. Manvers, Seguin, Novello, Clifford, Gill and Kench. We cannot praise them so unequivocally as the choir. Though there were many encores, few were entirely deserved, and the majority were attributable to the popular style of the music. Mr. Seguin's bass solos in Horsley's glee, "Cold is Cadwallo's tongue," is entitled to all commendation, and we have never heard a purer and lovelier specimen of ballad-singing than Miss Dolby's "Nod that died at sea," one of Dibdin's most exquisite inspirations. The other demands for repetition were decidedly injudicious, and hurtful to the general effect of the performance. The mania for encoring everything has of late become a perfect nuisance. If you go to a concert now, you must hear enough for half a dozen, or leave before it is half over. Mr. Oliver May was the accompanist and Mr. Edward May the conductor of the evening. Both did their duties ably, and Mr. Willy's select but efficient little orchestra was of the highest utility in the course of the performances. Now that the series of "Historical Concerts" is concluded, it may not be out of place to say a word or two on the manner in which their proposed object has been carried out. We regret to be compelled to urge that the title assumed has proved altogether a misnomer. The selections from the dead composer have been ill balanced, unfavourable for the most part as specimens of their styles, and manifestly incomplete. The name of Pinto, one of the greatest geniuses this country has given birth to, has not appeared once in the four programmes. And yet Pinto's canzonets are little inferior to Haydn's in beauty and ingenuity. The selections from Purcell, for the most part, have been made from his least interesting and least masterly productions. The specimens from the cathedral writers have been bald and scanty; and yet herein consists the glory and richness of our early school. Wesley, one of the best, was omitted altogether. The prominence accorded to such insipid and worthless compositions as those of Henry Lawes and others, was ill considered and detrimental to the end proposed, that of illustrating the history of the English vocal school by the best specimens of the best writers. But the most incomplete and absurd of all the programmes was the fourth and last, which, assuming to illustrate by examples the works of our latest composers, leaves out nine tenths of their names from the programme. In the entire list we find but two names of living composers, Horsley and Bishop. Where were Samuel Wesley, Charles Horn, John Barnett, Balfe, Wallace, Macfarren, Sterndale Bennett, Edward Loder, Rooke, Lucas, Henry Smart, Charles Horsley, Mudie, Rodwell, Alexander Lee, &c., &c., the least of whom is as much entitled to consideration for his productions, in respect to their influence upon the English school of vocal music, as the majority of those whose names figured so conspicuously? And what business had Storace in the programme, who was not an Englishman, but a pilferer from Martini, Piccini, Paisiello, and other of his Italian compatriots? The truth is, that the attempt to illustrate a subject of so much interest and importance, in four concerts, was altogether preposterous. Twelve concerts would no more than suffice for its ample consideration. Under these circumstances it behoves us to pronounce the "Historical Concerts" a failure. That they may have materially assisted the funds dedicated to the foundation of a new music hall for Mr. Hullah, we hope and have little doubt—since the attendances have been numerous. This object was praiseworthy and creditable to Mr. Hullah's pupils, who doubtless felt much gratitude for the good that has been effected by that gentleman in the introduction of the Wilhem method of vocal class-teaching to this country. But a good cause is damaged by a flag that bears false colors; and the designation of "Historical Concerts" being fictitious, was injudicious and detrimental.

FEMALE AMERICAN SERENADERS.—When the London public had been surfeited usque ad nauseam with the sable vocalists of transatlantic regions. and at the moment when it was supposed that want of interest in their performances would have hurled them for ever into oblivion, up starts a new troop of candidates of the same dark complexion, pretending to similar efforts, but having a totally different claim on the popular sympathies. The new American Serenaders are composed entirely of the fair sex, and are exhibiting at St. James's Assembly Rooms (late Crockford's): a temporary theatre being erected in the large room for their performance. The Company consists of sundry vocalists, the principals, who sing solos, or in concert, and a band of female choristers. The entertainments differ but little from those given to the public at the St. James's Theatre and elsewhere, but they are rendered infinitely more interesting by their being presented by members of the gentle sex. Perhaps the ladies have something of an advantage over the gentlemen in their performances, these being less brusque, and more euphonious. The Female Serenaders have been evidently well instructed, for their voices blend together capitally, and the chorus chimes in with great effect. The Assembly-room has been crowded day and night since their first appearance, and most of the nobility and gentry of the metropolis have already visited the Serenaders. Their performances will well repay a visit to the Rooms in St. James's Street.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

HAYMARKET.—The School for Scandal was repeated on Thursday before a crowded and elegant audience. Sheridan's comedy is always a bonne bouche both to the "old school" and to "Young England." The former will nevertheless sigh and exclaim, "Ah, I remember when the School for Scandal was the School for Scandal. I remember Miss Farren, Mrs. Abington, Mrs. Jordan, and dear Mrs. Davison in Lady Teazle—ah! there was acting. Where now is your Lewis, your Elliston, your Jones, your Dowton? We shall never see such actors again! However, I must say Mrs. Nisbett is very, very handsome, she is full of good spirits and vivacity, and her laugh is certainly deliciously joyous and fresh, and she dresses and looks the Lady Teazle to perfection; and Mrs. Glover, dear, delightful Mrs. Glover, there never was a better Mrs. Candour than Mrs. Glover's, and I will allow Farren, yes, Farren, to be an excellent Sir Peter, his screen scene is an inimitable piece of acting, and Hudson, too, makes a good rattling Charles, and young Lester, I will say is the best Sir Benjamin I have seen for many a long day, he both looks and acts the part inimitably, and so take it altogether I suppose I must not grumble any longer;" to which "Young England" agrees, and says "he is quite content to see the School for Scandal as now acted, and that he will certainly recommend all his friends to go and see and enjoy it as he has done, and intends to do, every night that the bills of the little theatre in the Haymarket are headed with "This evening will be performed Sheridan's comedy of the School for Scandal."

PRINCESS'S.—On Thursday evening this theatre was densely crowded to witness the début of a lady who has been known for some time in private circles as an elegant and accomplished ballad singer. She is sister to the celebrated pianist, Osborne, and has been latterly studying for the stage with great assiduity. The part chosen by the fair debutante was Amina in Sonnambula, and, if we may judge from a first appearance, we must say, no better part could be selected to exhibit her vocal and histrionic capabilities. Her performance of Amina was highly creditable, and as a first attempt, must be considered excellent. Her voice is a mezzo soprano of good quality and great flexibility, which she manages with perfect ease. She has fine capability of expression, and her method of vocalization is founded in the best school. As an actress she promises to stand very prominent. There were portions of her performance which were really great, and proved she had the highest requisite for tragic acting—abstraction. For a first endeavour we have seen no artist more perfectly at home on the stage. The fair debutante is lady-like in appearance, and possesses a countenance of great intelligence and expression. She may be pronounced decidedly handsome. The applause she obtained throughout the evening was uproarious, and she was called for at the fall of the curtain, and received with every demonstration of enthusiasm. The opera has been performed so frequently of late at the Princess's and undergone so many criticisms from our pen that we do not think it necessary to dwell upon the performance in this case. We may say that Mr. Allen played Elvino in his usual artistic style, and that the other executants were as hitherto respectable in their several parts.

SURREY THEATRE.—The new nautical drama in two acts, from the prolific and experienced pen of Mr. E. Stirling, entitled the Anchor of Hope or the Seaman's Star, continues to attract crowded houses. Mr. E. Stirling as the Jew Pedlar, and Mr. J. T. Johnson as Tom Topreef, a true British tar, are both capital in their respective parts. The ladies too are excellent. Mrs. Ware's Mary Wheatly and Miss Vaughan's Emily Dunmore merit considerable approbation. The drama is likely to have a long run and to bring lots of money to the treasury, and to add another to the many triumphs of Mr. E. Stirling's versatile dramatic talent.

FRENCH PLAYS.—Mademoiselle Rose Chéri still continues to attract crowded houses, even Her Majesty the Queen submits, nothing loth, to the charm of her empire. On Monday last Her Majesty arrived at the theatre at eight o'clock, accompanied by Prince Albert, and remained to the end of the performance. Un Roman Intime was given for the last time, and, considering that Mademoiselle Rose Chéri and Monsieur Rhozevil have alternately, alone, and together, to fill up rather better than an hour, it requires no small degree of talent in both the actors to do this without creating ennui or being monotonous. This piece was followed by Irène, or Le Magnétisme, by Messrs. Scribe and Lockroy. According to our Parisian contemporaries, we expected to find one of those neatly constructed, elegant, and interesting pieces for which M. Scribe is so celebrated, and which were the foundation of his reputation; we expected moreover to find a part peculiarly adapted to Mademoiselle Rose Chéri's capabilities, and which, written expressly for her own peculiar talent, would bring it forward in bold relief. We were disappointed in both our anticipations; not that we consider the piece bad, but rather hung on a rotten impossible frame-work, and clumsily put together. Magnetism has never had any hold on the public mind in England; it has suffered from the ridiculous exaggeration of its professors, or it may be dupes, from the cheats and tricks played off in public rooms, and the scandalous scenes enacted in private assemblies. Even were it a thousand times more real than it pretends to be, the public mind is closed against it, and fifty miracles would not raise it from the dead. Such is the subject chosen by Messrs. Scribe and Lockroy, or rather written by the latter, for we prefer taking it for granted that the former merely lent his name, and had nothing further to do with the matter. M. Scribe has too much tact and judgment to render his principal actress ridiculous, and that too in which she declares her love so pure, so disinterested, so ingenuous, and devoted. Fancy Monsieur Rhozevil in the position of a Dupotet, or the empire of the notorious Alexis; his hands outstretched, pawing the air, and enticing a young girl along a gallery, down a staircase, into an arm-chair; there questioning her as to whom she loves, what is his name—his name Je le veux— and she, after the customary struggle, breathing forth vows of love and tenderness and exalted plans of reform for her dissipated lover.—Nonsense!—such a scene is enough to jeopardise a reputation less firmly established than that of Mademoiselle Rose Chéri. There is but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous, and, unfortunately, here the limits of sound discretion were overstepped. Such a scene repeated in the second act, could not have been written by M. Scribe. Otherwise there is some smart writing, although rather hasardé at times. The character of La Baronne de Saint Savin, well played by Mademoiselle Angèle, is an amusing and witty conception, and gives rise to some laughable incidents. Her romantic display of affection for her admirers, her talent in making them believe that she never lived before and must die if their attachment be not eternal, although she has more than one intrigue to answer for, and a husband still alive into the bargain, served greatly to enliven the play. The acting was generally good, Mademoiselle Rose Chéri, in spite of the imperfections of her part, was charming and interesting in the extreme; M. Rhozevil played the part of the repentant rake with warmth and much feeling. M. Langeval is a careful actor, and, considering that his is all up-hill work, having to enact for the most part either a heavy father, or a tyrannical husband, or a despot of some sort, he displays much talent, and never spoils any thing. Mademoiselle Céline Fouquet made a sprightly and coquettish little aubergiste, and added much to the success of the piece by her bustling gaiety and hearty, merry laughter. Rebecca is a Jewess, who has fallen in love with a certain Count Pallavicini, and who is beloved by Ascanio; both the gentlemen are in prison; and Ascanio at the request of his relations who wish to prevent his marrying the Jewess. The count, who is condemned to die, marries the Jewess, intending to bequeath her to Ascanio, but a revolution takes place, and he is obliged to solicit a divorce to get rid of his wife; but in the meanwhile, falls in love with her, and on his discovering that she loves him and not Ascanio, he revokes the divorce, and all is for the best, with the exception that Ascanio is done out of his wife. The piece is rather heavy, and would lead us to believe that, even as Homer occasionally sleeps, according to Horace, so M. Scribe may sometimes be caught napping. Mademoiselle Rose Chéri dressed and looked the devoted, innocent Jewess to perfection. We must not omit to mention a scene between her and Mademoiselle Duverger which, although bordering at times on the scabreux, was well received, and excited much merriment in the house.

PROVINCIAL.

THE MANCHESTER MADRIGAL SOCIETY.—This society's annual assembly took place at the Town Hall on the evening of Thursday last. The auditory was numerous, and, of course, highly respectable; and the concert was in every way calculated to afford the friends of the members considerable gratification.

PROGRAMME—PART I.

Motet, "O Lord, incline thine ear," from the Gregorian Mass "Pro Angelis." Madrigal, "Spring returns," Luca Marenzio, 1570.—Ditto, "The white delightful swan," Urazio Vecchi, 1580.—Ballet, "Dainty fine sweet nymph," Thomas Morley, 1595.—Madrigal, "Ye pearls of snowy whiteness," Giov. Croce, 1590.—Ditto, "Ladies I fain would warn ye," Giov. Feretti, 1575.—Motet, God who madest earth and heaven." Ogden, Madrigal, "Stay, Corydon," John Wilbye, 1600.—Glee (full choir), "When winds breathe soft," S. Webbe.

PART II.

Anthem, "God is gone up," Dr. Croft, 1734.—Madrigal, "Die not, fond man," Job Ward, 1612.—Ditto, "No din of rolling drum," Ales. Striggio, 1580.—Ballet, "You that won't," Thom. Morley, 1595.—Evening Hymn, "The night is Henry Purcell, 1678.—Madrigal, "Where'er my Cynthia," Giov. Palestrina, 1580.—Ditto, "Come again sweet love," Jno Dowland, 1597.—Ditto, "Lady, John Wilbye, 1598.—Ditto, "All creatures now," John Bennett, 1600.—Let us sing, "Jerusalem Saville, 1667.

the society's clever maestro del coro, conducted the Thursday, and by a due observance on the part of the vocalists of the various signs and marks employed by their author, tended to produce that light and shade, which render the madrigal so pleasing and so powerful withal in its operation upon the senses. The applause bestowed by the audience at the conclusion of each piece, was ample evidence of their satisfaction, and served to illustrate the argument, that both the quaintness of the plain counterpoint, and the elaborate character of the ricercate parts of the madrigal, may be fully appreciated where madrigals form the substance of a musical performance. The madrigals "Stay Corydon," &c., by Wilbye; "Die not, fond man," &c., by Ward; and "No din of rolling drum," &c., by Striggio, were excellently given.

MACREADY'S RICHELIEU.—"Circumstances deprived us of the pleasure of seeing Mr. Macready's Richelieu, on Saturday evening. The following is furnished by a critical friend, on whose taste we have the fullest reliance:—"On Saturday evening, Mr. Macready appeared in this arduous character; and though Richelieu himself finished his career of caballing and intrigue, of imprisonment, deprivations, and executions, as early as the age of 58, being then only thirteen years after he had (according to Voltaire) received his patent of prime minister, yet it appears that he had been the victim of a disorder, which ultimately ended fatally. And hence we think Mr. Macready represented the cardinal as feeble from his malady—but still retaining all the vigour of his mind, which had only been excited and strengthened, not weakened nor subdued; and from the nice discrimination evinced in the exhibition of the contrast between bodily weakness and mental power, we think that his conception and personation were just and faultless. Whether we give precedence to his more tender recollections of the friendship between himself and the father of his ward, and his unceasing efforts to protect and promote the happiness of Julie, the irritability and contempt which Richelieu evinced to royalty itself, or the generous pardon of Adrian De Mauprat, and the accompanying expression of his varying countenance as an echo to the words, all was equally effective. The scenes that were the most prominent and the most awful (such is the appropriate epithet), were that in which he bids defiance to the order of the king for the appearance of Julie before his majesty,—when the Carnival draws the hallowed circle of the church around his charge,—when he summons up all his energies to breathe defiance to the mandate of the imbecile Lewis;—and, when the auditor is fearful that the great actor has either overstepped the bounds of nature, or must bring the climax to a rant,—he sinks, exhausted and powerless. In dignity, he reminded us of John Kemble's Lear, in his better days; or Edmund Kean's Othello when he uttered, in his deep melancholy, distracted manner, 'Othello's occupation's gone;' and in the final scene of all, where, after playing once more the 'old fox,' and regaining the power of prime minister from the king, he re-assumes the bodily capacity to govern, to punish, and avenge, and revels in the luxury of retaliating upon his enemies,—with what sarcasm he treats Gaston d'Orleans,—with what contempt he banishes Sieur Beringhen, as if unworthy of the honour of an execution,—and with what playful dexterity he wards off the sycophantish applications of his former instruments. It is nearly invidious to select, where all are so perfect, one scene from the rest, for though one may exhibit more physical capability than another, the whole was characterised by such propriety and adaptation of voice, manner, and action, that we once more pronounce Mr. Macready in the very first range of all actors, living or dead; and this opinion was ratified by the plaudits of a very full house. It were unjust to omit the chaste performance of Mrs. Charles Gill, in Julie. Perhaps her happiest effect was in the scene with the cardinal, where she dissipates his fear, contained in his enquiries if she had yielded to the importunities of the king. Her answer was conveyed in the finest expression of indignant, womanly innocence. Mr. Brooke also sustained his part with ability and judgment."—Manchester Guardian.

GUILFORD.—The Choral Society gave, on the 15th instant, a very interesting performance of Sacred Music, which, as usual, was well attended. Among the concerted pieces were anthems and motets including Weber's, "When winds breathe soft," and Dr. Crotch's "Methinks I hear the full celestial choir." The former was well rendered by the members of the society and the latter, being performed by the chorus in an anti-room while the solo was sung in the open hall, had an excellent effect. Miss E. Byers and Miss Duval were the only professional who gave their assistance on this occasion. Miss B. gave Mendelssohn's "Jerusalem, Jerusalem," in a sweet and effective manner: it met with great applause and was re-demanded. "The Last Day," a descriptive hymn by Mrs. Lemare, the conductor, was also well rendered by this lady. Miss Duval, who has a fine contralto voice, sang "But the Lord is mindful," also from St. Paul, while the duetts, introduced for these ladies, were delightfully executed. Crotch's anthem, "Hear my Prayer, O, God!" was among the best performances of the evening, the interesting programme closing with Haydn's chorus, "The Marvelous Works." The concert did not terminate until a later hour than is usual at the society's meetings, but the audience were well pleased to sit attentively to the last. A review of the performances of the Guilford Choral Society will show that from the complete oratorio every description of choral writing is in due course by them brought under the notice of the locality, while for the general accommodation both morning and evening concerts are given.

BATH.—Mr. and Mrs. Millar's Soirées, are about being brought to a close for the season, the soirée on Wednesday last being the last one of the series. On that occasion some delightful compositions were executed by Mr. and Mrs. Millar and Miss Perry; and Mr. Julian Adams, at the request of Mr. Millar, obligingly performed two fantasias on the piano-forte. It may not, perhaps, be out of place, or uninteresting to our readers, to mention here, that Mr. Millar had only that day returned from Leeds, where he had been officiating, on Monday, as primo tenore at a concert given in honour of Sir H. R. Bishop, at which a programme consisting of some thirty pieces selected from the writings of the talented composer, was performed in the presence of an immense auditory, conducted by Sir Henry Bishop himself, attired in his gown as a Mus. Bac. Mr. and Mrs. Millar's last soirée takes place on Wednesday, the 28th instant.—Bath Herald.

